Why, sir, this oil belongs to whom? It belongs to the public, not to the States, not to some administration, not to some committee of Congress. It belongs to the people. You have here and have had around the doors of Congress and thronging the rooms of the committees that deal with these subjects the representatives of the greatest monopolies in the world asking to get this legislation through according to terms agreeable to them.

During the course of his remarks Senator La Follette read into the RECORD numerous telegrams and letters of protest against the bill from those interested in preserving the public oil lands of the United States and preventing their being exploited by private oil corporations.

It was in an attempted answer to this direct and serious charge of the late Senator La Follette that the Senator from Montana divulged the fact, offered in defense of his attitude at that time, that the whole scheme of turning public oil lands over to private corporations was fathered by the leaders of the Democratic Party, with Secretary Lane as the head of the movement. In other words, instead of answering Senator La Follette's charges that the leasing act which he was supporting would work out in favor of private oil interests, the Senator from Montana attempted to explain his position by citing the fact that he was in complete harmony with the leaders of the Democratic Party. His words were as follows (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 58, pt. 5, p. 4742):

The genesis of this bill goes back to a bill which was introduced in 1913 or 1914, it being in all essential particulars like this, although of course differing some in details. That bill was introduced by myself, having been prepared by a committee called together by Secretary Lane, consisting of the chairmen of the Committees on Public Lands, the chairmen of the Committees on Mines and Mining, and the chairmen of the Committees on Agriculture, if my recollection is correct, of the Senate and House of Representatives. They, in conjunction with Secretary Lane and assistants, prepared the bill. That is all I care to say about this being a Standard Oil bill.

I read these comments because the other day the Senator from Montana said he had no recollection of ever being interrogated by the late Senator La Follette with respect to this situation, and he then attempted to introduce the late Senator La Follette's attitude as a reason for his present position. This is an alibi which will not stand the test of the record. The attempt of the Senator in that debate to justify his position by quoting Senator La Follette was made in answer to my repeated interrogations as to the circumstances under which former Secretary Lane resigned his position in the Cabinet after a controversy with President Wilson in connection with oil leases. The Senator evaded a direct answer, and other Senators, both on this side and the other side of the Chamber, took occasion to defend the record of the late Secretary Lane and to rebuke me for introducing his name into this discussion. I may state that the information which led me to make the interrogation is based upon a letter written by the Senator from Montana, copy of which I possess. It is dated February 23, 1928, an extract from which I will now read. It is addressed to Mr. W. G. Williams, 115 Broadway, New York City. It says:

Mr. Wilson did not hesitate to take drastic action with respect to anticipated rulings by his Secretary of the Interior.

This "drastic action" related to a lease on naval oil reserve No. 3, and according to a statement by the Senator from Montana on the floor of the Senate this "drastic action" resulted in a controversy between President Wilson and Secretary Lane which resulted in the latter's resignation.

And so we have this situation. During the debate upon the leasing act the Senator from Montana was accused by the late Senator La Follette of working in the interests of the Standard Oil Co. and other corporations who were infesting the committee rooms and the lobbies of the Congress in order to get the leasing bill through. At that time the Senator from Montana answered Senator La Follette not by a denial of his charges but by invoking the name of former Secretary Lane in justification of his action.

Now, when it is disclosed that Secretary Lane himself, according to the Senator's own letter, took such steps with reference to a naval oil reserve as to call for "drastic action," to use the Senator's own words, leading to a controversy with President Wilson, which led to the resignation of Secretary Lane, who thereupon accepted a position with the Pan-American Petroleum Co., a Doheny organization, at a salary of $50,000 a year, the Senator from Montana goes the other way and invokes the name of the late Senator La Follette as a witness in his own behalf.

The Senator from Montana will not deny the charge that he himself at the time the leasing act was up, was the chief advocate of the proposition to permit private oil interests to operate in naval reserves, upon the ground that other private oil interests, by locating wells immediately outside the naval reserves, were draining those reserves, and the only way for the Government and the Navy to obtain the oil from reserves was to permit their exploitation by private corporations. The entire debate on the leasing act, which became a law in February, 1920, is filled with arguments advanced by the Senator in support of this proposition and to support him in his arguments he quoted Mr. Edward L. Doheny. On September 3, 1919—CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 58, part 5, page 4770—he said, in support of that part of the leasing act which permitted private corporations to exploit oil reserves:

* * * However it may be regarded by anyone else, I attach very great importance to the testimony of Mr. E. L. Doheny to the same effect. It is well known that Mr. Doheny is one of the most extensive and one of the most successful oil prospectors and operators in the world. It appears that he has no interest whatever in any of the property within the naval reserve or in any of the lands that would be patented. He does, however, own profitable and producing oil wells throughout the State of California. If he has any interest in the bill at all of an individual or personal character it would be to see the bill killed, because thus the volume of oil would be restricted and limited, if not reduced, and the value of his product would be proportionately increased. I can not believe, however, that he is influenced either one way or the other by that consideration; but he tells us, after his long experience as an oil prospector and an operator in oil the fact is that the wells which now exist upon the reserves are continually draining the supply of oil and reducing the oil pressure, and he ventured an opinion that in 10 years the gas pressure would be so far reduced as to make it next to impossible to extract any further oil from the reserves.

In this situation of affairs, Mr. President, it occurs to me that the committee have acted wisely in providing that the wells already upon the reserves should be leased and that the President should have the authority to direct the drilling of other wells whenever, in his judgment, it became necessary to subserve the public interest. I do not believe, therefore, that those provisions of this bill are open to any serious objection.

Here, then, we have Mr. E. L. Doheny introduced into the picture by the Senator from Montana, upon the ground that he is a disinterested party "that has no interest whatever in any of the property within the naval reserve and that he is not interested in any of the lands that would be patented." This was in September, 1919.

We will leave Mr. Doheny for a moment, but come back to him presently. Now let us balance up the situation. The record shows that almost as soon as the Democratic Party came into power in 1913 an extensive and intensive campaign began, headed by Secretary Lane, participated in by the Democratic leaders in both branches of Congress, with the Senator from Montana as its spokesman in this body, to open up naval oil reserves for exploitation by private oil corporations, upon the ground that private wells just outside those reservations were draining the oil from the Navy's reserves, and it was a matter of self-defense to sink offset wells within the reserves and to permit this to be done by private oil interests.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I again challenge the statement of the Senator.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I can not yield now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana declines to yield.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The naval oil reserves had absolutely nothing to do with the legislation to which the Senator refers.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, I must decline to yield until I have finished what I have to say. Then I shall be glad to yield.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is to say, the Senator is perfectly willing to go on and make a misstatement without being called to order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana declines to yield.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state the question of personal privilege.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator has connected my name with a misstatement which he has made, and I desire to correct it.

The legislation to which the Senator is referring, and with which he is connecting my name, did not refer to the naval oil reserves at all, contrary to the statement just made by him. That legislation referred to the general public lands.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, I will answer that statement when I get through.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I rise again to a question of personal privilege——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Namely, that the Senator has attributed to me, in the statement just made, a statement which is not in conformity with the fact, as the RECORD discloses.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, I just quoted from the Senator's own statement on September 3, 1919. Does the Senator challenge my statement?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes; the Senator has quoted my statement discussing the legislation which is represented by the act of February 5, 1920.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Montana yield?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, I have the floor.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The legislation to which the Senator is referring—perhaps he does not understand it—dealt not with the lands within the naval oil reserves at all but with lands supposed to contain oil throughout the general public domain.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Of course, I assume that the Senator will give me credit for understanding that fact.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes; but——

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Again I must decline to yield.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. But I rose because the Senator has not stated that fact.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, I must decline to yield further, unless the Senator again rises to a question of personal privilege.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state the inquiry.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. When a Senator rises to a question of personal privilege, challenging a statement of fact made by another Senator upon the floor involving him, I inquire whether he is in order if he proceeds without either affirming the truth of his statement or withdrawing it?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, the correct rule applicable in such a case is that if a Senator is called to order he can not proceed except upon motion made by another Senator, and upon vote by the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair did not understand that the Senator from Montana called the Senator from Indiana to order.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I certainly intended to do so——

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, perhaps this will answer the Senator's question——

Mr. WALSH of Montana (continuing). Because I assume that when one Senator rises in his place and attributes to another Senator a statement that is not in accordance with the facts, and that statement is challenged, he is not proceeding in order unless he either takes the responsibility for his statement or withdraws it.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state the point of order.

Mr. FESS. The rules of the Senate require, if there is any language used that is objectionable, that the language must be stated, presented to the Senate, and, while they consider whether or not the language is proper, the Senator takes his seat.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I shall not interrupt the Senator further. He may proceed and make any statement that he cares to make after this.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Very well, Mr. President. I thank the Senator from Montana. I want to say now that I am not questioning the motives of the Senator from Montana in the slightest degree. I am stating facts from the record and then drawing conclusions myself from those facts. I may be wrong about my conclusions.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator will understand that I am challenging his statement of fact.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I understand that.

That was the defense of Secretary Daniels in leasing large portions of the naval reserves to private corporations. That was the argument advanced by the Senator from Montana on the floor of this body in his support of provisions in the leasing act giving such permission, in which he quoted Mr. E. L. Doheny as one of his authorities.

Let us take this defense, then, at its face value and see in what position Democratic Party leaders place themselves.

Secretary Lane resigned his position in the Cabinet after a controversy with President Wilson over naval reserve oil leases in February, 1920. That was the month the general leasing act became effective. In March, 1920, Secretary Daniels wrote his famous amendment giving himself autocratic control of all naval oil reserves. As soon as it became operative, he started to lease the oil reserves to private corporations upon the ground that private companies just outside the reserves were draining the Navy's oil. Simultaneously with Secretary Daniels's action Secretary of the Interior John Barton Payne, successor to Secretary Lane, began making leases to private corporations to drill oil wells on public lands just outside the naval oil reserves.

Secretary Payne assumed office March 15, 1920. He was in office, therefore, less than one year, the Democratic administration expiring March 4, 1921. During that period he granted 150 leases to private oil interests to develop and operate over 14,000 acres of oil land immediately adjacent to Teapot Dome naval reserve No. 3. This was 5,000 acres greater than the naval oil reserve itself. Of the 14,000 acres leased by Secretary Payne just outside the Teapot Dome naval reserve, 3,900 acres were leased to the Wyoming Associated Oil Corporation, whose president was John T. Barnett, of Denver, Democratic national committeeman from Colorado at that time. Mr. Barnett recently appeared before the Public Lands Committee as the legal counsel for one of the witnesses under interrogation in connection with the Continental Oil scandal.

So we have this situation: One Democratic Cabinet officer is leasing land within the naval reserves to be exploited by private corporations upon the ground that it is a defensive measure against the drainage of naval oil by private wells just outside the reserve. Another Democratic Cabinet officer at the same time is leasing 14,000 acres of oil land immediately outside the naval reserve to private corporations, thereby draining the Navy's oil. So we have the vicious circle of exploiting the Navy's oil completed by the action of the Democratic Cabinet officials, one leasing land just outside the naval reserve by which the naval reserves are drained and the other simultaneously leasing land within the naval reserves to offset the drainage of the wells just outside the reserve.

Thus the record shows that the conspiracy of private oil interests to grab the oil within the naval reserves of the Nation was entered into and consummated long before the Republican National Convention of 1920—entered into and consummated with the active aid and assistance of Democratic Cabinet officers and Democratic leaders in both branches of Congress. Nothing could be clearer or more conclusive than the facts in support of this statement. If Secretary Daniels, the Senator from Montana, and their school of thought were right, then it was wrong for Secretary Payne to permit 150 private leases to be located immediately outside the naval oil reserves in Teapot Dome, and it was equally wrong for Secretary Daniels, the Senator from Montana, and others to sit silent while this was being done, presuming it was known to them and to all members of the Democratic administration.

If, on the other hand, the sinking of wells immediately outside the naval reserves does not drain it and Secretary Payne thereby was not an active party in draining the naval oil reserves, then the whole theory advanced by Secretary Daniels, the Senator from Montana, and others in the defense of leasing land within the reserves is false.

The Democratic Party leaders can take either alternative they prefer, and it immediately brands the other alternative as being a wrong done against the property of the Government and the interests of the United States Navy.

Now let us return to Mr. Doheny. It was in September, 1919, that the Senator from Montana introduced Mr. Doheny in the picture as his authority in support of leasing naval reserves to private corporations, describing Mr. Doheny as being an oil operator "who had no interest whatever in any of the property within the naval reserves or in any of the lands that would be patented." Secretary Lane resigned from the Cabinet in February, 1920, five months from the time the Senator from Montana assured this body that Mr. Doheny was an expert, but wholly disinterested, oil operator who advised, in the interests of the public, the leasing of naval reserves to private corporations. On February 1, 1924, Mr. Doheny, testifying in the investigation conducted by the Senate Committee on Public Lands, stated that he retained Secretary Lane immediately upon his resignation as Secretary of the Interior, and that he had made the arrangement with him before he resigned. The record shows that Mr. Lane received as compensation in the employ of Mr. Doheny's Pan-American Petroleum Co. a salary of $50,000 a year. So, while Mr. Doheny may have been a disinterested advisor of the Senator from Montana in September, 1919, he was not so disinterested in February, 1920, five months later, when he entered negotiations with one of the Democratic Cabinet members to become an officer in his oil company, for Mr. Doheny testified that he employed Democratic officials because of the influence and the acquaintanceship they had with the Democratic administration.

The records show that the office of the Secretary of the Interior at that time was not on entirely unfriendly terms with private oil companies. Not only did Secretary Lane enter into negotiations with Doheny's company prior to his resignation and accept the $50,000 job with them immediately upon his resignation but Joseph J. Cotter, private secretary to Secretary Lane, resigned to become a vice president of one of Mr. Doheny's oil companies; and Mr. Herbert A. Meyer, assistant to the Secretary, resigned to accept an official position at a large salary with the Prairie Oil & Gas Co.; and Mr. Clay Tallman, Commissioner of the General Land Office, having the oil reserves under his especial supervision, resigned to accept a position in the Mid-West Oil Co.

In all fairness to Secretary Lane and his many associates and assistants whose services were acquired by oil interests, it should be said that they were not the only members of the Democratic administration who were unable to resist the temptation of financial inducements offered them by Mr. Doheny. It is a matter of record in the official testimony of Mr. Doheny before the Senate Committee on Public Lands, February 1, 1924, that he also employed former Attorney General Gregory, of the Democratic Cabinet, and that he employed Mr. Gregory because of his influence with the Democratic administration, because of his acquaintance with the State Department and with the President. I am now quoting from Mr. Doheny's testimony—> because we thought his connection with the Democratic administration would give us an entrée to it; open the door to it.

And on the same day the record shows that Mr. Doheny testified that he employed the former Secretary of the Treasury and the son-in-law of President Wilson, William G. McAdoo, and paid him the sum of $250,000. He testified that he did not employ Mr. McAdoo because of his legal talents but because of his influence with the Democratic administration, and that he kept him in Washington only so long as that administration remained in power. He further testified that he, or some of his companies, also employed the law firm of former Secretary of War Garrison.

And on the same day Mr. Doheny testified that he paid $5,000 to Mr. George Creel, the publicity director of the Democratic administration, and that he paid this $5,000 for the purpose of procuring the influence of Mr. Creel. Said Mr. Doheny—I quote from his testimony—> he was employed to get this lease and to hold off any granting of these leases to Republicans after the change of administration.

Now, let some righteous Democratic leader arise and explain away the employment, by oil interests, of a Democratic Secretary of the Interior, and his private secretary, and his Assistant Secretary, and his Commissioner of Public Lands, and a former Democratic Attorney General, and a former Democratic Secretary of War, and the Democratic Secretary of the Treasury, who was also a son-in-law of the President, and the director of public information of the Democratic administration, representing, all told, an annual investment in salaries of more than $365,000, or $1,000 a day!

Let some Democratic Senator explain how the gentleman who employed these Democratic officials became an advisor of the Senator from Montana in the framing of the leasing act, sat as a member of the Democratic platform committee in 1920, and wrote the plank on petroleum, and finally came through with $75,000 to help pay the bills of the Democratic National Committee. Here, I trust, is a text for my friend from Mississippi who so ably and accurately represents his constituency. In a burst of purity the other day the Senator from Mississippi said, in a colloquy with the Senator from North Dakota—> let me ask the Senator, does he not know that Doheny quit the Democratic Party because he could not corrupt it and went into the Republican Party because he knew he could corrupt it?

Here is a problem in higher mathematics—just how much does it take to corrupt a Democratic administration? If the employment of four members of the Democratic Cabinet and the Commissioner of Public Lands and the director of public information of the Democratic administration and a contribution of $75,000 to the Democratic national committee does not constitute an improper influence, the Senator from Mississippi might offer his own definition as to what does. "Mr. Doheny," says the Senator from Mississippi, "left the Democratic Party because he could not control it." But how about the Democratic Cabinet officers whose influence he acquired who are still living? Have they left the Democratic Party? At the recent Jackson Day banquet held in a fashionable hostelry in this city under the auspices of the Democratic national committee one of the gentlemen who sat at the speaker's table at the invitation of Mr. Clem Shaver, chairman of the national Democratic committee, was none other than William Gibbs McAdoo, who rammed a cool quarter of a million dollars of Mr. Doheny's oil money into his pockets and who never yet has made restitution. He was a guest of honor and a headline speaker at this Jackson Day banquet in January. And no later than Wednesday of last week the news came out of California that William Gibbs McAdoo is at the head of a slate trying to capture the California Democratic delegation to the next national convention for none other than our friend, the Senator from Montana; and Mr. George Creel, who also got upon Mr. Doheny's pay roll, is on the slate. Can it be possible Mr. McAdoo is using some of the residue of the quarter of a million he got from Mr. Doheny to finance the presidential nomination campaign of the Senator from Montana?

When it comes to the issue of restitution and cleaning house and getting rid of tainted money, it is perfectly obvious that the Democratic leaders have several days' work ahead of them if they would keep their doorstep from the accumulation of oil. And if they believe in their doctrine, preached from the floor of this body in the last few weeks, that a party should expel from its councils all those who have received oil money, it is perfectly obvious that some of the most distinguished members of the Democratic Party are going to be absent from the next Democratic National Convention.

Ah, but the gentlemen on the other side of the aisle say, while Mr. Doheny and other oil operators may have put up money with the expectation of obtaining something of value from the Democratic administration, they obtained nothing.

Was it nothing that private oil interests obtained leases on naval oil reserves from Secretary Daniels and operated them at a profit? Was it nothing that a Democratic national committeeman from Colorado and his associates were given a lease by the Democratic Secretary of the Interior on public oil lands adjacent to naval reserves—the lease covering 4,000 acres, approximately half the size of Teapot Dome and approximately one-third of the total amount of public oil lands leased by the Democratic Secretary of the Interior during the year of his term? Was it nothing that other private oil interests obtained leases, 150 in number, adjacent to the naval oil reserves, permitting them to drain the oil from those reserves?

According to the testimony of the eminent Senator from Montana, and according to the evidence of Secretary Daniels and former Secretary Lane, what is the issue before the country? The mere leasing of so many acres of ground, or the diversion of the naval oil reserves of this Nation?

The Federal court for the district of Wyoming, in the course of the litigation over the Sinclair leases in Teapot Dome, appointed receivers for the property leased pending the final action of the litigation. These receivers have made their report, which is to the effect that the drainage of the private wells immediately outside Teapot Dome, 150 of which were drilled by virtue of leases given them by the Democratic Secretary of the Interior, have drained the naval reserves of 50,000,000 barrels of petroleum. These gentlemen, who pose as being in possession of righteous leases, are getting the cream of the naval resources. Why, the report of the receivers shows the properties, illegally and fraudulently leased to Sinclair, are of infinitely less value than they were when Sinclair obtained them. The report shows that the daily crude-oil production of the Sinclair properties has dwindled from 3,700 barrels to 600 barrels, due to the drainage in the private wells just outside the naval reserve. My authority for this is a report of the receivers made to the Federal court for the district of Wyoming, January 11, this year, and contained in a special dispatch from Cheyenne, Wyo., to the New York Times, appearing in that paper the morning of January 12. Fifty million barrels of petroleum is a pretty liberal honorarium for the Democratic Secretary of the Interior to hand out to a Democratic committeeman and others at the head of private oil interests.

On the other hand, what did Mr. Sinclair and Mr. Doheny get out of the Republican administration? Well, so far they have gotten prosecuted, criminally and civilly, have had their leases canceled, have been compelled to surrender profits they made and more. And who is responsible for this? The Democratic Members on the floor of the Senate, or those holding prominent positions of leadership in the Democratic Party? No. The prosecution of these oil criminals, the cancellation of their leases, the legal return of the property they unlawfully acquired is due to the action of a Republican President, Calvin Coolidge.

On January 27, 1924, President Coolidge issued the following public statement from the White House:

It is not for the President to determine criminal guilt or render judgment in civil cases. That is the function of the courts. It is not for him to prejudge. I shall do neither. But when facts are revealed to me that require action for the purpose of insuring the enforcement of either civil or criminal liability, such action will be taken. That is the province of the Executive.

Acting under my direction, the Department of Justice has been observing the course of the evidence which has been revealed at the hearings conducted by the senatorial committee investigating certain oil leases made on naval reserves, which I believe warrants action for the purpose of enforcing the law and protecting the rights of the public. This is confirmed by reports made to me from the committee. If there has been any crime, it must be prosecuted. If there has been any property of the United States illegally transferred, or leased, it must be recovered.

I feel the public is entitled to know that in the conduct of such actions no one is shielded for any party, political or other reason. As I understand, men are involved who belong to both political parties, and having been advised by the Department of Justice that it is in accord with former precedents, I propose to employ special counsel of high rank drawn from both political parties to bring such actions for the enforcement of the law. Counsel will be instructed to prosecute these cases in the courts so that if there is any guilt it will be punished; if there is any civil liability it will be revealed, and if there are any contracts which are illegal they will be canceled. Every law will be enforced, and every right of the people and the Government will be protected.

Following this official announcement of the President and as a result of it, the Republican Congress, on February 8, 1924, passed a joint resolution authorizing the employment of special counsel in conformity with the announcement of the President, and as this resolution was adopted, President Coolidge announced the selection of former Senator Atlee Pomerene, of Ohio, a Democrat, and Owen J. Roberts, of Philadelphia, as special counsel to represent the United States Government in the prosecution, both civilly and criminally, of the oil frauds and individuals connected with oil frauds.

What a striking contrast this affords to the action of the Democratic administration! In the closing days of that administration action was brought in the House of Representatives in the form of a joint resolution, submitted by Representative EDWARD E. BROWNE, of the State of Wisconsin, to compel the Democratic Attorney General, Mitchell Palmer, to take action in an appeal in the case of the United States against the Standard Oil Co., the Southern Pacific Railroad, and the Equitable Trust Co., whereby oil lands in the State of California which had been fraudulently and corruptly possessed by these defendants, could be recovered for the United States Government. The evidence introduced at that time speaks for itself and, briefly, was to the effect that the Democratic Attorney General, Mitchell Palmer, let the interests of the United States go by default and let the defendants get away with 165,000 acres of oil territory by the simple process of delaying the filing of an appeal until it was too late.

Members on the other side of the aisle have been very vociferous in their demands that the Republican administration and the Republican Party make restitution. Restitution to whom? Under the leadership of President Coolidge and by reason of criminal prosecutions suggested by him, every interest of the United States has been protected and all its stolen property has been recovered and the criminals who engaged in the looting are now being prosecuted vigorously on criminal charges. The Republican house is being cleaned, and cleaned by the action of the Republican Chief Executive and his advisors!

I see no reason for contributing money to the infamous Sinclair. What he deserves is a prison sentence. But if he is to be reimbursed, why not go a little further and raise money to reimburse Mr. Doheny also for his investments in Democratic Cabinet officers and his contribution of $75,000 to the Democratic National Committee, more than $65,000 of which was never reported by the treasurer of the Democratic National Committee?

President Coolidge, in a speech before the National Republican Club of New York, February 12, 1924, said regarding the proposed prosecution of oil criminals:

For us (the Republican administration) we propose to follow the clear, open path of justice. There will be immediate, adequate, unshrinking prosecution, criminal and civil, to punish the guilty and to protect every national interest. In this effort will be no politics and no partisanship. It will be speedy. It will be just. I am a Republican, but I can not, on that account, shield anyone because he is a Republican. I am a Republican, but I can not, on that account, prosecute anyone because he is a Democrat. * * * I ask the support of our people, as Chief Magistrate, intent on the enforcement of our laws without fear and without favor, no matter who is hurt or what the consequences.

The pledge which President Coolidge made at that time has been kept both as to the letter and the spirit. From the outpourings upon the part of Democratic Members of this body and the House of Representatives the public might be led to believe that it was Democratic effort which unearthed the Continental Trading Co. and its secret jack pot, whereas, in point of fact, the Democratic inquisitors never heard of that concern until the details of its organization and transactions were brought to light by the special counsel appointed by President Coolidge. In point of fact, it would be very difficult for the Democratic orators to put their fingers upon a single constructive action in connection with the protection of the public's rights in this oil matter, which was of Democratic origin, and which was consummated by reason of Democratic action.

One purpose of the hearings of the Senate Public Lands Committee, according to the resolution, is to enable it to draft additional legislation with particular reference to the rights and equities of the Government of the United States in the preservation of its natural resources. In my opinion the Senate Committee on Public Lands should immediately draft such necessary legislation, and I have no doubt this will be done under the able and honest chairmanship of the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE].

The Nation has suffered quite enough at the hands of bipartisan oil criminals. Whether they be Republicans or Democrats, let the guilty be brought to justice, and constructive legislation enacted that will from this time forward safeguard the interests of the American people.

When all the facts are known to the public the leaders of neither party will be able to make the oil scandals an issue.

The people will never permit this national misfortune to be made a political football, and if Democratic leaders attempt it public condemnation will follow.

Mr. President, I send to the desk at this time, as in the course of my remarks I said I would do, a list of the leases made during the administration of former Secretary of the Interior Lane and the chronology of the leasing of the naval petroleum reserves, which I ask may be appended to my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CUTTING in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

CHRONOLOGY OF LEASING OF NAVAL PETROLEUM RESERVES

ADMINISTRATION OF SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR LANE

August 1, 1917

Secretary of the Interior Lane communicated with Secretary of the Navy Daniels, Secretary of War Baker, Secretary of Labor Wilson, Secretary of Commerce Redfield, and Secretary of Agriculture Houston, pointing out that naval reserve No. 2, California, was being drained by private oil wells outside its borders and urged that it be leased. He also announced his intention of taking the question up with the President.

September 8, 1919

Secretary of the Interior Lane made favorable report on general leasing bill before Congress, including provision giving Secretary of the Interior authority to lease producing wells within any naval petroleum reserve and empowering President to lease remainder of any part of a mining claim where wells have already been drilled.

February 25, 1920

General leasing act approved by the President authorizing Secretary of the Interior to lease producing wells within any naval petroleum reserve and empowering President to permit drilling of additional wells or to lease the remainder of any part of a claim within any naval petroleum reserve, where wells have already been drilled.

Departmental regulations for granting oil and gas leases under general leasing act, including producing wells in naval reserves drawn up and submitted to Secretary of the Interior Lane for his approval and consideration.

March 11, 1920

Departmental regulations for granting oil and gas leases under general leasing act, including producing wells in naval reserves, approved and signed by Acting Secretary of the Interior Vogelsang.

ADMINISTRATION OF SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR PAYNE

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I have always regarded it as rather profitless to engage in rancorous political discussion on the floor of the Senate as to the relative culpability of the Republican and the Democratic Parties in connection with the leasing of the naval oil reserves. I do not intend to engage in any such discussion at this time. I rise merely to try to straighten out, in some measure at least, the perfectly reckless and irresponsible statements of fact made by the Senator who has just taken his seat concerning the matters he has been discussing.

The Senator from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON] was not a Member of this body at the time these matters were prominently before us. He may, perhaps, be excused for some of his wild statements made in the course of the discussion; for others, however, there seems to be no excuse whatever, because the Senator must be apprised of the facts with relation to which his statements, by inference at least, convey the most erroneous impression.

The Senator has listed a number of sins of the Democratic Party in connection with these various transactions. He has told us, for instance, that four or five members of the Cabinet of President Wilson, on leaving the service of the Government, being lawyers, were employed either by Mr. Doheny or by Mr. Sinclair, but not one of them, Mr. President, so far as even the Senator from Indiana has dared to assert, in any connection whatever with the leases that were the subject of his discourse. Whatever may be said concerning the impropriety from an ethical standpoint of any of these gentlemen taking employment with Mr. Doheny or Mr. Sinclair, not even the Senator from Indiana can contend that there was anything like a breach of duty to the Government, much less any violation of any criminal law. Moreover, the Senator from Indiana dare not assert that any one of these gentlemen who thus took employment in any manner whatever while he occupied an official position gave the slightest favor or advantage to either Mr. Doheny or Mr. Sinclair in any dealings they had with the Government of the United States. The facts in relation, for instance, to the employment of Mr. Gregory have already been disclosed. Perhaps the Senator from Indiana in his study of the record overlooked what the record discloses with respect to the matter, but, touching Mr. Gregory's appointment, I have a letter from him, which I ask the clerk now to read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read, as requested.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

HOUSTON, TEX., March 23, 1928.

Hon. THOMAS J. WALSH,

United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: On last Wednesday Senator ROBINSON of Indiana in an attempt to besmirch Democrats, who he claimed had betrayed their trust, used the following language:

"I might observe, since the Senator has brought it up, that three Democratic members left the Cabinet of the last Democratic administration to take employment under Doheny and Doheny and Sinclair rest in the same bed, and they have got a lot of Democrats in it with them, too."

I was Attorney General for about five years under Woodrow Wilson, and resigned on the 4th of March, 1919; it is apparent that Senator ROBINSON included me among the three members of the Wilson Cabinet to whom he referred.

I have never seen Doheny or Sinclair or had a communication from either on any subject. I was never employed by Doheny or Sinclair at any time in regard to any matter, and do not recall ever having received any communication from any company in which either of them was interested.

Some six months after I retired from the Cabinet the law firm in which I was interested represented a small independent concern known as the Island Oil & Transport Co.; this Island Co. asked me, in the fall of 1919, to advise with it in regard to its rights in the Mexican oil field, and to do what I could to prevent its property from being confiscated by the Carranza régime. I did the work contemplated and, having finished it in the winter of 1919–20, rendered a bill for $15,000, which the Island Co. paid. I have heard that the Island Co. felt that the work I did redounded to the benefit of other companies besides itself and sought to secure from other companies similarly situated some contribution to the fee paid. It may be that some company in which Doheny was interested paid the Island Co. some portion of the money which the latter paid me in settlement of my fee. The above matters were fully set out in my letter to President Coolidge of February 2, 1924, which was published in every newspaper of importance.

The statement of Senator ROBINSON above quoted, by which he falsely sought to create the impression that I had left the Cabinet to take employment from Doheny, is untrue, and when made he knew it was untrue, or made it recklessly without knowing whether it was true or not. His motive was sinister as all decent people will understand.

As you are acquainted with the situation and have rendered invaluable assistance in developing the truth, I am writing this letter to you with the request that you have it placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Yours truly,

T. W. GREGORY.

P. S.—I am herewith inclosing a carbon copy of my letter to the President of February 2, 1924, in case you should care to use it in any way.

T. W. G.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I ask that the letter addressed by Mr. Gregory to the President, although it has heretofore appeared in the RECORD, may be printed in connection with the letter just read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter referred to is as follows:

FEBRUARY 2, 1924.

MR. PRESIDENT: On last Tuesday night when I was in Austin, Tex., you stated to me over the long-distance telephone that you wished to employ me in the investigation of the leases of the naval oil reserves. You will recall that after expressing my appreciation, I stated that I was not in close touch with the developments in the matter; that nothing occurred to me that would prevent me from serving, but that I would be in Washington Saturday afternoon (to-day) and would then confer with you on the subject. I had no idea that in saying this I was accepting an appointment or that you so understood it. I assumed that that would be decided when we conferred and that in the meantime I would have an opportunity to go through my books and correspondence to see whether in the course of my private practice I had ever had any employments which might stand in the way. It was also my desire before definitely committing myself to confer with Senator WALSH of Montana, who has conducted the investigation of the Senate committee. I was very much surprised to read in the Texas newspapers the next morning that I had been appointed, but did not feel at liberty to make any public statement, and consistently declined to do so until I had seen you.

Of course, if it had been in my mind at the time of our telephone conversation that I had been employed by Mr. Doheny, directly or indirectly, or at any time, near or remote, that would have ended the matter at once, because I would have realized that however free from criticism such employment might have been, it would have disqualified me from acting as your counsel on the present occasion. I have no recollection of having seen or communicated with Mr. Doheny in my life, and at that time did not recall ever having had any business connection with him or with any company controlled by him.

I returned to Washington as quickly as possible for the purpose of keeping my engagement with you, and arrived here this afternoon.

Yesterday, while on the train, my attention was called to a statement made the day before to the Senate Public Lands Committee by E. L. Doheny to the effect that his company and several others employed me "to represent them before the President in regard to getting permits to drill oil wells in Mexico," and that "the Island Oil Co. billed us for $2,000 as our share of the fee that they paid Judge Gregory for this particular work."

I would have been at a loss to know what he was referring to except for his mention of the Island Oil Co. I remembered perfectly my employment by that company, although some of the details had passed out of my mind. I have now refreshed my recollection by examining data in my office. The facts are as follows:

In the fall of 1919 the firm with which I was then associated had among its regular clients the Island Oil & Transport Co., which is evidently the Island Oil Co. referred to. It was a small independent company without any connection whatever, so far as I have ever known, with either Mr. Sinclair or Mr. Doheny.

The Island Co. asked me to act for it in the concerted effort then being made by American oil companies to get the State Department to take action to prevent the threatened confiscation of their properties in Mexico, the Carranza government having refused to grant them permits to drill on their own property unless they accepted the provision of the new constitution vesting title to oil and other minerals in the government.

The purpose was to secure some character of diplomatic action by the United States Government, which it was hoped would place American oil companies on the same footing as those of Great Britain, the latter having been allowed to continue development. The facts in regard to all the interested companies were about the same, the law as to all was the same, and there was general cooperation among them in attempting to obtain relief.

I gave the matter attention for some months, and the Mexican authorities finally extended to the American companies the privilege enjoyed by those of Great Britain.

This result was brought about in December, 1919, or January, 1920, and my employment in the matter ended then and there. I rendered a bill to the Island Co. for $15,000, which it paid.

At some stage of the transaction the Island Co. stated that the work I did redounded to the benefit of other companies besides itself, and that, it being a small company, it would try to induce several of the others similarly situated to make contributions to the fee charged. I understood that some of them did so. The Husteca Petroleum Co., which was controlled by Mr. Doheny, was one of these, and no doubt paid the Island Co. the $2,000 referred to by Mr. Doheny.

This phase of the matter had entirely passed out of my mind. But even at the time I never thought of my employment as an employment by Mr. Doheny or his company, and he evidently did not, as his testimony before the Senate committee, as reported in the press, is to the effect that he knew nothing about my connection with the transaction until within the last few days.

I have never felt that the transaction involved the slightest necessity for apologies, nor even for explanation, but for the unusual conditions which have arisen.

It is obvious, nevertheless, that the fact that one of Mr. Doheny's companies bore a part, however indirect and however small, of the expense of my employment by the Island Co. makes it inappropriate for me to act as your counsel in this matter.

Respectfully yours,

T. W. GREGORY.

To the PRESIDENT.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, is the Senator willing to be interrupted at this time?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes; at any time.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I was merely quoting from the record of Mr. Doheny's sworn testimony. It is somewhat at variance with the statement of Mr. Gregory in his letter. The Senator will concede that.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. Doheny's testimony is likewise at variance with the testimony of Mr. George White, who testified that Mr. Doheny never contributed $75,000 to the Democratic campaign fund, but testified that the amount was $34,000.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. If the Senator will yield for just one more question, I will try not to interrupt him again.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I will yield at any time.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I understood the Senator to say in the debate on Saturday that Mr. White admitted receiving $34,000 from Doheny.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It was not admitted; he told us that is what he got.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. He told the committee that?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. That was his sworn testimony, that instead of $75,000, it was $34,000?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Then I understand from the record—and I have made a search of the record—that only the sum of $7,500 or $7,600, or some such amount, was reported as having come from Mr. Doheny.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Nine thousand dollars was reported, and later on $25,000 additional was reported as an amount paid after the campaign, as I understood.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I understood it was not reported, but the Senator may be right about that.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I have taken pains, Mr. President, to call the attention of the Senate to the letter from Mr. Gregory. I might say in this connection that the Senator from Indiana is in error about another matter of a related character. He has repeatedly told about $250,000 being paid to Mr. McAdoo. That is a matter of no great significance, but Mr. Doheny later corrected that and said it was $150,000 instead of $250,000.

However, I introduced the letter of Mr. Gregory because of the remarkable contention made by the Senator in the course of his speech that the President of the United States is entitled to all the credit for the recovery of the naval oil reserves, having appointed two eminent gentlemen to conduct that work.

I have heretofore expressed upon this floor gratification at the excellent work that has been done by former Senator Pomerene and by Mr. Roberts, but it is rather remarkable that anyone should claim that credit for this excellent achievement is due to the President of the United States, who acted in the matter only by virtue of a positive direction of the Senate of the United States by resolution duly adopted and who theretofore had intrusted whatever he did in the matter to his representative, Mr. Rush Holland, a subordinate of Mr. Daugherty, then at the head of the Department of Justice. Of course, it is perfectly well understood that the resolution was passed for the purpose of taking the prosecution of these matters out of the hands of the Department of Justice. It is, however, a singular fact that the President of the United States, thus having been directed by the Senate of the United States to institute these proceedings, immediately employed as one of the attorneys to prosecute the case Mr. T. W. Gregory, the gentleman whose conduct has now been made the subject of animadversions by the Senator from Indiana. The other attorney appointed by the President was Mr. Silas Strawn, of the city of Chicago, one of the directors of the Sinclair bank of the city of Chicago. Both of these gentlemen were rejected by the Committee on Public Lands, to whom the matter was referred for advice to the Senate, and rejected because of their associations, the one with Mr. Sinclair and the other with Mr. Doheny.

Mr. President, I would not have it understood at all that either of these gentlemen would not have done the work in a perfectly acceptable and honorable and honest way; but the committee felt that by reason of these associations it was unwise to intrust them with the litigation.

Mr. President, the next sin charged against the Democratic Party in connection with these oil leases by the Senator from Indiana is that in the year 1920 Mr. Doheny was a delegate to the national convention at San Francisco. That convention was held in the month of June, 1920, something like a year before any of these leases were executed, at a time when Mr. Doheny enjoyed a reputation for being a perfectly honorable gentleman, and, so far as the record discloses or anything that appears in evidence before the Senate is concerned, a man of perfectly unexceptionable character. It is even disclosed as one of the sins of the Democratic Party that he was presented by the delegation from his State as a candidate for Vice President. It was not added, however, by the Senator from Indiana that he was rejected and was not the choice of the convention. However, as I say, at that time the reputation of Mr. Doheny was without stain so far as anything has been thus far disclosed.

Then, likewise, it is added in that connection that he contributed $75,000 to the Democratic campaign of that year. I have stated the facts as they appear in the record. Mr. Doheny testified that he gave $75,000, and Mr. George White denied that he gave $75,000 and tells us that the total of his contribution was $34,000—$9,000 contributed before the election of 1920 and $25,000 later to make up the deficit, all of which was contributed either before the leases were executed or before any disclosure was made of any particular iniquity in them.

Then it is likewise another sin of the Democratic Party that Mr. Doheny drew a plank in the Democratic platform of 1920 relating to oil; but even the Senator from Indiana can find nothing in that plank that is exceptionable in any manner whatever, or that he can in any way criticize.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, will the Senator yield right there just for a question?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Why was it necessary to have an oil plank in the Democratic Party's platform at all?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Why is it necessary to have a lot of planks in platforms?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Just at that particular time, when all of these leases were being made?

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Excuse me a moment. They were not being made. The convention was held in the month of June, 1920, and no leases were being made under the act of June 4, 1920, and my recollection is that none were made under the act of February 25, 1920.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, June 4 is when the rider to the naval appropriation bill passed the Senate, giving the Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Daniels, complete power over all the oil reserves. That was June 4; and just a week or two later the Democratic convention assembled in San Francisco and found it necessary to have an oil plank.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I have not yielded for a speech. The plank, as my recollection now serves me, relates to the acquisition of oil concessions in countries other than the United States.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I was just about to suggest to the Senator, as I am sure he will remember, that at the time there was a bitter controversy between this country and Mexico about the laws of Mexico inimical to American citizens, and that was what prompted the plank.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Undoubtedly.

Then it is also an additional sin of the Democratic Party that one George Creel, in association with Mr. Doheny, endeavored to get a lease of the naval oil reserves, or one of the naval oil reserves, from Mr. Daniels as Secretary of the Navy; but it was not told that Mr. Creel's efforts in that behalf were entirely futile.

The Senator, however, has extolled the late senior Senator from Wisconsin, the elder Mr. La Follette. Nothing that the Senator can say in praise of that statesman will go further than my own statement concerning his services to his country. He was, as everybody knows, sometimes intemperate in his remarks; but, nevertheless, he was always actuated, as I believe, by a sincere desire to subserve the public weal.

But, Mr. President, I refer to that fact because we have the testimony of Senator La Follette himself concerning the fidelity with which Secretary Daniels discharged the duties of his high office, so markedly in contrast with the manner in which they were met by his successors.

I read from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of September 3, 1919. Senator La Follette quotes from a letter addressed by Secretary Daniels to Hon. CLAUDE SWANSON, then chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, as follows:

THE SECRETARY OF THE NAVY,
Washington, February 27, 1919.

MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: I understand that a statement has been made by some Member of Congress that the Attorney General and the Secretary of the Navy favor the land legislation reported by the conference committee on public lands of the two Houses. You know my position all the time has been that while not opposing the leasing bill, which I favor—

"While not opposing the leasing bill, which I favor"—

I have opposed incorporating any provision with reference to the naval reserves in such legislation. I do not favor the bill that has been agreed upon; I do not think it is just to the Government; and while it is better, so far as the naval reserves are concerned, than the original bill, my attitude is that the naval reserves ought not to be touched by legislation, but ought to be settled by the courts.

I did agree with the Attorney General and the Secretary of the Interior upon a provision some time ago that would protect the naval reserves and would confer upon the President power to operate the going wells. I did this because I did not wish to assume to be standing in the way of the passage of legislation of importance which I favored, and I write you because I hope you will correct the impression that I have changed in my attitude. I believe that the naval interests require that whatever in the naval reserves belongs to the Navy by law should go to the Navy, though the final matter should be settled by the courts, unless the provision referred to, which the Attorney General and myself agreed to some time ago, is incorporated. I think it would be a great mistake to go further than that. I will be glad if you will make my position known.

Sincerely yours,

JOSEPHUS DANIELS.

Hon. CLAUDE SWANSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

With respect to that, Senator La Follette says:

Mr. President, I digress to speak of the record made by Secretary Daniels, because it is one of the important considerations in connection with the recommendations of a Cabinet officer, one that Senators, I think, ought to weigh with some care. The Secretary of the Navy, in so far as I have been able to study his career, has devoted himself fearlessly to the public interest.

Mr. President, let it be said to the credit of this man that he has driven straight ahead regardless of the storm of criticism, for when early in his official career he made recommendations to protect the Navy against pillage the interest-controlled press of the country assailed him. Have you forgotten it? Have you forgotten the organized abuse that was leveled against that man? Few men in public life have ever endured the brutal assaults that he suffered at the hands of the great newspapers of the country published in the interest of private greed and at the hands of leading magazines of the country that were equally subservient. Secretary Daniels was under fire. Review the literature of that time, and it will be difficult for you to find nationally anything like it. Yet there was not anything in that man's record to justify it.

I do not hold any brief for Josephus Daniels. I have met him only a few times, but I have followed his public career as an official. He came out of private life; he did not have much training that would have fitted him for this position, and he was charged with the conduct of the Navy Department under the greatest strain and ordeal that it was ever subjected to. Is it not fair to say that?

I undertake to say that when your Democratic administration comes to pass in review in history Secretary Daniels will stand out for ability and integrity.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator for a moment?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly.

Mr. THOMAS. During the period of the Secretary's career to which the Senator is referring I think I was the only man in this body who took up the cudgels for him and defended him upon this floor in a speech, perhaps too long for the comfort of the Senate, but one which reviewed as well as I could Mr. Daniels's services to the country and the motives which were behind the cruel attacks upon him both as a man and as an official.

Enough for that, Mr. President. But the Senator from Indiana has stated upon the floor of the Senate, and reiterated, that the Senator from Montana—myself—was responsible for the legislation through which these crimes became possible; and in that connection he has confused two pieces of legislation of the distinct character of which it is perfectly obvious he has full knowledge.

I had, as stated on the floor some time ago, absolutely nothing whatever to do with the legislation under which these leases were made to Mr. Sinclair and Mr. Doheny. Those leases were made under the provisions of the act of June 4, 1920.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Just a moment. The legislation with which I was in any wise concerned had the approval of the President on the 25th day of February, 1920.

I will state in this connection, Mr. President, that all over the western country lands had been withdrawn from public entry in order to await legislation appropriate to the disposition of lands containing or supposed to contain nonmetallic deposits of coal, oil, gas, phosphates, and sodium. Extensive areas of lands of that character existed in my State. They were tied up by withdrawals made by the President of the United States so that they could not be disposed of in any wise whatever, or to any person, so that they were unproductive. They were not subject to taxation of any character; they contributed in no wise to the development of the western country, and particularly of my State. The fight had been going on, not only during the time I have been in the Senate down to the time the legislation was passed in 1920, but for a number of years before.

The withdrawals generally were made during the years 1907, 1908, and 1909, and there the lands lay, absolutely unproductive, useless to anyone whatever, and naturally we were desirous that the legislation awaited should be enacted.

There is no naval reserve in the State of Montana, and never has been. The naval reserves are in the States of California and Wyoming, and the oil-shale reserves in the State of Utah. The legislation with which the Senator has seen fit to connect my name so prominently had reference to these vast areas I have spoken of, the public lands throughout these States, withdrawn, as I have said, from appropriation by anybody at all, for public entry, because it was believed that oil was contained in them; and in the case of much of these lands it did contain it.

I very naturally, when I came here, was desirous of seeing the legislation which was so long awaited enacted, that these lands might be developed.

It took form in the act of February 25, 1920, after a long struggle. Reference has been made to the opposition of Senator La Follette to that legislation. The Senator was solicitous, and very properly so, lest these lands, by reason of this legislation, should get into the hands of the great monopolies.

Senator Kenyon, when the bill was in its last stages, expressed some apprehension along the same line. That induced me to say, as will be found in the RECORD of August 23, 1919, as follows:

> Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I was going to say a word further. This, I believe, is the third day this measure has now been before the Senate, and I would be indisposed myself to yield to any request for a postponement of further consideration of it in order that a further study of it might be made by Senators were it not for the remark made by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. Kenyon], for whose attention I should be quite thankful, namely, that he is advised, or at least certain persons are filled with apprehension lest under the operation of the bill all the oil lands of the country would pass to the Standard Oil. I regret that the Senator from Iowa should have thought suggestions of that character of sufficient importance to dignify them by repeating them upon the floor of the United States Senate. Of course, I can not understand such a reference as signifying anything except that those who have been endeavoring to secure the passage of this legislation are either actuated by a desire to promote the ends of the Standard Oil Co., or that they are not capable of recognizing the purpose which he says it is reported to him the Standard Oil Co. has to appropriate these lands. That is so serious a charge that for myself, and I have been somewhat identified with the legislation from its inception, I should like to give the Senator from Iowa every opportunity to satisfy himself upon that point, and I hope he will come before the Senate when he has satisfied himself upon the point and give us the benefit of his judgment about it.
> Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I am not making any such charge. What I say is that it has been suggested to me that under the terms of the bill within a few years we will find the Standard Oil Co. in possession of practically all of these lands, and I am not at all certain that they are not correct. That is all.
> Mr. WALSH of Montana. In view of the statement repeated by the Senator from Iowa, I am going to ask the chairman to give the Senator from Iowa every reasonable opportunity to present his views.

So the opportunity was given, and neither the Senator from Iowa nor the Senator from Wisconsin endeavored to indicate how it was possible that the Standard Oil should appropriate these lands.

The head and front of my offending hath this extent, and no more. Bear in mind, the bill was for the disposition, not of the naval oil reserves at all, for all reference to that was taken out of the bill, except a single provision, but with respect to the legislation touching the general public lands, containing or supposed to contain oil. I call attention to the fact that Mr. Doheny had given some testimony before the committee which indicated that there was some danger that, by reason of the existence of wells immediately outside of the naval oil reserves—and he had particularly in mind naval oil reserve No. 1—the oil within the reserve might be drained away.

I put in evidence a letter from Mr. Phelan, who was then the oil expert for the Shipping Board, expressing the same view, and I then referred to the testimony of Mr. Doheny, as follows:

> But I do not rely entirely, in respect to my judgment of the matter, upon these experts. However it may be regarded by anyone else, I attach very great importance to the testimony of Mr. E. L. Doheny to the same effect. It is well known that Mr. Doheny is one of the most extensive and one of the most successful oil prospectors and operators in the world. It appears that he has no interest whatever in any of the property within the naval reserve or in any of the withdrawal areas, and that he has no interest in any of the lands that would be patented. He does, however, own profitable and producing oil wells throughout the State of California. If he has any interest in the bill at all of an individual or personal character it would be to see the bill killed, because thus the volume of oil would be restricted and limited, if not reduced, and the value of his product would be proportionately increased. I can not believe, however, that he is influenced either one way or the other by that consideration; but he tells us, after his long experience as an oil prospector and an operator in oil, the fact is that the wells which now exist upon the reserve are continually draining the supply of oil and reducing the oil pressure, and he ventured the opinion that in 10 years the gas pressure would be so far reduced as to make it next to impossible to extract any further oil from the reserves.

Mr. President, Mr. Doheny was speaking of the California naval oil reserves, reserves No. 1 and No. 2. Naval oil reserve No. 2 was what was generally spoken of as a checkerboard reserve. Every odd-numbered section within the reserve was owned by the Southern Pacific or its grantees, and wells were sunk upon these privately owned lands; lands which had been patented by the Government of the United States. Wells had been sunk upon those lands and it was being urged that it would be necessary, or advisable, at least, that the Government sink wells upon the even numbered sections, lest the oil underneath them should be entirely drained away. I called attention to the fact.

The Senator says I relied on the judgment of Mr. Doheny, and in that connection the inference was easily deducible from his remarks that I relied upon the judgment of Mr. Doheny concerning the wisdom of this leasing law. I do not know that Mr. Doheny expressed any view about that matter at all, but I relied not at all upon Mr. Doheny's judgment concerning the wisdom of the leasing law. I relied only on his judgment as a prospector that wells upon the odd-numbered sections would drain the oil from the even-numbered sections. And likewise with respect to naval reserve No. 1, wells had been drilled upon the lands immediately adjacent to naval reserve No. 1.

The map on the wall shows naval reserve No. 2, the sections marked in yellow being those owned by the Government, the others being held in private ownership, dotted with wells, as can be seen indicated on the map. The necessity of leasing, or in some way or other taking the oil from the odd-numbered sections, is obvious to anyone who knows anything about the subject.

So a large number of these leases, which it is asserted were granted by Democratic officials, are leases within naval reserve No. 2, as well as naval reserve No. 1, to which I shall presently refer.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. EDGE in the chair). Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. As I understand it, the 150 leases granted by the Democratic Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Lane, were over opposite No. 3, Teapot Dome, and in the so-called Salt Creek field, which was enormously richer than the other field. I have been informed, but I may be wrong, that the whole value of the Teapot Dome reserve was probably not over $50,000,000, but that the Salt Creek field was probably worth a billion dollars.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, the map to which I now point indicates the naval reserve No. 2. The one heretofore referred to is the same.

The lands immediately outside of this area here were held in private ownership. Wells were being sunk upon these lands held in private ownership and were draining the oil from the lands within the naval reserve. Mr. Doheny was telling the committee that that would be the inevitable effect of the sinking of these adjacent wells. So obvious was the result of the sinking of those wells that Mr. Daniels, commended by Senator La Follette for his fidelity to the public interest as Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Daniels, recognizing the soundness of the information given by Mr. Doheny and by others, I will say, with respect to the same subject, before he left office advertised for bids for the sinking of 22 wells along these sections 2, 12, and 18, in order that the oil available from them should not be drained off by the wells in the adjacent territory.

The leases were not made under the advertisement of Mr. Daniels and proposals were called for again, and before response was had to the proposals Mr. Denby succeeded Mr. Daniels, and the leases were made under the administration of Mr. Denby for the sinking of 22 wells in this adjacent territory. So that if I did rely upon the judgment of Mr. Doheny with respect to this matter, so likewise did Secretary Daniels and so likewise did everybody who had any information about the matter at all.

I am sorry we do not have here a map of naval reserve No. 1, although I could, I presume, give to the Senate a very clear understanding of the situation without the assistance of a map.

The Salt Creek field, so called, is an oval-shaped area lying to the north of another oval-shaped area, similar in extent, immediately to the south, known as the Teapot Dome. The Salt Creek field had been very extensively taken up by parties who acquired title to the ground in one way or another. They had sunk wells all over the Salt Creek field and it was contended that wells in the Salt Creek field were draining the oil out of the Teapot Dome, which lay to the south. Doubtless there was more or less drainage. The contention of those of us who have in some measure been responsible for making these affairs public was that the drainage was of no very great consequence and that it could be met by the sinking of a few wells, possibly 8 or 10 wells, along the line of the boundary between the Salt Creek field on the north and the Teapot Dome on the south, and that it afforded no justification whatever for the leasing of the entire Teapot Dome.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. If that is true, why did the Democratic administration continue to make the leases outside of the reserve? One Democratic official, one Democratic Cabinet member, was leasing wells in the reserve, while another was leasing the oil lands right outside the reserve for oil purposes; so if one theory was right, the other was wrong; and if the other was right, the first was wrong.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Let us take the first one. Here is a Democratic official making leases within the reserve. I called attention to that. Who will stand here in this presence and assert that that was not a wise policy? Each alternate section was being held in private ownership.

Mr. GLASS. Does anybody stand here and assert or suggest that he received a bribe for any of the leases?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Unless it is the Senator from Indiana, I know of no one else.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I am not asserting that anybody received a bribe, but I am asserting that Mr. Doheny, by his own testimony sworn to before the committee, testified about employing any number of people connected with the Democratic administration that did have to do with these very matters. I ask the Senator if he thinks——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Just a moment. The Senator is talking by my courtesy.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Very well.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I desire to say to the Senator that that is not the issue here, whether Democratic officials were or were not employed. The question is whether any of them was bribed by Mr. Doheny.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I am asking the Senator whether he thinks that was within the bounds of propriety?

Mr. GLASS. Were they employed before the leases, or at the time of the leases, or a considerable time after the leases?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. Doheny testified that they were employed—for instance, Mr. Lane was employed in February, if I remember correctly, or March.

Mr. GLASS. Does the Senator mean to suggest that Franklin K. Lane ever accepted a bribe from Mr. Doheny? If he does, then I denounce him here upon this floor as a slanderer.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I do not mean to reflect on Franklin K. Lane.

Mr. GLASS. Yes; that is exactly what the Senator means, and the denial simply accentuates his moral turpitude in doing it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I am going to say something in that connection. I think Franklin K. Lane bore a very high reputation and I am glad to have that opinion myself of Franklin K. Lane; but Senators on the other side of the Chamber have not hesitated to go into the tomb for Republicans who have passed away, Republicans who are now dead and gone. Just a day or two ago a Democratic speaker down in North Carolina, himself a candidate for the Presidency, went to the tomb for the corpse of John W. Weeks, who was an honorable man in this life. Democrats attempt to smear oil all over dead Republicans. But if we merely mention a man who perchance happened to be a Democrat, then there is something wrong.

What do they mean by their accusations against John W. Weeks? What do they mean by their casting of reflections on Frederick W. Upham, who is likewise dead? What do they mean by accusing Warren G. Harding, also dead, the late President of the United States? But if we speak of anyone who happens to be a Democrat, that seems to be a different matter.

Mr. GLASS. The question here is, What does the Senator mean by accusing Franklin K. Lane?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I am not charging him with bribery.

Mr. GLASS. The Senator is not doing it outright. He is doing it by the meanest kind of insinuation.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. In my judgment, it was a breach of the proprieties for all those Cabinet officers to go out and accept oil employment immediately after leaving the Cabinet.

Mr. GLASS. My judgment is that there is no kind of cowardice on this earth that is worse than an insinuation against an honest man who, because he is dead, can not defend his own character.

Mr. CARAWAY. I would like to inquire if the Senator from Indiana thinks they ought to have stayed in office and taken the employment?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I was addressing myself to naval reserve No. 3. The situation will be disclosed without any difficulty at all. I have indicated that there was a belief that there was some drainage from the Teapot Dome by reason of the wells drilled in the Salt Creek field, immediately to the north. That place was all dotted with wells—wells which were producing in phenomenal quantities. But not all of the land within the Salt Creek field was held in private ownership. There was a large area of land there—the Senator from Indiana has given us the aggregate acreage—that also belonged to the Government of the United States and had never been leased or drilled at all.

Obviously, Mr. President, if those lands were not leased and the oil taken out of them contemporaneously with the extraction of the oil with private lands within the Salt Creek field practically the entire value of those lands would have faded away.

The oil would have been drained out of the publicly owned lands by the wells on the privately owned lands in the Salt Creek field. Under these circumstances there was nothing for the Government of the United States or its authorized officials to do except to lease the Government lands within the Salt Creek field. They proceeded to do so, and advertised for bids. Bids were received which yielded to the Government a vast revenue from those lands in the way of bonuses, and it has been deriving a vast revenue from them since in the way of royalties.

Mr. President, the majority of the committee inquiring into these things in the year 1924 were Republicans. The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] was chairman of the committee for a considerable time. Former Senator Lenroot, of Wisconsin, occupied the position of chairman of the committee for a considerable time. He was succeeded by former Senator Ladd, of North Dakota, whose death was so generally and universally deplored. I ask the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] did he ever join with anybody in condemning the leasing of those areas by the Government within naval reserve No. 2 or naval reserve No. 1, or in Salt Creek field?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, so far as I understood the situation at that time, I thought that the wells were drilled for purpose of preventing the draining of oil from the lands in Teapot Dome. I thought that it was a perfectly proper thing to do if that drainage was going on. The Senator remembers very well the attitude we all took in that regard.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Let me ask the Senator, Was there any criticism from any member of the committee concerning the execution of the leases? I speak now of the leases in Salt Creek field, the leases in naval reserve No. 2, and the leases in naval reserve No. 1.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator means the wells that were drilled for the purpose of preventing drainage?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Exactly.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not remember of anything that was ever said while I was chairman. Of course, after I was appointed chairman of the Finance Committee the Senator knows very well we had a revenue measure on hand, and I was called from the investigating committee, and, of course, did not follow it as closely as I did when I was its chairman.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I am prepared to say that now, four years after these matters were fully investigated by the committee, and after no member of the committee, either Democratic or Republican, questioned the wisdom or propriety of those leases or the legality of them in any way or ever made a suggestion that there was anything wrong about them, the Senator from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON], who was not here at all at that time, regales us this morning with a story about how Democratic officials executed the leases.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. GEORGE. May I recall to the Senator's mind that he went fully into those leases at the time of his report, submitted on behalf not only of himself but of the full committee, in this Chamber in 1924.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I exposed all these matters in discussion of the subject on the floor at that time, without a suggestion from any quarter whatever, such as is now made, that there was something questionable and even corrupt about the leases.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Is the Senator perfectly satisfied with the working out of the amendment to the leasing act that was passed June 6, 1920?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I am not.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Has the Senator done anything to amend that act?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Has the Senator from Indiana done anything?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. That was the purpose of the investigation, or one of its purposes, as conducted by the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys. My position is that that committee should draft legislation to correct the situation.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator has been here now something over three years, or thereabouts. I would like to know what he has done to correct any of the evils he speaks of in the legislation?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I have gone into it very carefully, and I am perfectly willing to draft legislation if the committee does not desire to do so.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator understands perfectly well that he is at liberty to introduce any kind of a bill he pleases without respect to any recommendation of the committee.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Oh, indeed; but the resolution itself suggested that the legislation be drafted by the committee.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I want to have it perfectly clear in the mind of everybody who has followed this discussion that the legislation in which I was interested had absolutely nothing whatever to do with the naval oil reserves. Of course, when the matter came upon the floor, I took part in the discussion, but that part of it was not the subject of any comment by me except that to which reference has here been made; and yet, notwithstanding that, notwithstanding the herculean labors I performed in making public these scandals, notwithstanding that, in a large measure through my efforts, these properties, estimated by the Secretary of Labor to be of the value of a billion dollars, were recovered by the Government of the United States, the Senator from Indiana is quite willing to couple up my name with this legislation in an opprobrious way and to associate me in some form or other with those who have been guilty of this enormous iniquity.

Something has been said now and then about senatorial courtesy. I shall make no appeal whatever to that, but if the Senator from Indiana were on the floor—and I do not see him here now—I should ask him what would be expected of a gentleman under the circumstances?

Mr. CARAWAY. How do you think he could answer it?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I want to make it perfectly clear also, Mr. President, that, of course, the greater proportion—the overwhelming proportion—of this great area of land that was leased by Democratic officials was leased under the provisions of the act of February 5, 1920, and not under the act of June 4, 1920, at all.

Those were areas wholly and entirely outside of the naval reserves; they constituted but a relatively small portion of the aggregate lands throughout the West that are supposed to be valuable for the oil contained in them and that are subject to disposition under the provisions of the act of February 25, 1920.

Mr. President, I want to say in this connection that that contest had gone on for some considerable time before I ever became a Member of the Senate at all. As I have indicated, those lands were withdrawn somewhere about 1906, 1907, 1908, and 1909, and lay there entirely unproductive and undeveloped and continued so, and were to continue so until legislation appropriate to their disposition was enacted by the Congress.

A very strenuous contest arose as to the character of the legislation that ought to be enacted, it being contended generally by those from the West that those lands ought to be disposed of in fee; that they ought to be sold and title to the property given, so that they would become subject to taxation as is all other property within the State held in private ownership. On the other hand, the conservationists in the East insisted that the proper method of disposing of those lands was to lease them and not to sell them. The contest went on for years between those arguing in favor of the total alienation of the fee and those contending for the leasing only of the lands.

Contrary to the views of many of the Senators from the West, I believed that the difference was not of such great consequence as was alleged by some of our friends. I preferred rather to have the lands brought under development and to make them contribute to the general welfare of the people than to have them lie idle. So I gave my adherence to the proposal to lease those lands, and on the floor I contended for that policy against the strenuous opposition of able Senators such as the former Senators from Colorado, Mr. Thomas and Mr. Shafroth. That became the guiding principle of the bill for the leasing of these lands, which culminated in the general leasing law of 1920. I desire to have it perfectly understood that that law does not refer to oil alone, but it also provides for the disposition of coal lands, of lands containing phosphate, and of lands containing sodium and other deposits nonmetallic in character.

Mr. President, I stated the other day that I felt proud of the part that I had in that legislation. It has resulted in the opening up of vast areas of the West from which the Government is deriving a revenue in the way of royalties from the land. There are some features of that law to which the Senator from Indiana has referred that have not worked out well, much to my regret, features with which I had absolutely nothing at all to do; but, on the whole, the act has undoubtedly been beneficial.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. PITTMAN. Let me add to what the Senator has said that there was a method of obtaining title to the oil lands before there was any legislation looking to their leasing, and a great many citizens of the United States had obtained rights that were at that time recognized by the courts. In other words, lands were taken up under the placer mining act of the United States, which allowed an association of persons to locate 160 acres or one person to locate 20 acres; and one person might locate as many 20-acre tracts as he saw fit, if he complied with the law regarding such locations.

The section of country adjacent to oil reserve No. 2 in California and the Teapot Dome oil reserve had been located under the mining law for a period of several years before there was any attempt made by the Secretary of the Navy to create the Teapot Dome oil reserve or naval reserve No. 2 in California. Then in 1910, if I recollect aright, Congress passed an act to validate titles under the existing law, which act provided that, even though locators had not made a discovery as required in the law, if they commenced and continued their work with diligence until that discovery was obtained, they should be entitled to patents. The Honolulu Oil Co. case, referred to, was one of those. In the Honolulu Oil Co. case those who claimed the land under the old mining law, before the leasing act, had commenced to sink wells, and under the act of 1910 they proceeded to continue to sink wells until they obtained oil. Then, not during the time they were drilling, but after they had obtained oil, the question of diligence was raised. Lane tried that case and found as a fact that they had complied with the law of 1910; that they had been diligent; that they had made their discovery. There was a dispute with regard to that, but what happened? Under the oil leasing act there were certain men who were supposed to have a prior equity, and the ones who were supposed to have a prior equity were those who had attempted to comply with the law before and who had made a discovery of oil, but who were not granted title under patent. As a matter of fact, it was the succeeding Republican administration that granted the lease to the Honolulu Oil Co., and no one has ever before questioned, that I know of, the justice or the fairness of such actions. So we found when we attempted to establish the oil reserves both in California and Wyoming that there were a great many initiated rights surrounding and included in the area. Some of them were vested rights that the Government recognized and some of them were vested rights that were recognized in the leasing act.

We all remember very well when Secretary Daniels took the question before the Naval Affairs Committee. He at that time was fighting against the letting of a single lease in oil reserve No. 2, on the ground that the titles of the private owners in the reserve were not well founded; but, immediately after that, the Supreme Court of the United States held that every other section in oil reserve No. 2 was owned by the Southern Pacific Railroad Co. So it was not until after that decision was made, and until after the court had held good the title of a number of other locators in oil reserve No. 2, that the Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Daniels, considered for a moment leasing any of the wells in that reserve.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I have very little further to say. I merely desire to remind the Senate that, so far as the acts of Mr. Palmer, Democratic Attorney General, are concerned, or his failure to act is concerned, all of the facts in respect to that matter were developed by my examination of Mr. Palmer, and I have no hesitancy in saying here, as I have said repeatedly heretofore on the floor of the Senate, that I think a grave mistake was made in not taking an appeal from the judgment of the district court.

But all of these matters really are old stuff. They were all threshed out here four years ago when all of these facts were developed. The Senator from Indiana has called attention to nothing new in this matter whatever. The Senate was fully advised about the whole thing.

But, Mr. President, as some question has been raised by the Senator from Indiana concerning the legality or the propriety of leases executed by Democratic Secretaries of the Interior, and particularly by John Barton Payne, I beg to remind him that the resolution under which the Committee on Public Lands is now operating directs it to go further into the whole subject; and any evidence whatever relating to the general subject is entirely pertinent and proper to be received at this time. If the Senator from Indiana knows of anything that casts any discredit whatever upon Democratic officials in connection with these leases, he is invited now to come before the committee and to exploit his ideas before the committee or to adduce any testimony that he may have to support his contention. But, of course, the Senator has not any, and he will not be able to say anything that has not been said already by myself with respect to the matter. Moreover, Mr. President, the matter is open to legislation at any time.

Now, what is the difference as to whether the act of June 4, 1920, under which these leases were made was recommended by a Democratic official or by a Republican official? Of what consequence is it whether it was passed by a Democratic Congress or by a Republican Congress? The fault is not in the law. It ought to be amended in some particulars, in my judgment; but the fault is not in the law at all. It was in utilizing the law in such a way as was denounced by the Supreme Court of the United States as entirely illegal, coupled with corruption.

Why, Mr. President, you can afford no protection against corruption in public officers by any legislation concerning the granting of power to them, except, of course, to safeguard the provisions. The point is, however, that what was done was not done in the pursuance of this law at all, but was done in defiance of the law—not only in defiance of the law but done corruptly—and that is the question which is before us.

Mr. President, I have endeavored to review these accusations against the Democratic Party. It will be of no consequence, however, because the speech of the Senator from Indiana, together with all of the misstatements of facts he made in it and which he refused to permit to be corrected upon the floor here, will, of course, be circulated broadcast by the Republican National Committee, or at least by the Senator from Indiana; so I suppose it is useless for anyone to endeavor at this time to correct the misstatements of fact. But I think it strange, indeed, Mr. President, that the Senator from Indiana was unwilling in the course of his discussion to have these misstatements of fact corrected by those who are better informed upon the subject that he perhaps can hope to be from a study of the RECORD.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. What misstatement of fact did I make?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I challenged the statement which the Senator from Indiana made that the Senator from Montana was responsible for the law under which these leases on the naval oil reserves to Doheny and Sinclair were executed.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I do not think I made that statement, Mr. President. What I did say was that the Senator from Montana led the fight on this floor to pass the leasing act. I think that is true. The Senator will not deny that, will he?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator likewise knows that these leases were not made under the provisions of the leasing act, so called.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, these leases were made under the provisions of the amendment to that very act on the 4th day of June, 1920; and the Senator certainly voted for that act.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator speaks of it as an amendment. It had no relation, it had no reference, to the leasing act of 1920.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, if we had a rider attached to some bill changing the immigration laws, I should say that would be an amendment to the immigration laws; and this bill unquestionably changed much of the leasing act. Therefore I should say it was an amendment to the leasing act; and since the Senator was one of the very staunch supporters of the leasing act originally, and this legislation undoubtedly did change that act, and the Senator did vote for this legislation along with others on both sides of the Chamber, it seems to me the Senator can not escape responsibility for the legislation.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Why does not the Senator state the facts?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. What is the fact to which the Senator refers?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The fact is that that provision of the appropriation act of 1920 was recommended by Mr. Daniels, then Secretary of the Navy. He recognized the necessity of having authority to grant leases which would permit the sinking of wells on these reserves—naval reserve No. 2, where every alternate section was held in private ownership, and leases upon the lands within naval reserve No. 1 adjacent to territory that was being leased. He recognized the necessity of those leases, as suggested in the testimony of Mr. Doheny, to which the Senator has so frequently called attention, and which I commended to the notice of the Senate; and accordingly Mr. Daniels asked the authority granted by the act of June 4, 1920. That bill was reported and the matter came up on the floor and it was amended in one particular upon the motion of the Senator from Utah, taking out the provision in relation to the refining of oil. Outside of that, there was not a word of disapproval from anyone, so far as my information goes, in either branch of the Congress. The Senator from Montana did not get up and opject to it——

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. As I remember, there were nine votes against it in the House. Either against the amendment or the original leasing act.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Just a minute. The Senator from Montana did not object to it, and neither did any other Member of the Senate, Democratic or Republican, because, strange as it may appear, apparently they all had perfect confidence in Mr. Daniels, then Secretary of the Navy, and felt assured that he would execute no leases whatever except such as were absolutely necessary to prevent the drainage. But when his successor came into office, or, rather, when the Secretary of the Interior came in on March 4, 1921, he proceeded to lease the entire reserve; and that is the question that is under consideration here.

Now I yield to the Senator.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, the Senator admits, however, that he did support the rider to the appropriation bill?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Why, Mr. President, there is no admission about it. I am telling the Senator what the facts are—that the bill went through without opposition from me or from anybody else.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Then the Senator voted for it?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Why, certainly the Senator voted for it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. That is all I have said.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Just what satisfaction does the Senator from Indiana get from that?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The point I make is that there evidently was no roll call, and the Senator was in the Senate Chamber and voted for it, not against it; and I have simply said that he supported that amendment—that is all. The Senator refuses to call it an amendment. I can see nothing in it but an amendment to the leasing act which Mr. Daniels himself asked for. The Senator himself admits that he does not believe that that ought to remain the law. Neither do I; and I assume that the Senator, as a member of the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys, will draft legislation repealing it. I know the Senator is able to do it. I know he understands the situation.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I do not think there is any longer any fear that that act is going to be abused as it has been. I think we have taken care of that without legislation.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, is it not a fact that the Supreme Court, in its decision, declared that that act did not warrant the interpretation given it by Mr. Fall?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Of course; it did not warrant the execution of these leases.

Mr. GLASS. Exactly; so that the act had nothing to do with it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I am quite willing that the Senator from Indiana should draw any inferences that he cares to from the fact that these five lawyers, being members of the Cabinet of Mr. Wilson, as he says, after they left office were employed in one capacity or another by either Mr. Doheny or his companies or Mr. Sinclair or his companies in matters that had absolutely nothing whatever to do with the leases of the naval oil reserves. He may take what comfort he can from that, Mr. President; but when he endeavors to couple up my name, in view of my services in this matter, in such a way as to lead the public to believe that in some way or other I am open to reprehension in this connection, I feel that some explanation is due the Senate from the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, does not the Senator think that by that statement he attributes too much credulity to the public to imagine that they are going to be influenced by the statement the Senator from Indiana made?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I have not anything further to say about this matter.

ADMINISTRATION OF OATHS BY CERTAIN CUSTOMS OFFICIALS

Mr. SMOOT. I ask unanimous consent that House Joint Resolution 253 be taken up and passed, the Senate already having reported the same provision and it being now on the Calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. EDGE in the chair). Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Utah?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 253) authorizing certain customs officials to administer oaths, which was read twice by its title.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REMISSION OF DUTIES ON CERTAIN CATTLE

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, in this connection, will the Senator call up Order of Business 636, House Joint Resolution 217, providing for the remission of duties on certain cattle which have crossed the boundary line into foreign countries?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, to make all of the legislation complete, I ask unanimous consent now to take up House Joint Resolution 217, Order of Business 636, and pass it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of House Joint Resolution 217? The Chair hears none.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 217) providing for the remission of duties on certain cattle which have crossed the boundary line into foreign countries, which had been reported from the Committee on Finance with amendments.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I ask to have the second amendment rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments of the committee will be stated in their order.

The first amendment was, on page 1, line 8, after the word "between," to strike out "June 9" and insert "April 1," so as to read:

Resolved, etc., That, under regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, the duties are hereby remitted on (1) cattle which strayed across the boundary line into any foreign country or were driven across such boundary line for pasturage purposes only, and which were admitted to the United States under bond at any time between April 1, 1927, and the date of the enactment of this joint resolution, and (2) their offspring and increase so admitted during such period; and the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to cancel any such bond.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, after line 2, to insert a new section, as follows:

SEC. 2. Any officer or employee of the customs service designated by the Secretary of the Treasury or by a collector of customs is hereby authorized to administer any oath required or authorized by law or regulation promulgated thereunder in respect of any matter coming before such officer or employee in the performance of his official duties, but no compensation or fee shall be demanded or accepted for administering any such oath.

The amendment was rejected.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the joint resolution to be read a third time.

The joint resolution was read the third time and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "Joint resolution providing for the remission of duties on certain cattle which have crossed the boundary line into foreign countries, and for other purposes."

LEGAL FEES IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate take up out of order House bill 9020, to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a code of law for the District of Columbia," approved March 3, 1901, and the acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto. I make this request for the reason that the officials of the District of Columbia are very anxious to have the bill passed before the 1st day of April.

Mr. McKELLAR. What is the nature of the bill?

Mr. BORAH. It changes to some extent the fee system here in the District. It is designed to make the District law comply with the law in the United States courts elsewhere with reference to fees.

Mr. McKELLAR. The bill has been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. And has the approval of both sides?

Mr. BORAH. It has.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I ask to have inserted in the RECORD in connection with the bill just passed the report of the Committee on the Judiciary, which contains a letter from the clerk of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia.

There being no objection, the report was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CLERK'S FEES IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. BORAH, from the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted the following report (to accompany H. R. 9020):

The Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 9020) to amend section 1110 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia, prescribing fees to be charged by the clerk of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, reports the same favorably to the Senate and recommends that the bill do pass.

The bill has the approval of the Attorney General and his letter to the House Judiciary Committee is herewith printed as a part of this report followed by a letter from the clerk of the court setting out in more detail the purposes of this legislation.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, D. C., January 28, 1927.

Hon. GEORGE S. GRAHAM,
Chairman Committee on the Judiciary,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: I have the honor to refer further to your letter of the 13th instant with which you transmitted for my consideration and recommendation H. R. 16217, a bill "To amend an act entitled 'An act to establish a code of law for the District of Columbia,' approved March 3, 1901, and the acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto," and to say that I know of no objection to its enactment.

This bill provides for certain changes in the fees to be charged and collected by the clerk of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia. The fees as changed conform as far as practicable to the fees provided by the act approved February 11, 1925 (43 Stat. 857), to be collected by clerks of United States district courts. The department has been informally advised by Hon. Walter I. McCoy, chief justice of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, that the bill meets with his approval.

Respectfully,

JNO. G. SARGENT, Attorney General.

SUPREME COURT OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
Washington, D. C., March 19, 1928.

HON. GEORGE W. NORRIS,
Chairman Senate Judiciary Committee,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Referring to the bill (H. R. 9020) to amend section 1110 of the District of Columbia Code, which bill is now before your committee, I have to state that this bill is designed to conform as nearly as possible to the fee bill for the district courts of the United States (act approved February 4, 1925).

This bill does not affect salaries of the clerk or any of his assistants, all money collected thereunder being accounted for to the Department of Justice and deposited in the United States Treasury. This office does not pay out any money at all from fees collected. Salaries are fixed by the Department of Justice and supplies are furnished by that department on requisitions. Printing and binding for this court is done by the Government Printing Office, through an appropriation carried in the District of Columbia appropriation bill for the court of appeals and the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia of $4,275, of which $3,000 is allotted to this court.

Under this bill no refunds will be made to litigants as is now the law in bankruptcy cases, the fees named for filing the different classes of cases being an average fee for services in that class. The bill differs from the Federal court fee bill in that in this court a good many attachments are issued before judgment and executions and attachments after judgment at law and many rules to show cause in contempt in maintenance and divorce cases in equity that the Federal courts in the States do not have, and these attachments, executions, and rules are charged for extra in addition to the regular filing fee for the case, as it is impossible to gauge the number of attachments and rules that may be required in advance.

The bill is designed to produce as nearly as possible the same fees per case as are now earned. The only increase in any specified fee is the item on page 4, lines 24, 25, and 26, this item being increased from $1 to $2 for the oath to attorneys and from $1 to $2 for an engrossed certificate of admission to cover the oath books, indexes, and card indexes of attorneys, and is justified by the service rendered; and the item on page 5, line 1, for each marriage license from $1 to $2, the present system of indexing to be supplemented by a card index of all licenses issued, which necessitates the purchase of additional file cases and filing equipment, the increase being justified by the additional expense to the United States.

Item page 5, lines 16, 17, and 18, for clerks' attendance, etc., on court, is merely a relic of the time when this office paid salaries and expenses from fees received and in dull times, as in summer with the court not in session, if the fees were not sufficient to cover expenses the clerk could draw on the Department of Justice for sufficient funds from this $5 per day allowance to make up any deficiency. This was seldom resorted to, as the fees were sufficient to pay expenses and a small surplus was turned in to the United States, and while the charge is now only a constructive earning, no money passing thereunder, it has been considered best to retain the item in this fee bill for the purpose of making comparisons with earnings in other years and is comparable to section 4 of act approved February 4, 1925, which is the fee bill for the district courts of the United States above referred to.

This fee bill was suggested to this office by examiners of the Department of Justice to simplify accounting work for this office and auditing work for the department, leaving the tax upon the litigant as nearly as possible the same.

Yours very truly,

FRANK E. CUNNINGHAM,
Clerk Supreme Court, District of Columbia.

OCMULGEE RIVER BRIDGE, GEORGIA

Mr. SHEPPARD. From the Committee on Commerce I report back favorably, without amendment, the bill (H. R. 9831) authorizing J. E. Turner, his heirs, legal representatives, or assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Ocmulgee River at or near Fitzgerald, Ga., and I submit a report (No. 641) thereon. The senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS] would like to have the bill passed at once, and I ask for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the bill was read and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE IN THE CANAL ZONE

Mr. SMITH submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 184), which was read:

Whereas it has been alleged that the business of the courts of the Canal Zone, and especially in the district court of the Canal Zone, has been conducted in a manner prejudicial to the orderly administration of justice; and

Whereas charges of corruption, malfeasance in office, and inefficiency have been made against the present judge of the district court of the Canal Zone, as well as against other officers of such court; and

Whereas it is charged that conditions existing in the courts of the Canal Zone are detrimental to the best interests of the United States in Latin America: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate, or a duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is hereby authorized and directed to make a full and complete investigation of the judicial system of the Canal Zone, including the district court, the office of the United States district attorney, the office of the United States marshal, the magistrates' courts, and the administration of justice in the Canal Zone, and to report thereon to the Senate as soon as practicable, with such recommendations for necessary legislation as it deems advisable. For the purpose of this resolution such committee or subcommittee is authorized to hold hearings, to sit and act at such times and places in the United States or the Canal Zone, to employ such experts and clerical, stenographic, and other assistance; to require by subpœna or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents; to administer such oaths and to take such testimony in the United States and in the Canal Zone and make such expenditures as it deems advisable. The cost of stenographic service to report such hearings shall not be in excess of 25 cents per 100 words. The expenses of such committee or subcommittee, which shall not be in excess of $———, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, it will be noted that I have not fixed in the resolution any amount for the expenses of the investigation. The fact is that these matters were brought before me, and after consultation with different Senators they agreed that it was a matter of sufficient importance to have an investigation made. I ask that the resolution be appropriately referred.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator asks that the resolution be appropriately referred. Without objection, the Chair refers the resolution to the Committee on the Judiciary.

AWARD OF MEDALS TO WORLD WAR VETERANS

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a letter from Atlanta Post, No. 1, the American Legion, by Frank A. Haas, adjutant, and an accompanying editorial from the Atlanta Georgian of March 12, 1928. The letter and editorial have to do with a subject pending before Congress, as embodied in House bill 5898.

There being no objection, the letter and editorial were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ATLANTA POST, NO. 1, THE AMERICAN LEGION,
Atlanta, Ga., March 24, 1928.

The Hon. MILLARD E. TYDINGS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Inclosed is an editorial which appeared in an Atlanta paper on March 12, 1928, and copied in other sections of the country. It treats on a bill introduced both in the Senate and House of Representatives for the extension of time for the award of medals to World War veterans.

This editorial contains truths which we feel ought to be brought to your attention for immediate action.

May we ask for your consideration on the merits of this bill and then the action you think it deserves?

We have the honor to be, sir,

ATLANTA POST, NO. 1, THE AMERICAN LEGION,
By FRANK A. HAAS, Adjutant.

[From the Atlanta Georgian of March 12, 1928]

THIS SHAMEFUL INDIFFERENCE SHOULD BE REMEDIED

Since April, 1923, it has been impossible, no matter how meritorious the case, to award a medal of honor, a distinguished-service medal, or a distinguished-service cross to any service man of the World War.

In the Congress of 1923–24 Senator HARRIS, of Georgia, introduced a very simple bill to extend the time for only one year to award these medals, on proper recommendation and consideration.

For the past five years this bill has been reintroduced, and Senator HAWES, of Missouri, took up the cudgels in association with Senator HARRIS for the right to have an appreciative Nation recognize those who served with the most distinction and merit and award a slight token that would not cost the Nation a dollar of appropriation.

Just why Congress is so indifferent to this matter is hard to account for, unless it be that the War Department itself is indifferent, thus influencing Congress to an extent—without Congress particularly noticing it.

There is reason to suspect that the War Department is indifferent, if not actually hostile.

The regulars are plastered with ribbons; they have been taken care of and perhaps are willing to let things slide.

There are those, too, who are too modest or too proud to fight for their rights.

If they are entitled to service medals because of their deeds, if their records are clear and their deserts manifest, why should they not be rewarded accordingly without any time limit?

Why on earth should it be held that a man entitled to a decoration in April, 1923, is not entitled to it to-day?

If distinguished and meritorious service come to light 25 years after the close of the war, why should not the award be made accordingly?

Efforts to get that view into the bigwigs of the War Department seem of no avail, but it looks as if some pressure is to be brought before Congress after all.

The American Legion is taking the matter up vigorously and the Atlanta Post thereof is bestirring itself.

The Disabled American Veterans of the World War is lending a hand, and the American Federation of Labor is putting itself vigorously on record as demanding action and justice in this situation.

If it be true that this bill has been hopelessly hung up in the Military Committees of both Houses of Congress, and that the reason therefor is the attitude of the War Department, then all the Georgian has to say is that the War Department has assumed a shameful and wholly unworthy and un-American attitude!

It is gratifying to know that both Georgia Senators and the Georgia delegation in the House of Representatives are lining up favorably to this measure!

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, a few days ago I offered an amendment to House bill 5898. The junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] has requested that a letter received by him and an editorial from a certain newspaper be published in the RECORD in reference to the matter. I desire to make a brief statement, and I should like to have printed in the RECORD at the end of the statement a letter from Hon. Dwight F. Davis, Secretary of War, together with some citations which he gives.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

[The letter and citations appear at the end of Mr. BLEASE's speech marked "Exhibit A."]

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, April 7, 1923, was fixed as the last date for considering recommendations made for the medal of honor and for the distinguished-service cross. These are for American soldiers who served in the American Army overseas. Since that time the Senate has passed special enabling acts authorizing American officers to accept decorations from foreign governments, but at the same time Congress stands on record as prohibiting consideration of recommendations for medals by our own country. There are about 300 recommendations on file with the War Department recommending American boys for American honors which can not be acted upon because Congress has forbidden the War Department to do so. The injustice of this situation should be apparent to any man. Undoubtedly during the war many acts of heroism and bravery were performed which were not called to the attention of the proper authorities until long afterwards. I have asked to have inserted in the RECORD some 10 or 15 recommendations which have not been acted upon because of the law heretofore passed by Congress. These recommendations indicate some of the instances of brave and splendid conduct under fire during the World War which can have no reward. It seems a crying shame to deny these men at least an opportunity to have their cases considered and in the meantime permit the acceptance of foreign decorations by American soldiers. If any soldier has performed an exceptional act of bravery, he is entitled to his country's reward, and I have therefore offered an amendment to the bill to which I have referred which will permit the War Department to consider these cases, and if they are meritorious to confer upon those recommended the decorations which are their due. If we are not to permit American soldiers to receive decorations from their own Government, why should we permit them to receive decorations from foreign governments? I have no objection to the American soldier receiving a decoration from a foreign government, which we permit here each day, but if it is right to look at the matter from that angle there is more justice in giving the American soldier the right to receive a decoration from his own Government. My amendment simply provides that the recommendations now on file in the War Department may be considered, and if the board finds the cases are deserving the men may be given their decorations.

EXHIBIT A

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, March 17, 1928.

Hon. COLE L. BLEASE,
United States Senate.

DEAR SENATOR BLEASE: Further reference is made to your letter of the 12th instant, in which you requested that you be furnished with the names and citations of the first 12 men recommended for the award of the medal of honor, and the same information on the first 12 who were recommended for the award of the distinguished-service cross.

In compliance with your request, I am inclosing herewith two lists of the names of men who were recommended, or in whose behalf requests were made, for the award of the decorations mentioned subsequent to April 7, 1923. The action taken by the department in each case is shown on the lists, as well as the particular act or acts for which the recognition was sought.

The merits of these cases, as well as the merits of many other cases now on file in the War Department, all received since April 7, 1923, have not been decided upon, as the War Department is without authority to refer them to a board of awards for recommendation because such action is precluded by the law which terminated such awards on April 7, 1923.

Sincerely yours,

DWIGHT F. DAVIS,
Secretary of War.

MEDAL OF HONOR

William E. Ashton, lieutenant colonel, Medical Corps, Medical Detachment, Seventy-eighth Division, American Expeditionary Forces.

First recommended for the award of the Congressional Medal of Honor on October 27, 1926, received in the War Department on October 29, 1926. The action for which he was recommended is substantially as follows:

"On or about October 17, 1918, the mess trench at the Headquarters, One hundred and fifty-fifth Infantry Brigade, Seventy-eighth Division, was struck by a shell as the officers were sitting down to their evening meal. Some five officers and men were killed and a greater number wounded by the shell exploding on the edge of the trench. When the division commander learned of this disaster two ambulances were ordered from division headquarters some 2 miles in the rear at Chatel Chehery. The surgeon on duty at headquarters, Lieut. Col. William E. Ashton, insisted on taking the ambulances to the front himself notwithstanding the protests of the division chief surgeon, who called his attention to the fact that the road to and the terrain occupied by the One hundred and fifty-fifth Infantry Brigade was under heavy artillery fire. Colonel Ashton, nevertheless, went forward instead of delegating it to any subordinate, promptly appearing with his relief to care for the wounded. His great skill and sound judgment undoubtedly saved the life of First Lieutenant John P. Twaddell, aide to the brigade commander, and aided in the disposition of other wounded in no less a degree."

This recommendation was not considered by the department inasmuch as the time limit set by law within which the medal of honor could be awarded for World War acts expired on April 7, 1923.

Jack H. Hammons, corporal, Company C, Ninth Field Signal Battalion, Fifth Division.

Awarded silver-star citation in General Orders, No. 61, Headquarters Fifth Division, American Expeditionary Forces, France, dated October 9, 1918, as follows:

"Between September 12 and 15, in the St. Mihiel salient, displayed conspicuous gallantry and devotion to duty by opening and operating telephone and buzzerphone stations under heavy machine-gun and shell fire."

Recommendation for the award of the medal of honor, received April 9, 1923, was not considered in the War Department as the time limit within which the medal of honor could, under the law, be awarded for acts performed during the World War had expired on April 7, 1923.

Oliver C. Farrant, sergeant, Ninety-sixth Company, Sixth Regiment, United States Marine Corps.

Awarded the distinguished-service cross by the commanding general American Expeditionary Forces on September 18, 1918, with the following citation:

"For extraordinary heroism in action in the attack on Tigny, France, July 19, 1918. He led his section with remarkable coolness and courage in the advance under heavy fire of machine guns and artillery. He was severely wounded, but continued to advance, thereby setting such an inspiring example to the men of his section that they routed the enemy."

Letter of September 13, 1922, asking whether or not a medal of honor can now be awarded posthumously to the above named, with copy of recommendation dated August 30, 1918, for the award of the distinguished-service cross, were considered in the department on March 3, 1923, and the award of the medal of honor was disapproved as the act performed was not deemed to meet the standard set by law for that award. The distinguished-service cross was considered to be the proper reward for the measure of gallantry displayed.

Request in his behalf for the medal of honor received on November 19, 1925, was not considered, inasmuch as the limit set by law within which the medal of honor could be awarded for a World War act had expired on April 7, 1923.

John C. Reynolds, private (first class), Company A, Fourth Infantry, Third Division.

No specific recommendation for medal of honor received. Affidavits made by Mr. Reynolds and officers and men with whom he served submitted in March, 1923, for acts alleged to have been performed July 15–17, 1918, in carrying messages under shell fire after having been wounded were considered in the department on April 7, 1923, for award of medal of honor, but such award was disapproved as the acts performed were not deemed to meet the standard set by law for the award of the medal of honor. Certain other affidavits submitted since April 7, 1923, were placed on file without consideration, inasmuch as time limit set by law within which the medal of honor could be awarded had expired on April 7, 1923.

William Heineman, private, Company I, One hundred and sixty-fifth Infantry, Forty-second Division, American Expeditionary Forces.

Recommended for the distinguished-service cross March 26, 1923, for act of July 28, 1918. Considered by the War Department and disapproved as the act performed was not considered to meet the standard set by law for the award of the distinguished-service cross. However, he was awarded a silver star citation by the War Department, which citation is published in General Orders, No. 14, page 38, War Department, 1923, and is as follows:

"For gallantry in action near Serges, France, July 28, 1918. While carrying a wounded man to shelter the latter was killed, whereupon Private Heineman sought and found another wounded man whom he carried to the dressing station under a hail of enemy machine-gun fire."

This citation was considered the proper reward for the measure of gallantry displayed by Private Heineman.

Requests for consideration for the award of medal of honor were made to the department in 1924, but they were not considered, inasmuch as the time limit set by law within which the medal of honor could be awarded for World War acts expired on April 7, 1923.

Joseph P. O'Brien, private, Company A, One hundred and third Machine Gun Battalion, Twenty-sixth Division.

Awarded the distinguished-service cross by the War Department on June 29, 1922, with the following citation:

"For extraordinary heroism in action near Bouresches, France, July 18, 1918. Although severely wounded, Private O'Brien advanced in front of the line under terrific machine-gun fire and succeeded in rescuing a wounded comrade and carried him back to a place of safety. After receiving first-aid treatment, he again went forward and returned with the body of a company officer."

Recommendations and affidavits, recommending or suggesting the award of the medal of honor, received in the department in March, 1923, were considered in the department on April 5, 1923, and the award of the medal of honor was disapproved as the act performed was not deemed to meet the standard set by law for that award. The distinguished-service cross previously awarded was considered to be the proper reward for the measure of gallantry displayed. Requests in his behalf for the medal of honor received in September, 1923, were not considered, inasmuch as the time limit set by law within which the medal of honor could be awarded for World War acts had expired on April 7, 1923.

Taliesin Waters, second lieutenant, One hundred and seventh Field Artillery, Twenty-eighth Division. Recommendation for the award of the distinguished-service cross for act of September 6, 1918, near Baslieux, France, was considered and approved at general headquarters, American Expeditionary Forces, on November 21, 1918, with the following citation:

"For extraordinary heroism in action near Baslieux, France, September 6, 1918. He voluntarily went to the assistance of a large number of wounded soldiers who were in an exposed position waiting aid, and continued for several hours to dress their wounds throughout a severe bombardment of gas and high-explosive shells, while hostile airplanes flew low and swept with machine-gun fire the line of litters bearing the wounded. After administering aid to 36 wounded men he helped carry them to a place of safety."

Recommended for the award of the medal of honor in September, 1922, for the act of September 6, 1918. Considered by the War Department for the medal of honor on January 3, 1923, and disapproved, as the act performed was not considered to meet the standard set by law for the award of that medal.

Application in his behalf for medal of honor renewed on February 23, 1926, but was not considered, inasmuch as the time limit set by law within which the medal of honor could be awarded had expired on April 7, 1923.

Timothy J. Moynahan, major, Second Battalion, One hundred and forty-sixth Infantry, Thirty-seventh Division. Recommended for the award of the medal of honor, but awarded the distinguished-service cross by the commanding general American Expeditionary Forces on November 21, 1918. The citation is as follows:

"For extraordinary heroism in action near Cierges, France, September 28–30, 1918. Displaying remarkable personal courage and leadership, Major Moynahan personally led his battalion without support on either flank through terrific artillery bombardment in the face of direct machine-gun fire and enfilading fire from one-pounder guns on the right, capturing his objective on the ridge east of Cierges and repelling four hostile counterattacks."

A request for the medal of honor in behalf of Major Moynahan, received in the department February 6, 1924, was not considered for that award, inasmuch as the time limit set by law within which the medal of honor could be awarded for World War acts had expired on April 7, 1923.

Meade Frierson, jr., captain, Cavalry, attached to One hundred and twenty-fifth Infantry, Thirty-second Division. Recommended for the award of the distinguished-service cross in March, 1919, and such a decoration was (posthumously) awarded to him by the Commanding General, American Expeditionary Forces, on March 18, 1919. The citation is as follows:

"For extraordinary heroism in action near Sergy, France, July 31, 1918. He was continually at the head of his company in the attack on Hill 212, near Sergy, and was constantly exposed to the terrific enemy fire while leading his men forward. After the objective had been gained and the men had dug in on the crest of the hill, he remained on watch the entire night, constantly patrolling his company sector under the heavy rifle, machine gun, and artillery fire from the enemy's lines. He was later killed while on a hazardous reconnaissance in the vicinity of Juvigny, France."

A request for medal of honor, received December 7, 1923, was not considered for that award, as the time limit set by law within which the medal of honor could be awarded for acts performed during the World War had expired on April 7, 1923.

George Francis Patton, first lieutenant, Medical Corps, attached to One hundred and sixty-fifth Infantry, Forty-second Division.

Recommended for the award of the distinguished-service cross in 1922, for act of March 21, 1918, in the Luneville sector, France. Considered and disapproved by the War Department for the award of the distinguished-service cross on April 7, 1923, as the act performed was not considered to meet the standard set by law for the award of the distinguished-service cross.

Several requests for the congressional medal of honor, and recommendations for the distinguished-service cross, have been received in the War Department since April 7, 1923, in his case, but they were not considered inasmuch as the time limit set by law within which the medal of honor or distinguished-service cross could be awarded for World War acts had expired on April 7, 1923.

The action for which request was made for the medal of honor, and for which he was recommended for the distinguished-service cross, is substantially as follows:

"For extraordinary heroism on March 21, 1918, in the Luneville sector when the Third Battalion, One hundred and sixty-fifth Infantry, and in particular Company K of said battalion, was subjected to a severe gas and shell attack resulting in heavy casualties. Lieutenant Patton, at that time attached as medical officer to the Third Battalion, left the commanding officer's dugout and went a distance of 200 yards, through a heavily wooded sector, in order to give aid to wounded American soldiers and a French officer. In amputating the arm of one of the soldiers, upon finding he could not work properly with his gas mask, he threw the mask away. In spite of being badly burned by gas about the body and in addition suffering severely internally, he remained on duty until the entire battalion was evacuated from the sector, when he was then sent to hospital. This heroic behavior had a remarkably steadying effect upon the entire command and increased the spirit and morale of the troops."

James T. O'Neill, private, One hundred and tenth Ambulance Company, One hundred and third Sanitary Train, Twenty-eighth Division. Recommended for the award of the medal of honor in December, 1918, for act on August 10, 1918, at Fismes, France. Disapproved at General Headquarters, American Expeditionary Forces, for medal of honor and awarded distinguished-service cross as the proper reward for the measure of gallantry displayed. Reconsidered in the War Department in October, 1922, for medal of honor and disapproved, as the act performed was not considered to meet the standard set by law for the award of the medal of honor.

The action for which he was recommended for the medal of honor and awarded the distinguished-service cross is as follows:

"For extraordinary heroism in action at Fismes, France, August 10, 1918. Under heavy shell and machine-gun fire Private O'Neill voluntarily made five trips to ascertain the condition of a bridge over the Vesle River to make sure that it was safe for the passage of ambulances. Later, when the bridge became impassable for vehicles, this soldier crossed the bridge on foot and brought back food and medical supplies."

A request for the medal of honor, made in his behalf, received in the War Department September 8, 1923, was not considered, inasmuch as the time limit set by law within which the medal of honor could be awarded had expired on April 7, 1923.

William S. Brittain, second lieutenant, Machine Gun Company, One hundred and twenty-fifth Infantry, Thirty-second Division.

Recommendation for medal of honor received at General Headquarters, American Expeditionary Forces, in September, 1918; considered and disapproved as it was deemed that the act performed did not meet the standard set by law for such an award. He was, however, awarded the distinguished-service cross as the proper recognition for the measure of gallantry displayed. The citation is as follows:

"For extraordinary heroism in action near Juvigny, France, August 31, 1918. Lieut. W. S. Brittain, by his aggressive spirit and action, went out beyond the main Infantry line, pushed forward unsupported with his platoon and captured 2 German officers, 94 men, and 8 machine guns. From this point of action Lieutenant Brittain, with his platoon, proceeded in a direction from which firing could be heard and by his quick decision captured 2 enemy field guns, caliber 105, and 6 trench mortars, and immediately thereafter attacked and captured 30 prisoners and 3 additional heavy machine guns."

Reconsidered in the War Department in July, 1922, for the award of the medal of honor and disapproved, as it was deemed that the act performed did not meet the standard set by law for the award of the medal of honor.

Again recommended for the medal of honor in July, 1924, but this recommendation was not considered, inasmuch as the time limit set by law within which the medal of honor could be awarded for World War acts had expired on April 7, 1923.

DISTINGUISHED-SERVICE CROSS

Louis Doerr, private (first class), Company F, Three hundred and second Engineers, Seventy-seventh Division.

Recommendation for the award of the distinguished-service cross was received in War Department April 9, 1923, but no action was taken thereon, inasmuch as the time limit set by law within which the distinguished-service cross could be awarded for World War acts had expired on April 7, 1923.

The action for which he was recommended for the distinguished-service cross is the same act for which he and three other soldiers were awarded silver star citations in General Orders, No. 35, Headquarters Seventy-seventh Division, dated November 3, 1918. It is as follows:

"The following-named soldiers, for gallant conduct in reentering the Ravin Profond, Argonne Forest, in front of the advance elements of our division and in the face of machine-gun and snipers' fire, to search for Private Seaman, who was found to be missing from the detachment after a skirmish with enemy snipers a few minutes previously. This occurred on September 26, 1918."

Giovanni Fulginiti, private, Company C, Three hundred and sixteenth Infantry, Seventy-ninth Division.

Affidavits received April 9, 1923, wherein he was recommended for the award of the distinguished-service cross, were not considered in the War Department, as the time limit within which the distinguished-service cross could, under the law, be awarded for acts performed during the World War had expired on April 7, 1923.

The action for which he was recommended is as follows:

"On or about November 6, 1918, in the vicinity of Hill 378, the major of the First Battalion, Three hundred and sixteenth Infantry, two other officers, and some 25 men of the same organization, forced so far ahead in action that they got beyond our line into the enemy's territory and were surrounded by the enemy, with the result that the living, including the wounded, were captured, with the exception of Private Fulginiti, who laid still and feigned killed, with the result that the enemy passed him by as dead. The major, wounded, two officers, and some 25 men of our forces were captured and taken to the rear by the enemy. After darkness, Private Fulginiti crawled cautiously back to and joined his own company, thus performing an inspiring act and saving for our forces the services of a man which was so greatly needed at that stage of the combat."

Earl F. Tribou, sergeant, Battery E, One hundred and first Field Artillery, Twenty-sixth Division.

Recommended for the award of the distinguished-service cross on March 31, 1923, which recommendation, with accompanying papers, received consideration by the War Department on April 7, 1923, and was disapproved, as the act performed was deemed not to meet the standard set for the award of the distinguished-service cross. However, he was awarded a silver-star citation by the War Department, which citation appears in General Orders, No. 14, page 27, War Department, and is as follows:

"For gallantry in action on July 28, 1918, while his battery was in position near the Preaux Farm, on the heights south of Fere-en-Tardenois, Sergeant Tribou, though in an exposed position and under heavy enemy machine-gun fire from a low-flying enemy airplane attacking the battery position, coolly and valiantly directed the fire of one of the machine guns of his battery at the airplane at great risk to his own life, and by his coolness and skillful handling of his machine gun assisted in bringing down the enemy airplane."

An affidavit in support of the recommendation for distinguished-service cross received on April 10, 1923, was not considered, inasmuch as the time limit set by law within which the distinguished-service cross could be awarded for World War acts had expired on April 7, 1923.

Joseph A. Mullin, sergeant, Company C, Three hundred and sixteenth Infantry, Seventy-ninth Division.

Affidavit received April 9, 1923, wherein he was recommended for the posthumous award of the distinguished-service cross, was not considered, inasmuch as the time limit set by law within which the distinguished-service cross could be awarded for World War acts had expired on April 7, 1923. The action for which he was recommended is as follows:

"Sergeant Mullin had command of a platoon and during a German machine-gun barrage, preparatory to a counterattack, which resulted in the capture of one entire platoon, he directed fire on an approaching German platoon and repulsed them, thereby saving them from capture and also holding our position. Just at the beginning of the German barrage Sergeant Mullin came to his commanding officer and said, 'My God, lieutenant, we can not remain in this position,' to which the lieutenant replied, 'We must, sergeant.' With the spirit of the real soldier he was, he returned to his platoon. He met his death soon afterwards as a result of his determination to hold the position on Hill 378 at any cost."

William B. Fisher, corporal, Company C, Three hundred and sixteenth Infantry, Seventy-ninth Division.

Awarded a silver-star citation in General Orders, No. 29, Headquarters Seventy-ninth Division, American Expeditionary Forces, France, May 8, 1919, for gallantry in action and meritorious service, as follows:

"Pvt. (First Class) William B. Fisher, No. 1786335, Company C, Three hundred and sixteenth Infantry. Hill 378, near Verdun, November 5, 1918. He volunteered to take a message from the front line to the Battalion P. C. while the area was under exceptionally heavy shell fire. He delivered the message and returned to front line through heavy shell fire and machine-gun barrage. Having found that his company had been relieved, he joined the nearest company, remaining with the latter during the heavy fighting of the next two days and returned with that company when relieved."

Affidavits received April 9, 1923, wherein he was recommended for the award of the distinguished-service cross for the same act, were not considered in the War Department as the time limit set by law within which the distinguished-service cross could be awarded for acts performed during the World War had expired on April 7, 1923.

Ivan L. Lautenbacher, first lieutenant, Company C, Three hundred and sixteenth Infantry, Seventy-ninth Division.

Affidavits received April 9, 1923, wherein he was recommended for the posthumous award of the distinguished-service cross for act of September 27, 1918, at Montfaucon, France, were not considered in the War Department as the time limit within which the distinguished-service cross could, under the law, be awarded for acts performed during the World War had expired on April 7, 1923.

The action for which he was recommended is as follows:

"On the night of September 27, 1918, Lieut. Ivan L. Lautenbacher was ordered to the rear at Montfaucon, France, by his company commander because of serious illness. He was tagged for evacuation, but on the morning of September 28 he rejoined his company, Company C, Three hundred and sixteenth Infantry, and participated in the attack, having refused to be evacuated. His company commander was seriously wounded a few hours later, and Lieutenant Lautenbacher being second in command took charge of the company and pressed the attack. On October 2 he was seriously wounded, which resulted in his death a few days later."

James J. Halligan, first lieutenant, chaplain, Three hundred and eighth Infantry, Seventy-seventh Division.

Recommended for the award of the distinguished-service cross for acts of August 23, 1918, and from September 29 to October 1, 1918. Twice considered and disapproved at General Headquarters, A. E. F.; reconsidered and twice disapproved by the War Department on April 30, 1920, and April 5, 1923, respectively, as it was deemed that the acts performed did not meet the standard set by law for the award of the distinguished-service cross. Awarded silver-star citation by the Commanding General, A. E. F., in Citation Orders No. 2, G. H. Q., A. E. F., dated June 3, 1919, as follows:

"For gallantry in action August 23, 1918, in coming to Villa Savoye in the outpost zone on the Vesle River to arrange for the burial of four officers."

This citation was deemed the proper reward for the measure of gallantry displayed.

Application for distinguished-service cross for the act performed September 29 to October 1, 1918, was received in the department on April 11, 1923, but no action was taken inasmuch as the time limit within which the distinguished-service cross could be awarded for World War acts expired on April 7, 1923. The action on which this application was based is substantially as follows:

"In the Argonne Forest near Binarville from September 29 to October 1, 1918, Chaplain Halligan risked his life and showed extraordinary courage when he searched for three days through the forest, in constant danger from enemy machine-gun and sniper fire, until he found the body of Lieut. Col. Fred E. Smith, Three hundred and eighth Infantry. During this long search Chaplain Halligan was often several yards ahead of the outpost patrol squads and completely out of touch with his own regiment. The terrain was covered with thick brush and offered excellent concealment to enemy machine-gun posts."

Alvin S. Meredith, corporal, Company C, Three hundred and sixteenth Infantry, Seventy-ninth Division.

Affidavit received April 9, 1923, wherein he was recommended for the posthumous award of the distinguished-service cross, was not considered inasmuch as the time limit set by law within which the distinguished-service cross could be awarded for World War acts had expired on April 7, 1923. The action for which he was recommended is as follows:

"Corporal Meredith showed unusual bravery at a time when the Germans were putting over a heavy artillery and machine-gun barrage.

He was detailed to locate several new positions and was in the act of carrying out this order when he met his death."

George D. Livelsberger, sergeant, Company C, Three hundred and sixteenth Infantry, Seventy-ninth Division.

Awarded a silver-star citation in General Orders, No. 29, headquarters Seventy-ninth Division, dated May 8, 1919, for gallantry in action and meritorious service, as follows:

"Sergt. George D. Livelsberger, No. 1786833, Company C, Three hundred and sixteenth Infantry. On September 28, 1918, 500 meters north of Montfaucon, Sergeant Livelsberger (then a corporal) took command of a platoon that had suffered severe losses from enemy machine-gun fire, led the platoon around the left flank of an enemy spur trench in which were planted several machine guns, and led his men in a charge upon the crews of these guns. As a result of this action the enemy gunners abandoned their guns and those who were not killed retreated in disorder. This particular group of guns had held up the advance of our troops and just before being put out of action had caused the retirement of the company on the right."

Affidavits received April 9, 1923, wherein he was recommended for the award of the distinguished-service cross for the same act, were not considered in the War Department, as the time limit within which the distinguished-service cross could under the law be awarded for acts performed during the World War had expired on April 7, 1923.

Lawrence W. Seiberlich, private, Company C, Three hundred and sixteenth Infantry, Seventy-ninth Division.

Affidavit received April 9, 1923, wherein he was recommended for the posthumous award of the distinguished-service cross, was not considered inasmuch as the time limit set by law within which the distinguished-service cross could be awarded for World War acts had expired on April 7, 1923. The action for which he was recommended is as follows:

"A few days prior to the time when Pvt. Lawrence W. Seiberlich was wounded he was with the Browning Automatic Squad. His feet were in such condition at that time that he was unable to stand the hiking and was ordered to remain back. At his own suggestion he wanted to stay with the company and take up his original duties as cook. It was while he was in charge of the company kitchen that a direct hit was made upon same, which resulted in his being wounded to such extent that he died shortly afterward."

Adolph Kossman, corporal, Company C, Three hundred and sixteenth Infantry, Seventy-ninth Division.

Affidavit received April 9, 1923, wherein he was recommended for the award of the distinguished-service cross for act of November 5, 1918, was not considered inasmuch as the time limit set by law within which the distinguished-service cross could be awarded for World War acts had expired on April 7, 1923. For this act he and two other soldiers were awarded silver-star citations in General Orders, No. 29, headquarters Seventy-ninth Division, dated May 8, 1919. It is as follows:

"Hill 378, near Verdun, November 5, 1918. These three soldiers occupied a small shell hole on the front line. A few yards to the right a group of 15 men occupied a large shell hole. There were no other troops near this part of the line. The morning was very foggy and a large body of Germans (approximately 60) crept through the line, outflanked the 15 men in the large shell hole, disarmed them and ordered them to stand fast. These three men, when they observed what had occurred opened rapid fire on the Germans, killed six, and completely routed the others."

William A. Haas, corporal, Company C, Three hundred and sixteenth Infantry, Seventy-ninth Division.

He and two other soldiers were awarded silver-star citations in General Orders, No. 29, headquarters Seventy-ninth Division, American Expeditionary Forces, France, dated May 8, 1919, for gallantry in action and meritorious service, as follows:

"Pri. (First Class) William A. Haas, No. 1786482, Company C, Three hundred and sixteenth Infantry, Hill 378, near Verdun, November 5, 1918. These three soldiers occupied a small shell hole on the front line. A few yards to the right a group of 15 men occupied a large shell hole. There were no other troops near this part of the line. The morning was very foggy and a large body of Germans (approximately 60) crept through the line, outflanked the 15 men in the large shell hole, disarmed them, and ordered them to stand fast. These three men, when they observed what had occurred, opened rapid fire on the Germans, killed six and completely routed the others."

Affidavits received April 9, 1923, wherein he was recommended for the award of the distinguished-service cross for the same act, were not considered in the War Department as the time limit within which the distinguished-service cross could, under the law, be awarded for acts performed during the World War had expired on April 7, 1923.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I inquire of the chairman of the committee, going back to page 12, the item of $10,179,096, whether that includes the appropriations made for this calendar year?

Mr. McNARY. It is for the total salaries for the Secretary, including the extension service, which is carried in the Smith-Lever Act, a bill supplemental to which the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry is studying now, and in behalf of which the Senator from Utah appeared this morning. That sum, if carried in the bill known as the Capper-Hoch bill, would be added to this total sum of $10,000,000.

Mr. KING. I wanted to inquire in regard to what might be denominated the floating appropriation of one million several hundred thousand dollars. Is that included in this total?

Mr. McNARY. For what purpose?

Mr. KING. For extension work. In addition to the appropriation made by the Smith-Lever Act, there has been for a number of years another appropriation, independent of that, of something over a million dollars.

Mr. McNARY. That is carried in this item, too.

Mr. KING. I was just inquiring for information.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the next amendment.

The next amendment was, on page 20, line 19, after the word "expenses," to strike out "$510,200" and insert "$525,200," so as to read:

Animal husbandry: For all necessary expenses for investigations and experiments in animal husbandry; for experiments in animal feeding and breeding, including cooperation with the State agricultural experiment stations, including repairs and additions to and erection of buildings absolutely necessary to carry on the experiments, including the employment of labor in the city of Washington and elsewhere, rent outside of the District of Columbia, and all other necessary expenses, $525,200.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 20, line 20, after the word "appropriated," to strike out "$100,650" and insert "$108,000," so as to make the proviso read:

Provided, That of the sum thus appropriated $108,000 may be used for experiments in poultry feeding and breeding.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 21, line 9, after the word "products," to strike out "$257,140" and insert "$347,140"; and in the same line, after the words "together with," to strike out "not to exceed," so as to read:

Diseases of animals: For all necessary expenses for scientific investigations in diseases of animals, including the maintenance and improvement of the bureau experiment station at Bethesda, Md., and the necessary alterations of buildings thereon, and the necessary expenses for investigations of tuberculin, serums, antitoxins, and analogous products, $347,140, together with $9,000 of the unexpended balance of the appropriation for this purpose for the fiscal year 1927: Provided, That of said sum $50,625 may be used for researches concerning the cause, modes of spread, and methods of treatment and prevention of the disease of contagious abortion of animals.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, as the Senator in charge of the bill knows, we have been called upon to make appropriations to compensate for damages resulting from the alleged incompetence and inefficiency of representatives of the Bureau of Animal Industry in ordering the killing of cattle upon various pretexts, and the Government was compelled to make reparations for their negligence and incompetence.

I was wondering if the matter came before the committee, and if steps had been taken to assure that there will be no repetition of those incompetent acts in the future. By that I mean have those in charge of the Bureau of Animal Industry taken steps to secure more competent men and to prevent a repetition of the injustices and the wrongs and torts committed by officials of that bureau?

Mr. McNARY. I think it was two years ago, and perhaps this year also, there was an inference merely that there had been some mistakes made in the administration of that provision of the law. I assume it is very difficult to find any law on the statute books as to which some official did not make some mistakes in the administration of the law. However, it has been shown, I think, by Doctor Mohler, the very capable head of the Bureau of Animal Industry, that the tests have proved so effective that reactors in the case of cattle have been reduced from 5 per cent to 3 per cent, and the efficiency in the administration of those agencies in connection with the tuberculin test has increased considerably, and I think fewer mistakes will be found in the future.

Mr. KING. The Senator knows that on the calendar now there is a bill, and there may be more than one, which seeks to give persons the right to sue in the Federal courts for injuries sustained by them through the alleged negligence of representatives of the Bureau of Animal Industry in killing cattle that were not afflicted with any disease whatever. I had hoped that we would not have many bills of that kind. My information is there have been some very flagrant cases of negligence and incompetence upon the part of representatives of the bureau.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next amendment will be stated.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 22, line 8, after the words "together with," to strike out "not to exceed," so as to read:

Total, Bureau of Animal Industry, $11,227,895, of which amount not to exceed $800,000 may be expended for departmental personal services in the District of Columbia.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, I want to ask the chairman of the committee a question. The item on line 4, page 25, is increased from $765,800 to $800,000. Is that for salaries?

Mr. McNARY. That is the total, which was increased by reason of the increased compensation to the veterinarians.

Mr. CARAWAY. That is what I am coming to. Under what provision of law have the salaries of those officers been increased?

Mr. McNARY. I think there are four provisions relating to veterinarians in the bill. We made a general increase over and above the increase of the House and the estimate of the Director of the Budget, amounting to about $39,000, covering increases to 1,300 veterinarians, which equaled the estimate the Department of Agriculture had made to the Bureau of the Budget, which gives them a compensation of about $30 per year per man over and above the increase allowed by the House.

Mr. CARAWAY. What is the average salary of the veterinarian?

Mr. McNARY. The average salary of those in grade P–1, numbering about 250, is $1,860 to $2,400; in grade P–2, numbering about 940, about two-thirds of them, the average salary is from $2,400 to $3,000.

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, at this point I ask permission to have printed in the RECORD a letter from George G. Schweis, entomologist in the office of the State quarantine officer of Nevada, regarding the necessity for an increased appropriation of $5,000 for the investigation of alfalfa-weevil conditions, which is included in this item. It refers to investigation of alfalfa-meal milling.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letters are as follows:

OFFICE OF STATE QUARANTINE OFFICER, STATE OF NEVADA,
UNIVERSITY OF NEVADA,
Reno, Nev., February 17, 1928.

Hon. TASKER L. ODDIE,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR ODDIE: We have not heard anything from you recently as to whether the $5,000 for the study and investigation of the alfalfa weevil in connection with the shipment of alfalfa meal the entire year has been replaced on the appropriation bill.

This is a matter of vital importance to Nevada and also certain other Western States that are infested with the weevil, as the alfalfa meal business has assumed large proportions and it is providing a great financial relief to many of the small hay growers who did not have enough hay to attract large cattle feeders to their ranches. The result was that many of these small producers had two, three, and four years' hay crops on their hands and were unable to dispose of them in any way. In turn they owed the merchants and the merchants owed the banks and wholesalers and it produced a situation in certain of our counties that was indeed a hardship on all persons concerned.

The meal industry was started by having the quarantine officials of California visit with me at an alfalfa-meal mill at Fallon, where we conducted certain tests that proved conclusively that all weevils in the hay were destroyed by the process of milling, and at that time the California officials agreed that if these mills were placed under the supervision and direction of the Nevada State quarantine officials, that meal from such mills would be admitted to the State of California for shipment during five months of the year; that is, from November 1 to March 31, which is supposed to be the inactive or hibernating stage of the weevil.

On our own behalf we have conducted other tests which proved to us conclusively that if the proper safeguards were taken that meal could be shipped the entire year without endangering the agriculture of any other State. However, as we were interested parties in the matter we thought it highly desirable that the Federal Government take over this phase of the investigation as we did not want the quarantine officials of other States to consider that we were conducting an investigation that would be prejudiced to their interests.

We took the matter up with Mr. George I. Reeves of the United States Department of Agriculture, Bureau of Entomology, Salt Lake City, and he was also of the opinion that if the facts were known it would be possible to convince other officials that this meal could be placed in interstate commerce without endangering their interests, but he stated that there was no money available to hire a man suitable for this work.

Through your efforts $5,000 of the emergency appropriation of the Department of Agriculture was placed at the disposal of Mr. Reeves and the work was started, and as far as he has gone the results have been very satisfactory. If the investigation is stopped at this time, it simply means that the money already expended has been entirely wasted and we are in the same position as we were before we started, as nothing of a conclusive nature has yet been decided; therefore we are again appealing to you for your assistance in having this item of $5,000 restored to the agricultural appropriations bill.

If you care to have us do so, we could take the matter up with the quarantine officials of other infested States, and it may be possible that through their representatives assistance might be rendered you in having this item restored. The weevil-infested States at the present time that may be interested in the matter are as follows: Utah, Idaho, Colorado, Wyoming, Oregon (three counties being infested), and California (three infested counties).

We trust that we may hear from you in the near future, and any assistance that we can render will be cheerfully given.

Very truly yours,

GEORGE G. SCHWEIS.

I ask permission to have inserted in the RECORD the following letters from Acting Secretary of Agriculture Dunlap, written in response to my inquiry, which will show the status of the investigation of the alfalfa weevil with respect to this particular subject, together with the efforts the Department of Agriculture has made to secure the necessary funds to continue those investigations:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington, D. C., January 14, 1928.

Hon. TASKER L. ODDIE,
United States Senate.

DEAR SENATOR: I have your letter of January 5, 1928, asking about the appropriation for investigating the feasibility of shipping alfalfa meal during the entire year.

The investigations on the alfalfa weevil consist of studies on its behavior and development in order to determine the most efficient and economical means of control. The determination of its distribution, means of spread, and a study of the introduced parasites are also included. These investigations have been conducted for a number of years, but have not been completed, and any curtailment of them now would greatly jeopardize the obtaining of expected results. No specific sum has ever been allotted for investigations to determine if the quarantine on alfalfa meal might be modified in such a way as to permit shipments of meal throughout the entire year. The Budget for 1929, as submitted to Congress, does not provide an increase for the project under which investigations on the alfalfa weevil are conducted.

Sincerely,

R. W. DUNLAP, Acting Secretary.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
OFFICE OF THE ASSISTANT SECRETARY,
Washington, February 29, 1928.

Hon. TASKER L. ODDIE,
United States Senate.

DEAR SENATOR: In response to your letter of February 22, asking for additional information concerning the matter discussed in your letter of January 5, you are advised:

The Budget as submitted to Congress includes $5,000 increase under the Bureau of Agricultural Economics to provide for studies on the standardization of alfalfa meal and conditions governing the marketing of this product. These investigations are especially necessary at this time to enable the department to advise growers of alfalfa as to the best methods of grading and marketing this product, the movement of which is hampered by the quarantine on the alfalfa weevil.

Answering your inquiry as to what recommendations were made for the study of the alfalfa weevil to determine whether it would be possible so to modify the quarantine on alfalfa meal as to permit the shipments of the meal throughout the entire year, I may say that the department estimates included an item of $5,000 for that purpose under the Bureau of Entomology. This item is not included in the Budget.

Sincerely yours,

R. W. DUNLAP, Assistant Secretary.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Upper Mississippi River refuge," on page 53, line 23, after the name "Bureau of Biological Survey," to strike out "$1,074,520" and insert "$1,185,000"; and in line 24, after the words "not to exceed," to strike out "$209,520" and insert "$217,000," so as to read:

Total, Bureau of Biological Survey, $1,185,000, of which amount not to exceed $217,000 may be expended for departmental personal services in the District of Columbia.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the heading "Bureau of Agricultural Economics, salaries and general expenses," on page 57, line 13, after the word "products," to strike out "$715,000" and insert "$775,000," so as to read:

For acquiring and diffusing among the people of the United States useful information on subjects connected with the marketing, handling, utilization, grading, transportation, and distributing of farm and nonmanufactured food products and the purchasing of farm supplies, including the demonstration and promotion of the use of uniform standards of classification of American farm products throughout the world, including scientific and technical research into American-grown cotton and its by-products and their present and potential uses, including new and additional commercial and scientific uses for cotton and its by-products, and for collecting and disseminating information on the adjustment of production to probable demand for the different farm and animal products, independently and in cooperation with other branches of the department, State agencies, purchasing and consuming organizations, and persons engaged in the marketing, handling, utilization, grading, transportation, and distributing of farm and food products, and for investigation of the economic costs of retail marketing of meat and meat products, $775,000.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, on page 56, in the provisions of the Bureau of Agricultural Economics, I notice the following language:

For acquiring and diffusing among the people of the United States useful information on subjects connected with the marketing, handling, utilization, grading, transportation, and distributing of farm and nonmanufactured food products and the purchasing of farm supplies, including the demonstration and promotion of the use of uniform standards of classification of American farm products throughout the world, including scientific and technical research into American-grown cotton and its by-products and their present and potential uses, including new and additional commercial and scientific uses for cotton and its by-products, and for collecting and disseminating information on the adjustment of production to probable demand for the different farm and animal products, independently and in cooperation with other branches of the department, State agencies—

And so forth.

I want to suggest in this connection, while we are going over this particular provision in the bill, that it must be positively understood that there is no authority in this provision for the Bureau of Economics to forecast prices of farm products, and I do not think the Senate has ever intended to confer such power upon any agency of the Government.

On September 15, 1927, this bureau did a very strange thing, something that I had never known it to do before. That action is without a parallel, so far as I know. That little bureau actually predicted what the price of cotton would be for the next few months following that day. Think of that, Senators! Are we going to appropriate the money of the people, farmers included, to pay salaries and keep these agencies in office at the seat of government to work in concert with the vast speculative interests of the country to depress the prices of cotton and other farm products? This bureau, strange to say, exceedingly strange, I will say, after stating that the cotton crop of 1927 would be much smaller than they had expected, estimating the cotton yield at 800,000 bales below the estimate of a month before and saying the crop would be less than 13,000,000 bales, made the astounding statement that, therefore, the prices for the next few months would be lower.

Mr. President, I do not hesitate to say that I can not help thinking that the "bear" speculators in cotton strangely influenced somebody in the Bureau of Economics to do this terrible thing, and I am surprised that the offending officials have not already been removed. The pressure is great and the temptation is strong in all the bureaus that have to do with cotton and grain, and some strange things have happened. I have a concrete example which I would like to call to the attention of the Senate.

About the time I came to Congress two Government employees in the Department of Agriculture, a Mr. Hyde and a Mr. Holmes, connived with speculators on the New York Cotton Exchange to change their cotton report and arbitrarily add 250,000 bales to their estimate. They were paid, as I recall, $40,000 apiece to do that thieving work. How do you suppose they gave the signal to their partners in the crime—the New York speculators?

The morning that they were to give out the Government report they had an understanding with their coconspirators in New York that if they found that they could add the additional amount desired, one of them would go to a big window in the building where he worked and put his open hand up against it and stand there in that position for a minute or two at 9.30 a. m., 30 minutes before the report was to be given out. That was the signal to those outside, who would understand what he meant by standing there that the 250,000 bales suggested would be added. They immediately ran to the telegraph offices and wired in code message to their friends in New York that the thing had been consummated, so their friends went upon the exchange and speculated according to what they knew the influence of that report would be upon the market, and my recollection is that it broke the market about $7 a bale.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. HEFLIN. I gladly yield to my friend from Georgia.

Mr. HARRIS. I call the attention of the Senator from Alabama to the language on page 3 of the bill, as follows:

Provided further, That no part of the funds appropriated by this act shall be used for the payment of any officer or employee of the Department of Agriculture who, as such officer or employee, or on behalf of the department or any division, commission, or bureau thereof, issues, or causes to be issued, any prediction, oral or written, or forecast with respect to future prices of wheat and cotton or the trend of same.

No man who does such a thing is permitted under the law to draw any salary.

Mr. HEFLIN. I am glad the Senator from Georgia has read that provision. It does specifically cover one phase of this evil. But it does not go far enough. There should be a severe penalty, for tampering with or in any way changing Government reports. The Government officials who took it upon themselves to predict cotton prices on September 15, 1927, ought to be removed from office.

Senators, do any of you know how much that unauthorized prediction of cotton prices cost the cotton farmers of the United States? A former president of the New York Cotton Exchange, of New York, Mr. Marsh, testifying before the committee which is now investigating the New York Cotton Exchange in connection with the activities of the Department of Agriculture, was asked by me, "How much do you think that prediction, which broke the price of cotton and started a 'bear' raid upon the market cost the cotton farmers of the United States?"

He said, "At least $250,000,000 on the cotton crop of 1927." It is more than that, Mr. President. It cost the farmer $40 a bale on a crop of 12,500,000 bales. That would amount in a loss on one cotton crop to $500,000,000. Senators, I submit that we ought to clean house at the seat of government and refuse to permit anyone to remain in office who uses and abuses the power of his office to help rob the American farmer.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. HEFLIN. I am glad to yield to my friend from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator spoke of hearings before his committee. Did the Secretary of Agriculture or anyone in his department responsible for these predictions ever explain in any way why they were made, or were they called upon to explain why they were made?

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Tenny, the head of this particular bureau, has been interrogated just a little about it. He will be thoroughly examined upon the question. He stated that he thought they had authority to do it, and we asserted that it never had been done before and that he did not have the authority to do so, but that we would give him ample opportunity to explain his conduct in the matter. I do not think that he had any authority to do what he did. I never heard of it being done before. In this particular instance I do know that what he did broke the price of cotton $10 a bale immediately, demoralized the market to such an extent that it kept on breaking all down the line, until it reached a loss of $40 a bale on a crop of 12,500,000 bales. That is a tremendous loss to the cotton farmers of the United States. We ought not to permit Government officials to join hands with the cotton gamblers to rob the cotton producers of our country or the grain producers. If we can not prevent crooks from getting into the department and doing such things, then we ought to abolish the offices they hold.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

Mr. HEFLIN. Certainly.

Mr. McKELLAR. Does not the Senator think that the matter ought to be gone into to this extent? The Senator said he does not believe the Secretary of Agriculture or his representative had any right to make these predictions. I do not believe so, either; but I imagine that there is some provision of the law under which he believed he had the right to do it. Ought not that provision of the law to be ascertained, and if there is any such provision, ought not the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry to report out a bill changing the law? I hope the Senator, when Mr. Tenny comes before his committee again, will undertake to do that. Something should be done. These men in the Department of Agriculture who lend themselves to any such infamous scheme as was concocted last September ought to be put out of office for ruining the price of cotton in the way it was ruined.

Mr. HEFLIN. The Senator from Tennessee is entirely correct. I challenged his authority to do this and asserted he could not show me any authority to do it. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS] has just read the new provision in the pending bill, which, I think, will prevent this particular thing from happening any more. We can not place too many safeguards around reports that have to do with cotton.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. HEFLIN. Certainly.

Mr. SHEPPARD. This forecast was made under what is called a monthly price analysis. The officials claimed that they had authority to issue this forecast under the appropriation items for the Bureau of Agricultural Economics for this fiscal year, reading in part, "For acquiring and diffusing among the people of the United States useful information on subjects connected with the marketing, handling, utilization, grading, transportation, and distributing of farm and nonmanufactured food products," and "for collecting, compiling, abstracting, analyzing, summarizing, interpreting, and publishing data relating to agriculture."

I am told that this language may be found on page 24 of the act making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1928. I think it will be readily seen that authority to make forecasts as to the price of cotton and the trend of the price of cotton can not fairly be said to be authorized by the language I have read.

Mr. HEFLIN. I thank the able Senator from Texas. I agree with him heartily. There is no authority in the law for such action. The Government's business is to gather statistics; to tell about crop prospects; to tell about how much cotton is on hand; to tell about how much cotton is being exported, what the consumptive demand is, to give as accurately as possible the statistical position of cotton; and then to leave the public to decide for itself what it thinks the price is going to be. The absurd idea of a Government official arrogating to himself the right to put this great Government in the business of predicting the price of cotton and other farm products.

That is not the worst feature of this cotton calamity, for that low-price prediction followed what everybody says who knows anything about the cotton business, that it was a bullish report which indicated an upward trend of cotton prices. Cotton merchants had testified before our committee to the effect that in view of the fact that a small crop was being made, the price had been going up steadily for more than a month, but that after this gentleman had finished giving facts justifying an advance in price, he predicted that for the next few months "the price of cotton will be lower."

Strange indeed!

Mr. President, if the "bear" gamblers on the exchange of New York or elsewhere had hired a man to go out and forecast or make a prediction as to prices, he could not have played into their hands more than did the man who made this prediction in the name of the Government of the United States. It looks to me as though there is something rotten in Denmark.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Does the Senator from Alabama think that it is within human power accurately to forecast the price of cotton or the trend of the price of cotton? I do not think it is.

Mr. HEFLIN. That is exactly what the ex-president of the New York Exchange said. He said, "No man can be absolutely certain of that; you may think you know and speculate according to the way you think; but the market may not go the way you think it is going." He said it was humanly impossible to predict with certainty. Here, however, is a man, held in his position by the Government, wielding this great power over this most important agricultural product, the good or bad price of which affects for good or ill thirty-odd million of people. He has it in his power to beat down the price and lose to the farmers of the Cotton Belt from $250,000,000 to $500,000,000 in one year. It is inexcusable and indefensible.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, under the conditions that the Senator from Alabama has depicted it seems to me that steps ought to be taken at once, and ought to have been taken long ago, to have this man removed from the place he holds. According to the law that has been read by the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] it is perfectly apparent that this man had no right or authority to make any such prediction; and, of course, coming from the source it did, namely, the bureau where statistics are gathered, necessarily it would have a great influence upon the price of cotton. I hope that the Senator from Alabama, being on the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, will undertake at the earliest possible moment to offer a resolution dealing with this man who so far forgot himself as to undertake to manipulate the cotton market of the country.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator from Tennessee, and I think he will be satisfied with the report the committee will make when it gets through with this matter. I myself suggested to Mr. Jardine some months ago that he ought to remove this man; in fact, I wired him to that effect. As soon as this report was made I received telegrams from all over the country from cotton producers and cotton merchants, saying: "Wire protest to Secretary of Agriculture; nothing like this ever occurred before. What right did this man have to make such a prediction? Every circumstance and every piece of evidence connected with the market tends to show that the price of cotton should go higher. Why should he predict that it will go down?" So I wired the Secretary of Agriculture and suggested that he remove this man; but it is hard to get one of these fellows out when he once gets in and begins to feather his nest. However, I think we can pry some of them out now, and we want the valuable assistance of the able Senator from Tennessee when we get ready for that operation.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I shall be glad to cooperate in the matter. I think if the Secretary of Agriculture is undertaking to keep a man of this character in office that makes the Secretary of Agriculture a party to the transaction. His conduct in holding the man there after a protest, I think, makes the Secretary of Agriculture just as guilty as is the man himself, and I think he also ought to be dealt with. I have long thought so.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I wish the Senator from Tennessee and the other Senators could have been present when the able and distinguished chairman of the subcommittee, now conducting this investigation, the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], who, I think, knows more about cotton than does anybody else who has ever been in either branch of Congress—read this prediction to the committee and to Mr. Tenny and made some very pertinent comments.

Mr. President, I am ready to join with those from the grain-growing section of the country and enact such a statute as is necessary, not only to dispose of such handy gentlemen in the Agriculture Department, but that will put them in the penitentiary for conduct of this character, hobnobbing and conniving with the speculative interests to rob the farmers of the country. It must be stopped. Those on the inside who get this crop information have it in their power to warp and twist it and make it to suit themselves, and if there be a crooked man in the department, working with them on the outside, they can control the price, as they did in this instance, affect a whole crop, involving a loss to the producers of from $250,000,000 to $500,000,000, and put that many millions in the pockets of somebody else.

Mr. McNARY obtained the floor.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. McNARY. I wish to make a brief observation before we depart too far from the subject which has been discussed by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN], and then I will yield. On page 3, beginning in line 7 and ending in line 14 in the pending bill, the very thing about which the Senator from Alabama has decried is prohibited by statutory language. The prohibition is against "any prediction, oral or written, or forecast with respect to future prices of wheat and cotton or the trend of same." The word "cotton" was inserted in the House as an amendment and "wheat" was inserted at the suggestion of the Appropriations Committee of the Senate.

Mr. HEFLIN. I think that thoroughly covers the situation, Mr. President.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I do not know whether it does or not. Is there any penalty provided in case an officer should disregard the law in this respect and give out forecasts and statements that may result in the loss of millions and millions of dollars and work great harm to the country?

Mr. McNARY. It does not carry any penal provision. This is an appropriation bill, and we are not attempting to make it a legislative bill. It was thought best by the committee to proceed along the line indicated by the bill, because certain other legislation now pending in Congress covers the same subject specifically and legislatively, and in a way that will carry a penalty. I may add that, while of course there is no penal provision, there is a penalty which probably will be just as effective, for, under the provision, no salary can be paid to any person who gives out such forecasts.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is a penalty if that is provided for.

Mr. McNARY. I thought the Senator was discussing "penalty" in the usual acceptation of the word.

Mr. SIMMONS. No. Of course, I did not mean a provision for an indictment. I had reference to the very thing which the Senator has pointed out, and I wanted to know whether there was such a provision in the bill.

Mr. McNARY. There is the provision in the bill to which I have referred.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Oregon to look at the two provisos at the bottom of page 58. Are they a part of the same restriction? I will read them:

Provided further, That no part of the funds herein appropriated shall be available for any expense incident to ascertaining, collating, or publishing a report stating the intentions of farmers as to the acreage to be planted in cotton: Provided further, That no part of the funds herein appropriated shall be available for the preparation of mid-monthly reports of cotton estimates for the months of July, August, and November.

Mr. McNARY. They cover two distinct activities of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is another activity, and does not refer to the particular subject under discussion by the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. McNARY. Not at all. That language has been carried, I may say, for a great many years. The language to which I made reference is entirely new, so far as wheat is concerned in this body, and so far as cotton is concerned in the other body.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I wish to say that in the committee, as the Senator knows, I approved the language on page 3, prohibiting the giving out of such information; and I approve it very strongly now, and think the committee is to be congratulated upon inserting it in the bill.

Mr. McNARY. I think the Senator's approval before the committee was very persuasive.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, in response to what the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] suggested, I agree that there ought to be some severe penalty for this conduct along the line that I have suggested. Of course, withholding the salary is some punishment; but if the gamblers could have obtained the consent of an officer of the Government to make the prediction that this man made, they would have been willing to give him many times his salary to make that prediction. It was worth many millions to them.

When I was in the House, I think in 1907, we amended the Federal statute touching matters somewhat similar and provided a penalty for any Government official who changed figures or made a fraudulent or false report, and so forth. I am not sure that it would meet this case; and I should like to have the Senator from North Carolina look into that very carefully himself and see if he thinks it requires a special act to cover just such a case.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I think the punishment proposed—"punishment" is a better word than "penalty"—is very inadequate to the crime, as the Senator from Alabama has so well pointed out; but this is not a bill to prescribe the punishment to be imposed for crime or dereliction in office. It is simply a bill appropriating for the support of the Agriculture Department; and, incidentally, in connection with this particular matter, it provides for depriving the officer of his salary if he does not faithfully carry out the law. I think probably it would be better legislation if we should enact a criminal provision providing adequate punishment for a man who is guilty of an offense of this sort.

Some may think it is a very small offense; but where the failure of an officer to perform a plain duty, or the betrayal of an officer in the discharge of an official duty, hurtfully and seriously affects millions of his fellow-citizens to the extent that this failure affected the cotton farmers during the last year, something drastic is required in order to protect the public; and, if the Senator from Alabama can find the time in the discharge of his arduous duties, I wish he would prepare a bill providing adequate punishment for public officials guilty of this sort of crime against the American farmer.

Mr. HEFLIN. I shall be glad to do that, Mr. President. I think the provision we have in the bill to-day ought to be followed up by a separate act.

Mr. SMITH Mr. President, in connection with the discussion of this proposed feature of the agricultural bill, prohibiting any bureau or department or division of the Agriculture Department from making any price predictions, I think the manner in which we have drawn our agricultural appropriation bill and the legislation incorporated in it ought now to define clearly the duty and function of each bureau, and provide a penalty for violating those duties and functions.

I want to call attention to one specific thing done by the Bureau of Economics in connection with this monstrous thing of predicting what the trend of prices would be. They also in the same bulletin, on the opposite page to that on which this astounding prediction was printed, estimated and gave out as official the amount of cotton that was left over from the preceding cotton year which was to go into the incoming new cotton year.

This function by law is turned over to what is known as the Bureau of the Census. It is their duty to collect the statistics as to the amount of cotton ginned. We have gone so far as to require all the ginners in this country to make stated reports to the Bureau of the Census of the actual number of bales ginned; and at the end of what is called the cotton year—the 31st day of July or the 1st day of August—they are to report how much American cotton is held in stock in this country in all holding establishments of every kind, so that this carry-over, added to the incoming crop, will constitute the supply for the next cotton year; namely, from August 1 of one year to August 1 of the next.

I wish to point out what the Bureau of Economics said; and I want those who are interested in dealing fairly with the great disorganized mass that produce our farm products to hear what was actually done in that bulletin. The Bureau of Economics said that the carry-over of cotton for the year 1927-28, beginning with August 1, 1927, and running to August 1, 1928, would be 7,800,000 bales. As soon as that statement was promulgated, it was challenged by Mr. Hester, of New Orleans, who is recognized the world over as perhaps the greatest authority on cotton statistics in the world. He is secretary of the New Orleans Cotton Exchange. He is a man now 80 years of age; and his figures, under the acid test of those who have to deal in this thing, have been accepted for a long time as being perhaps the last word on this subject.

Mr. Hester challenged those figures, and asked the source of them. Of course, he was not a Government official, but he was charged with the duty of promulgating what was the available stock not only of American cotton but of the world's stocks of cotton. He said that the American stock was something like 1,000,000 bales less—less, mind you—than the amount promulgated by the Bureau of Economics.

Of course, my attention was attracted by this, as I and all other southern men are interested in the prosperity of those who produce cotton, and in a just return to them, so I came up to Washington to ascertain from the Bureau of Economics the sources of its figures. That bureau had no part or parcel, under the law, in obtaining statistics and promulgating them; but, being a part of the Federal Government, of course the trade took its figures as official, especially those whose interest it was to try to depress the price of cotton at that time, perhaps, for their personal interest. But before I would take sides either with Mr. Hester or with the Bureau of Economics I came on here to get the sources from which the bureau had gotten its figures, and, as far as it was possible for me to do so, to ascertain the validity of them, if the sources were such that I could judge between the old statistician, Hester, and this new adventure on the part of the Bureau of Economics.

I asked for an interview with those having this bureau in charge. First there was sent to me their statistician. I asked him the sources of their information as to the amount of American cotton at home and abroad. He submitted to me a table to show me the sources of their information. I wish I had known that this matter was coming up. I should like to insert that table in the RECORD right at this point. In that table there was Mr. Hester, of New Orleans; there was the New York Commercial and Financial Chronicle; there was the Bureau of the Census, the bureau that we do charge with gathering these facts and promulgating them; there was Mr. Theodore Price's Finance and Commerce; and there was the spinners' organization.

These figures were in parallel columns. The first half of the column was devoted to the amount of American cotton in America. The other half of the column was devoted to the amount of American cotton held in foreign ports and in foreign consuming establishments—or, in a word, held abroad. This remarkable thing is in my possession now and is available to Members of the Senate. The figures were taken almost verbatim et literatim from the figures furnished by the New York Commercial and Financial Chronicle.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, did they differ materially from the report of the Bureau of the Census?

Mr. SMITH. Let me explain in regard to that.

The Bureau of the Census did not attempt in these figures to show the amount of cotton held abroad, but did show the stock in America; and the difference between the stock estimated by them as held in America and the estimate made by the Commercial and Financial Chronicle was upward of 300,000 bales less. Now, catch the significance of this: Here was a bureau in the Agricultural Department, known as the Bureau of Economics, giving out a statement as to the world carry-over of cotton, and their statement differing from the statement of the department's Bureau of the Census by over 300,000 bales. In other words, they ignored the Government sources and took a private source.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, the Senator says they refused to take the census report. The census report is based upon the quantity actually ginned, is it not?

Mr. SMITH. Yes; and we charge them not only to take the ginning report but to gather cotton statistics and collate them for the benefit of those engaged in the business. It is the work we have set aside for them.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, did the Senator suggest a provision in this bill to the effect that no part of the appropriation shall be used by the Bureau of Economics to duplicate work done by the Census Bureau? I think that ought to be done.

Mr. SMITH. I am merely calling attention to the matter now. I have not had the time to prepare an amendment. I have been so busily engaged in digging into the monstrous condition that has arisen this year in the marketing of our cotton crop, absolutely inexcusable on any ground save that somewhere, somehow, by some artificial force the market has been put disastrously low, to the utter ruin of the Senator's section and mine.

Mr. McKELLAR. If we were to take away the funds of this bureau to be used for duplicating this work, it seems to me that would be the most effective way to handle it. I do not know just what provision of the bill carries this appropriation, but certainly there ought to be a limitation on the appropriation to the effect that the bureau shall not use any of that appropriation for the purpose of duplicating this work.

Mr. SMITH. I think there ought to be a comprehensive provision placed in the bill to the effect that no department shall duplicate the work of another department and no bureau shall be allowed to duplicate the work of any other bureau, and that there should be provided a penalty for the doing of such a thing.

The point to which I want to call attention is that if our departments and bureaus are to be of benefit to the country we must maintain their integrity, we must have confidence in the thoroughness of their work, the honesty of their work, the objective of their work. The moment there is doubt cast upon a bureau its efficiency is gone. Here is a bureau in one department absolutely assuming the work of another and then ignoring the work of the other. In other words, the Bureau of Economics absolutely ignored the Bureau of the Census in tabulating the figures as to how much American cotton in America would be carried into a new crop to an amount exceeding 300,000 bales.

One of two things is true, either the Bureau of Economics is right or the Bureau of the Census is right, and if the Bureau of the Census is right, the Bureau of Economics is wrong, and vice versa. We are appropriating money here in order impartially to acquaint the American people with the actual existence of any given commercial commodity as it is moving. Yet, in this hour of the South's need, comes this monstrous prediction that prices would decline, and on the other page is a statement made by a Government bureau that the carry-over was 7,800,000 bales, which were the exact figures of a private concern in contravention of what our own bureau in another department had said.

Those are the facts, capable of documentary proof, gotten from the Bureau of Economics. They say they got the figures from all these sources. The estimate made by the New York Commercial and Financial Chronicle was that we had 7,818,000 bales. Mr. Hester claimed we had an amount that was something in excess of 6,900,000, in round figures, a difference of approximately a million bales. In all reason, if the Bureau of Economics wanted to go outside of our own bureau, charged with doing that work, they would have been more excusable, perhaps, if they had taken a concern of 50 years' standing, one that had the confidence of the entire cotton world, rather than a paper in New York. What its interests are I do not know, but before the investigation is through I hope to know. The subcommittee of which I happen to be chairman, which is investigating this matter, has as one of its duties the burden of finding out, if they can, about the interests of those who have been quoted by this Bureau of Economics.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, what is the name of the concern of 50 years' standing to which the Senator refers?

Mr. SMITH. I am speaking about Mr. Hester as the statistician. It is true, he is secretary of the New Orleans Cotton Exchange, but his figures have been very reliable, and I think every man on this floor will agree to that. But I do not think we ought to allow this agricultural appropriation bill to pass without definitely determining and stating that no bureau or division or subdivision shall be allowed to duplicate the word of some other division or bureau, certainly not in the monstrous manner in which the Bureau of Economics distorted or ignored the report of the Bureau of the Census.

The result of that particular bulletin, issued on the 15th day of September, was to precipitate a decline in the price of cotton, which continued from September, when the main part of the crop was being moved immediately from the hands of the producer to the primary market, broke the price, until at the end it was $40 a bale less than the producer was getting when that monstrous thing was issued. Think of an ordinary farmer, who makes five bales of cotton. The average is not above 10 to the individual producer. Wipe out $40 a bale and you wipe out the basis of his meager hope of meeting the obligations incurred in producing the cotton.

I suggest that Senators read that bulletin and the context, the description of the preceding condition, that the boll weevil was spreading and its ravages becoming more disastrous; the consumption of the world was increasing by leaps and bounds; the crop was early and would soon be gathered; every bullish element that would tend to put the price of cotton up was recited. They were recited faithfully. Then, as the conclusion of the recital of these favorable conditions for a higher price, it says this curious thing:

If the relationship of supply and price—

Not supply and demand—

If the relationship of supply and price continues, cotton will decline for the next few months.

That precipitated a drop in less than two days of $10 a bale, and the price gradually went down until it reached the difference of $40 a bale.

I maintain that we have no department here that has the right to volunteer information not warranted by the facts or circumstances, that would aid and abet the great bear speculative interests to the ruin of the cotton producers.

Then, in addition to that monstrous prediction, was the estimate of the amount of cotton carried from the old crop into the new crop, more than a quarter of a million bales in excess of what our own bureau in another department, which we charge with that duty, said was the carry-over.

These are some of the things we are trying to investigate in the Committee on Agriculture. We propose to get the facts as far as we can and report them to this body, and let the Senate take such action as it thinks the facts will warrant.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I want to introduce an amendment to the bill and have it pending when we have completed the consideration of committee amendments. I will wait until those are finished, and then I will offer the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will lie on the table for the present.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I desire to move a reconsideration of the vote whereby the amendment on page 46, line 23, was agreed to. I wish to move to amend the amendment by increasing the amount by at least $5,000.

Mr. McNARY. We are considering, under unanimous consent, committee amendments, and I doubt the propriety of offering such a motion at this time.

Mr. FLETCHER. I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment to increase the amount. Therefore I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That motion may be entertained, but action on the amendment will be deferred. The question is on the motion proposed by the Senator from Florida that the Senate reconsider its action by which it agreed to the amendment on page 46, line 23.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will state the next amendment.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 57, line 18, after the word "receipts," to insert a colon and the following additional proviso:

Provided further, That $50,000 of the above amount, of which $10,000 shall be immediately available, may be used to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to complete an experiment in the grading and marking of meats under standards fixed by the Department of Agriculture.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 58, line 2, after the word "cotton," to strike out "stock" and insert "stocks"; and in line 6, after the word "agencies," to strike out "$728,000" and insert "$738,000," so as to read:

For collecting, compiling, abstracting, analyzing, summarizing, interpreting, and publishing data relating to agriculture, including crop and livestock estimates, acreage, yield, grades, staples of cotton, stocks, and value of farm crops, and numbers, grades, and value of livestock and livestock products on farms, in cooperation with the Extension Service and other Federal, State, and local agencies, $738,000:

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 58, line 6, after the word "That," to strike out "$89,660" and insert "$99,660," so as to make the proviso read:

Provided, That $99,660 shall be available for collecting and disseminating to American producers, importers, exporters, and other interested persons information relative to the world supply of and need for American agricultural products, marketing methods, conditions, prices, and other factors, a knowledge of which is necessary to the advantageous disposition of such products in foreign countries, independently and in cooperation with other branches of the Government, State agencies, purchasing and consuming organizations, and persons engaged in the transportation, marketing, and distribution of farm and food products, including the purchase of such books and periodicals as may be necessary in connection with this work.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 60, at the end of line 24, to change the total appropriation for salaries and expenses, Bureau of Agricultural Economics, from "$4,208,060" to "$4,278,060."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 65, line 4, after the name "Bureau of Agricultural Economics," to strike out "$5,548,280" and insert "$5,618,280," and in line 5, after the words "not to exceed," to strike out "$2,024,700" and insert "$2,031,700," so as to read:

Total, Bureau of Agricultural Economics, $5,618,280, of which amount not to exceed $2,031,700 may be expended for personal services in the District of Columbia.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Passenger-carrying vehicles," on page 74, line 11, after the words "not to exceed," to strike out "$165,000" and insert "$175,000," so as to read:

That not to exceed $175,000 of the lump-sum appropriations herein made for the Department of Agriculture shall be available for the purchase, maintenance, repair, and operation of motor-propelled and horse-drawn passenger-carrying vehicles necessary in the conduct of the field work of the Department of Agriculture outside the District of Columbia.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Forest roads and trails," on page 77, line 23, after the name "District of Columbia," to strike out "$6,500,000" and insert "$7,500,000"; and on page 78, line 2, after the word "and," to strike out "$2,555,000" and insert "$3,555,000," so as to read:

For carrying out the provisions of section 23 of the Federal highway act approved November 9, 1921, including not to exceed $47,000 for departmental personal services in the District of Columbia, $7,500,000, which sum is composed of $3,945,000, part of the sum of $7,500,000 authorized to be appropriated for the fiscal year 1928 by the act approved June 22, 1926, and $3,555,000, part of the amount authorized to be appropriated for the fiscal year 1929 by the act approved June 22, 1926.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 79, at the end of line 22, to change the total appropriation for the Department of Agriculture from "$132,488,849.88" to "$134,237,444.88."

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This concludes the reading of the bill for action on the amendments of the committee.

Mr. McNARY. I offer the following amendment of the Committee on Appropriations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

Eighth International Dairy Congress: For the expenses of the United States in participating in the Eighth International Dairy Congress, to be held in Great Britain during June and July, 1928, as authorized by Public Resolution No. 10, Seventieth Congress, approved February 25, 1928, including the compensation of employees, transportation, subsistence, or per diem in lieu of subsistence (notwithstanding the provisions of any other act), and such other expenses as the President shall deem proper, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of State, $10,000, fiscal year 1929, to be immediately available, $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McNARY. I offer the concluding motion from the Committee on Appropriations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from Oregon moves that the clerk be authorized to correct all totals in the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment on page 46, line 23, reconsidered on the motion of the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER].

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I would like to offer the amendment to the amendment which I have in mind with reference to that provision, and we can dispose of it now, I think.

A situation has arisen in the Everglades of Florida which makes it very important that there should be some extension of the investigation as to fires. That department should send some representatives down there to see if they can check the fires now ravaging the Everglades. That land is muck land. The water is taken off of it, and it is very dry. Fires have appeared in a number of places, and they are almost beyond control. I think a little help from the department or some of the experts would be of very great assistance in enabling us to control the fires and prevent their recurring, and to devise plans for stopping them when they do occur. It is of vast importance, because if that muck land gets afire it will burn up and that will be the end of the soil. The fires have broken out recently in a number of places, and the department have told me that they believe they have some experts who would be of very great assistance to us. I move that the amendment of the committee be increased by $5,000.

Mr. McNARY. It is a very new situation and a very imperative one, is it not?

Mr. FLETCHER. It is. I move that the amount named in the amendment of the committee be increased by $5,000, making the total $57,743.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Florida to the amendment of the committee, which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 46, line 23, amend the committee amendment by striking out "$52,743" and inserting in lieu thereof "$57,743," so as to make the paragraph read:

For the investigation and development of methods for the prevention of farm fires and of grain-dust, smut-dust, and other plant-dust explosions and resulting fires, including fires in cotton gins and cotton-oil mills, independently or in cooperation with individuals, associations, or corporations, $57,743.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. KEYES. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the proper place insert the following:

FLOOD RELIEF, VERMONT AND NEW HAMPSHIRE

For the relief of the State of Vermont, $2,654,000, and for the relief of the State of New Hampshire, $653,300, in the matter of roads and bridges damaged or destroyed by the flood of 1927: Provided, That any sums appropriated under this authorization shall be expended in accordance with the provisions of the Federal highway act, except that the provision limiting Federal payments to not exceed $15,000 per mile shall not apply and the provision restricting the expenditure of Federal funds upon roads on the system of Federal-aid highways shall not apply to the extent that such expenditure is hereby authorized on roads and bridges not on but which are extensions of said system within municipalities having a population of 2,500 or more, as shown by the last available census.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I would like to ask the Senator with reference to the amendment. I do not want to oppose the amendment, but is the agricultural appropriation bill the proper place to offer an amendment of this kind? Not only that, but have there been estimates for it? Is it in order now to put it on this bill? Has it been estimated for?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that the proper estimate has been made.

Mr. KEYES. That is correct.

Mr. FLETCHER. Was it taken up by the committee?

Mr. KEYES. The amendment was introduced on the afternoon the bill was reported out from the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Florida that extended hearings were held before the Committee on Roads in the House on this bill and one relating to Kentucky, and there appeared representatives of the State Highway Commissions of Vermont and New Hampshire. The amount carried in the amendment proposed is the amount reported favorably by the Committee on Roads in the House, and the two bills are now on the calendar awaiting the action of the House. We are seeking to get the appropriation in this way in order to save time because of the emergency.

Mr. FLETCHER. I thoroughly sympathize with this course and admit it is a commendable thing. What I am aggrieved about a little is that Florida is being entirely left out of this proposal or any similar proposal. I do not like very much to speak about floods and I do not like to boast of disasters of that kind or to advertise them particularly, but I want to read just a moment from the report of the Red Cross with reference to Florida floods:

The wind and water combined to leave a trail of devastation such as few States have ever experienced. A total of 327 persons lost their lives.

I think the evidence before our committee was that less than 100 persons lost their lives in the great Mississippi flood, and yet we have appropriated $325,000,000 for that purpose. Here in this flood 327 persons lost their lives and 6,327 were injured, of which number 1,000 were seriously hurt. This information comes from the Red Cross itself. This is from a disinterested outside party:

Property damage has been variously estimated at between $75,000,000 and $150,000,000. Most estimates, however, agree that it was not under $100,000,000.

That was suffered in September, 1926. We have had nothing at all from the Government. We have never offered any amendment to any bill to take care of any part of this loss or destruction. I am willing that these matters shall be taken care of, and I give notice that I am going to offer an amendment, not to take care of the $100,000,000 or any great portion of it. I have a letter from the good roads department of Florida to the effect that the damage estimated to the public highways in Florida amounts to $48,000. That is a very small item. If the amendment now pending is agreed to, I propose to offer an amendment to cover that item in Florida because I know we are certainly entitled to what the public roads department reports as the damage to the public roads in that State.

Mr. DALE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FLETCHER. Certainly.

Mr. DALE. In neither one of these cases are we asking for the total damage to roads. The State has to put up dollar for dollar for every dollar that is contributed by the Federal Government.

Mr. FLETCHER. I appreciate that. The sum of $48,000 is the estimate of the bureau to add to the damage to the roads in Florida.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair, in his capacity as a Senator from New Hampshire, wishes to say that his State in addition has already contributed five times the amount asked for.

Mr. FLETCHER. We have suffered a loss of $100,000,000 and we have not asked for any sort of an appropriation from the Federal Government.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I express the very earnest hope that the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire will be unanimously agreed to.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I do not know that I would oppose this appropriation on a fair hearing. It may be such a disaster that the Federal Government ought to take care of it. But I am impressed with what the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] said. I am afraid if we start in on this proposition without having it referred to a committee and given consideration, there will be no end to it. Would it not follow that a flood anywhere which tore up a road and damaged it, if we establish this precedent, would justify any State in coming to Congress to ask that the damages be paid?

Mr. DALE. Mr. President, I assume the Senator realizes that the amount which is carried in the amendment is exactly the same amount that is carried in the bill to which the Senator from Kentucky referred, on which there have been extended hearings, and the bill has been reported unanimously by the committee. The only reason why we are asking it in this way is that it will take so long to get the bill through. The bill will pass Congress, and there is no doubt about it, but Vermont has got to get to work. We can not let any contracts; we can not start any work on the roads until we have this appropriation. If we have to wait a few weeks we shall be seriously delayed. The Senator knows very well the snow flies up there pretty early in what is summertime in some other States, and we will be a year behind if we are very much longer delayed.

Mr. NORRIS. As I said, it may be that on proper consideration I should favor the amendment, because I know that oftimes there are disasters which are so great that it is unfair to put the entire burden upon the States. We have had an illustration of that in the flood control bill. We have had illustrations of that in a good many catastrophes. The State of Florida, for instance, had a terrible wind and flood down there. Should the Federal Government compensate for the loss? Perhaps it should contribute. California just recently had some terrible floods. It is fair to presume some of their roads were torn out. Should we consider that matter too?

Mr. MOSES and Mr. DALE addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. NORRIS. Let me say a word or two further and then I will yield the floor.

We ought, it seems to me, to proceed by appropriate bill if we are going to go into this business. We ought to draw the line somewhere. A few years ago there was a terrible windstorm in the city of Omaha, Nebr., that caused millions and millions of dollars of damage and killed quite a number of people. The Federal Government was not asked to make any appropriation in that case.

The point I am trying to make is that if we are going into the practice of making an appropriation from the Federal Treasury when any disaster occurs we ought at least to do it after full consideration, and we ought to treat every community alike; we ought to draw the line somewhere so as to show when the Federal Government may be called upon to assist in compensating local communities for damages that come from the act of God.

Mr. DALE and Mr. MOSES addressed the Chair.

Mr. NORRIS. I yield first to the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. DALE. The Senator from Nebraska will realize that the cases that he has cited here are not similar to this case.

Mr. NORRIS. No.

Mr. DALE. In this case we are simply asking that the Federal Government help restore the Federal-aid roads as they were built in the first place. The State of Vermont is required to give dollar for dollar just as it did when these roads were first constructed. We are simply asking the Federal Government to assume the loss sustained by the Federal Government on these Federal-aid roads.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I am not at the present time arguing that that is wrong, but if we are going to act on that kind of theory, we ought to remember that if every road anywhere in the United States, toward the building of which the Federal Government has contributed, were destroyed by some catastrophe it would be no worse than if it should be destroyed by use and wear. There would not be any end to such legislation, in my judgment, unless we should establish some precedent and draw some line that would be logical and along which we ought to travel. It would not be different if these Vermont roads had been destroyed by hail or hurricanes or the falling down of forest trees in a case where a road runs through a forest. Would the Senator have the Government repair a few rods of cement that had been torn out by the falling down of a tree? I do not think that anybody would ask the Government to do that.

However, somewhere between that kind of a case and the case where 100 miles of road might be destroyed, we should draw a line; we ought to establish, as nearly as we can, a scientific method by which we could decide when the Government should go in and recompense the loss local communities have suffered. We ought to treat them all alike.

Mr. DALE. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. NORRIS. What I am afraid of is that if we attach to an appropriation bill some provision of this kind we shall be establishing a precedent that will come home to trouble us. The Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] has already stated that, if this amendment shall be adopted, he desires a similar amendment to cover damage growing out of the disaster that occurred to Florida; and I think he would be entitled to it. As I remember, the damage done in Florida was even greater than in New England.

I myself can not draw a distinction between the destruction of a road, by an act of God, that the Government has built and the destruction of some road that somebody else has built if it should be destroyed by the same means. It is a loss to the community, but the Government does not obligate itself to keep a road in repair after it shall have helped to build it; in fact, as I remember the law, there is a distinct provision which relieves the Government from taking care of a road after it has once been established.

I sympathize, of course, with the communities in New England, and I say frankly that the damage may be so great that we ought to extend help from the Federal Treasury; but I do not believe we ought to do it in a haphazard way, because thereby we shall be opening the door here to many similar appeals. If we shall establish such a precedent without enacting the proper legislation under which such relief might be afforded, we shall make it in order where any road is damaged by an act of God, even though the damage may not be more than $10, to call on the Federal Government to make the damage good and repair the road. I can see endless trouble ahead if we shall legislate in that way without first laying down a rule by law. It seems to me such legislation should not be enacted in this manner.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think the Senator from Nebraska in the main is perfectly correct in his position, but would the Senator not draw some distinction in the case of some great unprecedented calamity such as the floods in Florida, Connecticut, and New Hampshire?

Mr. NORRIS. I would, and I have so stated. I am not saying that this is not that kind of a case; I am inclined to think it is; I agree that probably it is a case where the Federal Government ought to go to the relief of the people of those States; but what I am trying to guard against is the doing of such a thing haphazardly, without a rule or law that shall control our action. If we undertake to do it in that way, we are going to get into endless difficulty, in my judgment, before we get through.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I think the only way I could countenance any provision of this kind at all would be on the basis that such catastrophes were unprecedented. We never had such a calamity, for instance, in Florida in a hundred or at least in fifty years. The same thing is true of the New England States, where occurred a most unprecedented and sudden disaster. I think there is a distinction between the ordinary rains and floods and such extensive floods as occurred in those instances.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I will say before I close that the amendment, of course, is subject to a point of order; but I am not going to make it. My sympathy is entirely the other way, and I had rather err on that side than the other; but I do not believe that we ought to legislate in this way. It seems to me we ought to try to enact legislation that would be a guide when relief was sought by communities in cases of this kind.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. KEYES].

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 79, after line 21, it is proposed to insert:

FLOOD RELIEF, KENTUCKY

For the relief of the State of Kentucky, to restore and recondition the roads and bridges damaged or destroyed by the floods in said

State in the year 1927, the sum of $1,889,994: Provided, That any sums hereby appropriated shall be expended under the supervision and direction of the Department of Agriculture and Bureau of Public Roads in cooperation with the State Highway Department of the State of Kentucky: Provided further, That the amount herein appropriated shall be available when the State of Kentucky shall make available a like sum, which shall be expended to restore and recondition said roads and bridges: Provided further, That not more than $3,000 per mile on any road and not more than $15,000 on any bridge shall be expended out of the funds hereby appropriated: Provided further, That no part of the sum herein appropriated shall be expended for rights of way, or damages of any kind or character, or for engineering fees incurred by the State of Kentucky, or any division thereof, or for the restoration of any road, street, or highway within any incorporated town or city.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course, nobody dare object to that amendment; of course, it is perfectly proper. I wish simply to call attention to the fact that what I have said has been vindicated, and we will be doing this kind of business without end.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, may I ask who offered the amendment?

Mr. BARKLEY. I offered the amendment.

Mr. WARREN. Of course, it is clearly legislation. What has the Senator with which to fortify it, in the way of law or estimate? Has he had any statement from the Budget regarding the amendment?

Mr. BARKLEY. It has the same force behind it, I will say, as has the amendment which has just been adopted and which was offered by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. KEYES]. In the sudden flood of 1927 in the Kentucky River $56,000,000 worth of property was destroyed and 91 lives were lost; more than 2,500 miles of road were destroyed, and in one county 25 bridges were washed out. Some of the counties in east Kentucky had voted bonds for local road purposes in conjunction with State and Federal aid up to the limit under the State constitution. This flood, which poured down the valleys of east Kentucky a stream of water that ranged from 10 feet to 75 feet in height and destroyed property to the value I have indicated and the roads, was over within two or three days.

Mr. WARREN. When did it occur?

Mr. BARKLEY. It occurred at the same time the Mississippi River flood was at its height and, therefore, nobody paid any attention to it. The press could not give any space to the flood in Kentucky, although, especially in loss of life, it almost equaled the Mississippi River flood. The legislature of our State has appropriated $2,000,000 to match the appropriation provided by the amendment.

Mr. WARREN. Did the Senator attempt to attach the amendment to the bill which was before us on yesterday and which was passed? I refer to the bill relating to flood control.

Mr. BARKLEY. No; because the House Committee on Good Roads held exhaustive hearings not only with reference to the Kentucky situation, but with reference to the Vermont and New Hampshire situation, which has just been taken care of by the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire. The House committee reported unanimously a bill carrying this identical amount as an authorization. Our State highway department is ready to proceed with the reconstruction of these roads. It is very essential that the appropriation be made at once, because many rural roads are out of commission; many children are denied even the opportunity to go to school by reason of the fact that roads and bridges have been destroyed, and the counties and local authorities are not financially able to contribute anything under the limitations on their bond issues to the reconstruction of the highways. Therefore, we feel that it will be in the interest of the people and a just recognition of the obligation of the Government in this matter to make this appropriation available as soon as possible.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I have listened attentively to what the Senator from Kentucky has said, and I appreciate the situation which he has described. Sometimes it is easy for a man to resist his enemies, but it is a very difficult task to resist his friends. In view of what the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] has so well said, let me ask what position will the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations be in if he fails to insist upon the observance of the rules of the Senate which he, as well as other Members of the Senate, is bound to obey? What is he going to do in a case like this? A rule was framed when, as I recall, the control of the Senate was on the other side of the aisle, which had to do with amendments to appropriation bills.

I remember very well the then senior Senator from Alabama moving an amendment which provided that under no circumstances should an amendment be received to an appropriation bill that embodies legislation, and the amendment to the rules went so far as to provide that if the committee should recommend anything that was out of order under the rule on account of its embodying legislation and a point of order were raised on the floor of the Senate and the amendment was held to be out of order, the whole bill should go back to the committee. If the practice is to be that any Senator during the consideration of appropriation bills can offer and have agreed to any kind of legislation in the form of an amendment, "where are we at" and where are we going?

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

Mr. OVERMAN. I agree thoroughly with the Senator from Wyoming and also with the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. WARREN. It almost makes one sorry that he voted yesterday for the flood control bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. But we have agreed to an amendment which has been proposed to take care of a similar emergency in Vermont and New Hampshire. The pending amendment proposes to take care of an emergency in Kentucky, and I say a point of order should not be made against it.

Mr. WARREN. Is it an emergency?

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. It is just as much an emergency, I will say to the Senator, as is the case of New Hampshire and Vermont.

Mr. WARREN. Why did not the Senator from Kentucky proceed to secure legislation on the subject? I am making an appeal simply in my position as chairman of the committee. I seem to be expected to follow the rules of the Senate in connection with the consideration of appropriation bills on the floor, while other Senators do not observe them.

Mr. BARKLEY. I will say to the Senator that witnesses came here from Kentucky, just as they did from Vermont, and went before the House Committee on Good Roads and laid the facts before the committee, which held hearings that lasted probably for a month, in which all the details of this matter were gone into. As the result of those hearings and that activity on the part of the House committee, a unanimous report was made on a bill taking care of this emergent situation in Kentucky, just as it has been taken care of in Vermont and New Hampshire. Therefore, I did not deem it necessary to duplicate the effort by having similar hearings before the Senate committee, because the same purpose was reached by having the hearings before the House committee. That bill is before the House as an authorization, but the Senator knows how difficult it is in case of an emergency like this to have to go through the form of passing an authorization and then securing an appropriation. I do not agree with the Senator, however, that this amendment is in violation of the rules of the Senate.

Mr. WARREN. Has the Senator up to this time introduced a bill covering this matter?

Mr. BARKLEY. No, sir; I have not.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator did not bring it before the committee when they were in session?

Mr. BARKLEY. I did not wish to trespass upon the privileges of the House and Members of the House. I did not desire to assume leadership in any matter in which the House was taking the lead.

So far as the rules are concerned, I will say to the Senator that I do not think this amendment violates the rules. We have here general legislation granting Federal aid in the construction of highways. It provides that for every dollar put up by the Federal Government a dollar shall be put up by the State. That has been complied with.

The State legislature has appropriated $2,000,000 to match the $1,800,000 which I ask for in this amendment. It is to be expended under the Department of Agriculture, through the Bureau of Public Roads, in cooperation with the State Highway Commission of Kentucky, and, I think, complies with the general law on the subject, and is not in violation of any rule; but, even if it were, I certainly hope the Senator is not going to invoke any rule against Kentucky when he did not do so with reference to Vermont and New Hampshire.

Mr. WARREN. Would the Senator feel that it was any trouble to pass a bill making this authorization, and provide for the appropriation in a later bill, a deficiency bill?

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not know whether it could be done or not. It certainly would result in delay; and time is of the essence here.

Mr. WARREN. I want the Senator to understand the position that I think he is in and that I am in. The Senator comes here at the commencement of the session with a matter that he very much wants. He introduces no bill whatever on the subject. He does not secure one from the House and bring it to us, and I ask him to see the position he puts us in.

Mr. BARKLEY. I will state to the Senator that the hearings before the House committee began in December, and the House committee only reported on the 14th day of March the bill to which I referred. They reported it unanimously, recommending the enactment of this legislation. I do not think the inference of the Senator that I have been guilty of laches would apply in view of that fact, because I did not know the amount necessary.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I do not care to discuss the matter further. I know very well that I could make the point of order against the amendment. It might or might not be sustained, but the vote of the Senate could put in the amendment through appeal of ruling, so I have said all that I care to say; and I am ashamed of myself for having too much heart and too little nerve.

Mr. BARKLEY. I hope the fact that I am very proud of the Senator may make up somewhat for the shame that he feels.

Mr. WARREN. I wish to say, however, that from now on, as long as I occupy my present position—and I expect it will not be very long—I shall make the point of order on everything of this kind that comes up. I want all Senators to understand it—I do not care whether they are friend or foe, East or West, North or South—because we must have rules to do business under, or we are in the sea without boat or rudder.

Mr. SACKETT. Mr. President, I want to say just a word. The Senator asked if this was an emergency.

Mr. WARREN. I am accepting it as an emergency.

Mr. SACKETT. I appreciate that, if the Senator please. I speak of it as an emergency on account of the education of the children. This flood wiped out practically every schoolhouse in 4 counties, and numerous schoolhouses in 11 other counties. We were able, through private charity, to repair and replace those simple one-room schoolhouses; but to-day the roads are so destroyed and the bridges are so gone that the children can not get into attendance upon their schoolhouses. For that reason it is an emergency. It is a serious situation in counties that can not take care of themselves; and I am delighted that the Senator has accepted the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 45, after line 3, it is proposed to insert as a separate paragraph the following:

Not to exceed $10,000 of appropriations herein made for the Forest Service shall be expended for acquirement of additional lands for forest-tree nurseries.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I want to offer an amendment in line with what I have said. I shall not discuss it. It is the same proposition that was just passed on in two other cases.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. At the appropriate place in the bill it is proposed to insert the following:

There is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $48,000 for the relief of the State of Florida to restore and recondition the roads and bridges damaged or destroyed by the floods in said State in the year 1926: Provided, That any sums appropriated under this authorization shall be expended under the supervision and direction of the Department of Agriculture, Bureau of Public Roads, in cooperation with the State highway department of the State of Florida.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I make the point of order against the amendment. I might as well begin with perhaps the best friend I have in the world.

Mr. FLETCHER. I had hoped the Senator was going to start his reform after he got through with this bill, not before we passed it. My mistake is that I did not make the amount a million and a half or two million.

Mr. WARREN. I am really sorry the Senator did not, while he was about it.

Mr. FLETCHER. I wish the Senator would withhold the point of order and let this amendment go on the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The point of order is well taken.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I offer an amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 3, line 14, it is proposed to add the following additional proviso:

Provided further, That no part of the funds appropriated by this act shall be used by any bureau of the Department of Agriculture for any expense incident to ascertaining, collating, or publishing any data or information which it is the duty of another department or bureau to ascertain, collate, or publish.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator has no objection to that amendment, I suppose?

Mr. McNARY. Will the Senator, in a brief sentence, explain what is the purpose of the amendment?

Mr. McKELLAR. The purpose of it was stated in the debate just a few minutes ago, participated in by a number of Senators over here. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] showed that the Bureau of Economics in the Department of Agriculture had been collating information and material that it was the duty of the Bureau of the Census to collate. This prevents duplication.

Mr. McNARY. It is to prevent duplication of the activities of the department?

Mr. McKELLAR. That is all it does.

Mr. McNARY. I have no objection to it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, on behalf of my colleague [Mr. WILLIS], who is unavoidably detained from the Senate, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, and ask the chairman of the committee to give it consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 19, line 22, after the word "regulations," it is proposed to insert the following additional proviso:

Provided further, That out of the money hereby appropriated no payment as indemnity shall be made for any animal condemned for slaughter if the indemnity value of such animal is fixed by any arbitrary maximum, or it is not arrived at by some well-recognized and equitable method of appraisal.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, a very earnest request was made for an additional appropriation to enlarge the scope of the Market News Service with respect to agricultural products. It was represented that such an enlarged news service would be highly beneficial to producers as well also to consumers. For it is manifest that producers should be advised as to the need and demand of the various central markets throughout the country. If it is proper, I should like to inquire of the Senator in charge of the bill what disposition was made of that matter, and what hope we may have for future legislation with respect to it.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, the current appropriation has been increased materially in this bill, and now provides $1,076,000 for the services in connection with market news. The Senator from California very ably presented to the committee an amendment to carry that service, a complete service, into the State of California.

Other Senators appeared, asking for a complete service in various sections of the country. It was thought by the members of the committee that they should not take up this very important work by sections or by groups of cities, so none of these amendments were accepted. Consequently, the appropriation was not increased. However, it was agreed by the committee, and a direction was made to the Department of Agriculture, to make a thorough study and examination of this subject, and come in next year with an estimate which would make the service national in its scope.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I gather that the sentiment of the committee was favorable to the enlargement of this news service for the benefit of all sections of the country?

Mr. McNARY. Very much so. That is entirely true.

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the letters and petitions which I send to the desk, in regard to certain matters in this bill, be inserted at the proper place in the RECORD. The items mentioned in these letters and petitions have been considered by the Committee on Appropriations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that order will be made.

The matter referred to is as follows:

THE NEVADA LAND AND LIVESTOCK ASSOCIATION,
Reno, Nev., February 1½, 1928.

Hon. TASKER L. ODDIE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR ODDIE: We are advised that an appropriation approved by Dr. John R. Mohler, Chief of the Bureau of Animal Industry, and

William M. Jardine, Secretary of Agriculture, in the sum of $256,870, the purpose of which was to grant some increases in salary to field veterinarians of the above bureau, has been cut by the Bureau of the Budget to $120,381.

After carefully considering the matter, it seems to us that these men are being overlooked in the matter of compensation in comparison with those of other bureaus and in comparison with the importance and general high standard of their services, and we take this means, therefore, of seeking your support in the endeavor of getting this appropriation through in the full amount recommended by the chief of the bureau and department concerned.

Respectfully,

C. W. GRISWOLD, President.
VERNON METCALF, Secretary.

OFFICE OF RUSSELL LAND & CATTLE CO.,
Elko, Nev., February 11, 1928.

Senator TASKER L. ODDIE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: My attention has been called to a communication on the part of the Chief of Bureau of Animal Industry pertaining to the appropriation of $256,870, the amount asked by the bureau of a budget by the chief to offset wages for bureau veterinarians restored by Congress.

Being a second vice president of the American National Livestock Association, I believe I can frankly express the universal sentiment of the livestock men of this country in insisting upon competent veterinarians in connection with the Bureau of Animal Industry. It is my understanding that the compensation for these veterinarians is not on a par with other professional incomes. Knowing the great responsibility that falls upon this particular class of profession, it is my opinion that by all means such appropriation should be made that will take care of, attract, and be an incentive for the Bureau of Animal Industry to have such required assistants that may be necessary.

Your support and assistance to this appropriation will be greatly appreciated by all the livestock industry.

Yours very truly,

GEO. RUSSELL, Jr.

FALLON, NEV., February 27, 1928.

Hon. TASKER L. ODDIE,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We as beekeepers would like to have you get $20,000 added to the Budget of the United States Department of Agriculture for the United States Bee Laboratory at Washington, D. C. The same to be used for studies into the food value of honey and for field agents to help in the organization of beekeepers.

If honey was shown to have somewhat similar healthful qualities as milk, you can appreciate the benefit to the health of the people and also the help to the industry.

C. E. Andrews, Fallon, Nev.; P. A. McCart, Fallon, Nev.; P. N. McCart, Fallon, Nev.; A. M. Therien; Leslie Lowe; Mrs. Rachel Zimmerman; J. H. Miller, Fallon, Nev.; T. D. Raffetto; C. M. Beeghby; E. Bullock; E. G. Norton.

STATE OF NEVADA,
OFFICE OF STATE QUARANTINE OFFICER,
UNIVERSITY OF NEVADA,
Reno, Nev., February 20, 1928.

Hon. TASKER L. ODDIE,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR ODDIE: We have received a letter from Mr. C. L. Corkins, entomologist of the State of Wyoming, asking that the representatives of the Western States in the United States Congress interest themselves in securing an appropriation of $20,000 for the support and maintenance of the United States Bee Culture Laboratory, which maintains a branch office at Laramie for the purpose of investigating bee diseases in the Western States.

Nevada is particularly interested in having this laboratory continue its work, as the bee industry in this State is increasing rapidly and our honey business is assuming large proportions. The past year 30 cars of honey were exported from Nevada, and a very conservative estimate places its value at between $125,000 and $150,000. This is a cash crop and is of great assistance in bringing ready money into circulation in this State.

We therefore consider the prevalence of bee diseases that now exist in some of the Western States a serious menace and feel that it would be a desirable thing to have this laboratory continue and receive enough money so that the proper personnel could be maintained, to be ready at our call whenever need for their assistance arises.

Very truly yours,

GEORGE G. SCHWEIS.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
STATE OF CALIFORNIA,
Sacramento, Calif., December 21, 1927.

Hon. TASKER L. ODDIE,
United States Senator,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR ODDIE: Among the important resolutions and special motions passed by the Western Plant Quarantine Board at its ninth annual conference at Reno, Nev., last June, was the inclosed special motion, which was considered one of the most vital of those passed.

As you already know, this board comprises a membership of the 11 Western States, the Territory of Hawaii, and embodies also British Columbia and Lower California, Mexico, each State being represented at the annual sessions by the person in charge of its plant-quarantine enforcement.

As secretary of this board, I have been instructed by that organization to forward a copy of this special motion to you, in order that the information may be in your hands should there be any discussion with reference to the adequacy of funds available to the Federal Horticultural Board to carry on its important plant-quarantine work.

The pink bollworm is one of the most serious pests of cotton known in the world, and its further introduction and spread in the United States can only be curbed by more intense activities on the part of the Federal Horticultural Board in cooperation with the various States concerned. There are other pests liable to be introduced from Mexico, as well as from other foreign countries. The introduction of the Mexican fruit fly into Texas from Mexico and discovered early this year is a striking recent example. The increased vigilance necessary can only be accomplished if a larger personnel is available.

Mr. George G. Schweis, entomologist at Reno, is Nevada's representative on the Western Plant Quarantine Board and cooperates with the other members in order that the agricultural industry of Nevada and of the Western States generally be better protected against the invasion of pests from Mexico and other foreign countries by the important work that the Federal Horticultural Board is conducting along plant-quarantine lines at the maritime ports and at border points.

Yours very respectfully,

W. C. JACOBSEN,
Secretary Western Plant Quarantine Board.

SPECIAL MOTION RE NECESSARY ADDITIONAL FUNDS FOR FEDERAL QUARANTINE INSPECTION WORK

That the proper authorities in Washington, D. C., be petitioned to take such action with reference to funds furnished the Federal Horticultural Board that they be made in sufficient sums additional to those now provided so that proper detailed attention may be given to the vitally necessary inspection work in order to adequately prevent pest introduction along the international boundary between the United States and Mexico, and at such other border or vehicular inspection points as appears necessary; and, further, that additional funds be provided for complete scouting and continued inspection of the cotton-growing areas in the Southwest in order to learn at the earliest dates of further possible spreads of the pink bollworm of cotton into new areas and to investigate to what extent and how this serious insect pest is spread, whether through the medium of cottonseed and other cotton commodities and containers, or whether by other means.

Special motion, regularly seconded and unanimously carried at the ninth annual conference Western Plant Quarantine Board meeting at Reno, Nev., June 20 and 21, 1927.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 42, line 3, it is proposed to strike out the figures "$354,300" and insert in lieu thereof "$374,300" and the following words:

the $20,000 increase to be allotted to the Lake States Experiment Station to be used for silvicultural, dendrological, and other experiments, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I note from the RECORD that on yesterday the Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS], of course upon misinformation, stated that I was opposed to any appropriation in this bill for the eradication of tuberculosis.

That was a total mistake, perhaps derived from a statement of mine to him and to others, which at some future time I shall in an orderly way amplify, that it is my conviction that thousands upon thousands of perfectly healthy animals are being slaughtered every year by reason of incompetent and indifferent inspection. As long as that is being done, however, I, of course, am in favor of an ample appropriation to compensate the victims of this maladministration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is still before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment. If there be no further amendment to be proposed, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

FARM RELIEF

Mr. McNARY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 3555, known as the farm relief bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Oregon.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 3555) to establish a Federal farm board to aid in the orderly marketing and in the control and disposition of the surplus of agricultural commodities in interstate and foreign commerce.

Mr. McNARY. I desire to give notice that it is not my intention to take up the bill until after 2 o'clock on Monday.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 15 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, March 30, 1928, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, March 29, 1928

The House met at 12 o'clock noon and was called to order by the Speaker.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou who art the fairest among ten thousand, the rose of Sharon, the lily of the valley, and the bright and morning star, to Thee we come, for Thou art our redeemer and elder brother. Draw us into the harmonies of Thy law and into the blessings of Thy grace, that we may hear the whisper of truth and the appeal of duty. May our plain, common lives be responsive to Thy call and enriched by the glory of service. We thank Thee for difficult tasks, and even for severe disciplines, for we perceive the way of life lies here. Above everything else, our Father, make us like Thee. In all the conceptions of human life there can be no loftier ambition, no deeper desire, and no sublimer purpose. Being set with determined courage, calm with fathomless peace, let our lives shine forth in the transfiguring light of Christian citizenship. Hear our prayer for Jesus' sake. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. Craven, its principal clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 2004. An act authorizing the paving of the Federal strip known as International Street, adjacent to Nogales, Ariz.; and

S. 3740. An act for the control of floods on the Mississippi River and its tributaries, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that under authority of section 5581 of the Revised Statutes, the Vice President had appointed Mr. SWANSON as a member of the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution to fill the vacancy in the term expiring March 3, 1929, caused by the death of Hon. WOODBRIDGE N. FERRIS, late a Senator from the State of Michigan.

NATIONAL ORIGINS

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I present a privileged report from the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

House Resolution 148

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization shall have one legislative day for the consideration of the following bills: S. J. Res. 113, S. 716 (a similar House bill numbered 11351 now being on the House Calendar), and H. R. 12407; this rule not to interfere with privileged business.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, this rule provides that the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization may call up these several bills in the order named under the rule and be considered under the general rules of the House. As to two of the bills, I understand there is no controversy whatever. As to Senate Joint Resolution 113, while it deals with a controversial matter, I do not understand that there is any controversy in regard to this extension provided for in this bill.

A year ago we extended the time for one year when the provision of the 1924 immigration bill should be put into effect relative to the question of national origins. A study has been made, and, from any information I can get, we are as practically as far away from establishing a system of national origins as we were a year ago, and we will be in the same position next year.

It is my impression that eventually we shall have to repeal this act. It can not be done at this time, but it is necessary on account of the provisions of the original bill that we should at this time again put off the time of putting into effect the national-origins provisions, or the President will issue the order on April 1 to make it effective.

So far as I know, there is no one on the Rules Committee opposed, but perhaps the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR] may want to be heard on this rule. I yield to the gentleman from New York such time as he may wish.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Mr. Speaker and gentleman of the House, this Senate resolution might be entitled a sugar-coated pill for the consumption of the electorate at the next presidential election. Congress undoubtedly will not meet, after we adjourn here in June, until after the next presidential election, and the party in power is between a Scylla and Charybdis of either repealing this provision in the immigration act of 1924 or of putting it into effect, and the party in power has not got the stomach to do either one of those two things.

On the last page of the report from the committee accompanying this bill certain figures are given from which any gentleman claiming even a slight amount of astuteness can gather the reason which prompts this gesture to the American public at this time. Many of the peoples affected by this legislation—at least so far as their descendants, relatives, and friends on the other side of the water are concerned—have some votes to cast in the next national election. The postponement of the effective date of this "national origins" provision would have one effect on certain voters, while to repeal it would have a different effect on other classes of voters. Facing that dilemma, the powers in control come in here with this gesture and say, "We shall put it off for another year," though, as everybody knows, by no calculation whatever can the provision ever be put into effect. Still the party in power is not brave enough to meet the inevitable and repeal the provision.

That is the anomalous situation which confronts this House to-day. This bill is going to pass as if everybody were for it. As for me, I am anxious to see a show-down on this question. I want an opportunity to vote for the repeal of this provision, which was stuck into the immigration law of 1924 without the consent of this House.

The immigration act of 1924 provides that on and after a certain date—that we are extending—the quota shall be based on the national origins of the inhabitants of this country in 1790 instead of being based upon the census of 1890, as it is now. It was going pretty far in audacity and unfairness to seize upon the census of 1890 instead of taking the last census available, but to go way back to 1790 would be the most brazen thing ever attempted in a legislative body.

When the immigration act of 1924 came before this House this national-origins provision was offered as an amendment. It was vehemently advocated by that late Member from Massachusetts, Mr. Rogers, but after the most careful consideration and discussion, it was voted down by our body. When that bill came back from the Senate the provision was found in it under an amendment inserted by the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania, Mr. REED, a descendant of one of "the oldest families in America," whatever that means. It confronted the conferees, and principally because of the short time left for the passage of the bill and because the act of 1921 was expiring, it was left in.

Three members of the Cabinet, three Secretaries, were appointed to see if this provision were ever possible of being put into effect. Their first report, as all their reports, have said it never can be done; that there were no census figures or other figures available upon which to found fair and equitable calculations. Their reports are now before this body. Compare them on the last page of this report. It was impracticable in 1924 and it is worse to-day.

Over on the other side of this Capitol there is still another scheme or vision in the concoction, introduced by one of the distinguished Senators from Indiana, Mr. WATSON. He has a brand-new idea. He says, "Let us figure out 'national origins' every year and see how it works out. We have no idea what was the make-up of the population of this country in the Revolutionary days, and we have been trying for four years to find out what were the racial strains, so let us figure it out this year and base our immigration quota on it; then next year, when we get more facts, we will base our immigration quota on it." For a stable immigration policy that is a gem!

Gentlemen, this "postponing" is the timidest, the weakest, and the most fearful thing that has ever been offered in a legislative body. I would like to see the American Congress courageous enough to repeal it. The action we are taking to-day is an admission of weakness; it is an admission of lack of courage, and it is an admission that we are not brave enough to face the country and say that it is conceded that on the report of the three Secretaries in our Cabinet, on all the reports of all the investigators, as transmitted to this House, this thing can not be done. We should have the courage to say that, because we know in our hearts it can never be done.

Instead of taking up time here to-day to postpone the putting into effect of the "national-origins" proposition of the immigration act of 1924, we should be here to meet this issue fairly and bravely, as any legislative body should do. We should repeal the provision and for once and all wipe out this un-American proposal. [Applause.]

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, my good friend from New York has made exactly the statement I expected he would make. He and I practically agree. I would like to repeal this if we could, but we can not at the present time. So, as the gentleman from New York said in his speech, the only thing we can do is to extend it another year, when, perhaps, we can bring forth legislation which will repeal it.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that after the reading of the Journal and disposition of business on the Speaker's table on to-morrow, I may have 10 minutes in which to address the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that to-morrow, after the reading of the Journal and the disposition of business on the Speaker's table, he may be permitted to address the House for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

NATIONAL ORIGINS

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I call up Senate Joint Resolution 113, to amend subdivisions (b) and (e) of section 11 of the immigration act of 1924, as amended.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington calls up a resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That subdivisions (b) and (e) of section 11 of the immigration act of 1924, as amended, are amended by striking out the figures "1928" and inserting in lieu thereof the figures "1929."

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, you have heard the preliminary statements by the two members of the Rules Committee as to the necessity for this postponement. The report from the committee does not go into the merits of the national-origins provision of the 1924 immigration act, and I do not intend to discuss the merits of that provision to-day. To do so would take more time than I have at my disposal. In the report on the bill we quote in full a brief debate in the Senate which shows beyond a doubt, on the statement of the chairman of the Immigration Committee of the Senate that that committee could not come to an agreement as to a resolution for repealing it and that the best that body could do was to postpone it, which was done unanimously. To-day, at the request of the House committee, I am asking the House to pass this Senate resolution. The time, of course, will come when the national-origins provision will be before this Congress on its merits, and before that time, I assume, the Immigration Committee of the House and a similar committee in the other body will have gone further into the matter through hearings.

Mr. WELLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes.

Mr. WELLER. What is the status of the investigation with reference to national origins? What has the committee done, if anything? I would like to know something about the progress that has been made.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The postponement for one year gives the committee of six experts, two from each of the three departments—State, Labor, and Commerce—further time in which to analyze the figures as to the origin of the stock in the United States. They have made a report recently and these six experts are convinced, after having made considerable changes, that their figures are now fairly correct and yet they say they can make some other changes.

Our committee during this Congress has held no hearings because we have been waiting for this report. The figures only came to the Congress by a resolution of the Senate calling on the President to transmit them, and, as I said a moment ago, in view of the situation in the Senate committee whereby they can not act, either to repeal or to vote down such a motion, the Senate itself by a unanimous vote passed a resolution of postponement.

Mr. WELLER. Has the gentleman been able to satisfy his mind to any better degree of the certainty or uncertainty of the census of 1790?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I have given it a great deal of study, but I do not want to go into the details of that because it would take me at least an hour.

Mr. WELLER. I do not ask the gentleman to go into the details, but I would like to know something about it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. If the gentleman will permit I would much rather reserve the right. I think this would be proper in fairness to both sides, would avoid extensive debate as to merits, and would be in accordance with a sort of agreement we have had. Let me add that this question is entirely nonpolitical. The postponement will give time for further study and in the meantime our own committee will have time to work on some harder problems—harder, perhaps, than the House would think. The matter of the restriction of immigration from the borders is not an easy problem and is one that will not down until it is settled. The matter of relief for relatives of declarants, fathers and mothers of citizens, under certain conditions, is a matter that will not down. Our committee has put in two hours of very hard work this morning, and I do not care whether the man is in Congress or outside of Congress, he will find that these problems that deal with such human matters are distressful and wearing.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. By that statement does the gentleman mean to convey the idea that this question of whether or not we base the quota on national origins is of minor importance compared with these other problems?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. No; it is a very important problem, but let me say to the gentleman that it is very hard to get our committee to sit more than two days a week except when we hold hearings, and then we work for very long hours. By the grace of the House last month we were permitted to sit mornings and afternoons. Further, all the members of the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization, including myself, are members of other important committees, and continuous work in one committee is thus impossible.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. The gentleman takes up the problems in the order of their importance somewhat, does he not?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Largely by agreed program; and then again it is somewhat according to the pressure for consideration by the Members who have introduced the bills.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. And the gentleman feels that the problems with which he is presently to deal with respect to humanizing the immigration act, as it is called, are much more important than this national-origins question?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I do, indeed. There are 21 bills seeking amendments to the act for relief, within quotas or otherwise, for certain relatives.

Mr. EDWARDS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. EDWARDS. This resolution merely extends the time one year.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes.

Mr. EDWARDS. Does it require a report from these experts within the year?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. We do not call for the report, but any time we want the report such a resolution can be passed by either the House or the Senate asking for a report or the figures, or we can call the experts to the committee.

Mr. EDWARDS. Unless we require a report will we not be in the same condition a year hence that we are now?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. No; because we will undoubtedly get the report.

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes.

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. What are the prospects of the gentleman's committee taking up the question of the entire repeal of the national-origins provisions this year?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. That will have to be voted up or down in the committee, and before this Congress finally adjourns in March next it is bound to come to an issue.

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. Does the gentleman think the committee will take it up?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The committee endeavors to consider all bills before it.

Mr. SIROVICH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes.

Mr. SIROVICH. Since the gentleman spoke about humanizing the law and is asking that this matter go over for one year, would the gentleman object to humanizing the law by adding an amendment to the effect that the wives and children of declarants under 21 be admitted in the meantime outside of the quota provision of the law?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. That is a matter pending in the committee at this very moment.

Mr. SIROVICH. Would the gentleman have any objection to such an amendment?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I would not like to do that, because this is a Senate resolution and the necessity for its passage is urgent between now and the end of the week. It would be better to undertake that later.

Mr. McREYONLDS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Have not the experts made their report on this matter?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. They have made their report for this year and they think their present report is much better than the one for last year.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. What is the purpose for extending this provision if we have the report?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. As I said at the beginning of my statement, and as the gentleman will find in the proceedings on the floor of the Senate, the Senate committee is in a deadlock, and that leaves us the necessity of meeting that condition and joining them in asking for a postponement.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Is it necessary to have a postponement or an extension, although the facts have been worked out?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I believe the fair thing to do is to extend it.

Mr. BOX. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. TILSON). The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BOX. Will those opposing the resolution be entitled to recognition for one hour?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Washington has one hour, which he can yield if he wishes. The gentleman can then move the previous question at the end of his hour, if he so desires.

Mr. BOX. Will the gentleman yield us time? I do not think we will use half the time over here, but will the gentleman yield some time to those who are opposed to the resolution? We do not care to go into any extended discussion, but we would like to have some time.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman be content with 10 minutes? I do not think we should take the time for a full immigration debate here to-day.

Mr. BOX. Could the gentleman yield me 20 minutes?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I will yield the gentleman 10 minutes now, and will extend the time if necessary.

Mr. BOX. Mr. Speaker, I think I know what the House will do with this resolution, and I have no disposition to consume time unnecessarily. I do not at all agree in the statement made under discussion of this rule that this provision of law will have to be repealed or that it is unworkable or that it got into the law without consideration or by some accident, trick, or freak.

We are dealing with a vital problem, big with important issues. It is too large to be made a plaything.

The action which you will take to-day proves beyond dispute either that Congress, which passed the immigration act of 1924, and the President, who after consultation with his advisers approved it, were altogether guilty of the clumsy blundering which characterizes incompetency or that some unworthy consideration is now controlling them.

The national-origins provisions of the 1924 immigration act, which you are again postponing, were deliberately written into a big piece of legislation. The original bill as reported by your House committee did not contain them, but they were proposed as an amendment by a scholarly and able Member of the House, the late Mr. Rogers, of Massachusetts, who argued them ably and fairly. The House adhered to the committee bill then before it, and the bill passed without these provisions. It then went to the Senate, where the bill was supported and amended by able and ripe students of the immigration problem composing the Senate committee and membership. They added these national-origins provisions. The bill then went to conference. The House and Senate conferees reconsidered the whole proposition while under no duress, but acting deliberately. The conferees of the two Houses then agreed upon these very provisions. Our conferees recommended them to us. I was a junior minority member of the House committee and was not on the conference committee, but I was then convinced that these provisions are sound and workable. Further study has confirmed me in that conviction. I joined with the chairman and his associates of the conference committee in helping to show to the House the soundness of these provisions. This House adopted them by a big majority. The President after due deliberation, and doubtless upon the advice of his Cabinet, approved the law containing them.

Mr. NEWTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOX. I will.

Mr. NEWTON. Can the gentleman state where he stood on the question in 1924?

Mr. BOX. I stood with the conference committee after it passed the Senate and was inserted in the conference report.

Mr. NEWTON. On the floor?

Mr. BOX. I will go back further than that. It was understood among the supporting members of the House committee that we would stand like a stone wall against any amendment, which we did. The House wisely followed us. We voted against things that it might have been better to have adopted; but after the bill came back from the Senate containing the national-origins provisions, carried by the report of the conference committee the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Box] joined the chairman and his associates, along with many other Members of the House who believe in restriction, in supporting the conference report. After thorough discussion the House voted for the proposition by a large majority. The gentleman from Texas has absolutely no doubt that these are sound and workable provisions.

One gentleman this morning inadvertently misstated the principle upon which this is based. He said that it is based on the census of 1790. It is based on all information that can be gathered from every source—from history, from records everywhere, from all subsequent census reports—and will continue to take into future reckonings census reports hereafter to be made. All these constitute the strictly American base, which is the American population as it now is, counting from the beginning and continuing to be brought down to date by each successive census. It is thoroughly scientific, thoroughly sound, and thoroughly American. The computations by which it is reached can not be made exactly or in a moment, but it is a substantially accurate plan to make immigration proportionate to the population of the United States as determined by a thorough and careful computation of all of the elements entering into it.

I am not going to quarrel with gentlemen who speak excitedly and hastily about it. I am going to help save the law if I can. To do that friends of restriction must cooperate.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOX. Yes.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. The gentleman referred to me.

Mr. BOX. Not by name.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. No; but when I said it was based on the census of 1790, of course, I did not mean that was the entire source of it. The very criticism of it goes to show that it is based on no authoritative source, but writings of so-called historians, so-called historical societies—nothing up to this time that is a proper basis for legislation for immigration or any other purpose.

Mr. BOX. I yield no further. It is based on every source from which truth can be ascertained, census reports, reports of societies of various kinds entitled to credit. The history of our own country and of territory which we have taken over, such as that of Florida, Louisiana, Texas, and California, and even dependable foreign records, have been consulted. The members of the board of experts are capable gentlemen, members of your administration. They are men of high intelligence and great experience, and have gone about the work in a scientific and practical way. Of course, if you require a mathematically exact working out of this problem, you can not have it. Your act, based on the census of 1890, does not do it. We adopted the census of 1890 as the basis for the first quotas under the 1924 act, because it was the best approximation that we could get of what we believed would best serve the interests of the United States as an immigration law. It is a practically correct approximation. It serves the public interest, and was deliberately and carefully considered before it was adopted. What has happened since these provisions were thus deliberately enacted? They remained in the law undisturbed for about three years, but certain foreign blocs have attacked them and made threats against the political lives of those supporting them. Somebody has been running for cover since that attack began. This is the second postponement of these provisions.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOX. Yes.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. The experts have made their report on this matter, and is there any reason for a suspension of this further, if we are going to put it into effect at all?

Mr. BOX. The gentleman from Texas does not favor this postponement and will not vote for it.

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOX. Yes.

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. Is it not true that the Secretaries in charge of this investigation, depending upon the experts they must employ, did make the report about which the gentleman has spoken, and is it not also true that in that report they said this:

> The statistical and historical information available raises grave doubts as to the whole value of these computations as a basis for the purposes intended.

Mr. BOX. I have read that.

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. Is not that true?

Mr. BOX. Oh, something like that appeared in one of their reports.

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. That is actually printed, is it not?

Mr. BOX. Yes; that is printed, and I am like my chairman in that I do not want to say too much. Those gentlemen up there are like some of the rest of us. They say things sometimes which do not exactly chime with the facts, as shown by documents then in existence and as others know them to be. I do not accept that as a fair statement of the situation.

The law was three years old before its operation was postponed for one year the first time. You are again postponing it for one year. I submit two questions: If the law is right, why do you not let it go into effect? If it is bad, why do you not repeal it? But you do neither. Why? The foreign blocs have made you afraid to let it go into effect, while the patriotic societies and patriotic citizens who believe in restriction have made you afraid to repeal it. You are like the chap who was chased by a mad bull across the open ground and into a hole in the hill where he found a bear. If he stayed in, the bear would tear him. If he came out, the bull would gore him.

I congratulate Messrs. SABATH and DICKSTEIN, my colleagues on the committee, who oppose all restrictive measures. The mountain has come to them, for a while at least, but they must not be puffed up. This is a moveable mountain. The political winds may blow it back to its original position, where I hope it will rest. I congratulate my colleagues of the committee, Messrs. SABATH and DICKSTEIN, even if they are wrong, but I can not congratulate the country.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas has used 10 minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA].

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, again we are confronted with a situation where we seek to regulate a real human problem with figures and statistics. We can not take cold figures and apply them to family and human affairs. Some of us predicted at the time that we would have difficulty in arriving at accurate figures upon which to base the proportions under the national-origins clause of the act of 1924, and twice we have been called upon to extend the time. I take this opportunity to appeal to the Committee on Immigration to lay aside figures for a while, and give some attention to the humane side of this problem. Without in the slightest disturbing the restrictive immigration policy adopted by the Congress, we appeal for aid in so amending the law as to make it more humane and less cruel, and by that I mean an amendment, if you please, keeping within the total number of quota allowances, which will permit the uniting of families. [Applause.] The resolution sent over by the Senate offers no relief, because it simply takes from the quota side of the total and transfers to the preferential side. Take a country having 3,800 or 2,500 total quota allowance, 50 per cent of which as you know is preferential, and transfer a class of immigrants from the quota to the preferential, it brings absolutely no relief. In the name of good morals, in the name of decency, in the name of humanity, all we ask is that you permit the aged father and mother of a citizen of the United States to come in as nonquota immigrants and——

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Would the gentleman not also include in that class children of American citizens?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I am coming to that. We ask that you permit children of citizens between the ages of 18 and 21 years, to be included in the nonquota status, and we ask that you permit those declarants who have not yet obtained their papers, but who immigrated prior to the act of 1924, to send for their wives and children as nonquota immigrants, I submit to the most extreme restrictionist in the House, that such a demand is not unreasonable. It would not in the slightest disturb existing labor conditions, because under the existing law the Secretary of Labor may place under bond any person who asks admission whom he believes may become a public charge. I am willing to place every mother and father of a citizen included in this nonquota status under bond that they will not work in the competitive labor market. Surely such modest requests should receive a response from the Committee on Immigration.

Mr. MacGREGOR. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. MacGREGOR. Does the gentleman not know that we are working on that now?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes. I know that I have had a bill in every year since 1924.

Mr. MacGREGOR. And does the gentleman not know that we are actually working and spending several days on that proposition?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes. I appeared before the committee the other day, but that has been the fact every session, and that does not relieve the trouble the gentleman has in his district and that I have in mine. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH].

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, in the hope that we shall shortly secure the relief suggested by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA], I shall vote for the adoption of this resolution to defer the time of the national-origin provision for one year. But, if I were permitted under the rules, Mr. Speaker, I would offer an amendment to extend it for 21 years, so that instead of 1929 it would not go into effect before 1950.

As many of you older Members recall, when the 1924 act was being considered, I called your attention to the fact that this national-origin proposition or scheme, injected by the Senator from Pennsylvania, was impossible of ascertainment. In this I have been fully borne out, as each and every report submitted to the House by the Secretaries of State, Commerce, and Labor, whose duty it was to ascertain the quota that each and every country would be allowed has differed, and not only that, they have been obliged to admit just what I claim. It is a fact that the computations that have been made are uncertain and inaccurate. However, due to prevailing conditions, there is nothing that we can do but to extend the time in which this makeshift scheme goes into effect.

Now, I fully agree with the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] of the Committee on Rules, who gave the reason why we do not repeal it. Personally, I think it should be repealed, and some day, when we have courage enough, it will be repealed, and I am hopeful that it will be shortly. All that I can do now is to agree with the committee, with the hope that it may enable me to bring about favorable action on the pending bills that tend to grant relief to the separated families and bring the relief that is sought by all American women and the American Federation of Labor, and all organizations that have studied and understand the conditions now existing in our country.

I hope that within a few days the committee will be able to agree upon such a humane provision and that we shall be able to bring before the House a measure that will really mean something; something that will bring about a reuniting of the families, and that will also permit a few other exemptions that we are seeking to bring about.

Mr. ARENTZ. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. Yes.

Mr. ARENTZ. I rise for the purpose of bringing to the attention of the gentleman from Illinois, who is a member of the Immigration Committee, the fact that I have introduced a bill asking Congress to bring into this country the minor brothers and sisters of ex-service men, men who have done so much for their country and who are simply asking for the admission of minor brothers and sisters, and allow them, now remaining in Italy or Austria or wherever they are, to come to America.

Mr. SABATH. I am and will do everything in my power to include them in the nonquota basis, just as I am trying to do for the fathers and mothers of American citizens; just as I am trying to do for the children of American citizens up to 21, and the wives and children of men who have been in the United States for many years and who have been pleading with us for years to permit their wives and children to join them. [Applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. GREEN].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. GREEN of Florida. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I favor immigration restriction and do not believe in delaying, procrastinating, evading, and dodging the issue. I believe that inasmuch as this immigration legislation has been enacted, the proper and patriotic thing for us to do is to go on record as standing by this law.

Eighty or 90 per cent of the American citizens desire restricted immigration. They desire the protection of America for American citizens and the perpetuating of American ideals; they are not in sympathy with wedges being driven into the cracks on the plea of humanitarianism and for humanity's sake and separation of families.

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Florida. A little later I will.

I sympathize with any man or with any person who is separated from his family, but I deny the charge that the Congress of the United States and the United States Government has separated families. When an immigrant comes to America and enters our country, cognizant of our laws on immigration, and elects to leave his family at home, we are not responsible, and we have not separated him from his family.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. GREEN of Florida. A little later. I have not time now. I might say that those of us who are opposed to this measure are given 15 minutes, which is not time to even begin discussion.

Those who would permit the influx into our land, or in fact, in some instances decoy to our America, undesirable alien labor in competition with the splendid American laborer surely should be estopped. Cheap labor to-day may be an expensive liability to-morrow, and surely thousands of the foreign laborers are of this class. The American citizen laborer resides among us, pays taxes, contributes to the welfare and upbuilding of society and really stands at the helm of the ship of State of our mighty Nation. On the contrary, foreign laborers drift into our country, obtain what they can for their hire, give as little in return as possible, in most cases, and then invariably thrust themselves for a charitable existence upon the society, in the founding of which they have not assisted.

The influx of all types of undesirable aliens and their amalgamation with our people causes a general weakening, physically, and mentally of our civilization; and instead of our Nation a few centuries from now being the mistress of the world, leading in art, science, invention, statesmanship, culture, and general civilized development, would it not be reasonable to believe that we may assume a secondary place as compared to those nations which have kept their blood white and purely Caucasian. I do not tell you for a certainty that our Nation is destined to great disaster, but I do tell you that it is time to, in actuality, restrict, or even to stop altogether, immigrants coming to our country. In my opinion we already have enough Japanese, Chinese, Negroes, and in fact, many of the other foreign extractions and strains. It is time to stop the islands, Europe, Asia, and Africa from dumping undesirables upon our beautiful American shores. Of course, I do not mean to tell my fellow members that all people who are born in and come from foreign countries are undesirable; we must admit that there are good white people in countries other than America, but I do say that we should and must protect first America for Americans. We must protect American labor. I share with American labor the belief in the dignity of labor and in the majesty of toil, and I recognize no aristocracy save that of moral manhood.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Florida. Later.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Florida. I am sorry I have not time to yield.

Do you think it is fair, my friends, for us to open the doors and turn into America's industry undesirable or even desirable aliens who will here compete with our honest American labor? In addition to that there are many objections, many reasons why we should not listen to the plea of not separating families for humanity's sake and all that sort of bunk. We all know it and we should speak out for what we know is best and safer for America.

I believe the House of Representatives should stand on its own and not do homage to any other legislative body that would hold a whip to crack over the honest-thinking Members of Congress who are for restricted immigration. I will not listen to the behests of those at the other end of the corridor who do not believe in restriction. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Florida has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCREYNOLDS].

Mr. MCREYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, from my viewpoint I can see no reason why this resolution should be passed. If we are going to enforce this act, why not do it? This was all fought out in 1924. The experts have made their reports and this is merely an effort on the part of certain people who are not restrictionists to have this suspended. I see before me many of the same faces and the same men who met us on the floor of this House in 1924, when we had this immigration act under consideration. The same arguments were made then in reference to the kin of those in this country and from a sympathetic standpoint. They then made the same arguments they are undertaking to make now. As evidence that they do not desire this law ever put into effect, I call your attention to the statement that my good friend from Illinois made a few minutes ago, when he said he would vote to suspend it until 1950. If we are to put this into effect, then why suspend it? If you are going to repeal that section of the immigration act, then why not bring it on the floor of the House for that purpose and let us consider it?

Some suggestions have been made that there should be an amendment added to this bill providing that certain relationships should be brought into this country. Of course, there are individual cases in which this works a hardship, but whenever you let down the bars by a general statement as to relationship, then you will have flooded this country with thousands of immigrants and probably thousands of undesirables.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MCREYNOLDS. I yield to my friend.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Is it not a fact that the gentleman supported——

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. MCREYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, I have the floor and I do not see how the gentleman can take me off my feet in this way.

Mr. BLANTON. I want to get the gentleman an audience. I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. MCREYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, I do not yield for that purpose. I have the floor.

The SPEAKER. The point of order of no quorum can be made while the gentleman is speaking. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Two hundred and twenty-seven Members are present, a quorum.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MCREYNOLDS. My time has been partly taken up, but I will yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I desire to ask the gentleman whether he has concluded?

Mr. MCREYNOLDS. No; I have not.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Is it not a fact that the gentleman supported the national-origins proposition in 1924?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Did I support it?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Yes.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. We supported it after it came back from the Senate.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. And now you want to repeal it?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I did not say that.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. What is the gentleman's position on national origins?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I will make my position plain. As Judge Box explained, we voted against all amendments when the immigration bill was before the House, but when it came back from the Senate with this amendment in it, considering that this legislation was vital to the welfare, the standard of living, and the very liberty we enjoyed, we then supported it in order that it could pass this House. I am not advocating the repeal of that portion of this statute at the present time, but I do say, gentlemen, that a resolution was passed a year ago suspending it at that time and another resolution is pending now to do the same thing. My position is to put it into effect or bring it before this House for repeal. That is my position and I trust the gentleman will understand me.

Now, in reference to this matter of kin folks and relationship. This same fight was made in 1924; these same gentlemen made those speeches on this floor at that time and ever since that act was passed an organized minority have been undertaking to drive wedges into that immigration law. I want to caution the Members of this House that whenever you let down the bars in one place you are letting them down in another place. For my part, I would rather tighten the reins than to loosen them.

We have had no act passed in years that redounded more for the protection and welfare of the United States than the immigration act of 1924.

At that time millions were waiting on the shores of Europe just ready to come to our country.

This is our country, and we owe a duty, not only to ourselves, but to future generations, and also to the memory of those patriots gone before us, to preserve its institutions, our form of government, and the character of our citizenship. To aid in doing this, I know of no better way than to guard well the character and number of people that enter the portals of our country.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the resolution.

The resolution was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON of Washington, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the resolution was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. SELVIG. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, a little over a year ago Congress passed a resolution postponing for one year the application of the national-origins method of determining immigration quotas. At that time a majority of the Senate Committee on Immigration were reported by the chairman of that committee to be in favor of a permanent repeal.

The House Committee on Immigration in their report recommended that this method of determining quotas be eliminated from the 1924 immigration law. On account of the legislative situation due to the lateness in the session, the only action taken was to postpone the application of this clause for one year.

At the opening of Congress last December I introduced a bill (H. R. 292) repealing the national-origins clause. To-day, instead of having a permanent repeal resolution before us for consideration, we have again a resolution postponing the application of the national-origins method for another year.

I am in favor of a complete, final, and permanent repeal of the national-origins clause.

My reason for asking for the elimination of the national-origins method to determine the quota from each country can best be stated in the words of the department committee appointed by the Secretaries of State, Commerce, and Labor to present quota figures based on the national-origins plan.

Early in 1927 the preliminary report prepared by these experts from the State, Commerce, and Labor Departments was submitted to the Senate in a letter signed by the Secretaries of State, Commerce, and Labor, which I quote:

> The report of the subcommittee is self-explanatory and is stated to be a preliminary report, yet in the judgment of that committee further investigation will not substantially alter this presentation.
> Although this is the best information we have been able to secure we wish to call attention to the reservations made by the committee and to state that in our opinion the statistical and historical information available raises grave doubts as to the whole value of these computations as a basis for the purposes intended. We, therefore, can not assume responsibility for such conclusions under these circumstances.

In the face of "grave doubts as to the value of these computations as a basis for the purposes intended," Congress will make a grave mistake in spending any more time considering the national-origins plan. The entire clause should be repealed forthwith.

The attitude of the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON], chairman of the Senate Committee on Immigration, was clearly set forth on February 1, 1927, when he presented a resolution (S. J. Res. 152) asking for postponement for one year of that clause of the immigration act providing for the determination of immigration quotas based upon the national-origins clause. He said:

> I desire to say that under the present immigration law the President is required to promulgate a proclamation on the 1st day of April, 1927, in respect of the national-origins provision of the law. Upon this subject two messages have been received by the Senate. The last of those messages states that the figures relied upon for the quota numbers of various countries are ambiguous and that practical legislation could not be predicated upon them.
> I violate no confidence I think in saying to the Senator from Missouri that the majority of the Immigration Committee desired to repeal the national origins law, but, there being a minority in favor of it and our time being so limited, we felt that we could not at this time have definite action.

This resolution passed the Senate. The attitude of the House Committee on Immigration on the same resolution is expressed in the committee report, from which I quote:

> The committee having considered the text of Senate Joint Resolution 152, to postpone for one year the going into effect of the national-origins provision of the immigration act of 1924, is of the opinion that at the end of one year from July 1, 1927, the same uncertainty as to the results of regulating immigration by means of the national-origins plan will continue to exist.
> That the Secretaries of State, Commerce, and Labor will have little, if any more, positive evidence on which to base quota findings than at present.
> That too much uncertainty exists as to the requirements of the law that "the President shall issue a proclamation on or before April 1, 1927," when read in conjunction with further provisions of the law.
> That the uncertainty will continue from year to year.
> That it seems far better to have immigration quotas for the purposes of restriction fixed in such a manner as to be easily explained and easily understood by all.
> That the committee is of the opinion that the United States having started on a policy of numerical restriction, the principle of which is well understood, little will be gained by changing the method.

There is no ambiguity in those words. The House Committee on Immigration favored the permanent repeal of the national-origins clause. Why dally with it any longer? Let us repeal it and avoid the uncertainty that continues from year to year!

On February 27, 1928, the President, in response to Senate Resolution 152, submitted a communication of the Secretary of State, the Secretary of Commerce, and the Secretary of Labor, dated February 25, 1928, relative to the national-origins system of determining the immigration quotas.

This is the most recent communication signed by them. They make no recommendations regarding this much-discussed problem. They simply state:

> We wish to make it clear that neither we individually or collectively are expressing any opinion on the merits or demerits of this system of arriving at the quotas. We are simply transmitting the calculations made by the departmental committee in accordance with the act.

They then submit the report of the departmental officers who were intrusted with the task of determining the quotas. It is significant to note that there are several important deviations in the 1928 estimate from the figures submitted in 1927. The advocates of the national-origins provision in striving to support their contentions, by revising annually, or oftener, the percentages of respective racial stocks in the United States, raise grave doubts as to the whole value of these computations.

They report an increase in one extensive racial element of 23 per cent, a decrease in another of 10 per cent, and so on. All of this tends to show the unreliability of this method of determining immigration quotas. To many it will seem like juggling figures; to others, like the merest guesswork; and, to not a few, this plan of apportioning quotas is seen to favor certain special classes in our land.

The problem is of far too great importance to be settled by putting into operation any law which is basically unsound and fundamentally wrong. This would be establishing a dangerous precedent.

A second reason which leads me to take the position of opposing the national-origins plan is that the effect of the clause in question would be to discriminate unduly against the people from the countries whose quotas would be reduced by this method. The immigrants from Germany, Ireland, and Scandinavia are among our best citizens. They have helped develop this country and its institutions. Their loyalty and patriotism heretofore have never been questioned. They have always responded willingly, faithfully, and efficiently to calls for the defense of our country.

I had not intended, Mr. Speaker, on this occasion to attempt to eulogize any particular nationality. We are all Americans in this country, one in loyalty, devotion, and patriotism.

I can not forbear, however, from quoting two paragraphs only from the very readable and scholarly book, Reforging America, by Lothrop Stoddard, in which he appraises the contributions made by the various racial strains which have made the United States what it is. On pages 110 and 111, he writes:

Another important stream of the old immigration is the Scandinavians—the people from Norway, Sweden, and Denmark, together with the Icelanders, who are of Norse blood. The Scandinavian stream did not begin to flow much before 1870, but thenceforth it ran strongly, so that to-day the Scandinavian element in our population numbers nearly 4,000,000. The Scandinavians are characteristically outdoor folk. They make fine farmers, and prefer the cold climates of our Northwestern States, where they are found in great numbers, from Minnesota to Washington, and even in far-away Alaska. Others, heeding the call of their Viking forbears, follow the sea, and are fishermen or sailors.

The town dwellers among the Scandinavians are largely skilled artisans. The Scandinavians vary somewhat among themselves. The Norwegians and their Norse brothers, the Icelanders, are rugged individuals, and are perhaps the finest of the lot. The Swedes are quicker, though somewhat less tenacious. The Danes are relatively gregarious and excel in pursuits like cooperative dairying. The general average of the Scandinavians is extremely good, with very few really undesirable elements. They are a most valuable addition to our population, especially since they assimilate better than any other element except the Anglo-Saxons. This is just what might be expected, because the Scandinavians are not only Nordic in blood, but have political traditions, social ideals, and a general outlook on life very similar to those of the Anglo-Saxon stock.

And again on the last page of this same book he states:

That (the vexatious issue of lack of unity and alienism) is why we are not progressing socially and culturally as fast as truly advanced peoples like those of Australia, New Zealand, and the Scandinavian nations.

The immigration question has aroused a widespread interest throughout the country during the past four years. Two restriction laws have been passed by Congress, one in 1921, and our present act in 1924.

The quotas of many countries, especially of Germany and the Scandinavian countries were by the act of 1924, practically reduced by one-half, as is shown in the following table:

	Act of 1921	Act of 1924
Denmark	5,619	2,789
Germany	67,607	51,227
France	5,729	3,954
Norway	12,205	6,453
Sweden	20,042	9,651

The national-origins provision, if allowed to go into effect, would still further reduce these quotas. In the case of Norway, the quota would be reduced from 6,453 to either (1) 2,053, (2) 2,207, or (3) 2,403, depending upon which national-origins estimate is adopted. The first, (1) is the national-origins estimate submitted in 1924. The second, (2) is the national quota submitted January 7, 1927. The third, (3) is the national-origins quota submitted February 27, 1928.

In the case of Sweden, the figures would be (1) 3,072, (2) 3,259, or (3) 3,399, depending upon which national-origins estimate might be adopted.

In the case of Denmark, the figure would be (1) 945, (2) 1,044, or (3) 1,234. In the case of Germany, the figure would be (1) 20,028, (2) 23,428, or (3) 24,908. In the case of Great Britain the quota would be increased to (1) 85,135, (2) 73,039, or (3) 65,894, depending upon which national-origins estimate is selected.

The press in Minnesota has given widespread publicity to the practical wordings of our immigration policy. A recent editorial appeared in the Minneapolis Morning Tribune, February 4, 1928, which gives succinctly the attitude of Minnesotans regarding this entire matter. Permit me to read it:

If the national-origins clause of the immigration act of 1924 survives the present session of Congress it will not be with the consent of the Minnesota delegation in Washington. In both Senate and House there is Minnesota hostility to this feature of the law as it now stands, and the opponents are not backward about speaking their minds freely on the subject.

Minnesotans are far from being for free and unlimited immigration. They believe in sharp limitation as to the total number of eligibles in a given year, but they want the limitation to be so accomplished as to serve the best practical results not alone for Minnesota but for the country as a whole. They are able to cite figures to show that the national-origins clause as at present constituted, if permitted to go into effect in July, would unduly depress some quotas relative to other quotas, and that this relative depression would be the opposite of what the new immigration law was intended to bring about.

It is common knowledge that the avowed purpose of the revised immigration law was to keep down the quotas of nationals in southern and southeastern Europe, as compared with the quotas of northern Europe. The theory on which the quota phase of the legislation was predicated was that immigrants from the Nordic countries merge more quickly, naturally, and wholeheartedly into our social and governmental scheme than do the immigrants from southern Europe, southeastern Europe, and Russia. It was not intended that the national-origins allotment should be cut down, the number of eligibles from Germany, the Scandinavian countries, and the Irish Free State, while enlarging the number of eligibles from Italy, Austria, Hungary, and Russia, but it is said the national-origins clause, if operative, would have that general effect.

Minnesotans value highly the Scandinavian element that is woven extensively into the fabric of their citizenship, along with other nationals of northern and western Europe. They can not see that there is either wisdom or justice in reducing the quotas from Sweden, Norway, Denmark, Germany, and the Irish Free State.

As a matter of fact, the national-origins plan of "picking out immigrants" is well meant, but it is an uncertain basis on which to proceed. There is no available source of information from which to draw to make application of the law a matter of scientific accuracy. Immigration should be limited, but the limitation should be rationally accomplished if we are to serve best the economic, social, and political welfare of the Nation. When a law does not work out as it was avowedly intended to do, there is something wrong with it.

Instead of merely postponing the national-origins clause for a year, as is contemplated in the pending resolution, the clause should be permanently repealed.

A committee of experts, in endeavoring to work out the national origins of the present population in the United States, has found a difficult and confusing problem. It is impossible to evolve the quotas from the statistics of immigration and emigration available. This lack of statistics and data definitely precludes the possibility of establishing national origins with scientific accuracy.

The three estimates already submitted bear this out. In addition there have been numerous other estimates worked out by individuals and by various groups who have given time and study to this problem, which are defended with equal show of authority.

Because of the difficulties involved and the lack of scientific accuracy of any figures presented, widespread dissatisfaction with the new quota is bound to result. The national-origins feature of the 1924 immigration act was passed through Congress without receiving the critical examination its importance justified. Permanent and satisfactory adjustment of the matter can only be reached by the repeal of the national-origins clause of the immigration act of 1924.

Instead of merely postponing the repeal for one year, let us make the repeal permanent, and let us do it now!

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, the manner in which the resolution deferring the operation of the national origins clause of the immigration act of 1924 was railroaded through the Senate recently, and through the House here to-day, very well substantiates the charge made during the debate on the floor of the House to-day that the suspending of the operation of the law at this time is nothing more than a vicious political gesture, calculated to eliminate the vital issue embodied in the national-origins method of establishing immigration quotas from being a source of trouble to the Republican Party in the campaigns this presidential year.

There is absolutely no good reason for not facing the issue at this time by taking up my bill, which provides for the outright repeal of national origins. This second postponement was brought about following a recent visit, made upon special invitation, I am informed, of the Senator from Pennsylvania, author of the pro-British national-origins clause, to the White House, at which time it was made known that national origins must be put out of the way this year.

It was not those seeking the repeal of national origins who brought about this latest postponement in either the House or Senate, but rather the friends of the iniquitous clause, who have the hope that next year with presidential and congressional elections not to be worried about national origins, as a method of establishing immigration quotas, will be foisted upon the country and the pro-British fanatics in America will be assured of having their ranks augmented annually with over 50 per cent of all of the world's immigration coming to this country from Great Britain and Ulster Ireland.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I have the utmost faith in our country, but we have serious problems confronting us. I have in mind particularly the immigration problem. As a nation we have done many foolish things, but in the end, if we work loyally together, we will correct wrongs and mistakes and build a greater America.

America began by the coming here of a race of manly men, pioneers from the best stock of the Old World, who came here to found and construct a great commonwealth. The Indians found here were few in number, had not improved their opportunities, left no real mark on the country, and under the laws of God and nature gave way to a better and a bigger people. The Indian has suffered wrongs, and yet as between him and the white man the thing happened that should have happened. There are no buffaloes now, but there are New York, Philadelphia, Washington, New Orleans, Chicago, Denver, and San Francisco. There are no big-painted Indian chiefs left, but there have been Websters, Clays, Edisons, Washingtons, Lees, Vanderbilts, Wrights, Lindberghs, the Mayo brothers. There are but few wigwams and tepees, but we have the Capitol, the Congressional Library, the Washington Monument, the Singer Building. There are no more birch canoes but we own the Leviathan and the battleship Texas. There are no more Indian trails but we have 249,398 miles of railroad trackage.

NATIONAL RECONSTRUCTION

The alien problem and the negro question are the two serious obstacles to the construction of an ideal and lasting commonwealth. The northeast contains dangerous blacks, reds, and alien radicals, a situation calling for Federal intervention, such as bills now pending seek to offer.

Let me call your attention to the real situation in respect to this great question. We have approximately 100,000,000 whites. About half of this is fine stock, north European, English, Scotch, Irish, German, Dutch, Scandinavian, and others of lesser importance.

The bad element of our population consists of about 15,000,000 of recent importations from southern and eastern Europe. Add to this 10,000,000 negroes, 1,500,000 mongrels, and about 200,000 other undesirables. Now, let us deport those that can be and should be deported and begin the process of assimilating those that can be assimilated and Americanized, and limit future immigration to the lowest possible numbers.

One thing is certain, mass immigration must stop; and we must remake America, depending on the sturdy and polite Southerner, the business-loving Northerner, the sober and energetic middle westerner, and the eagle-eyed far westerner to do the big job.

LET US AMERICANIZE AMERICA

There should be no white and black intermarriages or intermixture. It is best for both colors that there should be drastic legal prohibition of white and black intermarriage and racial intermixture. The North with its large negro population now understands what the race question actually means. Some Northern States still permit marriages between negroes and whites, but such marriages are few, and happily so.

Sexual relations between whites and blacks should be prohibited under the most severe penalties.

Complaint is often made that the negro is disfranchised in the South. He is. It is done by means legal and constitutional, with good results for both races. The South will maintain white supremacy; has done so and will continue to do so, and by this course both whites and blacks have made progress, materially, socially, educationally.

Let it be known that the South is determined to yield no part of her creed as to who is best fitted to govern and as to what color will govern. Both races can not govern jointly. The pale-face dominates wherever he sets his foot, and the goal of mankind is thus thrust ahead. If the Japanese were in the majority on the Pacific coast, the white men and women would continue to rule. If the negroes were more numerous than the Irish in New York City and in Massachusetts, the Irish would remain in control. Save by very superior force of arms, no colored race can hope to govern any State in this Union.

Another matter in this connection:

Those of us who favor quota legislation have been asked for our motive in voting for this idea.

It was ascertained in 1909 that the illiteracy of the English was 0.7 per cent, the Scotch 0.5 per cent, the Scandinavian 0.2 per cent, the Irish 1.5 per cent, the Germans 6.3 per cent, while that of the south Italians was 56.9 per cent, the Russians 42.7 per cent, the Poles 39.9 per cent, the Greeks 26.1 per cent, and that of the Bulgarians, Serbs, and Montenegrins, 46.5 per cent.

From this it appears that the illiteracy of immigrants from southern and eastern Europe is over twelve times as great as that of aliens of northwestern Europe, and that the illiteracy of Armenians, Japanese, and Syrians is great. A man may be illiterate and not vicious or undesirable, and yet the best test of his fitness perhaps is the educational test.

Mr. MAAS. Mr. Speaker, it is most regrettable that this session of Congress did not see fit to repeal the national-origins clause of the 1924 immigration act outright and dispose of this question once and for all. However, under the circumstances I can not see that the House is to blame for the present situation. There is nothing else for us to do but to postpone the operation of this clause for another year. I join with the majority of the Members of this House in their desire to strike this provision from the bill at this time, but also agree with them that the better part of wisdom is to accept postponement for a year inasmuch as it is quite apparent that repeal at this particular time would be impossible.

I certainly feel that it is very much wiser to take the attitude that we will accept postponement now, and then repeal the bill at the next session, than to say that we will nave "repeal now or nothing," when in this case "nothing" means that the national-origins clause will actually go into operation. After all, the real object is to prevent the operations of that most pernicious quota provision. In the meantime the country is becoming well acquainted with the viciousness of this provision and I feel very certain that by the next session of Congress sentiment will be such that the law can be easily amended and the national-origins clause stricken out of the immigration act. I most heartily favor the principles of restricted and selected immigration. Immigration is purely a domestic matter, and at the present rate of increase in population in the United States it is very necessary to call a halt to general influx of other peoples. The best test of those desired is the proportion of those foreign peoples who have come into this country and shared in its upbuilding. The present quota basis establishes that very nicely and is for the best interest of all the people of this country. It is not desirable, nor would it be humane to entirely shut out immigration nor is it wise or desirable to artificially change the proportions of those people who will come into this country from the proportions of those people who came and did the most for building up of this great Republic. If the national-origins clause is put into effect, it would militate particularly against the Germans, Irish, and Scandinavian peoples. It is these very peoples who have formed the backbone of the development of the great Northwest. They assimilate readily and make the most loyal and substantial American citizens. Almost without exception they become naturalized and take an active and intense interest in civic affairs, both locally and nationally. From these peoples have come some of our greatest statesmen and leaders. I think it is only fair to serve notice, however, that while we are accepting postponement now that we intend to repeal this national-origins provision at the next session of Congress and that we have no intention of longer temporizing on this question.

EXEMPTION OF AMERICAN INDIANS BORN IN CANADA FROM THE OPERATION OF THE IMMIGRATION ACT OF 1924

Mr. MacGREGOR. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (S. 716) to exempt American Indians born in Canada from the operation of the immigration act of 1924.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York calls up the bill which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the immigration act of 1924 shall not be construed to apply to the right of American Indians born in Canada to pass the borders of the United States: Provided, That this right shall not extend to persons whose membership in Indian tribes or families is created by adoption.

Mr. MACGREGOR. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, this bill permits Indians born in Canada to pass and repass the borders of the United States. It is approved by the Department of Labor.

Under the Immigration Act of 1924, Indians are not permitted to cross the borders because they are ineligible to citizenship. Under the Jay treaty of 1794 between the United States and Great Britain, the Indians were permitted to pass and repass the borders of the country, and it was not until quite recently the Department of Labor discovered that they are not eligible to admission, it being determined that they were ineligible to citizenship. Therefore they were not permitted to visit their relatives in this country and pass to and from the reservations on each side of the line.

Mr. CELLER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MACGREGOR. Certainly.

Mr. CELLER. What body determined that the Indian was an alien?

Mr. MACGREGOR. They are not eligible to citizenship.

Mr. CELLER. I know; but what body determined that an Indian is an alien?

Mr. MACGREGOR. What body?

Mr. CELLER. Was it a court or the Committee of the House on Immigration? What body vested itself with authority to determine that the Indian is an alien?

Mr. MACGREGOR. I see the gentleman's point.

Mr. CELLER. Can the gentleman answer the question?

Mr. CARSS. They were the original inhabitants of the United States.

Mr. MACGREGOR. We took the land away from the Indians and now we are not permitting them to even go to and fro on the land which they originally possessed.

Mr. CELLER. Does not the gentleman think this act is absolutely unnecessary?

Mr. MACGREGOR. I think so myself, but the Department of Labor will not admit them.

Mr. CELLER. Have not the courts decreed that the Indian is not an alien?

Mr. MACGREGOR. That question was passed upon in a case which arose in the district court in Philadelphia——

Mr. SABATH. This applies to the Canadian Indians.

Mr. COLTON. That is the point, exactly.

Mr. MACGREGOR. Let me finish answering the question of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CELLER. I would like to hear the gentleman's views on that.

Mr. MACGREGOR. The court decided in this case that the Indians are entitled to admission irrespective of the immigration act of 1924 or the Jay treaty or anything else, but the department does not recognize decisions of United States district courts.

Mr. BLACK of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MACGREGOR. Yes.

Mr. BLACK of New York. Does the Prohibition Department approve this act? [Laughter.]

Mr. CARSS. Do the Canadian immigration authorities permit Indians who are citizens of the United States to enter Canada?

Mr. MACGREGOR. Oh, yes; they have no difficulties about that.

If there are no further questions, Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. MACGREGOR, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

A similar House bill was laid on the table.

REFUND OF VISA FEES

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, under the rule I desire to call up the bill (H. R. 12407) to authorize the refund of visa fees in certain cases.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington calls up the bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That any person who made application to a consular officer for the visa of his passport or other travel document, or to whom such a visa was issued, between July 1, 1923, and June 30, 1924, inclusive, shall, upon application made within two years after the enactment of this act, be entitled to a refund of the fees collected for such service if such person shows to the satisfaction of the officer to whom application for refund is made that he (1) never proceeded to the United States, or (2) proceeded to the United States under such visa and was excluded because of the exhaustion of the quota of his country or, if he arrived in the United States after June 30, 1924, because of his failure to have an immigration visa, required by the immigration act of 1924, or (3) proceeded to the United States under an immigration visa (whether or not he was admitted to the United States), having paid the required fee of $10 for such immigration visa and the application therefor. In the event that any person entitled to the refund authorized in this act has died since the issuance of the visa of his passport or other travel document, or the execution of an application therefor, such refund may be made, upon application made within two years after the enactment of this act, to a duly authorized legal representative of the estate of such deceased person, or, if there is no duly authorized legal representative, then to the persons found by the Secretary of State to be entitled thereto.

SEC. 2. An applicant for a refund authorized under the provisions of section 1 shall, (1) if he resides abroad, made application for such refund to the consular office in the district in which he resides, or (2) if he has been legally admitted to and resides in the United States, makes application for such refund to the Secretary of State. Any such person who resides abroad but does not reside within any consular district may make application for a refund to the consular office nearest to his place of residence. The Secretary of State shall cause the amount of the fee collected to be refunded, (1) upon proof satisfactory to him of the identity of the person making application, and (2) upon receipt by him of a statement in writing from any consular office stating that the records of that office show that the person in whose behalf claim for refund is made applied for or was issued a visa at such consular office.

SEC. 3. The Secretary of State is authorized to make regulations for carrying out the provisions of this act.

SEC. 4. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated the sum of $160,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to carry out the provisions of this act. No amount shall be paid as a refund under the provisions of this act unless an appropriation under the authorization contained in this section is available therefor.

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, this bill is made necessary by the fact that at the time of the passage of the 1924 act, and prior thereto, there was no limit on the number of visas that could be issued to prospective immigrants by consular officers.

The temporary quota law permitted all who had such visas on their passports to enter this country if they could arrive by a certain time. There was a time limit which ran against them. The visas were secured for months in advance, and since the 1924 act the number of people having visas, represented by this sum of money, say, about 15,000, have not been able to get to the United States, and many of them are asking for a refund. These requests are being made by the ambassadors from the various countries. The bill has merit and is one that should pass. Close family relatives who had paid these visa fees have been given preference, and all, exceeding 2,200 or so, have reached the United States.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, if you had given any particularly study to this bill, you would find there is more behind it than what my good friend the chairman of the committee has just said.

You must bear in mind that in 1923 the American Government visaed through its consuls certain passports of prospective immigrants who had been examined and found fit to enter the United States of America. They paid their fee to the Government, and the Government of the United States accepted the money, with the assumption that they would be permitted to enter the United States of America. Now, about four years afterwards, instead of allowing these people to enter the United States under a proper visa made by the American consul, we are waking up at this late time by saying that the visas we gave you in 1923 are no good, that the American Government will return you the $10 you paid in 1923, or at any other time, but you can not enter this country.

Mr. BOX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Yes.

Mr. BOX. Is it not a fact that they were not immigration visas—that the fact that they did not use them grew out of the fact that we adopted a law that gave the country a smaller quota?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. That is more reason why the American Government should recognize the visas that were made and given by the American consuls to the prospective immigrants. The trouble was that at the time these visas were issued to the prospective immigrants they believed there were plenty of quota numbers left for them in the quota, and there were sufficient numbers left in the quota until we passed the 1924 act, which completely cut off all prospective immigrants who sold every piece of property they had, believing that the American Government would honor their own visas. As a matter of fact, some of them who had real and personal property who were hundreds of miles away from the American consulate had traveled days and weeks to reach the consulate. They had no further common interest in their country of birth and left their homes in order to come to the future land of opportunity, which they expected to make their permanent home.

Mr. CELLER. And the immigrant had complied with all the conditions of the law then existing.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Absolutely; relying on the good faith of the American Government, relying on their visas, they have sold their property, as I stated, and they were not, like my colleague, Mr. GREEN, from Florida, has stated, the scum of the earth; and I do not believe the gentleman knows what he is talking about, for I do not believe he ever read the immigration law nor how it is applied. The fact is, the immigrant, before he can come into the United States, is examined by both the consul and the physician and the advisory board as to whether he is mentally and physically able to enter the United States. And unless he or she complies with all the requirements of the act of 1917 as to his or her fitness he or she can not enter.

Mr. O'CONNELL. How many immigrants will this bill affect?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Several thousand.

Mr. O'CONNELL. How do they reach the number?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. They give the visas to those persons who were holding such old visas issued prior to 1924. In other words, I do not exactly oppose this bill if Congress desires to return visa fees to those who do not want to make use of their visas. It seems to me unfair and unjust to make the immigrants believe that they hold an American visa which will allow them to enter the United States and then pass a quota law cutting them out, and after four years wake up and say we will return your money when these men have sold their property, broken up their little homes in the country where they came from. I do not think that is fair. I say that we ought to pass legislation recognizing and honoring our own visas. I think that should be done in spite of the fact that it is not with the approval of my colleague from Florida.

Mr. GREEN of Florida. Then the gentleman is in favor of open immigration?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. No; I am not in favor of open immigration. For the benefit of the gentleman from Florida and others who believe as he does let me call attention to a little history of our immigration problems.

In addition to the problem itself, there is always the question of an adjustment to be made by those who by the ties of blood and kinship are related to the immigrant, and the solution of the immigration problem requires principally a full determination as to what effect, if any, our policy can have on those who have a right to humane consideration of their own peculiar position in any matter affecting the welfare of their families.

I fully agree with my colleague [Mr. GREEN] that immigration in this country should be limited in some way. The trouble, however, with the existing law is that it seeks to limit immigration into the United States. not by quality but by number, and particularly it ignores the fact that no particular race or group is in any way superior to any of the classes or groups.

The obvious purpose of this discrimination is the adoption of an unfounded anthropological theory that the nations which are favored are the progeny of fictitious and hitherto unsuspected Nordic ancestors, while those discriminated against are not classified as belonging to that mythical ancestral stock. No scientific evidence worthy of consideration was introduced to substantiate this pseudo-scientific proposition. It is pure fiction and the creation of a journalistic imagination. All we know is that these immigrants are all human beings, and none of them is regarded by the majority of the committee as undesirable so long as they meet the test of the act of 1917.

Those who in the past have been admitted into this country, whether born in one part of Europe or another, have been industrious and useful accessions to our population. Many of them have become citizens and have performed their civic duties, and during the war entered our Army and Navy in large numbers, and were loyal to our Government. Their children, whether they were born in this country or arrived here at an early age, have been trained in our public schools and can rarely be distinguished from native Americans of elder generations.

Those who have come from the lands upon which a bar sinister is to be imposed have made valuable contributions to science, art, and literature, to a hundred different industries, to every imaginable form of commerce, and have performed much of the heavy work in our mines, furnaces, manufactories, farms, and forests, upon our railroads, and other public works. Without them our material progress would not have been as rapid as it has proved to be, and they are needed to-day as they have been in the past.

It is closing our eyes to known facts to suggest that this country, large sections of which are sparsely populated and whose development has not even begun, can not absorb additional immigrants and that hereafter only men of certain types or of certain creeds or nationalities may be added to our great army of workers.

In their eagerness to indulge in this discrimination the restrictionists, who have made propaganda for it and who do not understand the real sentiment of this country, forget that hundreds of thousands of immigrants have come to this country for the purpose of making it their home, of rendering loyal service whenever called upon to do so, and of exerting themselves in every direction to advance its interest; and, notwithstanding statements to the contrary, these immigrants have become citizens of the United States, and that they, as well as their children, are proud and grateful for that privilege.

What, we beg to ask, can be their sensations when they are told that it is proposed by an act of Congress to declare them, because of their birth and ancestry, to belong to an inferior class, and that those of their blood are henceforth to be discriminated against in our immigration laws? Is it to be expected that they will conceive that those who by this legislation would be pointed out as a favored class are superior morally, physically, or mentally? Such an assumption would be contrary to human nature.

It is inevitable that a feeling of resentment would be engendered by such action. It would be the first instance in our modern legislation for writing into our laws the hateful doctrine of inequality between the various component parts of our population. The consequences of such differentiation would be deplorable, and in the end would be heard above the strident outcries of those who are seeking to stimulate and foster racial, religious, and national hatreds, which carry with them a curse wherever they prevail.

It is particularly deplorable that the immigration law to-day does not permit a prospective citizen to settle in this country with his family and become fully Americanized. No reason exists, for instance, why, if a man be admitted to the United States, passing all requirements and qualifying himself under the existing immigration law, his wife and children should not likewise be admitted to the United States as a matter of course. No reason exists why Congress should not provide by appropriate legislation that, instead of admitting individual immigrants, immigrants and their families should be admitted simultaneously into this country.

After all, it would be in line with our national traditions to foster the union of families rather than compel their separation, as is so cruelly done under the present immigration law.

Whether Congress ultimately adopts the "national-origin provision," which Congressman GREEN seems to think so much of, is immaterial for the purpose of my idea as to what the law should accomplish. I believe that we must see to it that in any legislation passed provision be made for the union of families rather than for their separation.

As to this particular bill I should think it would be more humane to recognize visas issued by the American consuls abroad to prospective citizens and permit them to enter the United States in exemption of the quota instead of asking Congress to return to these immigrants after four years of waiting for their admission to the United States the visa fee. The committee should have proposed a request from Congress to permit the admission of all persons who hold old visas believing in the good faith of the country that they would be sooner or later recognized.

We must bear in mind that at the time these visas were issued by the American Government prior to 1924 these immigrants had a right to believe that the Government of the United States would honor their own visas. Instead therefore Congress passed a 1924 immigration act which practically put them out and they have been waiting ever since for legislation to take care of this situation. But instead of enacting such legislation as would be in accord with American teachings of humanity you are forcing these people to receive their money and leaving them upon the open sea. I submit that this legislation is not for the best interests of this country.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That any person who made application to a consular officer for the visa of his passport or other travel document, or to whom such a visa was issued, between July 1, 1923, and June 30, 1924, inclusive, shall, upon application made within two years after the enactment of this act, be entitled to a refund of the fees collected for such service if such person shows to the satisfaction of the officer to whom application for refund is made that he (1) never proceeded to the United States, or (2) proceeded to the United States under such visa and was excluded because of the exhaustion of the quota of his country or, if he arrived in the United States after June 30, 1924, because of his failure to have an immigration visa, required by the immigration act of 1924, or (3) proceeded to the United States under an immigration visa (whether or not he was admitted to the United States), having paid the required fee of $10 for such immigration visa and the application therefor. In the event that any person entitled to the refund authorized in this act has died since the issuance of the visa of his passport or other travel document, or the execution of an application therefor, such refund may be made, upon application made within two years after the enactment of this act, to a duly authorized legal representative of the estate of such deceased person, or, if there is no duly authorized legal representative, then to the persons found by the Secretary of State to be entitled thereto.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 6, afer the word "inclusive," insert the following: "Shall be permitted to enter the United States outside of the quota."

Mr. BOX. Mr. Speaker, I make a point of order that the amendment is not germane.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman on the point of order.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, this bill has to do with certain visa fees before we had the immigration law. This is to refund the money. It has nothing to do with the admission of immigrants, quota, nonquota, or otherwise. The amendment is an amendment of the immigration law of 1924.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I wish to be heard on the point of order if the Chair desires to hear me.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, this bill has to do with the refunding of certain sums of money received for immigration certificates or for visas, which the Government received for the visas which permitted these people to come into the United States. Were it not for the act of 1924, they would be entitled to enter the United States under the law. Consequently I think it is germane to the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. To make it clear, there was no immigration visa prior to 1924, as such. There was a visa on the passport.

Mr. SABATH. We called them passports.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. And a different system has been adopted since that time.

Mr. SABATH. But no one could enter without having a passport, and they could enter after receiving the passport.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Mr. Speaker, as I understand the amendment, and I examined it before it was offered, I think it is germane. This bill relates to the relief of certain people in connection with the immigration law. The bill itself would offer them one kind of relief, namely, the return of money. The amendment offers them another kind of relief, which they understood they were getting when they paid their money. This does not change the nature of the legislation. Any kind of legislation here can be amended as to the relief of the people to whom the legislation pertains, but instead of giving them their money back which they paid to come into the United States, the amendment merely provides that the United States shall carry out the bargain or understanding or assumption and will keep the money and let them come in outside of the quota. I submit to the Chair that the amendment is germane.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is prepared to rule. The Chair can find nothing in this bill that has anything to do with the admission of immigrants, the quota notwithstanding. He thinks it clearly has nothing to do with any of the provisions of the bill as it exists and is not germane, and, therefore, sustains the point of order. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. An applicant for a refund authorized under the provisions of section 1 shall, (1) if he resides abroad, made application for such refund to the consular office in the district in which he resides, or (2) if he has been legally admitted to and resides in the United States, makes application for such refund to the Secretary of State. Any such person who resides abroad, but does not reside within any consular district, may make application for a refund to the consular office nearest to his place of residence. The Secretary of State shall cause the amount of the fee collected to be refunded, (1) upon proof satisfactory to him of the identity of the person making application, and (2) upon receipt by him of a statement in writing from any consular office stating that the records of that office show that the person in whose behalf claim for refund is made applied for or was issued a visa at such consular office.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the word "made," in line 19, page 2, will be changed to the word "make."

There was no objection.

Mr. SIROVICH. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last two words.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SIROVICH. While I do not desire in any way to cast any aspersions upon any Member of this distinguished body, I feel that the time has come when I must take exceptions to the remarks of my distinguished friend from Florida [Mr. GREEN], who has spoken in a derogatory fashion against the foreigners of our country.

The citizenship of the United States is composed of two groups. First, there is the man who gives up everything which he holds near and dear in life and selects this country as the land of his adoption. We refer to him as an American of foreign extraction. Second, we have the native American, through accident of birth. These two constitute the modern American to whom the Constitution guarantees the inalienable right to the pursuit of life, liberty, and happiness. In return for this great privilege of citizenship the native American and the adopted American have contributed their all upon the altar of our Republic through agriculture, science, art, literature, philosophy, industry, and through every form of human endeavor, to make this the greatest nation upon the face of the globe, the haven for peace, prosperity, and happiness for all who live under our flag. Thus, we recognize them not as native Americans or foreign Americans but as Americans true to the ideals of the founders of our Republic and to our glorious institutions. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I have the honor to represent the fourteenth congressional district of New York City, one of the most congested communities in the United States, a district composed of almost every race, creed, and color of our country—native Americans and adopted Americans—and I challenge the statement of the gentleman from Florida [Mr. GREEN] that these foreign Americans of my district or any other district are less loyal and patriotic to our country than any of his native Americans from the State of Florida. [Applause.]

The foreigners of our Nation are not a gang or horde of outcast immigrants that the slums of Europe vomit forth to live and swarm together like some foul insect larvæ, but they are uniformly honest, conscientious, intelligent, and trustworthy Americans who are contributing through their toil, labor, and service to the prosperity of our Nation and to the material welfare and happiness of our country. Yea, even upon the battle field they have bared their breast to the shot and shell of enemy nations who have attempted to destroy the existence of our country. [Applause.]

In the East Side of New York, the district from which I come, there was gathered together in the last war a regiment known as the Lost Battalion. It was composed of cigar makers, tailors, furriers, carpenters, conductors, and many other vocations. Many of these men were not even citizens of this their adopted country, yet when the bugle summoned them to their country's call they gave their last full measure of devotion to the land that they had selected as their home. Their life blood saturated many a battle field upon the plains of France. Their maimed and crippled bodies have hallowed many a battle field, and the humble shaft or tombstone which commemorates their memory has written upon it the inscription: "They gave their life to fight for their adopted country. What will you native Americans do to preserve it?" [Applause.]

Let me tell the gentleman from Florida that the reason his State is in such desperate straits to-day is because they have not enough immigrants to plow their fields, to cultivate their soil, to fill the empty dwellings that are looking for tenants and to take advantage of that wonderful climatic condition with which nature has blessed Florida.

Mr. GREEN of Florida. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIROVICH. I can not yield. The gentleman refused to yield to others when he had the floor.

Mr. GREEN of Florida. But I did not jump on the State of New York. I would like to say that the State of Florida has an annual acreage yield as great as any State in the Union.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida will be in order.

Mr. SIROVICH. Mr. Speaker, I have been in Florida on many occasions and some of my dearest friends have lost a great deal of money in that beautiful State.

I can testify to what Florida yields. It yields sunshine and flowers. It is the place where winter spends its summer. It is the country of promise and the land of rainbows, and, above all, where wild acreage meets and greets you wherever you go. What a splendid contribution the distinguished gentleman from Florida could contribute to his State if he opened the gates of opportunity to allow selected immigrants from Europe to come into his native State and there help to develop that wonderful land which is to-day going to waste because there is no one to till the soil, no one to fill the empty houses that are crying for tenants, and no one to collect the crops that are being burned by the ravages of the sun and the tempests of the elements. Mr. Speaker, I want the gentleman from Florida to realize that he has insulted 40,000,000 people in the United States who are the sons and descendants of immigrants who fought upon every battle field in defense of their country in times of war and who contributed to its glory in times of peace. [Applause.]

Mr. GREEN of Florida. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIROVICH. I yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. GREEN of Florida. Does the gentleman mean to say that the 40,000,000 he speaks about are superior to the approximately 75,000,000 who are pioneers of America and who fought on battle fields of America since 1776? Who is superior—the Americans of the old America or the Americans who are drifting in here because it is the last frontier?

Mr. SIROVICH. History will teach the gentleman from Florida that this country was settled, not by one race, by one creed, or by one color. The French settled Canada, New England was settled by the English. The Dutch settled New York. Pennsylvania and Delaware were largely colonized by the Germans. New Jersey by the Norwegians and Swedes. Florida, your native State, by the Spanish. The Mississippi Valley by the French and Spanish. Thus, you see that many races and many peoples helped to settle our country, and the civilization of our Government is the cumulative and collective product of the lifeblood of all these various races that have labored and toiled in the quarries of our country to make it that which it is to-day. All these races have passed through the crucible of America, and under the fiery influence of its opportunities have come forth as the greatest of all races, the American race, true Americans. That is the kind we are, and that is the kind we want here as future citizens of our Nation. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. SIROVICH. I ask unanimous consent of the House to have five additional minutes to continue.

The SPEAKER. Is there any objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. SIROVICH. Our country has recently taken a new point of view regarding immigration. We believe that America should not be regulated by conditions in Europe but by the necessities of the people of our land. Congress contends that we are not responsible for the terrible state of affairs in Europe and are not therefore obligated to bear their burdens. So we have determined to take in only such immigrants as we desire or the conditions of our country require. This process of choosing our future citizens is called selective immigration.

From the tenor of the membership of this House, I believe that for the present, selective immigration is here to stay. No one is here to object to the selective feature of immigration. But the bill has one great drawback, one great weakness. While the immigrant husband is in America, his wife and children must remain in Europe until he becomes an American citizen, which is almost five to seven years. In this respect the law is cruel. It is inhuman. It is brutal. It breaks up the ties of family life. It disintegrates the home. It puts a premium upon desertion, illicit unions, bigamy, divorce without the wives' consent or knowledge. It neglects the education of the children. The health of the family suffers from worry and anxiety. The United States suffers economically. The alien sends remittances abroad which might be spent at home. The assimilation of the alien is delayed. His family life, from the standpoint of stability and normality, is postponed. Rapid Americanization is deferred. It creates alien problems which overwhelm him. While the law creates these problems, the alien is charged and blamed for their results.

Therefore I would say to the distinguished gentleman from Florida that we should humanize the immigration law; that we should make every attempt to unite the families and thus bring about a normal, happy, healthy union between husband, wife, and children under 21 years. You have cast aspersions against the immigrants of our country. Let me tell you that you should not forget that during the last 75 years these immigrants whom you have belittled through their sweat and blood have helped to build the great American railroads, to develop the great American industries of steel and iron, to create the manufacturing plants of our country; have gone down into the bowels of the earth to bring forth the buried treasures of nature's past, have dug the subways, and have made possible the perfection of skyscrapers and dwellings which have made our Nation and people the richest and most respected in all the world. [Applause.]

The sentiment of Congress would be to unite the immigrant with his family, not only on humanitarian grounds but for social, economic, educational, and patriotic reasons. The home is the foundation of society, upon which the superstructure of our Government is reared. In this home the father is king, the mother is queen, and the children the subjects. Destroy this home and you destroy government and all that it stands for. What justice is there in a law that prevents a father from helping his own children? What man can regard a law as just which denies him the right of having his wife and children with him? Morally, no law and no individual is justified in separating a man from his wife and children. It is a reflection upon America's honor and it should be wiped off our statute books to clear America's name among the different civilized peoples of the world. [Applause.] Every day in my office I see poor, helpless, weeping immigrants who cry pitifully and say to me: "Doctor SIROVICH, I would like to bring over my wife and children, from whom I have been separated by this cruel, inhuman immigration law for the last three to five years. Can you not, please, help me?" I say to you, honored sir, "Whomever God has united together, let no Congressman tear asunder." [Applause.]

Mr. GREEN of Florida. They have separated themselves.

Mr. SIROVICH. This terrible immigration law, for which you voted, has separated them. Through this bill you have severed and cut in twain the heartstrings that bind a father to his loved wife and family. This law as it operates to-day is infamous. It is barbarous, and unworthy even of medieval days.

Have you ever felt the labor pains that a mother endures in bringing a child into the world? If you had, you would not be in favor of disintegrating the home. Do you realize the love of a father for his brood? Of his headaches and heartaches in thinking daily of how and what they are doing over there?

Mr. GREEN of Florida. Do you contend that the responsibility is upon Congress and upon America when a man from a foreign land voluntarily and purposely deserts and leaves his wife and children in a foreign land, and when he comes here tries to shift the burden of responsibility and proof upon America instead of bearing it himself?

Mr. SIROVICH. No man who comes to this country, suffers, toils, and struggles to earn an honest living, and immediately thereafter sends his earnings over to Europe to bring over his wife and children should ever be called a deserter. But I will tell you why these honest immigrants come to our glorious land. What is the difference between America and Europe? The mountains and valleys and rivers of America are the same as those of Europe. The composition of water, which is oxygen and hydrogen, here is the same over there. The chemical formula of air is oxygen and nitrogen over here, the same as it is over there. The flowers, the trees, the plants, the shrubs are the same over here as they are over there. Then what is the difference between America and Europe? The great and fundamental distinction is that our country is the land of liberty, of freedom, of opportunity and justice, which is so sadly missing over there. And that is why these honest immigrants try to come to our land, so that they might give to their children the blessings and opportunities of freedom and justice which have been denied to them over there. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. SIROVICH. May I have one minute more?

The SPEAKER. Is there any objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. SIROVICH. If my distinguished friend from Florida [Mr. GREEN] objects to foreigners then he and his family and others who think like him should have objected to foreigners like Christopher Columbus and John and Sebastian Cabot to have discovered a country like ours where he and his family could live in peace and in happiness.

Everyone in this country is a foreigner or the descendant of foreigners. The only true and original Americans in our country are the Indians, whom we have made prisoners in the land of their fathers. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has again expired.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And Columbus and Cabot were both Italians. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in five minutes.

Mr. SABATH. Can the gentleman make it 15 minutes?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I amend the request and ask that the debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 15 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 15 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BOX. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, we rarely help to settle important questions wisely by getting our feelings aroused and we rarely ever discover the truth to ourselves or others by extravagant statements. After all, the big question involved in America's immigration policy is one of the preservation of the institutions which have made the country so attractive to all the world that millions of mankind everywhere want to come here. These institutions have grown out of certain racial traits, traditions, and habits, and certain attitudes as to government which find expression in the institutions themselves.

We do not want the world to feel that any hatred toward any group or any race is prompting our immigration policy. We are trying to preserve America for all its people. If our foreign-born friends and their relatives have traveled far from Europe and from other countries to find another Europe created here, they will suffer a great disappointment. The feeling which ought to dominate American life and this Congress in shaping and working out this policy is a desire to preserve these institutions and this life, not for those of us whose ancestors have been here for 100 years but for all the people who now make up the United States. We are striving to perpetuate these institutions for every class of our people, for the newcomers as well as for the rest of us.

It has been determined that the number coming has been and probably yet is too great, and that restriction is necessary, not because any hatred or feeling of superiority but for the benevolent purpose which I stated, and that purpose, if accomplished, will inure to the incomparable benefit of giving the best that is in American life and institutions to all our people, of all stocks, new and old. [Applause.]

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, it is to be regretted that whenever any measure comes from the Immigration Committee some members who really do not understand the situation or the conditions, and who are not familiar with the proposed legislation or the pending legislation, should arise and try to prejudice the minds of the membership of the House. There is no legislation now pending to open the doors wide, as the gentleman from Florida [Mr. GREEN] had tried to make the membership here believe. The only efforts that are being made are those to bring about the reuniting of families.

I want to say to the gentleman [Mr. GREEN] that there is an organization in the United States that has the interests of labor in America closer to its heart than even the gentleman from Florida [Mr. GREEN]. It is the American Federation of Labor. They have gone on record indorsing the proposition of bringing about uniting the congressionally separated families. I believe this should be done. I believe it is manifestly unfair for the gentleman [Mr. GREEN] to try to make people believe that this would in any way deprive the laboring man of America of any of his opportunities, because the fact is the people we are trying to assist would in no way take the places of American wage earners. They are the wives and children of American citizens and declarants, also parents of our citizens. I would be the last man that would be guilty of any act that would in any way affect the earning power or the living conditions of the wage earners of America.

Mr. O'CONNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. Yes.

Mr. O'CONNELL. Was it not falsely reported that the American Federation of Labor was against that measure?

Mr. SABATH. They have appeared before the committee through their representative and have indorsed this proposition, and, gentlemen, not only the American Federation of Labor, but every woman's civic organization throughout the United States through their representatives had appeared before the Committee on Immigration, within the last few days, and after carefully considering and a long study of conditions, they have indorsed the proposition of bringing about the uniting of the families, by permitting the wives and children of declarants to come to the United States, so as to enable the willing husband and father to take care of his wife and children, as it is his duty to do.

Mr. GREEN of Florida. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GREEN of Florida. Does not the gentleman [Mr. SABATH] know that neither the American Federation of Labor nor any labor organization indorses any legislation which will bring more laborers into this country to compete with them on a cheap scale?

Mr. SABATH. I am aware of that fact, but nevertheless they are favoring this humane proposition of reuniting of families. But there is nothing before the House that would increase the number of laboring men coming to the United States; but, on the other hand, there are bills, including the bill of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Box], and my own bill, that tend to restrict immigration from Mexico, Canada, and from Central and South American Republics and West Indies. I want the gentleman to know I am in favor of that legislation, but up to this time we have not received any aid that I know of from him so as to secure favorable action from the committee.

I feel that in the interest of humanity we should enact legislation which would bring about the relief that the good women all over the United States are appealing for.

In addition to this we have several thousand ex-service men who offered their lives during the last World War, who are pleading that they be permitted to bring their aged fathers and mothers into this country. This surely would in no way affect the labor conditions in this country, because these people are too aged to take anyone's job or bread and butter. In view of the fact they are in a position to provide for them and as good sons are desirous of taking care of their parents, I feel that we should extend to them this right and privilege and also permit the wives and minor children to come outside of the quota of those who have resided in this country for over three years and have in every way demonstrated their ability to provide for them and also proved conclusively that they are honest, law-abiding men.

In this connection I wish to embody a few communications that I have received on this subject. First, that from the Woman's City Club of Chicago; second, the Immigrants' Protective League, Chicago, Ill.; third, the Illinois Joint Committee of Chicago, Ill.; and further wish to say that similar actions have been taken by other women national organizations in the United States.

In conclusion I wish to embody the resolution adopted by the Synod of Montana of the Presbyterian Church of the United States of America and the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, showing that this great organization is asking Congress to act on this humane question.

The resolution unanimously adopted by this Synod of Montana of the Presbyterian Church of the United States of America reads as follows:

We, the Synod of Montana of the Presbyterian Church of the United States of America, having learned that immigrant families are divided because of the immigration law of 1924; and

Whereas the Synod of Pennsylvania of this church and the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America have petitioned the Congress of the United States of America that the immigration law be so amended as to allow those families to be united in this country;

We, the Synod of Montana of the Presbyterian Church of the United States of America, do go on record supporting the recommendations of the aforementioned bodies concerning the law which will make possible the uniting of these families; be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to the Committee on Immigration of both Houses of Congress and to the Senators and Representatives from this State of Montana.

Rev. CLARENCE W. ORNER,
Rev. F. B. GIGLIOTTE,
Committee.

The other communications referred to are as follows:

WOMAN'S CITY CLUB OF CHICAGO,
March 16, 1928.

Hon. ADOLPH J. SABATH,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SABATH: We, the board of managers of the Woman's City Club, are certain that you will agree with us that the family is the basis of all national life. For this reason we are asking you to do what you can to make it possible for families separated by the restrictive immigration law of 1924 to be reunited.

We are of the opinion that it is unjust to interfere with the rights of those who have waited long for their turn to enter our country and, therefore, we ask that, if possible, the members of families thus separated be admitted outside of the quota.

We earnestly hope that you will work toward the establishment of law that will make this possible.

Very truly yours, MAMIE D. NEUFIELD,
Chairman Education of the Adult Foreigner Committee, Woman's City Club.

IMMIGRANTS' PROTECTIVE LEAGUE,
March 15, 1928.

Hon. ADOLPH J. SABATH,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

A PLEA TO UNITE SEPARATED FAMILIES

MY DEAR MR. SABATH: For 20 years the Immigrants' Protective League of Chicago has been in contact with foreign-born who have come to make the State of Illinois their home. This organization assists them in adjustments to new surroundings and interprets for them the laws and customs of America. Many of these residents of Chicago are now confronted with a new problem which they are powerless to meet—separation from their families, who had expected to follow them. The road to citizenship and nonquota immigration visas is necessarily very long.

There are wives waiting to join their husbands who are becoming citizens of the United States in the minimum time the law permits; other wives whose husbands have encountered delays in securing their papers, whose separation is indefinitely prolonged; young children who can not come to their fathers for the same reasons; older children who have slipped past the nonquota age or preference age while their fathers were qualifying for citizenship, and under the present law can never come to them; wives whose husbands have no nonquota privilege, even though those wives may be full citizens of the United States; old parents whose sons and daughters in this country are well able to support them, who long to see them once more.

We believe that the best interests of this country would be served if these reunions are made possible. Only the action of Congress can bring this about. We earnestly request that you report favorably from your Committee on Immigration and Naturalization a measure which will extend nonquota immigration status to the following relatives of aliens and citizens legally admitted to the United States prior to July 1, 1924:

1. Minor children under 21 years of age.
2. Wives.
3. Husbands.
4. Parents.

We are attaching brief stories of actual cases which have come to our attention in Chicago, illustrating human hardships which we believe you will wish to relieve. We should greatly appreciate hearing from you.

Sincerely yours, S. P. BRECKINRIDGE,
Secretary of the Board of Directors.

THE ILLINOIS JOINT COMMITTEE TO SECURE LEGISLATION TO UNITE FAMILIES SEPARATED BY THE RESTRICTIVE IMMIGRATION ACT, Chicago, Ill., March 14, 1928.

DEAR MEMBER OF CONGRESS: We are aware that there are pending before the Congress—or before its Committees on Immigration—a number of measures designed to relieve the hardships of families separated by the present provisions of the restrictive immigration act. May we write you in their interest and in the interest of this industrial State of Illinois, in which members of those families are resident. We are in actual touch with them and know by experience their unfortunate plight.

We believe the situation which now exists can easily be remedied by Congress, and that once met it will perhaps never recur. The men and women who came to this country before the passage of the 1924 immigration act had no warning that a new policy would go into effect and that their families could not follow them to America. Long separations are now causing tragic strain and broken homes, with results that are far from desirable for this country.

As an act of primary justice we respectfully request that this Congress extend nonquota immigration status—a principle established by the quota act itself—to the following relatives of aliens and citizens legally admitted to the United States prior to July 1, 1924:

1. Minor children under 21 years of age.
2. Wives.
3. Husbands.
4. Parents.

We shall be glad to hear from you.

Yours very sincerely,

MARY E. MCDOWELL, Chairman.
ADENA MILLER RICH, Secretary.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, I hope you will bear with me just a few minutes. There has been much said about immigration restrictions; and in order to understand it, let us know something about the question. As a matter of fact, we had no restriction of immigration, under a quota law, until 1921. This law was a temporary measure passed because of war conditions. After 1921 we extended these temporary immigration restrictions until 1924, but still this was not a permanent policy with respect to our immigration laws.

In 1924, without notice to the world, we passed a permanent immigration law and we fixed an immigration quota of 2 per cent of the census of 1890. At that time, my colleagues, I told you on this floor that you had discriminated against 47 countries in favor of Germany and Great Britain.

In 1924 a certain number of husbands came to the United States with the hope at some future day of bringing in their wives and children. By the operation of the act of 1924 we prevented them from doing this if their wives and children resided in certain countries whose quotas were very small.

What we are asking the House to do and what we are talking about now is to allow and permit the wives and minor children of these persons to enter this country. These persons came to our shores and were persons who were in every way fit, morally and physically, to take care of their wives and children, but because of this quota law they are unable to do so.

Mr. FLETCHER. How many people would this affect?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I could not say exactly, but I should say probably 80,000 or 88,000. I am only speaking of those who came here up until July 1, 1924, and who have wives and minor children; and when I state 80,000, or whatever the exact figure may be, this includes minor children of these husbands.

Of course, it is true that under the law after they become citizens you can not stop them from bringing in their wives and children, but in the meantime they are permitted to roam around this country without a mate. They are prevented from seeing their children, and they are prevented from giving their children an American education.

I am not opposed to humane restrictions of immigration, but I do say that it is unjust for this country not to permit the wives and children to come here where the families have been separated.

Mr. CELLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Yes.

Mr. CELLER. Upon whom did the responsibility rest for the separation of these families?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I think we are as much to blame by the sudden passage of the act of 1924 as the persons who are trying to come to the country.

Mr. CELLER. I mean who in this House?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I do not know; it is said that the Ku-Klux Klan took the credit for passing this legislation. We have some Members in the committee who take credit for these restrictions. Still we have never urged on the floor an open door. I am for restriction of immigration, but not for the restrictions of the act of 1924; I am for selective immigration; but I am also for humane legislation which will do something to help these women and children who are separated from their families.

Would it not be more humane if the Congress of the United States would permit the uniting of these families—namely, the wives and children of persons who entered this country prior to July 1, 1924, instead of keeping them separated? These men who came to our shores were allowed to come here under the law and are now engaged in useful occupations, and in some cities have formed part of our working machinery and have adapted themselves to the manner in which business is conducted in this country and our methods of business management. They came here with the sole purpose of never again returning to their native lands, but their wives and children were left behind, and because of the act of 1924 they are prevented from bringing them in so that they may have the same opportunities and educate their children in our public schools. Through the failure of the law to permit their wives and children to come in, these families have been separated for many years.

It encourages breaking up of family ties by permitting men to roam at large without their wives and children. I believe our American policy should at all times be directed toward an effort to keep families together, because keeping the families together is the first principle of good government. No American principle can be affected by allowing these wives and children to come here, and there is no sound reason as yet presented by the restrictionists to sustain their views that the family be separated, and there has not since the passage of the act and prior thereto been advocated any reasonable theory upon which they continue to object to the uniting of these families.

It is also my belief, and I say it with all sincerity, that the law itself should be amended in the following respects: First, it should raise the age limit of children of American citizens up to 21 years instead of the present law of 18 years, as 21 years is universally accepted as the age limit where a child becomes responsible and assumes the responsibilities of a human being. Since the act of 1924 has gone into effect we have witnessed hundreds and perhaps thousands of cases of great hardship where American citizens petition for their wives and children. Naturally, all those children under 18 years are granted visas and are permitted to come to the United States with their mother, but take the case of a girl who is slightly over 18 years of age; she can not come in with the rest of the family, but must wait for a preference quota, yet she is the child of an American citizen. She must be left behind in foreign lands where it is dangerous to permit any minor to remain without the wing of the parent. The family is separated, and yet there is no question that the American citizen is being discriminated against in having his family with him.

I also believe that the fathers and mothers of American citizens should be exempted from the quota and not merely placed in the preference class. Why should we say by law that the son or daughter should not be permitted to bring his or her mother and father in their last stages of life and give them more comfort and companionship? Why place them in a preference class only, which means nothing in a great many instances, because in some countries the preference takes many years, and, furthermore, because not more than one-half of the immigrants of any nationality may be placed in the preferred class in any fiscal year. In the same preference we have other classes which take up the quota. It seems to me that no good argument has yet been presented against exemption of fathers and mothers from the quota, and I do not know of any real reason why Congress should not take some action on this question.

Again, in an examination of the law, we find that although we give equal rights to women citizens of the United States, we discriminate against them to the extent that when they marry foreigners they can not bring their husbands into the country of their birth or adoption, because under the act of 1924 the husband must come merely within the preference class. In some countries, like Great Britain or Germany, it would take a short time, but in all the other countries it takes many years before an American woman can have the privilege of bringing in her husband under a preference quota. I do not know of any reason why an American citizen, either man or woman, should not have the same rights, and the law should be amended accordingly.

If we would only give this matter a little more study, without heat or animosity or discrimination along the policy of immigration, I am sure we could solve the problem as Americans.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and all amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON of Washington a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

HOWARD UNIVERSITY

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I present a privileged report from the Committee on Rules.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 149

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 279, to amend section 8 of an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Howard University in the District of Columbia," approved March 2, 1867. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed one hour, to be equally divided and controlled by those favoring and opposing the bill, the bill shall be read for amendment under the five-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment the committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and the amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, for over 60 years the Federal Government has been making appropriation for the support of Howard University here in Washington. Under the present rules of the House, when an appropriation is brought in for that university some one makes the point of order against it. Of course, it is subject to a point of order, because these appropriations have never been authorized by proper law passed by the Senate and the House of Representatives.

The purpose of the present bill is to make in order appropriations for Howard University. This same bill passed the House at the last session but did not come up for a vote in the Senate. It is our purpose to pass again the same bill, and I hope it will be done at this time and finally become law. Everyone knows we are going to continue to make these appropriations; therefore let us put ourselves in position then with due authority of law.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Mr. Speaker, this bill pertaining to Howard University bears some similarity to the first bill before the House to-day, the national-origins bill. It is the conviction of some of us that we ought to meet this issue in the same way as we shall have to meet the question of national origins as a basis for immigration quotas. It is weak and timid not to meet the question. It is idle to make necessary every year a special rule from the Rules Committee to make in order an appropriation for Howard University. When the matter was up last year I had a few words to say. For about 60 years, as the chairman of the Rules Committee said, this appropriation has been stricken out on a point of order.

Now, no one anywhere in this country is advocating the annihilation of our negro population. If you are not going to annihilate them, there can be no sane man who does not want them educated properly, who does not want them protected, at least, against communicable diseases, who does not want hospitals for them, surgeons and educators to advance them. If it were only from a practical, economic, and social standpoint, this survival of old prejudices should pass out in this day of modern ideas. I feel confident if we do not do it this year, if we do not end it this year, it will hardly be more than another year before the provision will be permitted to remain in the regular appropriation bill, and I hope the resolution will pass.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, if there is no further time desired, I will move the previous question.

Mr. TARVER. I hope the gentleman will not do that. There has been no one yet spoken in opposition to the bill.

Mr. SNELL. I will yield to the gentleman from Georgia five minutes.

Mr. TARVER. The gentleman from Georgia does not desire to be heard, but I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LOWREY] may have 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not recognize the gentleman for that purpose.

Mr. SNELL. I will yield to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LOWREY] five minutes.

Mr. LOWREY. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR] has just made the mistake that people are constantly making on this matter and has shown the reason why we have not been able to get what I think is sane consideration of it. He says that it is time to lay aside these old, bitter prejudices, and all that sort of stuff. The truth of the matter is that the question is this: As the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] on the other side of the aisle has just said, the Congress for years—he says 60 years, and I think about 50 years—has been making appropriations for the Howard University here in the District. There is no other race in our Nation to whom the Government furnishes a university education—not the whites nor the Indians. Not only that, but the Negro race, to whom this university is furnished at public expense, does not need it a particle more than the other races do. I throw down again the proposition and stand by it that the Negro race through the South where I live is more abundantly provided for as to college education and college opportunities according to their needs than the white race. I am not one bit afraid of that statement; I am prepared to prove it with the figures. Then, while we are here to-day to decide a policy, I am opposed to the rule, and especially to allowing only 30 minutes' debate on a side to settle a policy that means the establishment of an institution for one race out of public taxation where that race does not need it more than other races do, where that race is quite as well provided for without it as other races are. Why should we commit ourselves permanently to this policy? Why should we permanently fasten upon the Government an institution to which we have already given $5,000,000 and given every dollar of it illegally? Why should we now legalize it and fasten it upon the Government permanently, and go on with it forever, instead of at this time stopping the unjust policy, the unreasonable policy, which we have pursued?

Mr. SNELL. Does the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TARVER] want five minutes?

Mr. TARVER. Not at this time.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. TARVER) there were—ayes 150, noes 15.

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote and make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and eighty-eight Members present, not a quorum. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will bring in absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 246, nays 89, answered "present" 1, not voting 98, as follows:

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] is not here on account of illness. If he were here, he would vote "yea" on the resolution, as well as on the bill itself.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, did the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] vote?

The SPEAKER. He is not recorded.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I have a pair with him. I voted "yea." I withdraw my vote of "yea" and answer "present."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

A quorum being present, the doors were opened.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 279) to amend section 8 of an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Howard University in the District of Columbia, approved March 2, 1867."

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Speaker, before the motion is put, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the opponents of the bill be controlled by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LOWREY].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that the time in opposition to the bill be controlled by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LOWREY]. Is there objection?

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, it is not necessary to make that request.

Mr. TARVER. There is no provision in the rule as to who shall control the time in opposition.

Mr. SNELL. One-half is to be controlled by those in favor of the bill and one-half by those opposed to it.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may we also have an understanding as to who controls the time in favor of the bill on both sides, the majority side and the minority side. There are people in favor of the bill on each side, and I suggest that the time of the people in favor of the bill be divided between the majority and the minority.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, I insist on controlling the time under the rule.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the time in favor of the bill shall be controlled by himself and the time in opposition to the bill shall be controlled by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LOWREY]. Is there objection?

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 279.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 279, with Mr. LUCE in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 279, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 279) to amend section 8 of an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Howard University in the District of Columbia," approved March 2, 1867

Be it enacted, etc., That section 8 of an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Howard University in the District of Columbia, approved March 2, 1867, be amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 8. Annual appropriations are hereby authorized to aid in the construction, development, improvement, and maintenance of the university, no part of which shall be used for religious instruction. The university shall at all times be open to inspection by the Bureau of Education and shall be inspected by the said bureau at least once each year. An annual report making a full exhibit of the affairs of the university shall be presented to Congress each year in the report of the Bureau of Education."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. REED] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, I renew in Committee of the Whole the request I made a few moments ago in the House, that the ranking member of the committee reporting the bill and signing the minority report, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LOWREY], be allowed to control the time awarded to the opponents of the bill.

Mr. LOWREY. I think that is an excellent suggestion.

Mr. REED of New York. That has already been arranged.

Mr. TARVER. The rule itself makes no provision as to who will control the time in opposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The Members in opposition will get time from the Chair.

Mr. TARVER. I rise to ask recognition to speak against the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will wait until he is recognized. The gentleman from New York [Mr. REED] has the floor.

Mr. SNELL. I think the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LOWREY] should be recognized to control the time in opposition to the bill.

Mr. TARVER. I beg the gentleman's pardon; there is no provision in the rule as to who shall control the time.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Regular order!

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is demanded. The gentleman from New York is recognized.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I ask to be notified when I shall have consumed five minutes.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, I believe the chairman of the Committee on Rules in his opening statement has made very clear to the Members of the House the purpose of this bill. You are all familiar with the usual fiasco which we have gone through every time that the item for Howard University has appeared in the Department of the Interior appropriation bill. The appropriation was not authorized by existing law, so that each time the item was included in the bill some Member would rise and object, and the provision would go out on a point of order. The matter would then be take up in the Senate, the item would be agreed to there, and later agreed to in conference, and then enacted as a part of the appropriation bill.

What this measure seeks to do is to stop the violation of the rule with reference to legislative riders. There is no doubt but that the sentiment of the House is in favor of appropriations for Howard University. It has been the custom for the past 48 years to make appropriations for this university, with which you are all familiar. It is a worthy institution. Most of you have been out there and have seen this class A university. I think the colored people are entitled to a great deal of credit when you consider that away back in 1867, when this institution was incorporated, they started with only five students, whereas to-day they have a student body of over 2,000, 600 of whom are girls.

This university has made a marvelous record. Students from 38 different States of the Union and 13 different countries are represented in the student body. The university is national in scope and purpose. Congress has used wisdom in making the necessary appropriations so that the university could carry on.

We had a fine example of its usefulness during the recent flu epidemic. A very distinguished Member of this House, a member of the Rules Committee, pointed out that in his little town in the South, where every white doctor was incapacitated, it was necessary for the white people to call in a colored doctor; and that colored doctor visited the bedsides of the sick and saved many lives. He was a man of ability and a university trained man. A crisis is liable to arise at any time when we need trained leadership in the city of Washington and in other congested centers of population. There are 100,000 colored people in our National Capital. Their patronage is not sought by the white doctors. It is necessary for these colored people to have colored doctors, and the university is producing a high type of colored doctor, a high type of colored dentist, a high type of colored lawyer, nurse, and pharmacist, people educated in the liberal arts, all of whom are necessary to supply the need for professional and educational leadership throughout the country.

The question has been raised from time to time on the floor of this House that we have no constitutional right to appropriated money for Howard University. I am not going into the constitutional question in my argument to-day; I have not the time; but in the extension of my remarks I am going to do that, and I am going to ask unanimous consent to insert certain tables and records showing the number of students, the States from which they come, the courses which they are taking, and so forth. There are also other records that I want to show. I want to show how much money colored schools are receiving in certain Southern States, and I shall show clearly the reason for the opposition that is shown to these appropriations made by Congress for Howard University.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REED of New York. Yes.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Under the requirements, who can go to Howard University? Is it limited to the District of Columbia?

Mr. REED of New York. No. Students can come from all the States and all over the world. There are students there now from 38 States of the Union.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Is the tuition free?

Mr. REED of New York. No. They pay tuition.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has used five minutes.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time. [Applause.]

Mr. LOWREY. Mr. Chairman, I ask recognition in opposition to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi is recognized.

Mr. LOWREY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TARVER].

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen of the committee, I shall speak in opposition to the passage of this measure, realizing that its enactment into law can not probably be prevented, but believing that a fair statement of the reasons which impel me, and, I think, should impel other Members of this House, to vote against it, is in accordance with my duty as a Representative not alone of my own constituents but of the United States.

I am opposed to this bill because, in my judgment, it is an attempt to legalize the use of funds from the Federal Treasury to meet alleged educational problems which are more or less local to the District of Columbia and territory in its vicinity, if they exist at all; because it is an attempt to divert Federal moneys to an educational institution not under public control; because it is a flagrant discrimination in the use of Federal funds for educational purposes against the people of the white race; and because it is directly opposed, in my opinion, to a provision of the Constitution which I shall hereafter discuss.

With 7,000,000 adults in this country who can neither read nor write, and millions of children growing up into the same class, you are asked, without doing anything for them, to legalize appropriations of huge sums for the professional education of negroes; with 62 per cent of the school children of my State able to secure less than a common-school education—which, I may say, is not a condition peculiar to Georgia alone—I am asked to vote to take tax moneys that my people help to pay and divert them to a negro university not even under public direction, supervision, or control; with the need of the Nation urgent for that education of the people which Edward Everett, of Massachusetts, said is a better safeguard of liberty than a standing army, we neglect remedies which might assure that education to devote our energies to means of securing higher education, and especially professional education, of the Negro race.

In opposing the passage of this bill I desire at the outset to make it clear that my position is not the result of race prejudice, that motive which is so often unjustly charged against Members of Congress from the South whenever they undertake to discuss problems relating to the welfare of the negro. I say "unjustly charged" because not only have those who live in the South better opportunities to know and understand the colored race, to appreciate their needs, and to understand their limitations, but they have also abundantly demonstrated the fact that they are the negro's best friends.

It is proposed by this measure to legalize appropriations from the National Treasury for the higher education and professional education of negroes at Howard University. Various arguments are advanced as justifying this course. I think I may state them fairly and concisely in the following order:

First. It is said that for 49 years Congress has been making these appropriations in violation of law, and will continue to make them whether this bill is passed or not; and this bill is necessary in order that Congress shall not continue to violate the law.

It is, indeed, a sad situation, Mr. Chairman, if the only way to make Congress law-abiding is to pass a law legitimatizing its illegal acts. It is a proposal akin to that which would repeal or modify our prohibition laws in order to make the people who now violate them law-abiding citizens. Surely, if there has been law violation by Congress or anybody else, the best remedy is to desist from illegal acts; and no individual and no law-making body, by a long-continued course of improper conduct, acquires a prescriptive right to maintain and even to have the sanction of legality placed upon it.

Second. It is argued that in the allocation of funds received by southern universities from the Federal Government through the Department of the Interior, discrimination is practiced as between the races, and the Negro does not receive his fair share; and the inference is that a fair share of other Federal appropriations to higher education being denied him in the South, it is up to the Federal Government to supply the deficiency in his just dues by maintaining for him a university in the city of Washington.

As an evidence that this argument is relied upon by the proponents of the measure, it is only necessary to call attention to certain statements appearing in the hearings had on a similar bill in the last Congress, and which hearings were relied upon by the Committee on Education in reporting the present bill:

On page 19 of those hearings Doctor Durkee, at that time head of Howard University, said:

> Turning to the list of southern white schools drawing money from the Federal Government through the Department of the Interior, the same situation obtains, though enhanced by discrimination.

Then follows, under the head "South," a long list of colleges and universities with amounts in dollars set opposite the names, and totaling $3,759,742. Then follows this statement:

> It should be said that of the total amount of $3,759,742 paid to the white schools of the Southland about $150,000 only is allocated by those States to colored schools when at least $625,000 should be so allocated.

It is clear, therefore, that in this statement, as well as in other parts of the hearings, the charge is made as a basis for asking this legislation that discrimination is practiced in the South in the allocation of funds received through the Department of the Interior for higher educational purposes. I have incorporated in the RECORD of March 1, 1928, certain data and citations and statements from Chancellor C. M. Snelling, of the University of Georgia, and Hon. John J. Tigert, Commissioner of Education, completely refuting this charge. For present purposes, it should be sufficient to point out that the only funds of the character mentioned disbursed through the Department of the Interior are funds appropriated under the Morrill-Nelson law of 1890, as amended in 1907; that these funds amount to only $50,000 per State and Territory; that the Southern States, excluding Maryland, Kentucky, and Missouri, received only $550,000 instead of nearly four millions as charged, and that of this amount $204,990.18 was received by colored institutions for the fiscal year 1925, or approximately 37 per cent of the total. I exclude Maryland, Kentucky, and Missouri because the great bulk of the negro population lives in the other 11 States of the South. If they were included, the proportion would be $225,365.18 out of a total of $700,000. It is thus apparent that the division is fair, and in proportion to population. The figures which I have mentioned are obtainable from a bulletin issued by the Bureau of Education entitled "Land Grant Colleges, 1925." That a man qualified to serve as the president of a university worthy of support from the Congress of the United States should have made the statement made by Doctor Durkee that $3,759,742 was appropriated to white colleges of the South through the Interior Department and only $150,000 allocated to the colored institutions, when as a matter of fact the appropriations thus made are only one-seventh of the amount claimed, and the allocation to negro institutions more than one-third in excess of that mentioned in his statement is as inexplicable as the fact that he included in his list of southern universities the following, which I read from page 20 of the hearings referred to:

University of Arizona	$101,722
Delaware College	94,528
Montana College of Agriculture	110,350
New Mexico College of Agriculture	113,328
Oregon State Agricultural College	120,383
Utah Agricultural College	106,651
West Virginia University	162,490

Besides several other institutions that are not usually considered southern. All of which merely serves to indicate the lack of care with which facts alleged to support and justify this legislation were prepared and presented to the committee which recommended it. At the present session of the Congress the committee refused to have further hearings with regard to this bill, although 12 of the 21 members of the committee were new members, and relied entirely for justification for their favorable report upon the hearings had at the last Congress on H. R. 8466 and H. R. 393, which were similar bills. In those hearings, aside from the statements of two officials of Howard University and an introductory statement by Mr. CRAMTON, no facts were submitted to the committee; and the misstatements I have called attention to in the principal evidence, that of Doctor Durkee, then president of the institution, are sufficient to justify question as to the accuracy of the rest of it. At any rate, it must certainly be clear that the passage of the proposed legislation can not be justified by the idea that in the South the negro is not treated fairly in the distribution of funds appropriated through the Department of the Interior to the agricultural and mechanical colleges; nor, in view of data inserted by me in the RECORD on March 1, that there has been discrimination in the allocation of Federal educational funds, however disbursed.

Third. It is insisted that there is a nation-wide need among the Negro race for professional men of their own color, and that in no other institutions is sufficient opportunity afforded for the training of a sufficient number of professional men; that according to Doctor Durkee, 400 negro physicians should be turned out every year for 10 years in order to catch up with the needs of the race along that line; and that there is similar need for colored lawyers, dentists, and pharmacists. Just where this tremendous demand exists is not pointed out, nor how the figures as to the extent of the demand are arrived at. It is apparent that it is not a demand which is general throughout the section of our country where most of the Negro race live, for Doctor Durkee makes the statement on page 21 of the hearings that I have referred to that—

> New York, Washington, Baltimore, Philadelphia, and Chicago have taken the larger number of the physicians.

Those who are being educated for physicians at Howard University, therefore, are not being so educated in order that they may go to the great centers of their racial population and begin lives of service among their people, but in order that they may leave those centers and locate in sections of the country where they may chase that chimera of social equality which is frankly and positively forever denied them in the South and is in reality denied them anywhere else where they are thrown into contact with white peoples.

As a matter of fact, there is small demand in great centers of colored population for negro physicians, lawyers, dentists, or pharmacists. Those of their own race realize that few of them are mentally capable of receiving and assimilating the knowledge which is necessary to bring eminence in these professions, and where they have opportunity to patronize negroes who practice them, usually patronize white professional men instead when they are able to employ them.

If we should concede the existence of the need, however, and should further concede that notwithstanding the great number of negro educational institutions throughout the South and the far greater number of white educational institutions in the North and West which receive negro students, that need can only be met by Howard University, what valid argument is thereby presented in favor of this bill? It is alleged by Doctor Durkee (see page 7 of the hearings referred to) that a negro man may receive through Howard University a medical education for about $2,000, whereas it costs white men in white educational institutions, he estimates, $10,000. How many thousand deserving young men of the white race throughout this country who would like to obtain professional education if the cost by Government appropriation might be reduced by 80 per cent? I have no sympathy with those who are continually, for political and other insincere reasons, charging unjust discrimination against the negro in the South or any other section of this country; but I have less sympathy with a proposition to afford professional education at Government expense to the Negro race, when the Government of the Nation now contributes not one single dollar to the professional education of the white race. I call your attention to the fact that appropriations authorized under the Morrill-Nelson law are appropriations for instruction in agriculture, the mechanic arts, and certain branches of learning, "with special reference to their application in the industries of life"; and that funds administered by the Federal Board for Vocational Education and the Department of Agriculture are for vocational training and rehabilitation, agricultural extension work, and training in industrial arts. Nowhere is there a Federal dollar available which would aid a young white man to embark upon a professional career.

The fourteenth amendment to the Constitution, so often referred to as a basis for attacks upon the South, guarantees to all persons within the jurisdiction of the several States the equal protection of their laws and, inferentially, of course, the equal protection of the laws of the United States. Here is a proposed law which will assure from the Treasury of the United States educational opportunity to the Negro race in the matter of professional education and will with existing laws fail to make equal provision for similar opportunities through the same source to men and women of the white race. Was the fourteenth amendment intended only for the protection of the negro or was it intended for the equal protection of all peoples under the flag? If the latter construction is correct, then any legislation which proposes to afford to the Negro race at the expense of the Nation educational opportunities not secured in the same way to the white race is unconstitutional and should be defeated for that reason.

It is further apparent from a study of the geographical distribution of the students at Howard University that that institution does not even serve a nation-wide need of the Negro race so much as it serves a local need. Referring to the table inserted in the record of hearings had during the Sixty-ninth Congress, on page 15, it appears that of a total of 2,032 students, 1,952 were residents of the United States, and that of this number 598 were residents of the District of Columbia and 521 were residents of the States of Maryland, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and Virginia, making a total of 1,119, or more than one-half, who came from a territory either comprised in or within a short distance of the District of Columbia. Ten Southern States, where the bulk of the negro population in this country resides, excluding Virginia, furnished only 395 students. Not only, therefore, is there discrimination against the white race in this bill but there is also sectional discrimination and an attempt to solve from the National Treasury alleged educational problems of the localities immediately surrounding Washington.

Mr. Chairman, I make the assertion upon the authority of a report issued by the Georgia State Board for Vocational Education that—

> A study of school-attendance statistics in Georgia show that of every 100 children who enter the primary class only 38 ever complete the seventh grade, only 8 ever finish high school, and only 1 graduates from college. Figures for other States show something of a similar condition, and a compilation and summary of attendance problems for the entire United States show that this is a universal problem.

When only 38 per cent of the children of my State receive a common-school education, and when I am assured that similar conditions exist in other States, I can not stand here and help to vote money out of the National Treasury in half million dollar lots for the maintenance of a university to serve a need principally local to Washington and vicinity for the higher education of negroes. If the money of the National Government is to be made available to a greater extent than at present to help solve our educational problems, that money should go, first, strictly under State administration and control, to the assistance of the childhood of our Nation who are not now receiving the opportunities in the way of a common-school education which they need in order to bring out the best that is in them for themselves, their communities, and their country. There are too many men and women in the United States to-day who remind us of the language of Henry Fulton, the noted English writer and divine:

> In some who have run up to men without education, we may observe many qualities darkened and eclipsed; their minds are crusted over, like a diamond in the rock.

Thomas Jefferson said:

> If you would have the sun continue to shed its rays on the faces of freemen, then educate all the children in the land. This alone startles the tyrant in his dreams of power and rouses the slumbering energies of an oppressed people.

But I wonder what the patron saint of democratic government would have thought of a plan by which the energies of the National Government, aside from certain aids to agricultural, mechanical, and industrial training which reach alike all races under the flag, have been and are to be under this bill devoted to the higher education of the Negro race? Surely, to insist upon prior consideration for the children of my country who are deprived of proper common-school educational opportunity, before legalizing a policy by which negro higher education shall be taken care of, is not to stamp myself as narrow, prejudiced, or unfair. [Applause.]

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON].

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I have had contact with this matter for several years through my connection with the Interior Department appropriation bill that carries this appropriation. Let me first emphasize that no appropriation which this Congress has ever made for Howard University was illegal. An appropriation bill is law the same as any other bill passed by Congress. The only emergency comes from the fact——

Mr. O'CONNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. I am sorry I can not yield in five minutes. I want to be courteous, but I can not yield.

Any bill passed by Congress making this appropriation has been the law and has been legal, the only emergency comes that under the rules of this House the Appropriations Committee does not have authority to report these appropriations, and hence they are subject to a point of order. If this bill becomes law that difficulty will be overcome.

Our committee has felt that because the appropriations have been made for nearly half a century and because each time when the House gets the chance to vote they sustain the appropriations, we ought to report them.

The gentleman from Georgia has suggested the institution is local. I am sure if he would study the question more he would find that it is a national school to meet a national need. The gentleman suggests it is not under supervision. If he will read the bill that is before us he will find that it provides that "the university shall at all times be open to inspection by the Bureau of Education and shall be inspected by the said bureau at least once each year" and that an annual report must come to Congress concerning it; and in addition, the financial aspect of it is now supervised by the Department of the Interior, so far as the use of our money is concerned.

The gentleman says it will be a discrimination against the white race for us to do this for the negro population. We have already established the precedent in the education of the Indians. We have many, many schools for the exclusive use of the Indians in order to fulfill our national obligations as to that race. We have a similar obligation to see that the negro is not discriminated against in the opportunity to get an education and raise himself and his race up.

The gentleman has talked of the present apportionment of Federal funds. I have received to-day from the Bureau of Education—I may say here I put in the RECORD at page 3711 some time ago a general study of this question by the Howard University, but I have now a statement from the Bureau of Education giving a tabulation which I will ask consent to put in the RECORD in detail. Suffice for the present to say that the money that goes from the Federal Government to State colleges and universities under different laws amounted as to the 17 Southern States in 1925–1926, the year they have used in their table, to $4,901,338.

Mr. TARVER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. I am sorry I can not yield. If I have any time when I have completed my statement I will be pleased to yield.

Approximately $5,000,000 went to the white institutions in these Southern States. How much went to the negroes? The population is respectively 27,000,000 and about 9,000,000 and we would expect then $1,600,000 to go to the colored institutions of the South from the Federal Treasury. Instead of that, there was $319,777.

Mr. TARVER. That is a very important statement the gentleman is making and in view of the nature of his remarks I hope the gentleman will yield.

Mr. CRAMTON. It is important and I am trying to cover it in a decisive and permanent way. The Bureau of Education that has charge of the distribution of most of this fund——

Mr. TARVER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. I do not yield. If the gentleman from Mississippi will yield me more time I will yield to any question desired to be asked.

This $4,900,000 went to the white institutions from the Federal Treasury and $319,777 went to the colored institutions in the 17 Southern States from the Federal Treasury. It is that discrimination that creates this national need for a great colored university.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and in doing so I desire to put in this table and the accompanying letter in part.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman apparently has some further time and I would like to ask him a question.

Mr. CRAMTON. The Chair has said I have no more time. Under the leave I insert the following:

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, BUREAU OF EDUCATION,
Washington, March 29, 1928.

Hon. LOUIS C. CRAMTON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. CRAMTON: In reply to your letter of March 23 we have checked over the figures for land-grant colleges shown in the report entitled "Comparative distribution of Federal and State funds for collegiate education of whites and negroes in 17 States."

Since the institutions represented in the above-mentioned report are not named it is difficult to check the figures. Footnotes read "Includes students of secondary grade," "Includes also appropriations for schools above secondary but of junior collegiate grade." The heading of the table on page 1 indicates "Publicly controlled institutions of four-year collegiate grade," but these are not itemized, nor is the number of these institutions given.

Accurate data on Federal funds for land-grant colleges and universities in the 17 Southern States have been tabulated and are presented in the inclosed table, which is summarized as follows:

	White	Negro
Interest on 1862 land-grant fund	$307,939	$24,152
Interest on other Federal land grants	23,585	5,777
Morrill-Nelson Acts of 1890 and 1907	600,279	249,721
Smith-Hughes funds as reported by institutions	132,728	40,127
Other Federal funds for instruction and administration	25,468	None.
Hatch-Adams funds for agricultural experiment stations	480,000	None.
Purnell funds (act of 1925)	320,000	None.
Other Federal funds for agricultural experiment stations	12,921	None.
Smith-Lever and supplementary funds for agricultural and home economics extension	2,928,176	None.
Other Federal funds for agricultural and home economics extension	70,242	None.

Mr. LOWREY. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HARE].

Mr. HARE. Mr. Chairman, if my information is correct, George Washington, the first President of the United States, and often referred to as the Father of his Country, left in his will a bequest of $25,000 for the establishment of a national university in the city of Washington or District of Columbia.

If I am mistaken in this, I hope some gentleman will correct me. I understand further that the question of accepting this $25,000 and establishing a national university in the District of Columbia, not only for the people of Washington and the District of Columbia but for the people of the entire Nation, has been before nearly every Congress for consideration for upward of 100 years.

And yet the combined intelligence of this great Nation, represented by Members of Congress, has said from time to time that this bequest of $25,000 from the father of our country can not be accepted and augmented by appropriations by Congress for the benefit of the education of the masses of the Nation, because it was not legal and was unconstitutional to do so.

Mr. CELLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARE. No. I am sorry, for I have only five minutes. But after more than 100 years have elapsed, and after Congress has often refused to consider the proposition and accept the money given as a legacy to this Nation by George Washington, showing an ingratitude that almost amounts to an insult, Representatives of this great country come forth in their majesty, in their dignity, in their greatness, in their superlativeness—and, I might say, with a smothered conscience—and say, "We want to make an appropriation; we want to enact a law for the benefit of a colored church institution. We want to legalize an appropriation from the United States Treasury, not for the benefit of the white people of the Nation, as George Washington wanted us to do, but for the benefit of a great university for the negroes of the District of Columbia. I understand that Howard University is chartered and maintained as a denominational school. I understand that it has a seminary, or school of theology, maintained by one of the Protestant churches of this country, and I wonder how a really intelligent and honest Representative can come on the floor of this House and say, "I will ignore the fact that this is a denominational school; that it is a church school; that it is a private institution, all of which is admitted to be wholly in conflict with the principles and policies of this Government, and the obligation to honestly and fearlessly discharge my duty to all the people alike, but will throw aside the dictates of intelligent judgment; I will ignors and smother my conscience, if necessary, and support this bill." I say, I can not understand why one should lose sight of the fundamentals of his Government and be led astray by a little sentiment, or possibly by a few votes.

Mr. GREEN of Florida. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARE. No; I am sorry I can not. If this bill is passed, what reason can you give the colored people of this city who belong to the Methodist Church in case they may want an appropriation for a similar institution? What reason will you be able to give for denying them help for a university? What reason can you give the colored people who may belong to the Presbyterian Church who might come here and want to establish an educational institution?

Is there any good reason? What reason could you give any of the other denominational churches who might come here and say we need a university because we have ignorance among our people; we have poverty among them; we have disease among them; we have distress; they have need of a great university; they have need of money from the United States Treasury to support it. They may confront us with those demands in less than 12 months, and they are certain to do it within less than 12 years if this bill is passed and the Supreme Court of the United States sustains it.

The gentleman who preceded me referred to the fact that there was some discrimination about the distribution of funds already appropriated for the benefit of colleges in the South and gave that as a reason why this bill should become a law. I gather from that reasoning he has reached the point in life when he believes that two wrongs make a right.

If you pass this bill and make Howard University an institution to be permanently supported and maintained by the United States Government, it will be equivalent to setting up an educational institution in competition with those supported and maintained by the States or by private funds. The appropriations from year to year will necessarily be in keeping with growing demands, which will mean taking students away from Tuskegee, Hampton Institute, Fisk University, and other colleges for colored students, and mark my prediction that within less than 10 years the appropriation for this university will reach such proportions as to stagger the imagination. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. WELLER].

Mr. WELLER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I am in favor of this bill. I find that the membership of this House from New York is quite a unit in supporting this worthy bill. Nineteen Southern States have their undergraduates and graduates of Howard University. These Southern States all have contributed, every State has contributed, to the roll of the university, and yet we find the South to-day a unit, practically, in opposition to a measure which seeks simply to correct what has been something unusual in the way of legislation. Since 1879 the appropriation has been questioned each year because it has come to the House on a rider of the Department of the Interior appropriation bill.

In New York City we have made ample provision for the education of negroes who live there, and we have 350,000 negro people who live in the city of New York. A great many of these good people are good residents in my district.

Mr. GASQUE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WELLER. Not now. For these people we have hospitals, we have schools; we have made ample provision for the colored people in the city of New York. It is quite apparent that schools of higher education like Tuskegee and the others in the South are not sufficient unto themselves to accommodate those who desire to receive a high scholastic education. To-day we are confronted with the same old wrangle of what we ought to do in order to correct something which obviously should be corrected. There is but one thing that can be done here, and that is to put our house in order, and put this question squarely before the House and have these appropriations made as they should be made.

In New York City we have many graduates of this university. We have doctors, lawyers, dentists, and divinity men, all of whom have had the advantages of this wonderful university. The last speaker, the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HARE], spoke about the religious features of this institution. I do not imagine there is a college anywhere in the United States but has some particular religious domination and influence. Certainly all colleges, no matter whether they be class A colleges or not, should be under the guiding influence, to some extent at least, of chapel exercises, and the church should have a proper position in the work of the institution. But that the money is going to be voted for any particular class of religion, of course, the very terms of the bill prohibit. By the very terms of the bill the money that is annually appropriated can not and will not be devoted to religious instruction.

This university has an endowment, I am told, of approximately $450,000. It is not self-supporting, but it is helpful. It is helping itself. Those who have been able to get an education there, those graduates who are not only in the city of Washington but who have come to the cities like New York, have invariably clung to their alma mater with just as much love and zeal and just as much esprit de corps as white men do in their own college life. That should be encouraged. If there is anything that can be done by this House, which has a moral responsibility to chip in, as it were, which has a moral responsibility to help out this worthy educational institution, to correct the parliamentary situation, then it does not lie in the mouth of any man in the House that he should protest against such a proposition.

Howard University was founded in 1867 by Gen. Oliver Otis Howard, a distinguished veteran of the Civil War, as an institution where negro men and women might receive college and university training. Like many other great things, it had a humble beginning. After the war the problem of properly placing the negro as a freedman became evident, and it became necessary for the leaders to stimulate their race by the encouragement of education. The charter of Howard University was granted by Congress on March 2, 1867, and each year this day has always been observed with appropriate ceremonies, and is known as charter day.

Congress appropriated small amounts each year, and in the year of 1879 the amount of $10,000 was appropriated for the maintenance of the university, so that gradually there developed a new life of intellectual and spiritual ambition.

The Negro race represents one-ninth of the total population of the United States and in the past 50 years has shown tremendous advances within its own ranks. Until now it has been apparent that the future of the race is virtually in the hands of its own political leader. After the war the newly created freedman swelled into Washington and the people were confronted with the great problem of properly taking care of them both from an intellectual and physical standpoint. Plans were laid in a comprehensive way to found a college whose requirements and standards were of such a high order as to acquire the recognition of the greatest university of our country. Year by year those who identified themselves with this remarkable project toiled incessantly, mindful that they were being watched with jealous eyes but strengthened by the belief of a righteous cause. The wisdom and far-sighted genius of the founders are now revealing themselves to the country.

Congress has before it now, in the days of maturity of this university, another opportunity to recognize further its value, not only to the Negro race but to all the people of our country, and to provide and help to assist this great work morally and with financial support.

The university formerly came under the jurisdiction of the Department of the Interior, but its needs and growth have been fairly unparalleled, and the original incorporation by Congress of Howard University in the District of Columbia has from year to year been compelled to report to and receive appropriations through that department. By this amendment now proposed the act of 1867 will be amended and an annual appropriation for constructive improvements and maintenance shall come directly and be a part of the national budget of our country under proper supervision and subject to an annual report to Congress each year through the board of education. This would seem to be the appropriate and logical way to handle this problem, and it is befitting the dignity of the high character of work that has been accomplished by the officers and alumni of the university.

This is really the one college in which the door is open for advancement and education to the negro, and happily it is situated in the site of our Government at Washington. So that in many respects it may be said that this university is a national organization. The young negro man or woman who desires collegiate or professional training and does not desire to go to any other university or college may come to Howard to devote and consecrate his or her life to the advancement of the Negro race.

The work of the officers of the university has been highly appreciated, and new buildings and departments have been created and erected, so that it now has an endowment of $450,000. The grounds are beautifully situated in Washington and nestled in a grove of trees. The different departments are housed in well-equipped buildings. The library is well stocked and the different classical and scientific departments filled with students eager to learn. Much of the advancement is owed to the courageous leadership of Dr. J. Stanley Durkee, former president of the university, and his associates. The problem has commanded the attention and interest of distinguished educators and men in public life, who serve on the board of trustees without compensation for the advancement of the negro. Dormitories are provided on the campus which may be had for the modest sum of $2 a week, and board may be obtained for $20 per month, and it can be seen that these sums are almost nominal.

The high regard in which the university is held is typified by the spirit of the alumni when it was sought to raise $250,000 to meet the requirements of the general educational board, which promised an additional $250,000 for the purpose of building a medical school costing one-half million dollars. It is said that a group of negro physicians in Washington assembled together, and 67 of them subscribed $100,000, and the balance of the amount was made up in pledges and subscriptions. It is estimated by Dr. Mordecai W. Johnson, the president, that the needs of the colored race require the graduation of 400 thoroughly trained physicians for the next 10 years to keep pace with the increase in population of the Negro race.

The college course of the university is known as grade A. and Howard University is the only university for the negro people that teaches medicine, with the exception of Meharri, in the State of Tennessee. The dental school is well known, and the law department has received recognition by the other law schools and the courts of the country. There are practically no large hospitals exclusively for the negro people, but the best known, and in which 90 per cent of the patients are colored, is the celebrated Harlem Hospital in New York City. The fame and reputation of this hospital under the auspices of the city of New York are well known to the medical fraternity and is a field for the colored internes and doctors.

Howard University also opens the door to negro women so that they may be educated leading to professional degrees. They also have a course in nursing in the adjoining Freedman's Hospital.

The men and women who attend the university come from all the States in the Union, and they have approximately 2,000 students on the roster for the coming year. Congress has from time to time made appropriations for various universities in the North, West, and South amounting to over $7,000,000. From 1879 to 1924, in addition to the money raised for tuition and endowment already referred to, Congress has already appropriated three and one-half millions, and the appropriation calls for approximately $400,000 a year. Each year this appropriation has been attacked, and it is claimed that coming, as they do, through the Department of the Interior appropriation bill, they are illegal. This should not be so. Money appropriations having the sanctity of law should be directly appropriated by Congress upon budgets and questionnaires and all doubt as to the legality removed. The contention, however, of the legality has not been sustained. But this method of handling the question would for all time dispose of such criticism. The dignity of the grand works of this university requires that there be not the first suggestion of irregularity. Howard University, the first university for the advancement of negro education, is entitled to the highest consideration, for the work of its officers and alumni has demonstrated that it has not been misguided or misplaced.

Mr. LOWREY. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. BUSBY].

Mr. BUSBY. Mr. Chairman, I am taking this short time to suggest that from my point of view this kind of legislation is totally unauthorized by the Constitution. I am not a great constitutional lawyer, but the question has been referred to by the gentleman from Michigan and others. I do know, however, that the Howard University was incorporated in the same atmosphere that the tenure of office act was passed, along after the Civil War. That act particularly brought President Johnson into condemnation, and on the basis of it he was impeached. The act was declared to be unconstitutional by the Supreme Court only last year, to be totally outside the scope of the Constitution and the authority of Congress. Howard University was incorporated and Federal funds began to be paid over to it about the time that the cotton tax act was passed, which also was held to be unconstitutional by the Supreme Court, but under which during the years 1867, 1868, and 1869 several hundred thousand dollars were collected from cotton growers in the South, which money still remains in the Treasury of the United States, notwithstanding the fact that the law has been declared unconstitutional. It was incorporated also about the time that the Freedman's Bureau was created, and the Credit Mobilier was the talk of the country. I mention the conditions under which this institution was founded to suggest to you that our public mind was not at its most favorable condition, and consequently it might not have taken into consideration with proper and due regard all of the provisions of the Constitution. I am against the proposition contained in the bill for that reason.

I suggest to the membership of the House that my own State, Mississippi, maintains splendid schools for the negroes. It maintains colleges for negroes. Mississippi has more negro children in its schools than any other State in the Union or any other governmental subdivision in the Union. We have done everything that we know of to provide for them and educate them and bring them up. We have done that as a State proposition and have not looked to the National Government to do it, as other States have not. For that reason it seems to me that we are going outside of the scope of the Constitution when we devote these funds to the purpose we are now authorizing them to be devoted to. The truth about the question is that there is more political dynamite involved in this bill than in any other bill that has been before the House in a long while. We all know that many are voting a political vote who are involved to any extent with the colored vote back in their districts. That being the situation, I suggest to the brethren who are opposing this bill so valiantly that the problem will soon be theirs and not ours of the South, for the simple reason that statistics show that during the last 10 years the colored population in the South increased only 1.9 per cent. My own State of Mississippi lost 74,000 negroes. The Northern and Eastern States have gotten these negroes. In Michigan the colored vote increased 251 per cent.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, there is a matter that I want to call to the attention of my colleagues from New York. When you come up to my district and tell my people that Congressman LAGUARDIA does not get along with his own party, just be reminded that to-day you are not getting along with your party. We had to-day a bit of prohibition immigration question, and now the colored question, and I see many of my colleagues not in complete harmony with their party. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. BUSBY] raised the question as to the constitutionality of the bill now under consideration. I want to suggest to the gentleman that when the Constitution was amended, giving negroes citizenship and equal rights, that amendment carried with it the obligation of giving the negroes an equal opportunity for education in this country. [Applause.] A republic and a representative government without education can not endure. If the State of Mississippi is doing so much for the higher education of the negro, I should think it would welcome this movement to relieve it of a part of the burden now imposed upon the State.

Mr. BUSBY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. No; I have only a few minutes.

Mr. BUSBY. I will give you the one minute you took away from me.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Oh, that is like giving a negro the right to buy a Pullman car ticket in your State. [Laughter.]

Mr. GREEN of Florida. Can they ride with you?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Surely they can.

Mr. Chairman, it seems strange that in this day and age there should be objection to endowing a university of this kind. I would do more of it. This Government can well afford to spend money in this way. The purpose of this bill is simply to avoid kicking the Howard University around every year when we have under consideration the appropriation bill.

In New York City our colored boys can enter the College of the City of New York and the colored girls are entering Hunter College. We provide for their education, whether they come from the South or elsewhere, and we believe in making the fourteenth amendment something real. [Applause and cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. LOWREY. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. GASQUE].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. GASQUE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I regret very much that my friend the gentleman from New York [Mr. WELLER] saw fit to state that this was a sectional measure, opposed only by the Members of his side from the South, and to leave the inference that the South was opposed to negro education. In the two minutes I have I want to in part reply to that statement. I came from the South and had the honor to be superintendent of schools of my county for 20 years, and I want to state that the South never was opposed to negro education. The South is providing to-day some of the best schools—both high schools and colleges—in this country for the Negro race, and doing this largely out of the white taxpayers' money. In the State I have the honor in part to represent we have as fine a negro college as the State of New York or any other State, supported wholly by the taxpayers of that State. It may not be as large, but is just as good. I resent the inference that the South is opposed to the education of the negro.

My opposition to this bill, as I am sure is the case with others on this side of the House, is that it is unconstitutional, and it violates one of the fundamental principles of this great Government of ours, in that it takes money from the Federal Treasury and gives it to a private denominational institution for the purpose of fostering not only education but the power and influence of that particular denomination. No man who believes in the principles upon which this Government was founded can conscientiously vote for this bill. Why not appropriate money out of the Federal Treasury to the support of an Italian or a Jewish university or a university operated by any other denomination or peoples? If this precedent is followed, where will we end? We have the same right to appropriate money to any private institution as we have to pass this bill.

I am convinced that the question of higher educational institutions of learning is one for the State and the various religious denominations to handle, or for private enterprises.

I am convinced that what I have to say will not keep this bill from passing, as there is more involved in this than mere principle.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BLACK].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized.

Mr. BLACK of New York. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I can not leave the remarks of my distinguished colleague [Mr. LAGUARDIA] to go unchallenged. I want to say that it was a Republican-controlled Congress which passed and a Republican President who signed the immigration bill he does not like, and the Republican administration that he supports has refused to modify the prohibition act.

I am a member of the committee that reported this bill. There is nothing in it to be excited about.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. BLACK of New York. No; I do not yield to the gentleman.

As to this bill, I say, there is nothing to be excited about. All this bill does is to put out of business a point of order that is made every year against the item appropriating money toward the support of Howard University. There is no racial or sectional proposition involved in it. We are going to pass appropriations for the institution, whether this bill is enacted or not. We have done it before, and we will do it again. As I said, I am a member of the committee that reported this bill, and I am in favor of it.

I had an agreement with the chairman that I would yield the remainder of my time to my colleague from New York [Mr. CELLER].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER] is recognized.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, I just want to remind the House that this bill provides that no part of the money appropriated shall be used for religious instruction. Out of 2,155 students in that institution in 1926 only 49 were in that part of the university where theology is taught. Thus only about 2 per cent of the students are in the school of religion. The religious school, therefore, in point of students is the least important of the university's schools.

I hail from Brooklyn, and I desire to point out that the former president of Howard, Dr. J. Stanley Durkee, now occupies the pulpit of a famous Brooklyn church, Plymouth Church, of Dr. Henry Ward Beecher fame. Dr. Mordecai W. Johnson succeeds Doctor Durkee at Howard. He is the first colored person to preside over Howard University.

We have heard something about the unconstitutionality of this provision. If it is unconstitutional—and that I doubt—we are quite estopped, after 49 years of appropriations, from raising that issue. I might also say that if it is unconstitutional to appropriate moneys for those of the colored race in Howard University, it is quite as unconstitutional to appropriate money for the land-grant colleges throughout the length and breadth of this country, and as well, it is unconstitutional to appropriate money for the education of Indians.

Morally we have every duty to help educate the negro as well as Indian. We took the Indian's land and kept him on reservations. We took or, rather, filched from him his cherished possessions. No one has raised a question about educating him. Did we not equally coerce the colored race? We brought the negroes from Africa, kept them in bondage. We freed their bodies. But should we not as well free their minds? We can only do that by education.

There is another point I would like to make, and that is this: As far as medical education is concerned, we find, for example, that in 1926 there was only 1 colored doctor among 3,194 colored persons, while there was 1 white doctor for 553 white persons. That disparity in itself should force you to the conclusion that you must vote for this bill. This disparity subsists to the same marked degree even to-day. Howard University is the only university where a colored student can get a complete medical education. It is the only place where he can get the very essential bedside training. He may enter some of the other medical schools, but sooner or later he will feel the prejudice and will be finally proscribed. But at Howard there is the Freedman's Hospital, where colored folk are treated. They will not object to the colored interne or student. But white folk in the hospitals near or adjoining other medical schools will object to the negro interne or student at the bedside. See how illuminating is the testimony of Doctor Durkee on this score:

> A colored man can go into one of the other medical schools, and for the first two years he is in the theory department of medicine. He is in the classroom and working in the private laboratories. There, there is no trouble at all; 100 or 200 colored men could be put in our large medical schools in this country in the first two years. But when you come to your second two years you get to the clinical years, and the students must be taken to the bedside in the hospitals; they must be taken frequently to private practice. I will tell you what was said by the dean of one of our greatest medical schools in this country. He said, "The individual professor does not know just when, if he takes a colored man to a particular hospital or to a particular bedside, he is going to strike a rumpus." And rather than take the chance at all he sidesteps it. Hence, when colored men get through their first two years they immediately run into that difficulty. Now, a few work it through, but the great majority write to Howard University and ask, "Can we not come in for your junior and senior years?" We are overcrowded and we can not take them. Now, the supply is being shut off because of that reason in the other great medical schools, and they are leaving it to Howard University alone.
> Mr. FENN. How do you get rid of that difficulty in Howard University?
> Doctor DURKEE. We have no difficulty, because we have the Freedmen's Hospital, a great hospital, right there near us.
> Mr. FENN. It is right in the same grounds, is it not?
> Doctor DURKEE. Howard University granted to the United States Government 11 acres of land on which the Government built the Freedmen's Hospital, and there we have innumerable opportunities.

Surely, colored doctors are as necessary as white doctors. Epidemics like the "flu" do not draw any color line. "Flu" attacks white and black alike. Should not the blacks be properly protected by a full supply of colored doctors—not only for themselves but also for the protection of the whites as well—for if the colored are not properly cared for the contagion can not be kept from the whites. Thus from a selfish standpoint, if from no other, you must preserve Howard for medical education of the colored people.

The same disparity obtains as to dentists. There was in 1926 1 white dentist to 2,070 white people, while there was but 1 colored dentist to 20,000 colored persons. Surely that is sufficient argument to encourage passage of this bill.

Is there discrimination against the negro in higher education? I will let you judge.

In West Point I think there are no colored cadets. In Annapolis there are no colored midshipmen. Only three colored men graduated from West Point. In the great universities there are few negroes to matriculate; one must attach a photograph to the application. The reason is obvious. Yet at Columbia and Harvard there are many Chinese. The yellows are not taboo, apparently.

This institute, Howard University, is national in character and, to my mind, there is no greater need in this country to-day than that of higher education of colored men and women of the Nation. There is a great lack of negroes in various professions. The negro, ostracized from so many things, should not be kept from education. The negro is proud and he would not accept of this charity from the Government if money were available from other sources.

This bill should pass so that hereafter appropriations for Howard University will be proof against the parliamentary point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. LOWREY. Mr. Chairman, I yield to myself the rest of the time allotted to my side.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi is recognized for eight minutes. [Applause.]

Mr. LOWREY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I think it is very unfortunate that this discussion should in any way take a trend or be looked upon as a partisan question, politically, or as a sectional question. The most painful thing to me in all the discussions of this question all the way along has been the way that feature has been injected into it.

There has been much insinuation on the floor like that made by my Democratic friend from New York, that we southern folks were awfully wicked in our attitude toward this question and toward the education of the negro. Well, now, I am not going to say anything ugly or make any accusations, but I believe I am forced to tell a little story. The secretary of a Congressman north of the Ohio—I will not say where—said to a southern Congressman's secretary lately, "There is no one I hate more than a damned nigger, but we have got to support this bill because my boss must have the negro vote in his district to get by." I am not going to tell you who said that, and there may have been just as mean and bitter things said by those coming from the South; but what I am coming at is this: The race feeling and the partisan feeling is not all on one side of this matter, but there is a political feature in it which we all have to admit is there. I wish we could forget the political feature. I wish I had the time to go somewhat into an answer of some things that were brought out on the floor by my good friend from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON], who quoted from a little pamphlet presented by the Howard University. I started to say it is a little singular—but it is not singular, either—that Howard University, in sending that to the Congress, took the 17 States in which the colored and white folks are separated in the schools and then the 3 States, Mississippi, Louisiana, and Georgia, from which the three men come who signed the minority report in this matter.

But with charity to all and malice toward none that analysis by Howard University was the most inexcusable, unjust, and unfounded thing I have seen on the question. I have been looking those matters up through that presentation by Howard University and I have been looking it up through the negro yearbook, which is gotten out by Tuskegee. So I am taking my information entirely from those sources. In the 17 States referred to where the races are segregated in the schools, according to this pamphlet from Howard University, the negro population in those States is about 9,000,000 to 27,000,000, I believe it was stated here, about one-third, and the argument is, therefore, taking my State, Mississippi, where there are more negroes than there are white folks, that there ought to be more of college money appropriated to negroes than to white folks because it is dealing entirely with money appropriated to colleges and not money appropriated to public education. Now, the truth is this: That if you will take the number of negro college pupils in those 17 States and divide the number into the amount of money the States and Federal Government give to those colleges you will find that it amounts to $694 per pupil. That much is spent on every negro college pupil in those States out of State funds and Federal funds, and most of it comes from State funds. For the white people in the same States the amount of State funds and Federal funds for white college pupils aggregates $286, a good deal less than half of the amount given to each negro pupil. So we are not defeating the negro in his rights.

Now, somebody says, why are there so few negro pupils in the colleges? Well, in the first place, the negro in the South takes largely to denominational colleges and private schools rather than to the State colleges. For instance, in my own State we have only 388 negroes in the State college for negroes, but we have something over 6,000 in the colleges all told. There are about five or six colleges run by the denominations, run privately, and run this way and that; and there are something like 6,000 negroes in all those colleges put together, but only a little less than 400 in the State college. They take to the denominational colleges.

Now, there is another thing which we all have to meet and we should meet it squarely. The negro has been out of slavery only a few years. I imagine there are 50 white students in my State really ready for college to 1 negro ready for college; I mean ready and able to go and enter college.

Now, this pamphlet argues that we must divide the money according to the population.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DALLINGER].

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, in answer to the statement that has been made that this authorizes an appropriation for a sectarian institution, I simply want to call attention to the fact that the act of incorporation, a copy of which I hold in my hand, has nothing in it in regard to any sect or any race. This institution is incorporated the same as every other nonsectarian institution of learning in the United States.

Mr. Chairman, I want to state that as chairman of the Committee on Education in the Sixty-eighth Congress I had the honor to report a bill similar to this one, and it passed the House, but failed to pass the Senate. The same thing happened in the Sixty-ninth Congress.

Howard University is doing a great work and I can not understand how gentlemen from south of the Mason and Dixon line—some of them—are averse to having colored doctors get the best possible medical education, and Howard University is the only place where they can get the best and most up-to-date medical education. It is important that there should be trained doctors and nurses and school-teachers of this race, and Howard University is a great national university that is doing a great work, and I trust the bill will pass by an overwhelming vote. [Applause.]

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HUDSON].

Mr. HUDSON. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me when a question of progress comes before us we are always confronted with the bugaboo of constitutionality. It is a favorite cry for the lawyers to bring forth. There has never been a single progressive step made in the forward march of humanity that some one has not brought up the cry of constitutionality.

The fact is this can not be raised against the pending measure justly. In addition to the 49 years in which we have been making appropriations through congressional action for this institution, thus showing clearly the trend of feeling of the Nation toward the institution, it has become and is to-day more of a national problem than ever before, and therefore ought to receive the most hearty support we can give it. You gentlemen of the Southland have been standing with us on the question of immigration. Now the Nation as a whole is confronted, as it never has been before, with the question of migration, and the negro problem is no longer a southern problem; it is a national problem.

I have within my district one city of over 100,000 population in which the negro vote is the controlling vote. I have other cities in which there have come up great migrations from the South. They are not the northern negro, they are the southern negro; and in this Capital City the negro population is increasing by leaps and bounds, and it behooves us of the North and of the South, of the Nation everywhere, if for no other reason than that of sanitation and health, that we have trained leaders as physicians and as nurses in this race. [Applause.]

Howard University is an institution of national importance. It is not simply an institution for the Negro race confined to the citizens of the District of Columbia. The District of Columbia has 598 pupils there, Maryland 115, but the fact is that nearly every State in the Union is represented in its enrollment. The Virgin Islands has 2, the British West Indies 29, and the British Guiana in South America 18; in fact, its reputation and excellency of training has spread to the most of the countries of this hemisphere.

For 49 years the Congress of the United States has been giving favorable consideration to Howard University. Since the Budget Commission went into effect the appropriations for the Interior Department of the Government has carried an item covering various needs of the university. It has been objected to by Members of the South on the ground of constitutionality and struck from the bill on a point of order only to be restored by the Senate and passed by the conferees.

The bill before us to-day is meant to correct that objection and give the Appropriations Committee authority to make such appropriations as from year to year the demands of the university may require.

The cry is raised against the measure that it will be unconstitutional. That is the cry always raised by opponents to progress. Of course, this is constitutional, and the purpose of the bill contemplates nothing that is not constitutional. There has never been a single progressive step made in the fall and march of humanity that some one has not brought up the cry of constitutionality.

For many years the American people, in answer to the obligation owed the Indian, have appropriated money to build schools and hospitals wherein their youth might be trained and educated to become the leaders of their people, the hospitals to teach them the art of healing and sanitation.

The obligation of the Nation to the negro would seem to me even stronger than in the case of the Indian. The negro was not robbed of his land as was the Indian, but he is here and by force brought to the shores of this country, and in this strange land unwillingly became a slave of the white man, and for generations his lot was nothing more than that of a chattel. And since that time by manual labor only, untrained and unskilled, he has largely been compelled to eke out a precarious existence.

Howard University is a practical demonstration of the response of this Nation to its moral obligation. While it is true that negroes may be admitted to the colleges of the North and the South, the conditions of admission are very much restricted, and generally this may be said that these colleges are not open or available to the Negro race except for industrial training.

Here you have in Howard University a class A school, where the students receive a fine and complete training to go out as teachers, lawyers, preachers, doctors, and business leaders. All of this is most needed and most commended.

There is, however, a further consideration for the passage of this bill and a strong practical reason why an institution like Howard University should be maintained in the District of Columbia. The Freedmen's Hospital was authorized by Congress in 1904 and was built upon the land owned by Howard University. The university generously leased the land to the Federal Government for 99 years at $1 a year, with the privilege of renewal for a like period. The existence of this hospital, so near to the medical school of Howard University, affords the students of the university an opportunity which exists nowhere else in this country to acquire the clinical instruction which is necessary to complete each student's medical course.

The great importance to the country as a whole of having this institution is more readily visioned when we recall that the negro is no longer a race simply in the Southland, but through the migration of the last decade and a half has become a resident and a citizen in great numbers in practically every city of the Northland. This institution is not only capable of training leaders for the colored race in all walks of life, but what, perhaps, is more urgent, makes possible a supply of properly trained physicians and nurses; and therefore is for the protection not only of the health of the Negro race but the health of all people of this Nation, white as well as black.

Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, in conclusion I can not help but bear tribute to the progress of the Negro peoples in the last past century. They have under an almost insurmountable handicap leaped forward in education and training and leadership. Instead of an economic burden they are becoming an economic asset to the Nation, and year by year are finding more and more their place in all walks of material, educational, and spiritual leadership. We can only wish them the best, and surely in this way as a Nation assist in their great endeavor to still further fit themselves to take their place in our civilization.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM].

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, this bill (H. R. 279) to incorporate the Howard University in the District of Columbia, is in reality a bill to amend the charter of the university, which was approved on the 2d of March, 1867, by adding a section known as section 8 providing—

Annual appropriations are hereby authorized to aid in the construction, development, improvement, and maintenance of the university, no part of which shall be used for religious instruction.

For the past 49 years, Congress has been appropriating for the maintenance of this university, and for this year about $218,000 was provided by the Budget. These appropriations for nearly half a century have been without legal sanction and this amendment will if passed legalize future appropriations. It does not burden the Government any more than the Government has in the past assumed the burden. It does not bind the Government to any appropriations, but merely gives the authority, and when an appropriation is recommended in a bill, Congress may refuse to make the appropriation if it deems proper. It is entirely free to use its judgment.

For my part I shall vote for the bill, not only because I think appropriations should be legalized, but because I am in favor of these appropriations. I do not think our Government can spend money for a better purpose than the education of our people, be they white or colored. The very foundation of our governmental system is based upon the education of the electorate. The better our people are educated and the more of them, the firmer will be the foundation of any democratic government whether it be the United States or any other.

I look upon this Howard University, which had its inspiration and organization under Gen. O. O. Howard and General Ballock some 60 years ago, as a national university for the colored race. There are to-day some 12,000,000 colored people within our borders, and this, to my knowledge, is the only institution of its kind in the country. It is not generally known that there are some 2,000 colored students at this university, both male and female. The curriculum is of the highest. The American Medical Association has placed it in class A, so that its medical graduates are permitted to take the State board examination in any State of the Union.

The university is certainly doing a great work in the education of medical students. If there is one thing scarce among the colored race it is trained doctors, and may I say here that the very high standard now required makes all doctors very scarce especially in rural communities.

The university also educates lawyers, dentists, pharmacists, ministers, and many in the liberal arts and sciences. I feel that this institution fills an important place in the educational formation of our country. The District of Columbia has 598 pupils there; Maryland, 115; in fact nearly all the States of the Union are represented in this university. The far off Virgin Islands have two; the British West Indies, 29; and British Guiana in South America, 18; in fact its reputation has spread to most of the countries of this hemisphere. [Applause.]

I insert as a part of my speech a list of the States and countries represented:

Evening classes, 115.

I should not approve of appropriations to universities all over the land, and do not consider it a precedent in voting for this bill or for an appropriation to this university. Located in the National Capital of the country, and having in its student body men from nearly every State of the Union, all received upon the same basis and the same tuition, it is national in all respects. It is not generally known that the National Government appropriates eight millions of dollars and over to universities and colleges in all sections of the country. These appropriations are what are generally known as land-grant appropriations. Some $4,317,583 goes to those States north of the Mason and Dixon line, and $3,759,742 to those States south and west of the Mason and Dixon line, of which our own Maryland Agricultural College, now a part of the University of Maryland, receives $142,936. The truth is: The Maryland Agricultural College should receive at least $50,000 more, because it not only acts as the land-grant college of Maryland, but also for the District of Columbia, having more than 200 students from the District. The District now receives no part of these land-grant appropriations, which it should receive and definitely designate the Maryland school as its land-grant college.

I merely quote these appropriations to show that it is nothing new for Congress to make appropriations for educational purposes.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I can not resist the temptation to call the attention of this House to the stand it took against permitting our Maryland students from surrounding counties to attend the schools of the District. It was certainly to my mind a very shortsighted policy, and one not in accord with the good-will policy which should exist between Maryland (practically the metropolitan district of the city of Washington) and the District of Columbia itself. There will be a chance for this House to reverse itself and to do justice to Maryland and Virginia in this matter. [Applause.]

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes, which will consume all my time, to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. SUMMERS].

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Mr. Chairman, Howard University was incorporated by the Congress of the United States in 1867, and for 48 years the Congress has been making annual appropriations to help to support this worthy institution.

The negro problem is not an important problem in my State, but we all recognize the importance and the necessity of helping to solve what is commonly spoken of as the negro problem throughout the country. Here is a great institution with 2,000 students, with instructors, many of whom have been graduated from Yale and Harvard Universities. They are doing very high-class work. They are doing for the colored people what we are doing for the white young men and women throughout the country. This means nothing new. This does not mean that any larger sums of money will be appropriated in the future than in the past, but it will permit us to do in an orderly and in a parliamentary way that which we have been doing for the past 48 years.

I shall vote for the bill. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired, and the Clerk will read the bill for amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 8 of an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Howard University in the District of Columbia," approved March 2, 1867, be amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 8. Annual appropriations are hereby authorized to aid in the construction, development, improvement, and maintenance of the university, no part of which shall be used for religious instruction. The university shall at all times be open to inspection by the Bureau of Education and shall be inspected by the said bureau at least once each year. An annual report making a full exhibit of the affairs of the university shall be presented to Congress each year in the report of the Bureau of Education."

Mr. LOWREY. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. LOWREY: In line 8, after "university," strike out the comma and the words "no part of which" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "in amounts not exceeding those which annually may be appropriated toward the support and maintenance of George Washington University in the District of Columbia which are hereby authorized, and no part of the said appropriations to Howard University."

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. LOWREY. Will the gentleman reserve it?

Mr. CRAMTON. I will reserve it.

Mr. LOWREY. Mr. Chairman, all this amendment does is this: It does not take away a thing from Howard University, but it does give Congress the same power to appropriate to a university for white people in the District that we are using to appropriate for the negro students.

Now, there are over twice as many young white people in George Washington University as there are negro students in Howard University. The university reports to me about two-thirds of the students in George Washington University are young women and men who are working in the departments of the Government, in congressional offices, running elevators and working hard during the day and then spending their hard-earned money and their time at the university instead of taking recreation.

If we are going to adopt the policy of appropriating to universities in Washington it seems to me we should adopt this amendment. You talk about having to account to the negro vote in your districts. What about the vote of the young white folks who are here from the congressional districts in the United States? There are more than twice as many of them at the George Washington University as there are negro students at the Howard University.

All I ask is to do like the chairman of the Appropriations Committee not long ago did when he came on the floor and said, "I know this is subject to a point of order, but I hope no gentleman will make it, and if it is not made and goes through it will be legal if no point of order is made against it." What I want to appeal to is the loyalty of this Congress to the struggling young white people in George Washington University as well as the negro students in Howard University. These white students pay more than twice as much tuition because they get nothing from the Government.

Now, if we are going to maintain a university in the District of Columbia let us make it two. This provides that Congress may legally appropriate for George Washington University.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi as not germane. We are amending the act incorporating Howard University, and the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi authorizes an appropriation for another university and is not germane. I think that is probably sufficient grounds for the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. LOWREY. Will the gentleman yield to me to offer my second amendment, and then he can proceed?

Mr. McKEOWN. I will yield.

Mr. LOWREY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. LOWREY: Page 2, line 5, after the word "education," insert a new sentence, as follows: "All expenditures incurred under this section shall be charged against the revenues of the District of Columbia and the Treasury of the United States in the manner prescribed in the appropriation act in which the provisions therefor are contained."

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I think I know pretty well the minds of the men from the southern part of the United States on this question of the education of the Negro race. I know that the State of Oklahoma is spending generously to-day and has so spent in the past for the education of the negro. The only proposition here is that, because a man votes against this bill, you want to class him as being opposed to the education of the negro. It depends a good deal upon the viewpoint as to what kind of education he is going to get. I know that the education of the negro has been to the benefit of the race, and everybody knows that; but there are some things taught in some places that are not good for the race, nor good for the white people.

Mr. O'CONNELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKEOWN. Yes.

Mr. O'CONNELL. His education ordinarily is limited now, and, if you don't give him this opportunity, he will not get any chance at all.

Mr. McKEOWN. I say this to the gentleman. Proper education for the negro is a matter that should be sought and is sponsored, I dare say, by every man who lives in this country, whether he is from the South or the North. But I call attention to this. You are here legalizing—and I do not know whether it has been approved by the Budget or not—appropriations in the future for this school, and you do not know whether they are going to teach the things that are going to be for the benefit of the Negro race or not.

Mr. O'CONNELL. We have been doing it for 49 years.

Mr. McKEOWN. Yes; and the RECORD here shows that they are advocating intermarriage between the white and black races, and the gentleman knows that that means the destruction of this country if it be maintained.

Mr. O'CONNELL. The gentleman does not know that.

Mr. McKEOWN. The gentleman knows that the RECORD shows that that was taught. I suggest the gentleman look at the RECORD of March 7.

Mr. GALLIVAN. What RECORD would show that?

Mr. McKEOWN. The RECORD of Congress of March 7. At that time there was inserted a statement that has not been denied.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Will the gentleman tell me who wrote that?

Mr. McKEOWN. It was a statement alleged to have been made by the president of Howard University. I am in favor of the education of the negro, but I want to see to it that he is properly educated and that something is not built up here that will destroy the country.

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKEOWN. Yes.

Mr. LEAVITT. Is not this the situation? It was charged on the floor of the House that such teaching had been made.

Mr. McKEOWN. Yes.

Mr. LEAVITT. The question was asked by the gentleman from New York [Mr. CLARKE] as to whether there was any proof of that. No proof was given except a clipping. The gentleman from New York [Mr. CLARKE] the next day or so put into the RECORD a letter from the president of Howard University setting forth his side of the question, and entirely denying it, and as far as I am concerned, satisfactorily denying it.

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKEOWN. Yes.

Mr. TARVER. Does the gentleman know that the letter from the president of Howard University that was inserted by Mr. CLARKE makes no positive denial of the charge that was made upon the floor?

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKEOWN. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. Does the gentleman recall when this question came before the House on the matter of appropriating $390,000 to Howard University, which was inserted in the Senate on the Interior appropriation bill?

Mr. McKEOWN. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. The gentleman from Oklahoma who now has the floor was one of 259 Members of the House who voted for that appropriation.

Mr. McKEOWN. Yes; I voted for it at that time, because I believe in education, but I am not going to vote for this bill which would perpetuate this thing. At present you have not a law making it legal, and it is subject to a point of order, then whenever they get teaching things of that kind in that school the Congress of the United States at any time can withdraw its aid. You are here fixing it so that we can not withdraw that aid.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. LOWREY. Mr. Chairman, I rise now to speak on my second amendment, which simply provides that the appropriations made to this institution shall be made out of the funds of the District just as other educational funds in the District are appropriated. A claim has been made that this education is national in its scope.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LOWREY. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. Did I understand the gentleman just now to say that his amendment provided that the appropriations should be divided as between the Federal Government and the District, as other appropriations in that bill? The word "other" is not in the amendment.

Mr. LOWREY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be again reported.

There being no objection, the Clerk again reported the amendment, as follows:

On page 2, line 5, after the word "education" insert a new sentence as follows: "All expenditures incurred under this section shall be charged against the revenues of the District of Columbia and the Treasury of the United States in the manner prescribed in the appropriation act in which the appropriations therefor are contained."

Mr. LOWREY. Is that satisfactory?

Mr. CRAMTON. That is not in accord with the gentleman's understanding. That amendment would mean that each year's appropriation bill must prescribe how the funds shall be divided. It does not say that they shall be divided in accordance with other appropriations in the Interior appropriation bill. If so, that would mean nothing charged to the District, because the other appropriations are not charged to the District.

Mr. LOWREY. The gentleman means that the educational appropriations, the school appropriations in the District, are not charged to the District?

Mr. CRAMTON. But this item will be carried in the Interior Department appropriation bill, and the District of Columbia items are in a different bill. The gentleman's amendment would have the effect of leaving the question open for the determination of Congress each year, just as I may say of this bill if it becomes a law as written it leaves to Congress each year the decision of whether it will make any appropriation or not.

And if the majority of Congress should feel like that in making appropriations, no appropriation would be made.

Mr. LOWREY. To be frank, in order to try to make sure of my amendment, I had it prepared by the clerk in the rooms of the Committee on Appropriations. My idea was simply to charge this item to the District and make that institution one supported by the District of Columbia.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LOWREY. Yes.

Mr. CELLER. In the hearings conducted in 1926 the figures would indicate that these students came from 38 different States, including the District of Columbia. Would the gentleman saddle the entire burden on the District of Columbia for education given to citizens and residents of the States?

Mr. LOWREY. I certainly would, in this way: There are 9 colleges out of 10 in my country which are sustained largely by contributions made by the cities in which they are located. Those cities get every cultural advantage that comes to the college. They get the money brought in by the students. Every State institution, I think, in my State that has been located in any town has received money largely from the town in which it is located, and I notice that wherever colleges are maintained in a town, that town gets so much advantage from those who come from outside and who bring their money there and spend it there that the town readily contributes to the support of the institution.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section, and all amendments thereto, be now closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York moves that all debate on this section, and all amendments thereto, be now closed. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. GREEN of Florida. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 102, noes 25.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the enacting clause. I am not sure if the motion is debatable, despite the action of the committee just taken.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia moves to strike out the enacting clause. Does the gentleman from Georgia desire to be heard on his motion?

Mr. TARVER. Yes. In possible explanation of the attitude of the Representatives from New York, Maryland, and other neighboring States I want to point out——

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. TARVER. I do not yield, Mr. Chairman. I have the floor, and I do not yield to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York will state the point of order.

Mr. REED of New York. I make the point of order that the debate is exhausted.

Mr. TARVER. I am not yielding to the gentleman at this point.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the Chair hear me a moment on the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. Will the gentleman from New York state his point of order?

Mr. EDWARDS. Is the Chair ready to rule on that point and does not know what it is?

Mr. REED of New York. The debate is exhausted. The motion has been made and agreed to, to close all debate on the section and all amendments thereto.

Mr. TARVER. The point of order of the gentleman not having been made at the time I arose and addressed the Chair and the Chair having allowed me to proceed, the gentleman's point of order is too late.

The CHAIRMAN. The question in point is the ruling made by Mr. Chairman MacArthur, that a motion to strike out the enacting clause is debatable, even though the debate has been closed on a pending section.

Mr. TARVER. I am glad the Chair did not decide against me.

I started out to say that as a possible explanation of the attitude of Representatives from near-by States, I point to the fact that in the hearings upon a similar bill in 1926 it was shown that out of a total of 2,032 composing the student body of Howard University, 1,119 came from the District of Columbia, and the States of Maryland, Virginia, Delaware, and Pennsylvania, and only 395, or less than 20 per cent, came from the 10 States of the South, excluding Virginia, where the bulk of the negro population of this country resides. Therefore, as I said a while ago, this is a bill to take care of an educational problem that is more or less local to the District of Columbia and the adjoining territory. Again, there is not a single Federal dollar available for the professional education of the white man. The money appropriated under the so-called Morrill Act is for instruction in agriculture and the mechanic arts. All the other money appropriated for educational purposes to which the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] made reference, a while ago, is expended under the direction of the Federal Board for Vocational Education and under the administration of the Department of Agriculture in agricultural extension work and in the conduct of experiment stations.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TARVER. No; I do not yield because the gentleman refused to yield to me to ask him a question when he was discussing the same subject matter. The statements inserted in the RECORD which purport to show discrimination in the South in the allocation of Federal educational funds are erroneous, as will be proven by some data that I inserted in the RECORD on March 1, 1928. Those data show that the gentleman's figures are fallacious, and I trust gentlemen who are interested will find time to examine my remarks on the subject in the RECORD of March 1. It is conclusively shown that the charge of discrimination in the South in the allocation of funds for educational purposes received from the Federal Government is groundless.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask for recognition.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman rise in opposition to the amendment?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I am against the motion to strike out the enacting clause of this bill because I believe it is a good bill. [Applause.] The colored race must have teachers, they must have doctors, they must have dentists, they must have nurses, they must have preachers, and they must have others of their race trained to guide them properly, and it is Howard University that gives this training to this race of colored people, that has suffered from time to eternity under the terrible handicap which God has seen fit to place upon them, and God knows they need this encouragement.

This colored race can get this special training in no other way. Colored students from Texas and every other State come to this colored school. I am one southern Democrat who is not afraid to vote for it, and there is not a colored vote in my district that will come to me by reason of my vote, not one; there is not a colored vote in Texas under our primary system there that could come to me by reason of my vote, hence I can reap no political benefit from it; and if there is a white vote in my district or in my State that would vote against me because I would give to this race this educational institution to train teachers, doctors, dentists, nurses, and preachers for them, then let it be cast against me. I am not turned hither or thither by the way the wind blows. I am going to do my duty on this bill and respecting every other bill that comes up regardless of political criticism. I think this bill should pass and I do not believe that a southern Democrat or a northern Democrat will be hurt by a roll call, and if they have a roll call let us southern men stand here like a solid phalanx and give this needed training to the colored race. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on striking out the enacting clause.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, while the Chair has ruled upon the point of order, I think it is very important that the exact parliamentary situation should appear. It is entirely within the discretion of the Chair whether he cares to hear any further discussion upon the question of the point of order. Of course, if the Chair has foreclosed that matter, then there can not be any further discussion, but I want to call attention to the special rule under which we are proceeding and to the effect of that rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair believes it is of grave consequence that there shall be no erroneous ruling to serve as a precedent which will embarrass future presiding officers. He believes that the welfare of the House calls for the hearing of further debate on the question.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I call the attention of the Chair to page 387 of the House Manual, 1927 edition, where I read:

> And where a special order provided that a bill should be open to amendment in Committee of the Whole, a motion to strike out the enacting words was held out of order. (Hinds' Precedents IV, 3251.)

The present rule provides:

> That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed one hour, to be equally divided and controlled by those favoring and opposing the bill, the bill shall be read for amendment under the five-minute rule.

I have not had time to refer to the precedent but have asked the parliamentary clerk to find it for me. It is in Hinds', IV, 3215.

I call further attention to page 103 of the admirable work by Mr. CANNON, a Member of this House, Procedure in the House of Representatives, where I read the following:

> The reading of a bill for amendment in Committee of the Whole being concluded, a motion to strike out the enacting clause is not in order.

The reading of this bill for amendment has been concluded. It is true an amendment may still be offered, but the reading for amendment has been concluded and, therefore, a motion to strike out the enacting clause is not now in order. The purpose is that a motion to strike out the enacting clause should be made before a bill has been completely read and before all other opportunity for action has been closed.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman inform the Chair, inasmuch as this is a bill of but one section, when that other opportunity might have presented itself?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. This section, of course, is the entire bill. I think it should have been offered at once after reading. The reading has now been concluded.

Mr. CANNON. If the Chair will permit, I think the Chair will recall that two years ago, when the McNary-Haugen bill was under consideration the same point of order was raised and reference was made to the precedent which has just been cited. The Chair at that time, ruling hastily, sustained the point of order, but subsequently determined that this ruling was erroneous; that a motion to strike out the enacting clause is itself an amendment and is, therefore, in order.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Under a special rule, may I ask the gentleman?

Mr. CANNON. Yes; under a special rule. We were proceeding at that time under a special order—precisely the situation we have here.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois desire to be heard further?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. No. I thank the Chair.

Under the leave to extend my remarks I wish to add that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON] has refreshed my recollection as to the precedent I had in mind which relates to the main point that I desired to urge upon the chair. The ruling was by Chairman GRAHAM, of Illinois, on May 31, 1924, and may be read on page 10057 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for the first session of the Sixty-eighth Congress. The McNary-Haugen bill was under consideration under a special rule, which provided that the bill should be read for amendment under the five-minute rule. At the conclusion of the consideration of the bill the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] moved to strike out the enacting clause. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON] made the point of order that the motion was not in order because of the provision of the special rule that the bill should be read for amendment in committee under the five-minute rule. Mr. CANNON also made the point of order that the motion to strike out the enacting clause was not in order after the completion of the reading of the bill. After considerable debate the Chairman, Mr. GRAHAM, of Illinois, sustained the point of order. Upon an appeal taken from the decision of the Chair by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] the Chair was sustained by a vote of 179 ayes and 15 noes. The only point passed upon by the Chairman on this occasion was the effect of the special order, which provided that a bill should be open to amendment in Committee of the Whole. The Chair did not at that time pass upon the question whether the motion came too late during the consideration of the bill in the committee.

In fairness I wish to add that I am informed that subsequently the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM] stated aliunde that he had reached the conclusion that the decision was incorrect. However, the precedent stands as the judgment of the Committee of the Whole on the occasion cited.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on striking out the enacting clause.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON), there were—ayes 28, noes 123.

So the motion was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now comes on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LOWREY].

The amendment was again reported.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The rule provides that the committee shall now rise.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LUCE, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 279, had directed him to report the same back to the House without amendment, with the recommendation that the bill do pass.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule, the previous question is ordered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 226, nays 94, answered "present" 2, not voting 112, as follows:

On motion of Mr. REED of New York, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

FURTHER MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A further message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its principal clerk, announced that the Senate had passed with an amendment the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 217) entitled "Joint resolution providing for the remission of duties on certain cattle which have crossed the boundary line into foreign countries," in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 253) entitled "Joint resolution authorizing certain customs officials to administer oaths."

REMISSION OF DUTIES ON CATTLE

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table House Joint Resolution 217, providing for the remission of duties on certain cattle which have crossed the boundary line into foreign countries, and agree to the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment.

The Senate amendment was agreed to.

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that to-morrow, after the reading of the Journal and the disposition of business on the Speaker's tables and special orders, my colleague, Mr. MCREYNOLDS, may be permitted to address the House for 20 minutes on bill 10167, relating to the immigration conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that to-morrow, after the reading of the Journal, disposition of business on the Speaker's table, and special orders, his colleague, Mr. MCREYNOLDS, may address the House for 20 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

IMMIGRATION QUOTAS

Mr. SINCLAIR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. SINCLAIR. Mr. Speaker, on the subject of immigration quotas on the basis of the national origins law that has been enacted by the Congress there are many serious objections that I wish to set out! At the time the law was passed no one knew how it would work nor how it would affect the stream of immigration to this country. Certain undesirables were coming to the United States. It was thought that this law would stop them. It was adopted hastily as a compromise in a difficult legislative situation.

The policy of restricted immigration which we established in the act of 1920 was a new one for the Nation. It met with much opposition because of the many nationalities represented in our citizenship. It was based on the 1920 census, and permitted each nation to send to this country annually 3 per cent as many immigrants as there were people of that nationality living here as disclosed by that census.

Before the passage of the 1920 act the United States was the haven for the oppressed of all nations of the world. This was the first quota law ever passed by Congress, but the countries of the Western Hemisphere were exempted from its provisions. The law did not work out when applied as its proponents hoped that it would. It admitted too few people from northern and western Europe and more from southern and eastern Europe than seemed desirable. As a result there have been strong protests against it from our great Northwest.

The upper Mississippi Valley States were settled, for the most part, during the two decades following the War between the States. Immigration from northern Europe was heavy during that period. The rich agricultural lands offered by the Government as free homesteads appealed especially to the Scandinavian and German peoples. In some States over half the pioneer population was made up of these very desirable farmers. The need for this class of settler is just as keenly felt in some farming sections to-day. Not only would more liberal immigration quotas from the northern countries of Europe make farm help more plentiful and reduce the cost of production, but they would go a long way in solving the trend toward increased farm tenancy.

Because of the unsatisfactory operation of the first quota law, both the friends and opponents of restricted immigration were anxious for some change. In 1924 a new quota bill was passed in the House. It cut the percentage to 2 per cent and was based on the 1890 census. This would have given the Nation the same strain-of-blood immigrants that it received during the period of our greatest growth and expansion. Under its provisions northern Europe would have been more favored. However, while the bill was under consideration in the other body of the Congress the "national origins" provision was proposed. No definite basis for its application was ever fully explained. The bill came back to the House from the Senate with this amendment and was hastily concurred in. I was one of the few Members who believed that the bill with this amendment included could not help but work injustice upon the Scandinavian and German peoples, and that this provision had not received the careful consideration it should have had before adoption. I therefore voted against the measure.

The quotas of 2 per cent, based on the 1890 census, have never been put into effect. They were suspended, and the Secretaries of State, Commerce, and Labor were directed to work out new quotas based on the "national origins" and to submit a report to Congress. Manifestly it would be impossible for officials to ascertain in a limited time the national origins in a nation like ours. We have nearly 120,000,000 people, representing almost every country on the face of the earth. They have intermarried to such an extent that as many as half a dozen nationalities may be represented in the grandchildren of one family. This mingling of races is the melting pot of democracy, and is distinctive of America. It makes for a virile and vigorous citizenship. Regardless of national origin, all are Americanized, and adopt the habits, customs, language, education, and life of this country. The result is that the parent land of origin is soon lost and wholly untraceable.

The Secretaries, therefore, soon encountered difficulties when they attempted a determination of the national origins of our population upon which to base the quotas under the law. The task was seemingly a hopeless one, and more time was needed. Finally it was discovered in a study of the problem that the first census of the United States was of a different character than that taken in later years. It was simply a list of the names of all residents. These were the original 100 per cent Americans, if we except the Indian population. Of course they were preponderantly English, and if taken as a basis from which to start, an unfair advantage would be given the quota from Great Britain. In addition, since the tendency is to Anglicize every name, many descendants of other races soon became identified as of English origin. Thus it will be seen that the English quota profited at the expense of the Scandinavian, German, and other nationalities.

The practical effect of this system of determining the immigration quotas on the basis of national origin, as worked out by the experts, is that Great Britain and Northern Ireland nearly double their quotas, while Germany and the Irish Free State lose nearly half; Norway and Sweden lose nearly two-thirds, Denmark over one-half, and Switzerland about one-third. All of these nationals, from every standpoint of American citizenship, are highly desirable immigrants. There should be no discrimination against any of them in favor of others. Particularly should no such unjust discrimination be made against those aliens who naturally gravitate to the farms upon arrival in America, in favor of those who remain in the big cities.

The records bear out the statement that the greater percentage of German and Scandinavian immigrants turn to farming, while those of Irish and English origin find homes in the urban centers. The effect of this is to work a hardship on the already depressed industry of agriculture. Moreover, the people of northern Europe have been led to believe by their relatives in this country that they would soon have an opportunity to come here under the provisions of the first restriction law. To cut their quotas now would be unfair and disappointing. Under the new plan, the applications of many of these prospective immigrants may never be reached.

Vigorous opposition to the law has been aroused. Members of Congress are being petitioned, and rightly, for its repeal. In my judgment, the "national origins" method is wholly unworkable and should never be enforced. It is inequitable and unjust to a large proportion of our best citizens.

Since the World War the question of immigration has been a troublesome one for nearly all countries. The war-torn nations of Europe are overcrowded and deeply in debt. Their people are seeking to get away from the burdensome taxes, and to go where the struggle for existence is less intense. The more favored Western Hemisphere is the mecca of all. There was a time when every immigrant was regarded as an asset, yet nowadays he is welcome almost nowhere. Many of our naturalized citizens are at a loss to understand this changed attitude, as are their relatives still in the old countries waiting to join them here. There is criticism and resentment in many sections. The question is one of growing concern. Those who have given it close study realize that it is one of the most portentous problems Congress has to solve. In arriving at a solution it is highly important that the deplorable condition of agriculture be given due consideration to the end that no program be adopted which will discriminate against the Scandinavian and German peoples, who form a most valuable part of our farming population. In my State a majority of our pioneer farmers and their descendants are of German or Scandinavian origin. In their behalf, I earnestly urge the repeal of this discriminatory law.

The table below will show the immigration quotas from the different countries under the proposed national origins, and the present plan based on the 1890 foreign-born population:

TOLL BRIDGE ON PUBLIC ROADS

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a statement in relation to the building of toll bridges on public roads.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Speaker, for the last decade State highway departments have been taking over toll roads and abolishing their objectionable traffic-retarding gates as rapidly as possible, but private interests have been busy acquiring exclusive rights to construct bridges at commanding locations on the public highways and setting up new gates. Many of these bring the owners a rate of return on the capital invested far in excess of the most profitable toll roads.

A survey just completed by the Bureau of Public Roads, so I am advised, shows that there were 233 toll bridges in operation in the United States at the beginning of this year. Eighty-six of these were built within the last 10 years. This means that the number of such bridges now operated has increased nearly 60 per cent in the 10-year period.

There are at present 29 new toll bridges under construction and 163 proposed for construction. Included in the number proposed for construction are all projected bridges regarding which some definite step has been taken, such as the filing of an application for franchise or the organization of a company to finance the construction. If the proposed bridges are completed and those now under construction put into operation and those already in operation are continued, then the number of toll bridges in the United States will be nearly doubled in a few years.

Of the 233 bridges now in operation, 191 are privately owned and 20 of the 29 under construction are being built by private concerns. The remaining number in each case are publicly owned and operated, and in most of these cases they are being operated with the intention of lifting the toll as soon as the bridges are paid for.

In order to demonstrate the return on the investment in several privately owned bridges as revealed by reports of the owners, I am giving below some facts and figures as cited in the reports. One of these is the bridge over the Potomac River at Williamsport, Md., which was built at a cost of $87,000 in 1907. The public is still paying toll for the use of the bridge, notwithstanding the fact that it has long since paid for its construction. In 1926 alone the net operating income, after deducting all costs, taxes, and so forth, from the tolls received, was over $41,000, or almost 50 per cent of the original cost, and a dividend of $32,000 was declared, which was 32 per cent on the $100,000 of common stock. The Gandy Bridge over Tampa Bay, between Tampa and St. Petersburg, Fla., yielded in 1926 a total net income, after deduction of all expenses including depreciation, of nearly $211,000 on an investment in tangible property of $2,158,000. This instance, perhaps, is more nearly typical of the majority. In the case of the Pollock Bridge over the Platte River at Plattsmouth, Nebr., the capital invested yielded a gross income of more than 150 per cent annually from 1923 to 1925.

The majority of the toll bridges in the country are on roads which are part of the Federal-aid highway system; the reason for this being that this system of 186,000 miles includes the most important State and interstate roads which are, therefore, the most heavily traveled roads in the country. Of the 425 toll bridges in operation, under construction, or proposed at the beginning of the year, 217, which is more than half the entire number, were on the Federal-aid system. Sixty of these were on roads included in State highway systems but not in the Federal-aid system, and 148 were on other roads.

The State highway officials and the officials of the Bureau of Public Roads oppose the further construction of toll bridges to be operated by private interests. They insist, and rightly so, that the public should not be compelled to pay profits to private bridge operators long after the cost of construction of the bridges has been paid for by the public in tolls. These same State and Government officials oppose the collection of tolls on public bridges after the cost of financing their construction has been met.

The fact that there are cases in which the financing of the cost of expensive bridges by means of tolls is the only practicable means is recognized by the highway officials, but at the same time they insist that the bridges should be built and operated publicly and that the toll should be collected only so long as may be necessary to pay the costs of construction. To encourage the adoption of this method, the Oldfield bill, which was passed at the last session of Congress, permits the payment of one-half the cost of important bridges on the Federal-aid system by the Federal Government and the financing of the other half of the cost by the State through State-collected tolls.

A very large amount of money now being made by private operators as profit on investments can be saved to the traveling public by either taking advantage of the Federal assistance thus offered or by the construction and operation of necessary toll bridges by the States.

The public can borrow money on terms at least as favorable as those available to private builders, and usually on better terms. Public agencies can erect and operate the bridges as efficiently and economically as the private owners and by abolishing the tolls after the bridges are paid for, the traveling public will be saved the payment of handsome profits thus discouraging the increasing private interest in toll-bridge construction.

There is an active market for revenue bonds which are secured and retired with no other funds than the revenues derived from the tolls collected, and by resorting to this method of financing costly bridges can be built by the public without increasing taxes, and can be paid for by those who use them without paying several times their cost in profits, therefore, it is no longer necessary to entail an increase of property taxation to provide a sinking fund and interest by borrowing money for bridge construction. If the bridges are built by public agencies there is also the assurance of open competition and the awarding of the contract to the lowest responsible bidder, thereby obtaining the minimum cost of construction, which will be a saving to the public.

The fact that 63 of the 163 new bridges proposed at the beginning of the year will be publicly owned and operated indicates a growing belief that these bridges should be operated by the public. This is a larger proportion by far than is found among the bridges now in operation and under construction. There is still a very active private interest, however, for 33 bills authorizing the construction of a particular private toll bridge have been passed by the House since Congress convened in December, or the first of this session of Congress.

An investigation by the State Highway Commission of the State of Washington revealed that the cost of collecting the tolls amounts to from 15 to 27 per cent of the tolls collected. The report of this investigation, which was authorized by the Washington Legislature, shows further that the cost of service on all toll bridges on the highway system of the State is from 63 to 185 per cent higher than similar service would cost if the bridges were free; therefore it would appear that whenever it is at all possible, necessary bridges should be financed without toll collection.

FIFTH ANNUAL SHENANDOAH APPLE BLOSSOM FESTIVAL

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that my colleague Mr. HARRISON may be given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the fifth annual Shenandoah apple blossom festival.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that his colleague Mr. HARRISON may extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, I take advantage of the authority granted me to extend my remarks to call attention to the fifth annual Shenandoah Apple Blossom Festival, to be held at Winchester, Va., during the coming May. In the name of the people of the Shenandoah Valley of Virginia, I desire to extend to the Members of Congress and to the public a hearty invitation to visit this most beautiful of all valleys when its glory is enhanced by the bloom of millions of apple trees. The apple orchards have developed into a tremendous industry, and we claim that no better apples are grown than in this valley; and we are anxious for visitors to see this favored section at a time when its possibilities can be best appreciated. For miles, in apple-blossom season, the tourist may travel through territory redolent with the aroma and glorified with the beauty of the blossoms.

Highly improved roads pass through this section from every center of population. Seven splendid highways come into Winchester like spokes into a hub. In addition, the railroad facilities are excellent. Living in a section famous for its scenic beauty, the people are the most generous and hospitable in the world. Perhaps in no other section of the United States are there as many localities of great historic interest. The section is rich in colonial and Revolutionary lore. Here are the scenes of great Civil War battles: New Market, where the cadets of the Virginia Military Institute won undying fame and glory on the field of battle; Kernstown, where Jackson met his one repulse; Cedar Creek, where Sheridan ended his historic ride; and at Winchester still stands Fort Loudoun, built by George Washington in 1756, when the valley was the western frontier of English civilization.

Here are some of the greatest of natural phenomena which attract tourists from all over the civilized world: The Shenandoah Caverns, Endless Caverns, Luray Caverns, the Grottoes, and Natural Bridge are visited yearly by hundreds of thousands of visitors. In this vicinity are located the greatest educational institutions of the South: The University of Virginia, founded by Jefferson; Washington and Lee, of which Robert E. Lee was at one time the president; and the Virginia Military Institute. Within 20 miles of Winchester begins the proposed Shenandoah National Park, which in the next year or so will be a reality and which will be the Nation's playground.

Last May at the fourth annual festival, which in its main features was a duplication of previous ones, a hundred thousand visitors flocked to Winchester. On the first day 6,000 children marched through the streets of Winchester keeping step to the beat of drums and to the time of the music of the various bands in the line of march. In the afternoon the lovely Mrs. Isabelle Gilpin, daughter of the distinguished Senator TYSON, of Tennessee, was crowned queen of the festival by Hanford McNider, Assistant Secretary of War. At the coronation her court included 60 princesses and 200 flower girls. On the second day of the festival a parade 5 miles long was staged, which required an hour and a half to pass the spectator. It included 155 floats and 29 bands, among which appeared Captain Benner and his famous Navy Band. For the coming festival preparations are being made to surpass those of the past in splendor and brilliance. In the pageant there will be symbolic representations of the wonderful historic past of the Shenandoah Valley, its equally wonderful present developments, and its glorious possibilities of the future. The queen will again be attended by a bevy of beautiful princesses and the parades are expected to be more spectacular than in the past; Captain Benner will again be present with his band, while Commander Richard E. Byrd, world-famed explorer, will in all probability be in Winchester, his home town, on this occasion.

An artistic program has been prepared and will be mailed to anyone who will write for a copy to Mr. Ray Robinson, Winchester, Va.

I repeat a pressing invitation to take advantage of this occasion to see the Shenandoah Valley when by nature she is robed in her choicest apparel and stands arrayed in unparalleled loveliness. Historical old Virginia will throw wide her gateway, open her arms, and extend to each and all who honor her with their presence a most cordial welcome.

FLORIDA'S CONGRESSIONAL REPRESENTATION

Mr. SEARS of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing an article prepared by Dr. R. M. Harper, of Florida, on congressional representation.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SEARS of Florida. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following:

TALLAHASSEE, FLA., March 23, 1928—Florida should have seven Congressmen after the next census instead of its present membership of four if the present ratio of congressional apportionment is maintained, Dr. R. M. Harper, statistician and geographer, believes.

Doctor Harper's estimate is based upon calculations of his own, given in the past as to Florida's growth in population and reiteration of his prediction of a year ago that the State should have about 1,750,000 inhabitants at the census of 1930, barring unforeseen complications.

The congressional apportionment, however, which at present is based upon about one Congressman to every 250,000 inhabitants, is usually raised each time to keep the lower division of the National Assembly from becoming too large, the statistician pointed out; but even if it is raised to 300,000, he reasoned, Florida should be entitled to six Congressmen instead of five, which seems to be the plan now.

In view of the speculation indulged in of late as to how many Congressmen Florida would be entitled to after the United States census of 1930, Doctor Harper has briefly reviewed analyses and estimates of the standing and potential population of the State, which revealed an unprecedented growth. Recent estimates of the State's probable population at that time have generally been based on the assumption that the increase would continue at the same rate as that between 1920 and 1925.

Nevertheless, says the statistician, the greatest increase of population in 1925 took place after the State census, which was taken in the spring, and 1926 was a year of great activity also. Doctor Harper in a statement given out through the Associated Press early in February, 1927, estimated from a study of marriage figures, school enrollment, gasoline consumption, etc., that the State's population increased about 20 per cent in the year 1925, and nearly half as much in 1926, making a total of about 1,600,000 at the beginning of 1927. His estimate for the middle of 1926, used in calculating the marriage rate for that year, in another Associated Press story in December, 1927, gave results which he believed absolutely consistent with those of previous years.

Not enough 1927 figures are available as yet to make an estimate of the population for the past year, the statistician declared, but he added that he sees no reason for changing his estimate of a year ago that Florida should have about 1,750,000 inhabitants at the census of 1930, barring unforeseen complications.

MISSISSIPPI FLOOD

Mr. REID of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by including a portion of the report of the Committee on Flood Control relating to the Mississippi problem which will be before the House in a short time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. REID of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, a few observations are advisable before one can understand the issues presented in the consideration of the flood-control problem of the Mississippi River.

We are confronted with a condition, not a theory, and every hour's delay may add another chapter to the awful story of misery and death. The results of the flood of 1927 are listed hereafter; even if the horrors of that disastrous flood are not still fresh in the reader's mind. Under the present law the United States says to the threatened ones, "No pay, no protection." To stave off famine and probably the horrible fate of drowning, the people of the lower Mississippi Valley appeal to us. What shall our answer be? Let those loyal to the dollar stand aside while those loyal to humanity come to the front. No cold, discriminating policy of economy will decide this issue, and any party advocating such a move had better look to its laurels.

Some say that it is not the affair of the United States Government to do this work. But who can stand idly by and see that land devastated and depopulated, business interests destroyed, commercial intercourse cut off, and people starved and degraded?

It may be the naked legal right of the United States Government to stand thus idly by, but if it does it is not worth the name. And those who do so say do not represent American sentiment; they do not represent American patriotism.

This Congress is being appealed to; the South, the whole United States, and the whole world will judge our actions. Shall we stamp ourselves as petty and provincial, or shall we be recorded as magnanimous and national?

Is our civilization so little removed from barbarism that it will permit hundreds to be drowned and thousands to be made homeless and destitute while, like Shylock, it demands its pound of flesh from those who can not pay? That they can not pay is not on account of their own indolence or neglect but because the progress of industry in other States pours down upon them oceans of destructive flood waters in order that those States may continue to progress and prosper.

As early as 1850 Congress was warned that the process by which the country above is relieved is also that by which the country below is ruined; yet we permit the destructive waters to ravage our towns and destroy the lives of our people. The river is as cold and heartless as an enemy in war. Yet we do not defend against it.

The Mississippi River has worked the deadliest wrong to this country—its gifts to the South are discontent, impoverishment, and degradation.

The farmer and his family must live in semistarvation, in wretched hovels, amid squaldor and privations, barbed by the thought that any little money earned by labor and sweat from day to day will have to go to the Federal Government to pay for levees.

After the flood had subsided these people had no homes to which to return; their fields have grown up to weeds, they have no mules, no implements of husbandry with which to begin anew the cultivation of the soil, they have no seed, they have nothing; yet they are asked to pay a special tax to be permitted to earn a living and to be saved from drowning.

The conscience of the whole country has been aroused by the frightful destruction in the lower valley. Nothing less than an adequate, comprehensive plan of 100 per cent flood control without local contribution will satisfy the people of this Nation.

If anyone asks why the Federal Government should be urged to take hold of this problem on a national scale and assume full responsibility for the time, labor, and great cost involved in obtaining complete control of the Mississippi River, surely it is sufficient to remind him that the drainage basin of this great river covers 41 per cent of the total area of the United States. Besides the great investment in the levees, the need of the Mississippi as a carrier of United States and foreign commerce, the havoc wrought to interstate commerce and the interference with the United States mails when uncontrolled, the increase to the National Treasury when industry is not stopped, the safety of life and property and the promotion of its general welfare—these formulate an adequate answer to his questioning attitude. To these might be added one thing that would be worth all the cost—national defense. No foreign foe can ever conquer us as long as navigation is kept open on the Mississippi.

There can be no flood control by local option. Let our duty be met squarely. We have evaded our responsibility long enough.

THE PROBLEM IS HOW TO CONTROL A RAGING TORRENT OF 60,000,000 HORSEPOWER

President Coolidge, in his message to the Seventieth Congress, said of the 1927 flood:

It is necessary to look upon this emergency as a national disaster. It has been so treated from its inception. Our whole people have provided with great generosity for its relief.

The governments of the afflicted areas, both State and municipal, can not be given too high praise for the courageous and helpful way in which they have come to the rescue of the people. If the sources directly chargeable can not meet the demand, the National Government should not fail to provide generous relief.

The people in the flooded area and their representatives have approached this problem in the most generous and broad-minded way. They should be met with a like spirit on the part of the National Government. This is all one country. The public needs of each part must be provided for by the public at large. No required relief should be refused. An adequate plan should be adopted to prevent a recurrence of this disaster in order that the people may restore to productivity and comfort their fields and their towns. * * *

Flood control is a national problem.

President Coolidge, in his message to Congress transmitting the Jadwin report, said:

In my message to the two Houses of Congress at the beginning of the first session of the Seventieth Congress the flood-control problem of the lower Mississippi and the urgent necessity for its solution were outlined.

Hon. Dwight F. Davis, Secretary of War, in his letter accompanying the Jadwin report, said:

A proper regard for the lives and interests of our fellow citizens in the valley requires that legislation be enacted to prevent the repetition of such a disaster not only from the standpoint of loss of life and damages already caused, but also to reduce the chance of an even greater disaster and unparalleled loss of life in the event of the failure of present structures near more thickly populated centers.

Maj. Gen. Edgar Jadwin, Chief of Engineers of the Army, in his report to Congress on the control of the flood waters of the Mississippi River, said:

The cost of the project is unquestionably justified. It will prevent a repetition of the widespread disaster, human suffering, dislocation of the economic life of the valley, interruption of interstate commerce, and the effect on the general welfare of the Nation that attended the recent flood. The expenditure would be justified even though such a flood occurs but once in 150 years. It will prevent the less-extensive flood disasters that are likely to occur at much more frequent intervals. The protection afforded to the cities back of the levees in the valley against a flood even greatly exceeding that just past is especially justifiable from a humanitarian standpoint, since an unexpected break in the levees at these places would probably result in serious loss of life and might be an unparalleled catastrophe. * * *

In view of the national aspect of the flood-control problem from the standpoint both of the cause and of the effects of the floods, and in view of the large sums spent in the past by the people of the valley for flood protection, the sacrifices they have made in meeting their allotments, the great losses suffered in the past flood, and the larger expenditures now required, it is believed that the United States should bear a larger proportion of the cost of construction than in the past, and that the States or local interests be as small as consistent with the results desired. * * *

While $37,440,000 is small in comparison with the amount to be spent by the United States and with the amounts already spent by the people of the valley, it must be remembered that these people still owe considerable sums on their bonds on which the money spent was raised. Some of the levee districts are also near the limit of their bonding power under present State law and also near the limit of their credit. However, it is not equally clear that this expenditure, spread over a 10-year period among four or more States, would constitute an unreasonable burden on the States themselves, in view of the increased taxable values which will result from the improvement. * * *

Its worst characteristic is that its floods inflict at times great damage upon the people and property, in the alluvial valley of the lower river. They take their toll in life and in damage to property, affecting the inhabitants of the valley and investors, manufacturers, and consumers throughout the country. They interfere with the food supply and the general welfare of the country, with its Postal Service and transcontinental and other interstate commerce. * * *

While the great floods of the Mississippi have overflowed thousands of acres of land, destroyed crops by long inundation, and driven the inhabitants temporarily from their homes, there has never as yet been such a catastrophe as would result from the breaking of a levee on the front of the densely settled areas in the cities and the larger towns of the lowlands. This fortunate result is due to the care that is given to the construction and upkeep of levees on city frontages, possible by reason of their greater resources in money and labor. Failures in the long lines of levee that have not these resources have always relieved the situation at important centers of population. * * *

61. The catastrophe resulting from a crevasse on a city front would be so appalling that no measure should be spared to prevent it. * * * * * * Since the protection and preservation of the flood-discharge capacity of the alluvial valley of the Mississippi River is requisite to the common welfare of the Nation and to the preservation of the many lines of interstate commerce which cross the valley, it should be protected and preserved by similar legislation. The warning can not be too strongly emphasized that unless the flood-discharge capacity provided in the plan herein recommended is preserved, a future great flood will result in a disaster as great as or greater than that experienced this year.

The Mississippi River Commission, in its special report on the control of the flood waters of the Mississippi River, said:

The commission is firmly of the opinion that some degree of local financial cooperation is essential to a successful accomplishment of a flood-control project. This opinion is based not on a belief that local interests should share in the cost by reason of their being beneficiaries. * * *

The commission is aware that its operations in the past have been at times hampered through the failure of some levee districts to furnish assurance of their share of the funds needed for levee work, this adversely affecting the prosecution of the work. * * *

The commission is not in possession of the data on which to base a complete economic study of the flood-control project. It has, however, enough data to warrant it in saying that, considering the investment already made in levees, the cost of doing the work above outlined is fully justified from an economic standpoint.

The investment of Federal and other funds already made in levees has been returned in the increase in value of the lands. Without the protection, large areas would have been useless except for the growing timber. Prosperous communities now exist throughout the alluvial valley; all owe their existence to the protection furnished by the levee system. Large investments in roads and railroads have been made possible. The development of the alluvial valley as a whole has added, and will continue to add, much to the wealth of the Nation, and the work of flood control carried on heretofore must be credited with all such gain in national wealth. Greater protection will hold that gain and add to it.

Dr. H. C. Frankenfield, meteorologist, chief of the river and flood division of the United States Weather Bureau, says:

It is easily * * * conceivable that a somewhat smaller amount of precipitation [than occurred in 1927], properly distributed as to place and time, could cause as great a flood as that of 1927. In other words, a series of heavy rains over the central and southern portions of the basin—say five or six rains of 2 or 3 inches or so, separated by intervals of from three to five days—would certainly cause a great flood in the lower Mississippi River if the soil had not been abnormally dry for a long time previous.

Attention is called to the fact that, if the Ohio, the upper Mississippi, and the Missouri Rivers had been in flood stage in the spring of 1927, the flood would have been much greater, and levees from 10 to 20 feet higher would have been required to hold the water.

EFFECT OF 1927 FLOOD

The Mississippi River flood of 1927 was disastrous. In effect it—

1. Killed more than 246;
2. Destroyed hundreds of cities, towns, and villages;
3. Drove 700,000 people from their homes, and rendered them objects of charity, dependent upon the Red Cross and other agencies;
4. Inundated 18,000 square miles;
5. Killed 1,500,000 farm animals;
6. Caused losses amounting to many hundreds of millions of dollars;
7. Suspended interstate freight and passenger traffic;
8. Prevented telegraph and telephone communication;
9. Delayed the United States mails; and
10. Paralyzed industry and commerce.

SUBJECTS INVOLVED IN PROBLEM

The consideration of the flood-control problem involves several general subjects as follows:

1. The necessity for legislation;
2. The necessary flood-control works;
3. The agency in charge of the work; and
4. The provision for its payment.

NECESSITY FOR NEW LEGISLATION

The disastrous flood of 1927 demonstrated to the Nation and to Congress that the provisions of existing law with reference to controlling these destructive flood waters were wholly inadequate. The evidence before the committee has conclusively shown that the primary reason for the failure of the flood-control system was the result of the provisions of the act of March 1, 1917, which authorized the "levees only" system and which required local contribution to the cost of the flood-control works before their construction by the United States.

The necessity for the legislation recommended in the present bill is, therefore, apparent.

OBJECT OF FLOOD-CONTROL PLAN

The evidence before the committee was to the effect that a comprehensive flood-control plan should have as its objects:

First. To lower flood heights in the Mississippi River by construction of diversion channels or flood ways.

Second. To provide additional protection for the city of New Orleans.

Third. To give additional protection for Cairo, Ill.

Fourth. To protect the entire valley by raising and strengthening the entire present levee system.

Fifth. To conduct the destructive flood waters safely from Cape Girardeau, Mo., to the Gulf of Mexico, through the flood-control works.

The evidence further shows that, to be successful, the plan must be a unified one embracing the whole system; the works must be constructed simultaneously from Cape Girardeau to the Head of Passes by one authority; the funds should be provided by the same authority; and local contribution carries with it a certain amount of local determination as to the necessity for location, size, etc., of the flood-control works, fatal to the success of the project.

POINTS PROVED BY EVIDENCE BEFORE COMMITTEE

To prepare a bill that would provide against a repetition of a disaster like that of 1927 was the task of the committee.

The evidence presented to the committee, consisting of official Government reports and documents, reports by State and local officials, and testimony by witnesses, proved the following conclusions:

First. That the flood-control works heretofore constructed were neither adequate nor of the right kind.

Second. That they were not of the right kind was the fault of the "levees only" policy of the Mississippi River Commission.

Third. That they were inadequate because of the local contribution policy contained in the acts of Congress relating to flood control, and Fourth. That a comprehensive flood-control system to be effective must include not only levees, but spillways, diversion channels, flood ways, storage basins, and reservoirs.

WHY FLOOD CONTROL HAS FAILED

Flood control has been unsuccessful heretofore for the following reasons:

1. There never was a determination, either by the United States or the individual States, that the destructive flood waters of the Mississippi River should be controlled.
2. There never was a plan for a unified system.
3. What was attempted was done in a piecemeal manner.
4. There never were sufficient funds to do the work in such a manner as to preserve and protect prior work.
5. The "levees only" policy, which caused a patchwork system of levees, and was a continuous defense against the flood waters.
6. The method of payment for the work, partially by the Government and partially by local interests was inadequate. When the local interests had money, the Government had none; and when the Government had money, the local interests had none.

The committee in dealing with this legislation kept in mind the fact that this flood of 1927 was no ordinary misfortune, but, as Secretary Hoover has said, "Our greatest peace-time disaster." President Coolidge himself has stated that "its recurrence must be forever prevented." If ever the American Congress had received a unanimous demand from the American people upon a single subject, it is this. The committee had before it the definite commitment not only from thousands of citizens of this country but the overwhelming expression of the leading business, civic, fraternal, and industrial organizations of America, which in the final analysis pay the bill. To recommend any policy which would not effectively accomplish the control of the destructive flood waters of the Mississippi River would be to betray the American people.

The phrase "local contributions" is intended to mean local payment toward the cost of the construction of flood-control works.

The committee found it the controversial point of the whole discussion, so it investigated thoroughly every phase of the subject, and was forced finally to the conclusion that it was not practical and that its incorporation in the proposed legislation would result in its nullification, thus leaving Congress no further advanced in the solution of the problem though after more than 40 years spent in the effort and an expenditure of nearly a half billion dollars.

The following question was asked of witnesses time after time for months at the committee hearings:

Question. Have you any practical plan to offer to the committee, or have you ever heard of one, to collect money from local interests or State?

Everyone who has studied the subject at all has abandoned the claim that flood control will bring a direct, tangible benefit to the adjacent property owners and have gone from the levee districts as a basis to the State or several States as the source for payment for the flood-control works. Though often requested, no one has offered to present or sponsor a plan of local contribution that would be workable.

FACTS NECESSARY TO UNDERSTAND THE ISSUES—TWO SIDES OF QUESTION PRESENTED

In order to understand the flood-control problem of the lower Mississippi River it is necessary to know the different schools of thought that have developed in the long years it has been under consideration, and which in turn involves its history and a knowledge of the legislation and upon what that legislation was based.

There are two schools of thought. One we will call the nationalists, who believe that it is and always has been the Government's obligation to control the destructive flood waters of the lower Mississippi, not only on account of its terms of acquisition and its national use, but also on account of the development of the United States in the great West and Northwest and progress in the East, deluging intermittently the lower Mississippi Valley.

The other school we will call the local contributionists, who believe that levee building is a private matter and that the Government's interest is one of navigation only, and that its participation and payment should be so limited.

Originally levee building was a local and private matter, not only as to districts, but as to individual landowners themselves, who only protected their own properties.

With the increased floods caused by artificial drainage, as first above referred to, the task of protecting private property became too great for the individual to cope with singly; so he and his neighbors organized levee districts. Faster came the floods than levees could be built; even levee districts were impotent and crevasse after crevasse overflowed adjacent lands. This summarized the private standpoint.

All this time in another jurisdiction a more important problem to the Nation was being wrestled with, however, not with individuals or localities as the factors, but the great engineering talent of the United States Army, backed by the entire resources of the Nation endeavoring to make and keep the Mississippi River a navigable stream, so that the Nation might prosper.

After spending years of study and great amounts of money, the United States engineers finally determined that the only hope for the navigable channel for the Mississippi River lay in the use of levees to keep the river water under control at all times.

In conformity with this engineering opinion Congress passed laws embodying the recommendations regarding the use of levees as an aid to navigation, and finally in 1879 it created the Mississippi River Commission, which was charged with the duty, among other things, of giving ease and safety to navigation of the Mississippi River and preventing destructive floods, promoting and facilitating commerce, trade, and the Postal Service.

The appropriations made by Congress until 1890 specifically prohibited the expenditure of any part of the money "for the repair or construction of levees, for the purpose of preventing injury to lands by overflow, or for any other purpose whatever, except as a means of deepening or improving the channel of said river."

From 1892 to 1917 the Congress provided that the expenditure should be—for the general improvement of the river, for the building of levees * * * in such manner, as in their opinion, shall best improve navigation and promote the interests of commerce at all stages of the river.

In 1916 the Flood Control Committee of the House was created, and in 1917 Congress passed an act providing "for controlling the floods of the Mississippi River and continuing its improvements," and provided as to expenditures upon levees—

(b) That no money appropriated * * * shall be expended in the construction or repair of any levee unless and until assurances have been given satisfactory to the commission that local interests protected thereby will contribute for such construction and repair a sum which the commission shall determine to be just and equitable, but which shall be less than one-half of such sum as may have been allotted by the commission for such work; and provided that such contribution shall be expended under the direction of the commission, or in such manner as it may require or approve, but no contribution made by any State or levee district shall be expended in any other State or levee district, except with the approval of the authorities of the State or district so contributing. * * *

(d) No money appropriated under authority of this act shall be expended in the payment for any right of way for any levee which may be constructed in cooperation with any State or levee district under authority of this act, but all such rights of way shall be provided free of cost to the United States, provided that no money paid or expense incurred by any State or levee district in securing such rights of way or in any temporary works of emergency during an impending flood, or for the maintenance of any levee line, shall be computed as a part of the contribution of such State or levee district toward the construction or repair of any levee within the meaning of paragraph (b) of this section.

Various acts of Congress amended the flood control act so as to extend its jurisdiction from Rock Island to the Head of Passes and on the tributaries as far as the flood waters of the Mississippi River affected the tributaries, and in the act of 1923 also authorized an appropriation of $10,000,000 per year for six years for flood-control work, of which the amounts for 1928 and 1929 are yet to be expended.

The entrance of the Government into the levee building resulted in greater flood heights caused by adding to the ever-increasing floods on account of northern drainage the retention in the main channel of the river, all flood waters below Cape Girardeau.

Local interests prompted by the action of the United States regarding the building of levees organized themselves into levee districts under State laws, which permitted the levying of a tax on property within the districts, and with funds obtained through bond issues attempted to keep pace with the ever-increasing flood heights by contributing to the United States funds expended by the Government in building higher levees.

How these levees failed and brought great loss of life and property to the lower valley is now a matter of history.

FLOODS OF THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER PRIOR TO 1927

Mentioning the higher high waters of the past, notable floods occurred in the years stated below:

In 1828 the valley, in general, was overflowed with the exception of the portion bordering on the Mississippi below the head of the Atchafalaya Basin. The mean depth of overflow on the Arkansas-Louisiana line in the Tensas Basin was 7.1 feet. Between Vidalia and Harrisonburg it was 7.7 feet. The computed maximum discharge of 1828 in the Mississippi River near Plaquemine, La., was 1,110,000 cubic feet per second (deduced by Humphreys and Abbot from their Carrollton discharge curves of 1851–52), and the estimated discharge into the Atchafalaya Basin was 414,000 cubic feet per second, making an estimated total of 1,524,000 cubic feet per second passing the latitude of Red River Landing.

The third rise in 1844 resulted from a combined flood of the Missouri and upper Mississippi in June. The St. Francis and Yazoo Basins were flooded, being almost without levees. The Tensas Basin was flooded by breaks in the levees. Red River was at a low stage, and the region below the mouth of Red River escaped with very little damage.

In 1849 there were two distinct flood waves at Memphis, cresting February 8–16 and March 28 at 30.86 and 30.66 feet, respectively, above the present gauge zero. The first crest was 2.3 feet lower at Memphis than that of 1844, but was 0.7 foot higher than 1844 at Carrollton, due to the fact that there were coincident floods in the lower tributaries. The St. Francis, Yazoo, and Tensas Basins were overflowed; and below Red River, due to numerous crevasses, the flood was considered the most destructive ever known. New Orleans was inundated by a crevasse about 17 miles above the city.

In 1850 the St. Francis and Yazoo Basins were deeply flooded. The depth of overflow in the Tensas and Atchafalaya Basins was greater than during any flood since 1828. Floods on the Arkansas, Red, and Black Rivers aggravated conditions on the lower river. Crevasses were discharging into the Atchafalaya Basin for more than four months. The Bonnet Carre crevasse on the left bank above New Orleans attained a width of 7,000 feet and continued flowing more than six months. The computed maximum discharge of 1850 at Carrollton was 1,050,000 cubic feet per second (deduced by Humphreys and Abbot from their Carrollton discharge curves of 1851–52), and the estimated maximum escape through crevasses between Red River and Carrollton was 118,000 second-feet on the right bank and 114,000 second-feet on the left bank.

In 1858 the maximum measured discharge of the Mississippi River was about 1,400,000 second-feet at Columbus, Ky. Discharges of 1,238,000 second-feet at Red River Landing and 1,188,000 second-feet at Carrollton were deduced from measurements at Vicksburg and Natchez and from the Carrollton discharge curves.

The flood of 1862 exceeded all previous gauge heights at Cairo and all points below. The crest was 50.8 feet at Cairo, 48.2 feet at mouth of White River, and 15.9 feet at Carrollton. Great damage was done to levees.

The flood in 1882 exceeded all previous records at all gauges from Cairo to Arkansas City. The crest was 51.87 feet at Cairo, 48.4 feet at mouth of White River, and 14.95 feet at Carrollton. There were 284 crevasses with an aggregate width of 59.1 miles.

The crest of the 1883 flood was 52.17 feet at Cairo, 48 feet at mouth of White River, and 15.4 feet at Carrollton. There were 224 crevasses with a total width of 34.1 miles.

The crest of the 1890 flood was 48.8 feet at Cairo, 50.4 feet at mouth of White River, and 16.1 feet at Carrollton. There were 53 crevasses with a total width of 6.8 miles.

The crest of the 1892 flood was 48.29 feet at Cairo, 49.27 feet at mouth of White River, and 17.35 feet (2.25 feet above previous record) at Carrollton. There were 31 crevasses with a total width of 2.3 miles.

The crest of the 1893 flood was 49.33 feet at Cairo, 49.48 feet at mouth of White River, and 17.45 feet at Carrollton. There were 17 crevasses with an aggregate width of 3.23 miles.

The crest of the 1897 flood was 51.72 feet at Cairo, 52.42 feet—2.02 feet above previous record—at mouth of White River, and 19.17 feet—1.6 feet above previous record—at Carrollton. There were 37 crevasses with an aggregate width of 8.7 miles.

The crest of the 1903 flood was 50.57 feet at Cairo, 53.7 feet at mouth of White River, and 19.42 feet at Carrollton. There were six crevasses totaling 2.2 miles in width.

The crest of the 1912 flood exceeded all prior records at all gauges south of Cairo with the single exception of Vicksburg. The maximum was 53.94 feet at Cairo, 56.35 feet at mouth of White River, and 21.05 feet at Carrollton. Twelve crevasses destroyed 13.4 miles of levee.

The crest of the 1913 flood was 54.69 feet at Cairo, 55.35 feet at mouth of White River, and 19.28 feet at Carrollton. This flood exceeded all previous records from Cairo to Helena. Eight crevasses destroyed 3.04 miles of levee.

The crest of the 1916 flood was 53.2 feet at Cairo, 56.5 feet at mouth of White River, and 20.05 feet at Carrollton. One crevasse 1,800 feet wide occurred in the controlling levee line.

The crest of the 1922 flood was 53.6 feet at Cairo, 56.85 feet at mouth of White River, and 21.27 feet at Carrollton. New high records were established at all gauges below White River. There were four crevasses in Mississippi River levees, with an aggregate width of 7,000 feet.

RECURRING FLOODS AND NO RELIEF

Following in the wake of every great flood which has deluged the valley in all the years since the jurisdiction and responsibility of the control of the river passed to the Federal Government by the Louisiana Purchase, Congress has made a perfunctory and superficial investigation of the problem, and has listened to small delegations from the flooded regions tell the story of their loss and suffering and has heard them beseech the United States to recognize its long-neglected duty, and to have established an adequate and comprehensive system which would control these destructive flood waters of the Nation and prevent the ever-recurring disasters.

Congress has never heeded, however, except in a small measure, the pleas of these unfortunate people, nor of the many boards, commissions, and committees of engineers which have studied the problem, but continuously, for one reason or another, has adhered to the wasteful policy of piecemeal appropriations. The results were always the same; the levee districts could not raise sufficient money to complete the levees to the grade and section fixed by the engineers, Congress would not, and the inevitable happened. The next great flood would wash away a part of the levees, the ultimate cost of a completed system was thereby increased, and the aggregate of property values destroyed grew with each crevasse.

Shall it so happen again after this flood of 1927, the greatest and most destructive in the long list of holocausts visited upon the lower valley?

The annual appropriations must be large enough to make real economy possible. There is no other work of improvement where the element of time is so important. Just when the next flood will come is beyond human reckoning. If another great flood should come before the lines are high enough and strong enough to withstand it, the loss will be great indeed, and the ultimate cost will be largely in excess of the present estimates.

LEVEES BUILT HIGHER AND HIGHER

The Mississippi River Commission in the beginning established a standard grade for levee building, which they changed from time to time to meet new flood heights, using the last prior flood as a basis, until 1914, at which time they established what they considered the ultimate as necessary in view of the floods of 1912 and 1913, and which is the present existing grade.

Before each recommendation of the Mississippi River Commission for an increased levee height could be carried out, a disastrous flood has come, and another increase in the levee heights recommended.

As all levee building participated in by the Mississippi River Commission was for the purpose of aiding navigation, the construction of the levees was as close as practicable to the river bank and many miles of levees were washed away because they were not protected and because the work was not done in such a manner that the prior work was protected, but it was done piecemeal. Many times work lagged because the Government and private interests did not have sufficient money at the same time.

In this connection there is a phase of the local contribution feature provided for in the flood control act of 1917 that should be touched upon.

Following the passage of this act which provided for continuing appropriations and with an estimated total sufficient to complete the work as then estimated, the different levee districts, practically without exception, obtained legislative authority to exceed their respective limiting amounts of outstanding levee bonds, in order to participate to the fullest with the United States Government. In this desire they met with a most liberal and helpful attitude on the part of the financial interests who stretched the credit of the levee boards to the utmost in fixing the amount of bonds that would be salable.

In the beginning many of the levee boards were disappointed at the relatively small amounts they were called upon to put into the United States cooperative fund, and requests to the commission for increased allotments to their respective districts were declined. At that time the levee boards were rich temporarily, with the proceeds of the new financing, and the Mississippi River Commission was relatively poor. Rather than build up large bank balances until such time as the Mississippi River Commission would be in a position to call upon them for larger contributions, the greater portion of these funds were expended in levee improvement, waiving the stipulated two-thirds cooperation on the part of the United States with the object of hastening the completion of the work. Expenditures of this character with no cooperation on the part of the United States, have largely contributed to the figures quoted in General Jadwin's report, namely, 70 per cent of levee expenditures by the local authorities and 30 per cent by the United States. (House Doc. 90, 70th Cong., 1st sess., par. 34.) Now, the situation is reversed, the levee boards are without funds in the face of a greater task, and the Government has plenty of funds. Should not these expenditures by local levee boards in anticipation of the availability of the funds to be supplied by the United States be taken into consideration?

JADWIN PLAN PROCEEDS ON WRONG THEORY OF LAW AND ASSUMES FACTS UNWARRANTED BY EVIDENCE

General Jadwin's plan is based on the following assumptions:

First. That the natural bed of the Mississippi River is the alluvial valley traversed; he assumes, therefore, that any part of the valley may be devoted to flood control without payment.

Second. That his flood-control plan is to be treated as a reclamation project. He contends that a benefit results from his project so that adjacent landowners should pay a part of the cost and land values are raised so that tax assessments paid to the States will be higher; therefore the States should help defray part of the expense and pay damages.

Third. That the destructive flood waters have an easement through the valley and that the valley should give it safe conduct or suffer the consequences and that the Government, under the swamp land acts, donated to the States certain land to pay for the construction of levees on the Mississippi River.

Fourth. That flood-control works should be optional with local communities.

ERRORS IN JADWIN PLAN POINTED OUT

Regarding the assumptions in paragraph 1 that the natural bed of the Mississippi River is the alluvial valley and the United States is engaged in a reclamation project, it is sufficient to state that the Supreme Court of the United States has held just the opposite in the case of Cubbins v. Mississippi River Commission (241 U. S. 351), the syllabus on exactly this point being as follows:

> The conditions existing in the valley of the river demonstrate that the work of the Mississippi River Commission, and of the various State commissions, in constructing the series of levees from Cairo to the Gulf is for the purpose of prevention of destruction and improvement of navigation by confining the river to its bed and is not for purposes of reclamation.

In deceding this point, the Chief Justice, who rendered the opinion, one of the most eminent jurists in our history, said that the contention that the building of the levees was a work not of preservation but of reclamation, was unsound and was "wholly irreconcilable with the settlement and development of the valley of the river."

As to the assumption in paragraph 3 above, that the destructive flood waters have an easement, the general's position is not well founded, as will be seen from the following quotations from ruling case law, as to the common law, and from Domat, a celebrated commentator, as to the civil law:

> Acceleration of flow or increase in quantity of water: Without a grant, either express or implied, an upper owner has ordinarily no right to accelerate the impelling force of a stream of running water, as by deepening the channel or removing natural obstructions therefrom, to the injury of a lower owner. And this is true although there be no damage at the point where the stream enters the lower tract, but only farther down. * * * Dams, dikes, embankments, and the like may be constructed in or along floatable streams to facilitate their use, but not to the extent of injuring the riparian proprietors by * * * sending it down in increased volume, to their injury or at times when the stream would not otherwise be navigable. * * * So, if it appears that a dam erected by a municipality in a ditch or watercourse * * * so far increases the flow of a river with which the ditch is connected as to cause injury to the land of a riparian owner, the municipality will be liable to a lower riparian owner who sustains special damage on account of such increased flow. (27 Ruling Case Law, 1099–1100; citing a long list of cases.)
> "If waters have their course regulated from one ground to another, whether it be by the nature of the place, or by some regulation, or by a title, or by an ancient possession, the proprietors of the said grounds can not innovate anything as to the ancient course of the water. Thus, he who has the upper grounds can not change the course of the waters, either by doing it some other way, or rendering it more rapid, or making any other change in it to the prejudice of the owner of the lower grounds. Neither can he who has the lower estate do anything that may hinder his grounds from receiving the water which they ought to receive and that in the manner which has been regulated." (Domat's Civ. Law, Cushing's Ed., p. 616 (1583).)

The justice of this position lies in the fact that the water from 31 States is poured, though uncontrolled, into the Mississippi River. It is the national ditch of the Government, and a moral duty rests upon us to prevent the waters from some of those States from destroying the property of the others and, if between private parties, this would be illegal. This is what the Government is doing; more and more each year they close natural drains and bayous, and thereby divert the natural flow and increase the natural burden in the lower States. The Government participates in this. In this, its acts are illegal, unless at the same time it protects the lower States against such increased burdens. From a legal standpoint, when the Government thus increases the waters in the river by drainage and levees, it becomes our duty to protect the States along the river from this increased flow of water.

With reference to the general's assumption, referred to in paragraph 3 above, that the swamp lands were donated by the Government to the States for the building of levees on the Mississippi River: That this is entirely erroneous is shown by the facts upon which the swamp land acts were based, as the swamp lands were donated to 15 States of the Union, including Alabama, California, Oregon, Iowa, and other States entirely out of the Mississippi Valley.

The debates in Congress when the acts were passed, the titles of the acts themselves, as well as the decisions of the United States Supreme Court, and other courts thereon, clearly demonstrate that these grants were made by the Federal Government under its policy of assisting the individual States in reclaiming swamp and overflowed land, as will be seen from Chapter IX, subchapter 2, herein, to which attention is invited.

The assumption in paragraph 4 above that participation in his flood-control plan should be optional with local communities needs little comment.

Would anyone think of expending millions of dollars for flood control only to have the whole system fail and the money wasted because one local district elected to stay out? The integrity of the levees is the prime factor in the control of the destructive flood waters. Local communities can not be forced to raise funds or be compelled to enter into a flood-control program which entails the expenditure of private funds.

The assumption that the project should be paid for in the same manner as reclamation projects can not be sustained upon the facts. A reclamation project has for its object the reclaiming or bringing into existence lands theretofore not susceptible of cultivation, while the lands herein involved have been in cultivation for hundreds of years. This is not reclamation, but preservation.

It is then contended that benefits will result and those receiving the benefit should pay part of the cost of the work. It is useless to contend that no benefit will ensue, but it is contended that the benefits are not the kind upon which a special tax upon adjacent property is warranted. The benefits may be listed as follows:

Human life will be saved.
Sickness and disease will be prevented.
People will not be driven from their homes and made objects of charity.
Suffering and misery will be prevented.
Land will not be washed away.
Property will not be destroyed.
People will be able to follow their occupations.
Industry will continue.
Interstate commerce and the United States mails will not be interfered with.
There will be a feeling of security that will restore confidence.

No court or law of the land ever levied a special tax on land based on these elements and to require a payment for these benefits would be levying a tax on saving of human life, on occupation, on industry, on opportunity, on progress, and on prosperity.

These benefits are some of those for which our National Government is organized, and always has been, are properly paid out of the General Treasury, and are given freely and without price in order that general welfare may be furthered.

The Federal Government has spent, and will continue to spend, millions of dollars to develop this country so that its citizens may prosper, and it will be a bold Congressman who will advocate a tax on the opportunity to make a good living and a small caliber one who would begrudge an American citizen this good fortune.

Our country can prosper only in proportion as our citizens prosper, and the misfortune of great numbers affects the fortune of the Nation. Why States as such should be considered in this matter is not quite clear. The States asked to pay have no part in producing the destructive flood waters. Floods know no State boundaries and can not be controlled by fiat. The States as such can not legislate regarding the control or use of the navigable waters of the Mississippi. The States have authorized the organization of levee districts and provided for the raising of funds and there is no more they can properly be asked to do.

Levee building is a matter between the Government and adjacent landowners, one for navigation, the other for protection. The landowner has followed the lead of the Government and has spent millions of dollars and all there is to show for it is a collapse of the system, and a poverty stricken and disappointed people.

Every argument made against the "Government pay all" proposition is equally strong regarding the "Government pay 80 per cent," with this difference, the 80 per cent Government payment secures no adequate flood-control protection while the 100 per cent Government payment insures the absolute success of the undertaking.

While reclamation is important to a landowner, its importance to him sinks in insignificance when compared with the importance to the Nation of maintaining this great river highway as a commerce carrier. Levees are essential to such, so why hesitate to construct them? Shall we neglect matters of national concern because individual citizens might profit therefrom?

Can it be, too, that the vast interests of the Nation in interstate commerce and in the transportation of the mails are not important enough to warrant the Federal Government to take all necessary steps to prevent their being interfered with by flood waters?

Millions of dollars are spent protecting our commerce abroad, yet no one would think of taxing those engaged in commerce to pay the cost of the protection. The lower Mississippi Valley produces more wealth for the United States Treasury than our foreign trade does, yet there are those who pretend to have business insight and who would begrudge this same protection to our home people.

General Jadwin's plan does not take into consideration the regions from which the floods come, and of course no solution of the problem can be found without so doing. Thirty States pour their flood waters down on Louisiana, and yet, after having erected levees sufficient to take care of the natural flood waters, it is forced to contribute large sums to take care of the floods produced by artificial drainage caused by the prosperity of other States. The one causing the damage should pay. It is our boast that there is no wrong without a remedy. This is a vain boast unless the Federal Government does its whole duty to the people of the lower Mississippi Valley. Fair play and common justice would require that, after having the benefit of privately paid for levees to aid navigation, the Government should do the fair thing and build the levees for navigation that will aid these same people.

This is not a reclamation project but is a humanitarian one, pure and simple, and the United States should not attempt to drive a hard bargain when the safety and welfare of so many of its citizens are at stake. Shall it, like Shylock of old, demand its pound of flesh for its ounce of gold, especially when this work is made necessary to correct the mistaken policy of the Government itself in the control of the Mississippi River?

The economic principles applied in the Jadwin plan are open to great criticism and the objections to the no-contribution plan are not well founded because the objections urged apply with much more force to the Jadwin plan. The no-contribution plan has the virtue of frankness instead of being based on guesswork and without regard to proper economic principles.

That the Jadwin plan would work successfully dependent on local contribution was doubted even by its author, for, while stating certain conditions, he made provision to waive their compliance when it became necessary to do what he thought was desirable. Congress itself should fix the exceptions, if there are to be any, and should not leave that to the agency doing the work.

JADWIN PLAN PENALIZES ONE DISTRICT TO BENEFIT ANOTHER

Another of the serious objections to General Jadwin's plan, and one which is most strongly urged by the officials and people in the affected States, is that it proposes to protect certain districts and States at the expense of other districts and States. And not only so, but it proposes further that in some places certain works shall be erected to protect a city or territory, which will result in other territory, sometimes in another State, being periodically flooded, and calls upon the latter district to pay for the works.

As expressed in the brief filed by Governor Martineau, of Arkansas, in referring to the Boeuf Basin flood way proposed by General Jadwin, which would flood over two and a half million acres, much of it productive land, and destroy many cities and towns in Arkansas in order to protect a portion of the State of Mississippi, Arkansas is being asked to "pay a portion of its own funeral in order that other sections may survive" (p. 2500).

A similar proposal in the Jadwin plan has aroused the people of southeast Missouri. The general recommends that in order to protect the city of Cairo, Ill., on the other side of the river, the present levees on the Missouri side shall be cut down and set back 5 miles, and a river-bank flood way created between Birds Point and New Madrid, Mo., which in times of flood would lay waste and devastate 144,000 acres of land, 60 per cent of which is highly cultivated and productive. And the cost of this work, estimated at millions of dollars, is to be borne by the people of Missouri, while the city of Cairo, Ill., is not to be asked to put up a cent.

Such inequities and injustices in the Jadwin plan convince the committee that the legislatures of the valley States will never agree to it, and that, therefore, no flood-control work will be done, as the plan provides no work shall be done until the States have consented to the plan and agreed to provide the money.

Instead of the Jadwin plan, if adopted by Congress, providing protection from the floods of the lower Mississippi Valley, it might result in the recurrence of a disaster like that of 1927.

ENGINEERING FALLACIES OF JADWIN PLAN

Fundamental doubts as to the technical soundness and efficacy of the plans submitted by General Jadwin was testified to by many engineers outside Government circles, and these doubts were clearly enough recognized by members of the committee, so it was necessary in the bill to create an organization competent to work out a dependable plan. The engineers best qualified by training and experience as well as by personal experience fighting floods on the Mississippi River objected to many of the engineering features of the Jadwin plan.

These objections are: (1) That it is lacking in engineering details and has not a sufficient factor of safety; (2) that it uses new and untried methods in the diversion of the flood waters; (3) that the "fuse-plug" levees will not work and disaster will result; and (4) generally that it is not dependable and is not feasible from an engineering standpoint. The committee did not believe it probable that so many eminent engineers could all be wrong, and therefore refused to adopt the Jadwin plan as the project for the flood-control work.

COST OF PROJECT

An appropriation of $473,000,000 is authorized. The committee considered very carefully the several items recommended by the Mississippi River Commission and General Jadwin and arrived at this figure to include those which, in its opinion, should be undertaken immediately. The amount authorized, therefore, represents a consolidation of the two plans, with the addition of several others by the committee which it believed should be provided for. The following are the items which make up the $473,000,000: Bonnet Carre spillway, Atchafalaya flood way, Cypress Creek diversion, Birds Point-New Madrid flood way, main-river levees, tributaries' levees, mapping, reservoirs, reforestation, erosion, surveys, and investigations.

The President is authorized, when, in his judgment, it is necessary and the condition of the Treasury requires it, to issue bonds to raise the money required to carry out the project. This would prevent too great a drain upon the Treasury at any one time and would permit the spreading of the expenditures over a period of years.

The committee in its three months' hearings had presented to it a woeful picture of this flood of 1927. Many members of the committee had visited the flood area while the flood was at its height. It laid waste a veritable empire and drove 700,000 men, women, and children from their homes to face privation, suffering, disease, and sometimes death; they were seeking shelter, food, and clothing from the Red Cross, and became dependent upon the generosity of their fellow Americans. Scenes such as the observers beheld were indeed comparable only to war itself, and it is very doubtful if even war was ever more certain and complete in its wholesale destruction of a great region.

Thousands of newspaper and magazine articles describing these scenes were published and were available to those who found it impossible to visit the scenes of the disaster. Special writers from all great news agencies in America were sent to the valley. Photographs taken from boats, from trains, from points of vantage on portions of levees still standing, from the high ground, from airplanes, and in every way which the mind of the wily photographer could suggest, were published, and many of them filed with the committee. Hundreds of moving-picture reels were made, and news organizations carried the pictured details of devastation to every town, hamlet, and city of America.

MAGNITUDE OF PROJECT

IT IS A BIG UNDERTAKING AND THE UNITED STATES SHOULD ACT

That this is a gigantic undertaking is the opinion of the entire country as evidenced by the public addresses of many prominent men, editorials, statements in numerous leading newspapers and magazines, and resolutions of national associations and organizations.

President Coolidge, in his address at the Budget meeting on June 10, said of the Mississippi River flood of 1927:

> The vast, fertile, and productive reaches bordering the Mississippi and its tributaries have been subjected to great disaster. The loss of life and property is appalling. * * * Control measures that were considered by all as ample to full protection have proven inadequate. Such a disaster must never happen again.

And in addressing the Union League Club of Philadelphia, on November 17, 1927, President Coolidge said:

> Flood control must be completed.

Secretary of War Dwight F. Davis, in an address given before the Chicago Flood Control Conference in June, 1927, said:

> The Mississippi River question is one that can and must be controlled. The Nation whose engineers defied seemingly insurmountable obstacles in building the Panama Canal can and will solve this great and complex problem.

Herbert Hoover, Secretary of Commerce, in an address at Little Rock, Ark., June 25, 1927, said:

> The Mississippi flood of 1927 has been a disaster unprecedented in the peace-time history of our Nation.

Major General Jadwin, Chief of Engineers of the United States Army, in an address at the Chicago Flood Control Conference on June 3, 1927, said:

> The flood of the Mississippi Valley is, in many ways, the most serious catastrophe of its kind in the history of our country. It is less serious only than war itself.

Hon. NICHOLAS LONGWORTH, Speaker of the House, in an address before the Chicago Flood Control Conference in June, 1927, said:

> I believe there is not a man in either the House or the Senate that does not believe and realize that the time has come when the Government of the United States itself must take an active interest and participation, not only in the relief of the sufferers but in the prevention of such future catastrophes.

Hon. MARTIN B. MADDEN, chairman of the House Appropriations Committee, in an address at the Chicago Flood Control Conference in June, 1927, said:

> We are not penurious. We have been generous with the world. Whenever they have been confronted with a crisis; whenever Congress found itself in session on an occasion where any foreign nation or any foreign people were in trouble like we have been, we responded generously to the call, both individually and officially. And we are going to respond to the call of the American people in the Mississippi flood.

Hon. Jacob M. Dickinson, former Secretary of War, member of the flood-control committee of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, on pages 411 to 417 of the hearings said:

* * * * * * *

> I think that you can accept that, gentlemen, as a fact that can not be gotten away from; that if any plan be set upon foot and formulated which has as a basis the coordination of action by the various States or counties or levee boards, it is doomed to certain failure, and the result will be, if any such plan as that be adopted, that that country will be abandoned absolutely to a jungle, and here we will have through the center of the United States a tremendous territory of fertile land which will be completely given over to waste.

* * * * * * *

> That conclusion is sure. If there is anything certain in this question, it is that if a plan is to depend upon the contributions of the States and the counties and the coordinating of them into one general work, or any part of them, the whole thing will have to be abandoned. I never felt surer of a proposition in my life than I do about that.

* * * * * * *

> Of course, if the Government is going to assume this work, and the expenditure necessary in connection with it, it has got to have the complete power of locating it and controlling it.
> Of course, if that country should be abandoned it would be an almost unthinkable thing—and, as I have undertaken to show, it will be abandoned unless the National Government shall undertake it—and we would have here, right in the midst of our country, a great gash cut through it subject to constant and recurrent overflows. It would break up the railroad system of your country. It would shut off your commerce to the next to the largest port in the United States of America, and in case of peace it would involve vast losses of every kind; and in case of war it might result in a very great disaster, because we know that in this late war a very large part of the transportation to the foreign countries of men and supplies and fuels and things of that sort was carried over the railroads and down the Mississippi River to the port of New Orleans and there transported. If the flood had come at the very crux and critical moment of the war and that country had lapsed, as we now contemplate the possibility of its doing, into abandonment, you can see how the sentiment of the country would rise up and proclaim against it. I do not believe that any other country on earth, no matter what questions were involved, would submit to have that vast area abandoned and turned over to desolation and loss. That seems to me to be unthinkable.

* * * * * * *

> So there is a great national work at hand. It has got to be protected; and the question of protecting the people, I say, is merely incidental to it. If there were not a city or a plantation on either bank of the Mississippi River, I should say it would be your duty to control and preserve and maintain in its integrity the navigation of the Mississippi River.

* * * * * * *

There is nothing new in the idea that the control of these disastrous and devastating floods is a great national question and that the problem is one to be solved by the Federal Government itself.

Presidents William Henry Harrison, Abraham Lincoln, Andrew Johnson, James A. Garfield, Rutherford B. Hayes, Theodore Roosevelt, William Howard Taft, Woodrow Wilson, and Calvin Coolidge all have emphatically declared that this problem is national.

Henry Clay in a speech in the Senate said:

> The Mississippi, with all its tributaries, constitutes a part of a great system, and if the system be not national, I should like to know one that is national.

In 1912 the platforms of both the Republican and Democratic Parties, as well as that of the Progressive Party, declared that the problem was national and pledged its solution.

"The control of the Mississippi River floods is now more than ever before our greatest domestic problem," according to the United States Chamber of Commerce. (Report of Committee, Referendum No. 51, p. 22.)

John F. Stevens, president of the American Society of Civil Engineers in 1927, and Chief Engineer of the Panama Canal, on page 4284 of the hearings, said:

> The CHAIRMAN. You consider this is a big problem, do you?
> Mr. STEVENS. It is one of the biggest I have ever known; and as far as the engineering problem is concerned, it far exceeds that of the Panama Canal.

PANAMA CANAL ACT SUGGESTED AS A PRECEDENT

Representative E. E. DENISON, of Illinois, on page 3274 of the hearings, said:

When we decided to construct the Panama Canal, we adopted a policy. I wish the committee could, before you report your legislation, read the Panama Canal act, known as the Spooner Act of 1902. It contains but a couple of pages, and yet it authorized and provided for the greatest project that has ever been undertaken by any Government.

Congress did not go into details in that act and tell the engineers how to dig that ditch. We did not tell the engineers how wide to make it or how many locks to have, how wide the locks should be, or how deep or any of those details. We decided the question of policy.

* * * * * * *

There we issued a mandate to the President to carry out a policy. What was it? To dig a canal; to buy the French company's properties there; to negotiate a treaty for the right to cross the country; to construct a canal of sufficient depth to accommodate not only the largest vessels that were then known but that may be reasonably expected; then defend it and construct terminals at the ends of the canal. That is as far as we went, and that is as far as Congress could go.

The Government had decided, of course, on a lock canal. We did not leave that to the engineers to decide whether it should be a lock canal or a sea-level canal. The Government decided that. Then, having decided that, they issued a mandate to the President through the Isthmian Canal Commission to go ahead and construct the canal. There is a good example for this committee to follow.

Although many of the members of the committee had been witnesses of the disaster, the committee, none the less, felt the necessity of hearing, for the benefit of those members who had not visited the area, first-hand testimony from those who had part in the great fight. It had before it prominent citizens from Louisiana, Mississippi, Arkansas, Tennessee, Kentucky, Missouri, and Illinois. The graphic picture which they painted of the desolation and devastation of the valley is part of the seven-volume record of testimony which the committee has compiled. The flood had left an indelible print upon their minds, and their appeal, weary and worn out in the struggle, was to the great American Government not to allow it to happen again. With one united voice they echoed President Coolidge's memorable words, "The recurrence of such a disaster must be forever prevented."

The hearings before the committee began on November 7, 1927, a month in advance of the convening of Congress, and were attended by citizens from the North, the South, the West, and the East. It is doubtful if ever before in our history has so large a group of citizens attended the discussion of a single national problem. There were here governors of States, United States Senators and Representatives, mayors of great cities, engineers, and public officials from Minneapolis to New Orleans and from Pittsburgh to New Mexico.

Three months were consumed by the committee in listening to evidence, the hearings having closed on February 1. For 63 days the committee was in session, and all of its meetings were attended by a practically full committee membership. The testimony fills six volumes, covering 4,924 pages, in addition to an appendix volume, and the total record is estimated to contain over 3,500,000 words.

WITNESSES BEFORE THE COMMITTEE

There appeared before the committee delegations from 15 States of the Mississippi Valley and from the far West and the far East. It had before it witnesses from New England to California. Over 40 Senators and Representatives testified before the committee. More than 300 citizens were examined, including governors of many States. Army engineers testified, as well as the engineers from all the levee districts of the Mississippi Valley from Rock Island to the Gulf. Three past presidents of the American Society of Civil Engineers testified before the committee and gave it the benefit of their wide experience. The committee record includes over 150 resolutions adopted by the leading commercial, civic, and fraternal organizations of this country. It received 300 manuscripts containing the most fantastic plans and offering every conceivable solution of the problem, from plowing up the bed of the river to making an entirely new channel 3 miles wide. It also received 5,000 letters and telegrams from every part of the United States dealing with the problem of flood control on the Mississippi and throughout the Nation.

NATIONAL ORGANIZATIONS INDORSE FEDERAL PAYMENT FOR FLOOD CONTROL

A great many national organizations sent representatives to appear before the committee, including the United States Chamber of Commerce, the American Legion, the American Federation of Labor, the American Farm Bureau Federation, the American Bankers' Association, Investment Bankers' Association of America, National Association of Real Estate Boards, National Sand-Lime Brick Association, Motion Picture Theater Owners of America, Mississippi Valley Association, Masonic lodges, the Chicago Flood Control Conference, and the Mississippi River Flood Control Association, each representing and speaking for a vast membership of the citizenship of this country and each unanimously insisting that Congress find a solution of what, in their judgment, had become the Nation's greatest problem.

The sympathetic interest of the American people in the suffering and distress of their fellow citizens in the Mississippi Valley was aroused as never before in our history as a Nation, and they have very properly insisted that their Representatives in Congress shall take such action as will forever prevent the recurrence of a similar catastrophe. The statement was made before the committee that propaganda has been used to influence Members of Congress in their stand on this subject and that referendums, opinions, and views from outside sources should be disregarded. Have the American people not a right, through every lawful means, to express their will in regard to legislation? Are they to be denied the right to voice their overwhelming sentiment that these disastrous and destructive floods shall be controlled by the Federal Government?

Representatives of many national organizations appeared before the committee during the hearings and presented resolutions adopted, in many cases, unanimously by their bodies, and told of the steps taken by their organizations and individual members to present their views on this great national question to the Members of Congress. These organizations serve a most useful purpose, and should be commended instead of censured by the Members of Congress for the opportunity afforded them to learn the opinions and desires of their constituents. What better guide can one who is supposed to represent the people have to their wishes?

COMMITTEE ASSISTED BY ENGINEERING EXPERTS

The committee had the able assistance and advice of four committees of distinguished civilian engineers, for whose cooperation it is deeply indebted and extremely grateful. One of these committees was from the American Society of Civil Engineers, headed by John F. Stevens, president of the society in 1927, and chief engineer of the Panama Canal, an engineer of international reputation; one from the leading universities of the United States; one from the principal railroads in the Mississippi Valley; and one from the States and levee districts of the valley. Members of these committees came to Washington at their own expense to assist in finding the best possible course for Congress to pursue.

The examination of so many individuals in the discussion of technical problems of engineering and economics was not an easy one, and yet the members of the committee, by thorough preparation, were able, not only to grasp the economic side of the problem, but to appreciate the technical features. During three whole months the members of the committee, at the practical sacrifice of all other affairs, were constantly in attendance at the hearings, placing this most serious problem of the Nation before every other consideration, for which they are entitled to the commendation and thanks of the Congress and the people of the country.

TESTIMONY ON EFFECTS OF FLOOD ON INTERSTATE COMMERCE AND THE UNITED STATES MAILS

Upon the economic phases of the problem the committee had valuable testimony. It had before it the Secretary of War, Hon. Dwight F. Davis, whose testimony upon the value of the river to the Nation is available as part of the committee hearings. Its members heard Postmaster General Harry New testify to the number of post offices closed, the interruption and suspension of the mails, and the general disarrangement of the Government's mail service. Officials of great transcontinental railroads testified not only to their heavy losses, resulting from the suspension of business over weeks and in some cases months, but likewise furnished this committee with an accurate estimate of the degree to which the flood paralyzed interstate commerce, both passenger and freight. Their testimony revealed what could happen to this Nation through the suspension of interstate shipment in time of war should one of these preventable floods occur at such a time.

TESTIMONY ON FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL EFFECTS

Prominent bankers and business men were likewise in attendance at the committee hearings. Such a general interruption of commerce would itself have a deterring effect upon the business of the Nation generally, but this would be reparable were it not for the staggering actual losses of property which can not be replaced for years to come, and upon which millions of dollars of securities have been predicated. These financiers testified that the solvency of the stricken areas would break down unless some agency came to the rescue. In many instances there was testimony that tax suspensions were in contemplation to give relief. The huge loss in farm implements, livestock, and domestic animals increased the burden and made immediate living conditions increasingly difficult.

The floods of former years have stricken these people of the South many times, often with as tremendous a force as that of the recent flood, and which were followed by the same untold misery, but never before had their helplessness and their suffering attracted the attention of the entire Nation and of the Congress as did the flood of 1927. Each preceding flood brought small delegations of the Mississippi Valley to Congress, supplicating protection against the waters of the Nation's greatest river. They received before a somewhat superficial investigation of their troubles, considering the magnitude of the project, and the fact that human life and its protection by this Government, as well as great property loss, were involved.

In the past this made but a small impression upon the representatives of the American people until the flood of 1927 brought to us the realization that the solution of this problem had gone beyond the power of individual States or communities and had become the Nation's duty.

THE BILL

1. H. R. 8219 reported favorably by committee with amendment.
2. Synopsis of the bill as amended.
3. Explanation of provisions of the bill as amended.

1. H. R. 8219 REPORTED FAVORABLY BY COMMITTEE WITH AMENDMENT

The Committee on Flood Control, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 8219) to prevent destructive floods which cause the loss of life and property, interrupt interstate commerce or delay the United States mails; and to prevent the recurrence of a flood such as that of the Mississippi River in 1927, which resulted in the loss of more than 246 lives, drowned out hundreds of cities, towns, and villages, drove 700,000 people from their homes, rendering them objects of charity dependent upon the Red Cross and other agencies, inundated 18,000 square miles, destroyed 1,500,000 farm animals, caused losses amounting to many hundreds of millions of dollars, suspended interstate freight and passenger traffic, prevented telegraph and telephone communication, delayed the United States mails, and paralyzed industry and commerce, having considered the same, report thereon with a recommendation that it do pass, with the following amendment:

Strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert the following:

That for the sole purpose of aiding interstate commerce, preventing interruptions to the United States mails, promoting general welfare and national defense, and for the security of the life and property in the lower Mississippi Valley from the destructive flood waters of the Mississippi River, the President shall, through the Mississippi Valley Flood Control Commission hereinafter authorized, proceed at once, without local contribution, to cause to be established, constructed, and completed a comprehensive system of flood-control works to control the largest floods of the Mississippi River now recorded, or which may be reasonably anticipated, consisting of such levees, controlled and regulated spillways, flood ways, storage basins, and reservoirs and appurtenances thereto as in the judgment and discretion of said Mississippi Valley Flood Control Commission may be necessary, to keep the flood crests of the said Mississippi River at or below the gauge heights as hereinafter indicated, and will permit the passage of the destructive flood waters of the said river and its tributaries safely through such flood-control works from Cape Girardeau, Mo., to the Gulf of Mexico, utilizing to that end as far as practicable the work heretofore done by the Mississippi River Commission and other agencies for the control and improvement of the Mississippi River.

SEC. 2. That to enable the President to construct the flood-control works as provided in this act there is hereby created the Mississippi Valley Flood Control Commission, the same to be composed of seven members, who shall be nominated and appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and who shall serve until the completion of said project, unless sooner removed by the President, and one of whom shall be named as the chairman of said commission. Of the seven members of said commission at least four of them shall be persons learned and skilled in the science of engineering. Said commissioners shall devote their entire time to the duties of the commission, and each shall receive such compensation as the President shall prescribe until the same shall have been otherwise fixed by the Congress. In addition to the members of said commission the President is hereby authorized through said commission to employ in said service any of the engineers of the United States Army at his discretion and likewise to employ any engineers in civil life at his discretion and any other persons necessary for the proper and expeditious prosecution of said work. The compensation of all such engineers and other persons employed under this act shall be fixed by said commission, subject to the approval of the President. The official salary of any officer appointed or employed under this act shall be deducted from the amount of salary or compensation provided by or which shall be fixed under the terms of this act. Said commission shall in all matters be subject to the direction and control of the President, and shall make to the President annually and at such other periods as may be required, either by law or by the order of the President, full and complete reports of all its official actions and of all moneys received and expended in the construction of said work and in the performance of its duties in connection therewith, which said reports shall be by the President transmitted to Congress. And the said commission shall furthermore give to Congress, or either House of Congress, such information as may at any time be required either by act of Congress or by the order of either House of Congress or appropriate committee thereof. The President shall cause to be provided and assigned for the use of the commission such offices as may, with the suitable equipment of the same, be necessary and proper, in his discretion, for the proper discharge of the duties thereof; and said commission shall keep a true and correct record of its proceedings and shall make such rules and regulations, subject to the approval of the President, as are necessary for the orderly conduct of its duties.

SEC. 3. Upon completion of the project herein authorized the Mississippi Valley Flood Control Commission shall turn over to the Chief of Engineers of the United States Army all records, property, and equipment of every kind whatsoever in its possession.

SEC. 4. The Mississippi Valley Flood Control Commission created by this act shall succeed to the jurisdiction of the Mississippi River Commission and shall take over and complete all flood-control and river-improvement work thereof.

SEC. 5. The Mississippi River Commission is hereby authorized and directed to transfer and deliver to the Mississippi Valley Flood Control Commission created by this act any and all property and equipment, papers, maps, charts, records, books, or other documents now in its possession bearing upon or connected with floods and flood control and improvement works of the Mississippi River and its tributaries; and the President is authorized to require the transfer and delivery thereof to the Mississippi Valley Flood Control Commission created by this act. Any and all papers, maps, charts, records, books, and other documents shall be made available to the Chief of Engineers of the United States Army as and when necessary to be used in flood-control work under his direction; and the Chief of Engineers is hereby directed to make available all records, surveys, maps, and documents in his possession or under his control as and when necessary to be used in flood-control work by the Mississippi Valley Flood Control Commission.

SEC. 6. When the Mississippi Valley Flood Control Commission herein authorized is appointed and organized the Mississippi River Commission shall be thereupon abolished.

SEC. 7. The Mississippi Valley Flood Control Commission shall, under the direction of the President, have exclusive control of the location, construction, and maintenance of all flood-control works herein provided for, and shall cause to be made such investigations, studies, and surveys as may be necessary for the prosecution, construction, and completion of such works, and may employ such persons as it may deem necessary therefor and fix their compensation.

SEC. 8. The President, through said commission, is hereby authorized and directed to proceed at once by hired labor or otherwise to construct and complete the flood-control works and river-improvement works herein and heretofore authorized. Said commission is hereby authorized to acquire in the name of the United States such equipment, property, real estate, or interest therein, or uses thereof, rights of way, flowage rights, or flood ways, or other property or rights as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of this act.

SEC. 9. The Mississippi Valley Flood Control Commission is hereby authorized to acquire in the name of the United States such real property or interests therein as shall in its judgment be necessary to effect the purposes of this act (1) by purchase whenever such property or interests may be obtained at a price deemed by it to be reasonable; (2) by donation; (3) by condemnation proceedings.

SEC. 10. Whenever any State or subdivision or agency thereof, or any levee district, individual, partnership, corporation, or company, shall have acquired, after the passage of this act, for the purpose of conveying the same to the United States any such property or interest, the commission is hereby authorized to repay to such State, subdivision, agency, levee district, individual, partnership, corporation, or company, in exchange for a deed or legal instrument conveying to the United States a good and marketable title to such property or interest, the amount expended therefor by such State, subdivision, agency, levee district, individual, partnership, corporation, or company, provided such amount shall not exceed the fair market value thereof and in the opinion of said commission be reasonable.

SEC. 11. There is hereby conferred upon the commission full power to enter upon lands and to acquire, condemn, occupy, possess, and use real estate and other property needed for the location, construction, operation, and maintenance of flood-control works.

SEC. 12. The commission may, if it deems it for the best interests of the United States, proceed and acquire title to any property, rights, or interests herein authorized to be acquired by condemnation thereof, under the direction of the Attorney General of the United States, by judicial proceedings to be commenced in the appropriate district court of the United States. The court shall, for the purpose of ascertaining the just compensation to be paid to the owner of the said property, appoint three commissioners, who shall be competent and disinterested appraisers. The appraisers shall be sworn to the faithful performance of their duty. They shall, under such rules as the court may prescribe, view the property and hear the evidence which either party may offer, and they, or a majority of them, shall then sign and file a report fixing and determining the value of the property or right sought to be acquired. Either party may, within 10 days after the filing of the report, file objections or exceptions thereto. The court shall consider the report and objections and confirm or modify the same, or make such other appropriate order as it shall deem proper. The court shall, at the conclusion of the proceeding, enter an order fixing and determining the amount which shall be paid to the owner of said property as just compensation for the taking thereof, which order shall be final and binding upon both parties.

Upon the filing of exceptions or objections to the report of said commissioners by the party or parties owning or having an interest in the lands, rights of way, flowage rights, easements, and improvements sought to be condemned in such proceeding, the Mississippi Valley Flood Control Commission shall have the right to take immediate possession of said lands, rights of way, flowage rights, easements, and improvements to the extent of the interest to be acquired and to proceed with the work herein authorized: Provided, That the court in which such proceeding shall be pending shall be satisfied that certain and adequate provisions shall have been made for the payment of just compensation to the party or parties entitled thereto by previous appropriations of the United States.

In every case the proceedings in condemnation shall be diligently prosecuted on the part of the United States in order that just compensation may be promptly ascertained and paid. All proceedings for the condemnation aforesaid shall be in accordance, except as herein provided, with the act of Congress of August 1, 1888, entitled "An act to authorize condemnation of land for sites of public buildings, and for other purposes."

SEC. 13. The commission is hereby authorized and directed to proceed at once with the work authorized by this act, including the enlarging, raising, strengthening, reinforcing, relocating, and reconstructing of existing levees as may be necessary to control the destructive flood waters of the Mississippi River and its tributaries and outlets, in so far as said tributaries and outlets are affected by the flood waters of the Mississippi River.

SEC. 14. And for the purpose of assisting in the control of the destructive flood waters, and supplementary to the system of levees, the commission is hereby authorized and directed to prepare such plans for flood control, and so locate, relocate, raise, strengthen, construct, or reconstruct the levees, and so construct spillways, flood ways, diversion channels, storage basins, or reservoirs, that the flood waters of the Mississippi River be confined, controlled, regulated, and carried safely through such flood-control works from Cape Girardeau, Mo., to the Gulf of Mexico, and the flood-control works shall be of such type and capacity that sufficient of the flood waters shall be diverted from the main channel thereof so the flood crest thereof shall not hereafter exceed 19 feet on the Carrollton gauge at New Orleans, La., 58 feet on the gauge at Arkansas City, Ark., and 54 feet on the gauge at Cairo, Ill.

SEC. 15. The Mississippi Valley Flood Control Commission shall cause to be made an economic survey of the area involved in the flood-control project to ascertain the effect of the additional flood-control protection herein provided on said area and report its findings to the President, who shall transmit the same to Congress.

SEC. 16. The President is hereby authorized and directed to proceed at once to cause the investigation and study, either by the Mississippi Valley Flood Control Commission, the Chief of Engineers, or other agency, of all watersheds within the Mississippi Basin producing floods destructive to life and property or which obstruct interstate commerce and cause interruption of the United States mails, utilizing in said studies all available data, reports, and surveys, including the surveys and reports thereon authorized by the act approved January 21, 1927. Reports of said studies shall be transmitted to Congress as soon as practicable and from time to time as the studies shall be completed, with a view to the adoption of plans for the control of the destructive flood waters in said Mississippi Valley, which reports shall also contain a statement of (a) the extent and character of the area to be affected by the proposed improvement; (b) the probable effect upon any navigable water or waterway; (c) the possible economical development and utilization of water power; (d) such other uses as may be properly related to or coordinated with the project; (e) what Federal interest, if any, is involved in the proposed improvement; (f) what share of the expense, if any, should be borne by the United States; and (g) the advisability of adopting the project.

SEC. 17. The President shall at once proceed to ascertain, through the Mississippi Valley Flood Control Commission, or other agencies, the extent to which floods in the lower Mississippi Valley may be controlled by a reservoir system. All such agencies in their investigations shall, so far as they reasonably can, invite the helpful aid of State engineers, university and technical men, and State officials. The studies shall include such questions as: The effect on the subject of flood control in the lower Mississippi River to be attained through the control of flood waters in the drainage basins of its tributaries by the establishment of a reservoir system; the benefits that will accrue to navigation, agriculture, and power from the prevention of erosion and siltage entering the streams; a determination of the capacities of the soils of the district to receive and hold waters from such reservoirs; and such kindred questions. It shall also further inquire as to what additional benefits may accrue from such reservoir system, the prospective income from the disposal of such waters, including both agriculture and power; it shall inquire as to the return-flow value of waters placed in the soils from reservoirs, as to their stabilizing effect on stream flow as a means of preventing erosion and silting and improving navigation conditions, and shall determine to what extent reservoired waters may be available for municipal and domestic uses and to what extent reimbursive; it shall report as to the approximate cost of each proposed reservoir and its capacity and shall give specific reasons for acceptance or rejection of any proposed reservoir site.

As soon as the studies of reservoirs, singly or in groups, provided for in the foregoing section, shall have been completed and approved by the commission or other agency, with definite estimates of cost and working data, they shall be reported by said commission or agency to the President of the United States, together with all related findings and conclusions, and on his order to such effect said commission or other agency shall proceed with the construction thereof as soon as money shall be available for such purposes, either by the letting of contracts or by Government construction: Provided, The conclusion reached by the President shall be that such construction will have a substantial and beneficial influence in the control of floods on the navigable waters of the lower Mississippi Valley, and is, in his opinion, economically justifiable.

On completion of any reservoir or reservoirs, so constructed, the Secretary of the Interior shall have authority to dispose of any impounded waters, under rules made by him and approved by the President, and may further enter into negotiations for the purpose of disposal of reservoirs themselves, always retaining, however, at all times, authority to direct the impounding and the emptying of the water in such reservoirs. Tentative agreements for the sale of any reservoir shall be submitted to Congress and be approved by law before final sale thereof is made.

SEC. 18. To carry out the purposes of this act, the President and the commission are hereby authorized to utilize the engineering, scientific, and constructive services of the bureaus, boards, and commissions of the several Government departments of the United States, and commissions created by Congress that relate to the study, development, or control of rivers and subjects related thereto.

SEC. 19. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $473,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act, and in order to provide the funds necessary to carry out the provisions of this act, the President is hereby authorized, when the condition of the Treasury necessitates so doing, and if he deems it advisable, to exercise, through the Secretary of the Treasury, the authority granted by the various Liberty bond acts and the Victory Liberty loan act, as amended and supplemented, to issue bonds, notes, and certificates of indebtedness of the United States; and any bonds so issued shall be disregarded in computing the maximum amount of bonds authorized by section 1 of the second Liberty bond act, as amended.

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill to provide a comprehensive system of flood control of the Mississippi River in its alluvial valley, and for other purposes."

2. SYNOPSIS OF THE BILL AS AMENDED

Section 1 authorizes the President, through a new commission to be appointed by him, to construct flood-control works consisting of levees, controlled and regulated spillways, flood ways, storage basins, and reservoirs and appurtenances thereto, to pass destructive flood waters of the Mississippi River safely from Cape Girardeau, Mo, to the Gulf of Mexico without local contribution, utilizing the present levee system as a basis.

Section 2 authorizes the President to appoint the Mississippi Valley Flood Control Commission, to exist until the completion of the project only, composed of seven members, who must devote their entire time to the duties of the commission, and four of whom shall be engineers; authorizes the President to fix their salaries, and authorizes employment of Army or civilian engineers and all assistants, and provides for the procedure of the commission.

Section 3 directs the commission to turn over to the Chief of Engineers all records, etc., on completion of the project.

Section 4 cedes the flood-control jurisdiction and river improvement work of the Mississippi River Commission to the Mississippi Valley Flood Control Commission.

Section 5 provides for the transfer of all records and property to the Mississippi Valley Flood Control Commission from the Mississippi River Commission; provides for the use by the Mississippi Valley Flood Control Commission of all flood-control records of the Chief of Engineers of the Army, and makes available to the Chief of Engineers all flood-control records of the Mississippi Valley Flood Control Commission.

Section 6 abolishes the Mississippi River Commission upon organization of the new commission.

Section 7 places the exclusive control of the flood-control works in the Mississippi Valley Flood Control Commission and provides for surveys and for the employment and pay of all necessary assistants.

Section 8 authorizes the construction of all flood-control works by hired labor or otherwise, and provides for the acquirement of all necessary property, equipment, and flowage rights.

Section 9 authorizes the commission to acquire necessary real estate or interest therein by purchase, by donation, or by condemnation proceedings.

Section 10 authorizes the commission to obtain necessary property through levee districts or other agencies.

Section 11 confers on commission power to enter upon and acquire lands for flood-control purposes.

Section 12 authorizes condemnation proceedings by the commission, through the Attorney General of the United States, to acquire necessary land for flood-control purposes, and the payment of just compensation for the property taken with authority to enter upon necessary lands to be condemned after court proceedings have been instituted and under certain conditions.

Section 13 directs the commission to proceed at once to enlarge, raise, strengthen, reinforce, relocate, and reconstruct existing levees to control the destructive flood waters of the Mississippi River.

Section 14 provides, in addition to system of levees, for the control of the destructive flood waters by spillways, flood ways, diversion channels, storage basins, and reservoirs.

Section 15 provides for an economic survey of the area involved in the flood-control project to ascertain the effect of the additional flood-control protection, and report of its findings to the President, who shall transmit the same to Congress.

Section 16 authorizes the investigation and study of watersheds within the Mississippi Basin producing destructive floods, all available data, reports, and surveys to be utilized in said study, including the surveys and reports authorized by Congress in the act of January 21, 1927, and provides that the report shall include information as now provided for in the present flood control act.

Section 17 provides for a comprehensive reservoir survey to ascertain the extent to which floods in the lower Mississippi Valley may be controlled by a reservoir system; report to contain valuable information on kindred subjects, and provides for their use if economically justifiable, in the opinion of the President.

Section 18 authorizes the commission to utilize engineering, scientific, and constructive services of all Government departments and commissions that relate to the study, development, or control of the rivers or subjects related thereto.

Section 19 authorizes the appropriation of $473,000,000, or such sums as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of the act, and in the event the condition of the Treasury necessitates so doing, the President is authorized to issue bonds up to that amount.

3. EXPLANATION OF PROVISIONS OF THE BILL AS AMENDED

Section 1

The bill in its amended form as reported by the committee provides in a general way in section 1 that "for the sole purpose of aiding interstate commerce, preventing interruptions to the United States mails, promoting the general welfare and national defense, and for the security of life and property in the lower Mississippi Valley from the destructive flood waters of the Mississippi River" the President shall through a commission, to be known as the "Mississippi Valley Flood Control Commission," construct certain flood-control works "without local contributions" as will control the greatest floods heretofore recorded or which may be reasonably anticipated. The section refers to a "comprehensive system of flood-control works" in which there is authorization to include levees, controlled and regulated spillways, flood ways, storage basins and reservoirs, and appurtenances thereto, as are in the judgment of the President and commission necessary or economically advisable so as to reduce the volume of water in the main trunk of the river between Cape Girardeau and the Gulf to certain stages set out in later sections of the bill. It further allows this new commission to utilize in such work whatever has been heretofore performed by the Mississippi River Commission or any other agency for the control of floods or improvement of the river.

In section 1 there are in a general way the complete provisions of the bill, with the exception of the appropriation further on provided. In section 1 is outlined (1) the executive authority for the construction of the flood works, (2) the financial or economic policy to be pursued, and (3) the engineering features which the committee recommends. It must be borne in mind that whatever arguments are herein contained can be justified by reference to the printed record of the hearings and in the addenda which is attached to the report. A report of this character must of necessity be incomplete and the committee feels justified, after its prolonged investigation of the subject matter, not only in inviting attention to its report, but in requesting likewise a perusal of the record of the hearings, and especially the excerpts from the same contained in this report.

In a situation like this it is proper to place upon the President the responsibility for and to confer upon him the authority to construct the flood-control works in the lower valley designed to prevent these great periodical economic losses and interruptions to commerce and the business of the Nation. There is provided in the bill an agency through which the President is to accomplish the work, to which more detailed reference will be made further on in the report. No restrictions are placed upon the President in the free execution of the task and the legislation recommended contemplates that the Chief Executive shall finally be the judge of what is or is not to be done. In this respect the legislation follows closely the precedent and policy established by the Congress in providing for the construction of the Panama Canal.

The control of floods upon the lower Mississippi has been generally admitted to be a gigantic undertaking. If the Congress is to deal adequately and thoroughly with the problem, which holds a yearly threat to the lives and property of so many American citizens, it should authorize the President to do whatever is necessary to accomplish the end sought. The United States of America has expended hundreds of millions of dollars in the rehabilitation and rescue of foreign nations and has spared neither effort nor money in the thorough accomplishment of this work. In dealing with the lives and happiness of our own citizens the Congress should not do less than it would for others.

Section 2

This section of the bill provides that the flood-control works shall be constructed "without local contributions." The committee's reasons for this action are very fully set forth heretofore in Chapter III.

This section of the bill follows closely the act creating the Isthmian Canal Commission, the organization used in the planning of the construction of the Panama Canal.

The bill adopts no specific engineering plan, merely investing the commission with the authority necessary to do the work.

This is not only the wisest thing to do, but is the only thing that could be done in view of the evidence presented to the committee, different governmental agencies having proposed different engineering plans to do the same work.

There was a wide divergence between the plan submitted by the Chief of Engineers, General Jadwin, and that of the Mississippi River Commission, the duly authorized agency established by Congress to prepare flood-control plans. General Jadwin's plan also differed widely from the reports of the several subordinate boards established to investigate certain phases of the problem. The committee, therefore, had before it no well-defined and comprehensive plan upon which there was anything like unanimity of opinion. In fact, there was not a single outstanding engineer that would approve the Jadwin plan in its entirety, and scores of levee engineers with years of actual experience on the river refused to approve many of the engineering features suggested by General Jadwin and denounced it as impractical, unscientific, and surely doomed to failure.

Therefore the committee decided to give the President the authority, through a new commission to be appointed by him, to formulate plans for and then to construct a comprehensive and adequate system of flood control for the lower Mississippi Valley, utilizing the present levee system as a basis and employing such spillways, flood ways, storage basins, and reservoirs as, in their judgment, might be found necessary, in order to pass the flood waters safely from Cape Girardeau, Mo., to the Gulf of Mexico.

This commission will be able to take the several engineering plans which have been devised, study them, reconcile the differences, and finally adopt a matured and well-considered plan which will insure the desired result, the prevention of another such disaster as that of 1927.

It would be impossible for a committee of laymen to pass upon the merits of highly technical engineering features, such as are embodied in the Army engineers' plan. The new commission will be at liberty to adopt General Jadwin's plan in its entirety if it believes that the plan is sound and should be followed, or it may adopt certain features of General Jadwin's plan and certain features of the plan recommended by the Mississippi River Commission. The committee's reasons for not adopting the plan submitted by General Jadwin or the Mississippi River Commission are more fully set forth in Chapter IV.

It is proposed that the new commission consist of seven members, at least four of whom shall be experienced engineers. Further than this, their qualifications are not prescribed in the bill, under which the President is at liberty to appoint whom he chooses, selecting the personnel from the present Mississippi River Commission, the Corps of Engineers, or from civil life. For a project of the magnitude of this one, and considering its importance to the whole Nation, the commission should unquestionably be composed of outstanding engineers or business leaders who have demonstrated their ability to deal with a big problem in a big way. The Chief of Engineers of the Army would be eligible for appointment to the new commission, and his services ought to be of great assistance to it, either as an active member of the commission or in an advisory capacity.

The commissioners are to devote their entire time to the duties of the commission, and they are to receive such compensation as the President may determine, until it is otherwise fixed by Congress.

The salaries to be paid the members of the commission should be sufficiently large to attract the best, most experienced, and capable engineers and business men in the country.

One of the handicaps under which the Mississippi River Commission has labored in the past, as brought out in the testimony before the committee, is that its members have been charged with so many duties it has been impossible for them to give the time and attention to the work of the commission which it should have received. This is particularly true with reference to the three Army engineer officers, Colonel Potter, Colonel Schulz, and Colonel Kutz. Each of these officers is now a division engineer of the United States Army in charge of a great many different projects and burdened with a myriad of details. It is physically impossible for them to devote any great portion of their time to the problem of the Mississippi.

Another handicap to the smooth and efficient working of the commission has been that under the present law an Army engineer officer is allowed to serve only four years on one assignment. This has caused a constant changing in the personnel of the commission, which has interfered with the carrying out of their plans and projects. To remedy this condition, the bill provides in this section that the members of the commission shall serve until the project is completed, unless sooner removed by the President. In this way a commission will be provided which will be able to carry on the work without unnecessary changes in personnel, and the experience gained by the members in the progress of the work will not be lost through the appointment of new and inexperienced members every few years.

The President, of course, under the language of this section is given the right, in his discretion, to remove any of the commissioners from office at any time, either with or without cause.

The President is also given the authority to employ, in connection with the project, any of the engineers of the Army, any engineers from civil life, and any other persons necessary for the proper and expeditious prosecution of the work. Following the precedent established by the Panama Canal Commission, it is very probable that the Mississippi Valley Flood Control Commission would deem it advantageous to appoint a chief engineer who would have entire charge and direction of the project, and to whom all the subordinate employees would be responsible. This would give the "one-man" control which was advocated by several witnesses who testified before the committee, and would enable the work to be carried on under one directing head, acting, of course, under the general supervision of the commission.

The compensation of the employees of the commission is to be fixed by it, subject to the approval of the President, and the official salary of any Army officer appointed or employed in connection with the project is to be deducted from the salary or compensation which shall be fixed under the terms of the present bill.

The Mississippi Valley Flood Control Commission shall be under the direction and control of the President, and is required to report to him each year, or at such other periods as he may fix, covering all of its official actions, its receipts, and expenditures. The President shall transmit the reports of the commission to Congress, and the commission is further directed to render to Congress, or to either House of Congress, such reports as may be required from time to time by act of Congress, or order of either House or the appropriate committee of either. By this means the President and Congress will be able to keep in close touch with the commission and its work, to enact such additional legislation as may from time to time be found necessary, and keep a close check on the progress made on the project.

The President is directed to have suitable offices provided for the use of the commission, together with such equipment as may be necessary and proper for the discharge of its duties. The location of the headquarters of the commission is not named in the bill, and this is left to the best judgment and discretion of the President. He may deem it advisable to have the commission located at some point on the Mississippi River, or it may be thought more advantageous to have its headquarters in Washington, where close contact could be maintained with the several Government departments. No restriction should be placed on the President in this connection.

The commission is directed to keep a true and correct record of its proceedings. Members of the Mississippi River Commission testified that a great deal of its business has been transacted orally, with no written record kept for future reference. This has made it very difficult to get an accurate estimate of the status of the commission's work on the various parts of the river. A complete, detailed, and accurate written record should be kept of all the business and transactions of the commission in order that correct and comprehensive reports may be made by it to the President and to Congress.

The commission is authorized to make such rules and regulations as may be necessary for the orderly conduct of its duties, subject to the approval of the President. This authority will enable the commission to determine its procedure with reference to the various subjects under its jurisdiction, and to promulgate rules for the information and guidance of all concerned. The commission should have the general authority to determine its procedure without having to secure new legislation covering the matters.

Section 3

The Mississippi Valley Flood Control Commission is directed upon completion of the project authorized in the bill to turn over to the Chief of Engineers of the Army all of its records, property, and equipment. The commission is created in order to carry out and complete this one project of flood control on the lower Mississippi River, and therefore the bill directs that when the project is completed, the commission shall be dissolved and the work shall revert to the Corps of Engineers of the Army.

Section 4

The jurisdiction of the new commission shall be the same as that now exercised by the present Mississippi River Commission, viz, from Rock Island, Ill., to the Head of Passes, on the main channel of the Mississippi River, and on the tributaries of the river so far as they are affected by the flood waters of the river. The new commission is directed to take over and complete all flood-control and river-improvement work now under the jurisdiction of the Mississippi River Commission.

Section 5

The Mississippi River Commission is directed to turn over to the Mississippi Valley Flood Control Commission all of its records, property, and equipment. During the 50 years that the Mississippi River Commission has been in charge of work on the river it has, of course, accumulated much valuable data and information which will be of great assistance to the new commission in carrying on the flood-control project. These records will be immediately available, and from them the new commission will be able to determine the type of flood-control works needed, and begin their construction without unnecessary delay.

All of the records and data in the possession of the Chief of Engineers are to be made available to the commission when their use is necessary in connection with the flood-control project, and, similarly, all records and data in possession of the commission are to be made available to the Chief of Engineers when necessary for his use in connection with any flood-control work under his direction. In this way, with the interchange of information, a duplication of work will be avoided and each agency having to do with any flood-control work will be able to utilize the results of research and investigations made by the other.

The commission when appointed will have access to all the studies and surveys which have been made by the Corps of Engineers, and should be able quickly to determine upon the character of flood-control works which should be prosecuted. It will not, therefore, be necessary for a new survey or examination to be made by the commission, and its appointment will not cause any material delay in starting the construction of the flood-control works. A commission including competent and skilled engineers should be able to take the reports of the Chief of Engineers, the Mississippi River Commission, and the various subordinate boards, and in a short time work out a definite project.

It is the purpose of this section of the bill to place in the hands of the new commission all available reports, records, and data which will be of any assistance to it in formulating its project.

Section 6

This section abolishes the Mississippi River Commission after the new commission is appointed and organized. It is thought very likely, however, that the President may see fit to utilize the membership of the Mississippi River Commission in connection with the project authorized by the bill, either as members of the new commission or in other capacities. The experience which they have gained, some of them from a long and intimate connection with the problems of the Mississippi River, should make their assistance very useful in connection with carrying out the project. Three of the present members of the Mississippi River Commission are Army officers, and, of course, under the provisions of the bill the President is authorized to employ them in connection with this work.

The Mississippi Valley Flood Control Commission is given exclusive control of the location, construction, and maintenance of all flood-control works. One of the elemental weaknesses of the present system has been the divided responsibility. So long as this condition is permitted to continue, no adequate flood protection will ever be afforded. The testimony of the witnesses, who have appeared before the committee, has been unanimous to the effect that only by having one responsible agency in charge of locating, constructing, and maintaining all flood-control works can a comprehensive and coherent system of flood protection be secured. At present, the local levee districts and the Federal Government share in this responsibility, and the result has been an uncompleted system of levees which have resulted in the disasters of the past. The Federal Government has entire charge and control of the river for all purposes of navigation, and should unquestionably have similar authority for flood control.

The commission is directed to make such investigations, studies, and surveys as may be necessary in connection with the project placed under its jurisdiction, and also to employ such assistants as may be necessary and fix their compensation. Certain surveys and studies will probably be necessary from time to time as the work contemplated in the project proceeds, and it is felt that the commission should have full authority to undertake them as it sees fit without further action by Congress. It should also have authority to engage its assistants and to determine their salaries.

The President is directed, through the Mississippi Valley flood control commission, to proceed at once to construct and complete the flood-control works and river-improvement works contemplated in the present project, and also those which have been heretofore authorized by existing law. This authorization includes the right to have the works constructed either by hired labor or otherwise, which empowers the commission to enter into contracts for their construction, in its discretion.

The commission is authorized to acquire, in the name of the United States, any equipment or property which may be necessary to complete the project, and also to acquire any or all real estate, including rights of way, flowage rights, or flood ways, or other property or rights or such interest therein or uses thereof as may be necessary.

The committee feels that the commission charged with the execution of the project should be given the unlimited right, in its judgment, to acquire whatever property or equipment may be required in order to carry out the project, and should not be hampered in any way in the procurement of the same.

Section 9

The commission is authorized to acquire, in the name of the United States, any and all real property or interests therein as in its judgment is necessary to complete the project. Three ways in which this property may be secured are given, as follows:

First. By purchase, whenever the property or interests may be obtained at a price deemed by the commission to be reasonable.

Second. By donation.

Third. By condemnation proceedings.

Section 10

The commission is authorized to repay to any State or subdivision or agency thereof, or any levee district, individual, partnership, corporation, or company, the amount expended by same for any property or interest acquired by them for the purpose of conveying it to the United States, provided this amount does not exceed the fair market value of the property, and, in the opinion of the commission, is reasonable.

This provision will enable local levee districts, or the other classes enumerated, to secure real estate which may be necessary for the prosecution of the flood-control works, and to sell it to the United States. In many instances the local levee districts, being the ones most closely in touch with the situation, will be able to secure the necessary land or other property at a price far below that which the Government itself might have to pay. It is believed by the committee that the levee districts, being primarily interested in securing flood protection, will be glad to assist in the pursuance of the work to this extent.

Section 11

In order that no necessary work may be delayed while awaiting judicial proceedings, the commission is given full power to enter upon any land and to acquire, condemn, occupy, possess, and use it when needed for the location, construction, operation, or maintenance of flood-control works.

Section 12

This section outlines the procedure which shall be followed in acquiring the necessary property by condemnation proceedings, and has been very carefully drawn after consultation with a representative of the Department of Justice. The condemnation proceedings are to be under the direction of the Attorney General and are to be conducted in the appropriate district court of the United States.

In order to ascertain the compensation which should be paid to the owner of the property the court is directed to appoint three commissioners who shall be competent and disinterested appraisers. In this provision the bill follows the provisions of the act with reference to acquiring the land for the Algiers Naval Station at New Orleans. The appraisers are to be sworn to the faithful performance of their duty and are directed to view the property and hear the evidence which either the United States or the property owner may offer, under such rules as the court may prescribe. The appraisers, or a majority of them, then sign and file in the court a report fixing the value of the property or right sought to be acquired. Either party is given the right, within 10 days after the filing of the report, to file objections or exceptions thereto. The court then considers the report and objections and either confirms or modifies the same or makes such other appropriate order as it shall deem proper. At the conclusion of the proceeding the court shall enter an order fixing the amount which shall be paid to the owner of the property as just compensation for its taking. This order shall be final and binding upon both parties.

The Mississippi Valley flood control commission is given the right to take immediate possession of any property when exceptions or objections to the report of the commissioners are filed by the property owner, and to proceed with the flood-control work authorized by the present bill, provided that the court shall be satisfied that certain and adequate provisions shall have been made for the payment of just compensation to the property owner by previous appropriations made by the United States.

The bill directs that all condemnation proceedings shall be diligently undertaken on the part of the United States in order that just compensation may be promptly ascertained and paid.

All condemnation proceedings authorized under this bill are to be in accordance with the general law governing the condemnation of land, except as modified or changed by the bill.

Section 13

The commission is directed to proceed at once with the work contemplated in the present project, which shall also include the enlarging, raising, strengthening, reinforcing, relocating, and reconstructing of the existing levees as may be necessary to control the destructive flood waters of the Mississippi River and its tributaries and outlets in so far as the said tributaries and outlets are affected by the flood waters of the Mississippi River.

The commission is directed to proceed at once with the work contemplated in the present project, which shall also include the enlarging, raising, strengthening, reinforcing, relocating, and reconstructing of the existing levees as may be necessary to control the destructive flood waters of the Mississippi River and its tributaries and outlets in so far as the said tributaries and outlets are affected by the flood waters of the Mississippi River.

This provision takes in the tributaries of the Mississippi to the extent of the present jurisdiction of the Mississippi River Commission, and gives the commission full power and authority to do whatever is necessary to have the levees brought up to the height and size which will make them effective for the purpose of protection against the floods.

In addition to the system of levees at present existing, the commission is directed to prepare such plans for flood control and to construct such additional levees as may be necessary to control the destructive flood waters. The commission is also given full power and authority to construct spillways, flood ways, diversion channels, storage basins, or reservoirs, in order that the flood waters of the Mississippi River shall be confined, controlled, regulated, and carried safely through the flood-control works which are to be built between Cape Girardeau, Mo., and the Gulf of Mexico.

The flood-control works shall be of such type and capacity that sufficient of the flood waters shall be diverted from the main channel of the river so that the flood crest shall not hereafter exceed the following stages on the gauges listed: 19 feet on the Carrollton gauge at New Orleans, La.; 58 feet on the gauge at Arkansas City, Ark.; 54 feet on the gauge at Cairo, Ill.

HOW GAUGE HEIGHTS WERE FIXED

The Jadwin report and the Mississippi River Commission report state that the "levees only" policy is abandoned and that the future necessity is to keep flood heights down to safe heights by use of spillways and diversion channels. Under the Jadwin plan with such small amount of freeboard in order that the levees may be kept from breaking, gauge heights are fixed in the bill at three cardinal points which, according to General Jadwin's testimony (p. 3680), are sufficient on which to base operation of discharges. Under the Jadwin plan the water at Cairo is to be discharged into the flood way when the water reaches 55 feet, in the bill it is directed to be discharged when the crest reaches 54 feet; at Arkansas City under the Jadwin plan discharges into the Boeuf Basin flood way at 60.5 feet, in the bill at 58 feet; at New Orleans the Jadwin plan discharges the flood at 20 feet, in the bill at 19 feet. Where such a great calamity might ensue the committee decided no unnecessary chances should be taken so it fixed the flood crests as indicated, which are reasonable in view of the last flood.

JADWIN PLAN

Water begins to spill over the levee into the Bird Point-New Madrid flood way at elevation of 55 on the Cairo gauge. (Par. 125, Jadwin report.)

Water begins to go over the top of the fuse-plug levee into the Boeuf flood way at elevation 60.5 on the Arkansas City gauge. (Par. 117, Jadwin report.)

Over the fuse-plug levee at the head of the Atchafalaya flood way at elevation 57.5 on the Angola gauge. (Pars. 101 and 109, Jadwin report.)

Crest of the Bonnet Carre spillway placed at 20 feet above mean Gulf level equivalent to about 15 on the Carrollton gauge, but not to be opened unless the Carrollton gauge will go above a stage of 20 feet. (Par. 115, Jadwin report.)

MISSISSIPPI RIVER COMMISSION PLAN

The Mississippi River Commission provides for no diversion between Cape Girardeau and the mouth of the Arkansas.

Provides 600,000 cubic feet per second diversion through the Boeuf diversion, which will begin discharging as soon as the water reaches the elevation of the spillway crest, or 54.4 on the Arkansas City gauge. Expected to control the height of water at Arkansas City to 66.4, which without spillway would go to a stage of 74.5. (Par. 244, Mississippi River Commission report.)

Mississippi River Commission plans to let 980,000 cubic feet per second into the Atchafalaya flood way by the removal of the levees at the head of the flood way (par. 48, spillway board report), presumably to the elevation of the ground surface, which is equivalent to 47.5 feet on the Angola gauge. (This elevation not given in either report, but is taken from maps.) The diversion is expected to hold the gauge at Angola to 60, which otherwise would go to 65.5. (Spillway board report, par. 77.)

In order that Congress may be in possession of all the facts necessary in order to determine any adjustment to be made in the future in the proportion of the cost of the flood-control works to be borne by the United States the commission is directed to have an economic survey made of the area involved in this project, and to report its findings to the President, who shall transmit them to Congress.

It is the belief of the committee that this survey will disclose that there will be no increase in the value of the lands in the Mississippi Valley because of the added protection which may be afforded by the flood-control works, and that it will show the people in the lower valley are wholly unable to bear any additional burdens. The commencement of the work, however, should not be delayed until this survey is completed, but should be promptly begun and vigorously prosecuted. If the survey should reveal that there should be some different apportionment of the cost of the work, it can be done by future legislation.

It is conceded by all that every drop of water which falls in the Mississippi Basin should be taken into consideration in devising a comprehensive and adequate system of flood control for the lower Mississippi River. The testimony before the committee shows that there never has been a complete survey of all that vast territory which stretches from the Allegheny to the Rocky Mountains. Before it can be said that the study of the problem is complete there must be a survey of all the streams tributary to the Mississippi, which are the contributing factor to the floods on that river.

The rivers and harbors act approved January 21, 1927, authorized surveys of practically every river in the United States, including those in the Mississippi Basin, where power development seemed feasible, the surveys, however, to include also the question of flood control. This section of the present bill, therefore, contains no new authorization, but merely directs that the surveys should consider flood control as a major problem and not incidentally to that of power development.

The President is authorized to utilize whatever agency he sees fit for this survey, either the Mississippi Valley Flood Control Commission, the Chief of Engineers, or any other agency. The investigation is directed to be made at once and is to include all watersheds within the Mississippi Basin producing floods destructive to life and property or which obstruct interstate commerce and cause interruption of the United States mails. The agency making the survey is directed to utilize in its studies all available data, reports, and surveys, including those authorized by the act of January 21, 1927, referred to above.

Reports of the studies are to be transmitted to Congress as soon as practicable, and where those of particular rivers or areas are completed they are to be submitted from time to time as ready without waiting until the survey of the whole area is finished.

As these reports are received and studied, Congress will be enabled to adopt plans for the control of the destructive flood waters in the Mississippi Valley, in addition to the project authorized in this bill, if it should be deemed necessary or advisable.

The reports of the studies and investigations shall contain the following information and data:

First. The extent and character of the area to be affected by the proposed movement.

Second. The probable effect upon any navigable water or waterways.

Third. The possible economical development and utilization of water power.

Fourth. Such other uses as may be properly related to or coordinated with the project.

Fifth. What Federal interests, if any, is involved in the proposed improvement.

Sixth. What share of the expense, if any, should be borne by the United States.

Seventh. The advisability of adopting the project.

This is the same provision which is contained in the present flood control act with reference to reports submitted on surveys authorized in accordance with that act.

Section 17

Many students of the flood-control problem have for years maintained that the ideal system of flood control is the building of reservoirs at the headwaters of the tributaries of the Mississippi, storing the flood waters at their source, and thereby preventing them from entering the main channel below and filling it to overflowing. The committee received a great deal of testimony with reference to this theory, particularly with regard to the possibility of the economical utilization of the waters of the Missouri River and the other streams in that vast strip of country lying west of the Mississippi and north of the Arkansas. The committee feels that no adequate study has ever been made of this phase of the subject and that it should receive further and more extended consideration.

The bill, therefore, in this section provides for the investigation of the reservoir system of flood control by the Mississippi Valley Flood Control Commission, or other agencies, in the President's discretion, which are authorized, so far as they reasonably can, to invite the helpful aid of State engineers, university and technical men, and State officials.

The studies shall include such questions as the following:

First. The effect on the subject of flood control in the lower Mississippi River to be attained through the control of flood waters in the drainage basin of its tributaries by the establishment of a reservoir system.

Second. The benefits which may accrue to navigation, agriculture, and power from the prevention of erosion and siltage entering the streams.

Third. A determination of the capacities of the soils of the district to receive and hold waters from such reservoirs.

Fourth. Kindred questions.

Fifth. What additional benefits may accrue from such reservoir system.

Sixth. The prospective income from the disposal of such waters, including both agriculture and power.

Seventh. The return-flow value of waters placed in the soils from reservoirs.

Eighth. Their stabilizing effect on stream flow as a means of preventing erosion and silting, and of improving navigation conditions.

Ninth. To what extent reservoired waters may be available for the municipal and domestic uses and to what extent reimbursive.

Tenth. The approximate cost of each proposed reservoir and its capacity.

Eleventh. Specific reasons for acceptance or rejection of any proposed reservoir site.

The commission, or other agency which may be charged with the work, is directed, as soon as the studies of the reservoirs are completed and approved, either singly or in groups, to submit a report thereon to the President, together with definite estimates of cost, working data, and all related findings and conclusions.

If the President reaches the conclusion that the construction of any of the reservoirs reported on would have a substantial and beneficial influence in controlling the floods on the navigable waterways of the lower Mississippi Valley and is economically justifiable, he is authorized to issue an order directing the commission, or other agency, to proceed with their construction as soon as appropriations are available for the purpose. The commission may have the reservoirs constructed under its own supervision or may let contracts therefor.

These provisions of the bill will provide for the adoption of the reservoir system of flood control, so strenuously advocated by close students of the subject for many years, if the results of the studies directed to be made should disclose that its adoption is economically feasible.

The Secretary of the Interior is given the authority, upon the completion of any reservoir, to dispose of the impounded waters under rules which he may make and which shall be approved by the President. This would permit the use of the waters in the reservoirs for purposes of irrigation or power, and the revenue to be derived thereby would largely offset the cost of their construction.

The Secretary of the Interior is given the further power to enter into negotiations for the purpose of selling the reservoirs themselves, but he is directed to retain at all times authority to direct the impounding and the emptying of the waters, so that their use for purposes of flood control may never be interfered with injuriously. Only tentative agreements for the sale of the reservoirs may be entered into by the Secretary, the approval of Congress being required to be given by law before final sale is made.

The committee's reasons for the inclusion of this section of the bill are more fully set forth in Chapter VIII.

Section 18

In order that all the resources of the Government may be utilized in carrying out the project for the control of the floods on the lower Mississippi River, the President and the Mississippi Valley Flood Control Commission are authorized to utilize the engineering, scientific, and constructive services of the bureaus, boards, and commissions of the Government departments, and also the commissions created by Congress that relate to the study, development, or control of rivers and subjects related thereto.

This will permit the coordination of all activities of the various Government departments, will prevent overlapping and duplication of effort, and will insure the best and most economical administration in connection with this vast project.

Section 19

An appropriation of $473,000,000 is authorized to carry out the project. This figure was arrived at by the committee after considering very carefully the estimates of the Mississippi River Commission and General Jadwin, and includes those items which the committee deems essential for the prompt and speedy execution of the project. The items indicated below are those which the committee believes should be undertaken at the earliest possible moment, and the figures given are taken from the reports of General Jadwin and the Mississippi River Commission, as indicated, except certain new items added by the committee as shown:

If this appropriation should be considered by the President to be too large for the condition of the Treasury to warrant at this time, he is authorized, if he deems it advisable, to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to issue bonds to raise the money, acting under the authority of the various Liberty bond acts.

WHY LOCAL CONTRIBUTION WAS ABANDONED

1. To avoid divided responsibility which resulted in weak levees.
2. Impossibility of getting contributions from local interests, as shown by local economic survey.
3. Impossibility of enforcement in times of disaster.
4. United States should have exclusive control to render flood-control system effective.
5. Levee districts are interdependent.
6. Levee tax systems in States in lower Mississippi Valley.

The committee is of the opinion that the "local contribution" policy of the Government should be abandoned and believes that to make the construction of flood-control works dependent upon local contribution will result in the failure of the whole plan and another disaster such as that which appalled the Nation last year might happen. Divided responsibility resulting from the local contribution policy has been the primary cause for the failure of the protective works, and permitted weak levees, which, when they failed, not only flooded their own districts but also brought disasters to the neighboring districts and neighboring States.

A system which permits local interests to build or not to build adequate levees is doomed from the beginning, and there is no way under the law to compel a district to build flood-control works or force the collection of any assessment for the same.

Under the present law, and similar proposed laws, money for flood-control works must come from the levee districts along the Mississippi River. These levee districts, while authorized by State law, are in no way connected with the State. They get no State funds and they are not permitted to use the credit of the State. Every property in each levee district only pays the amount assessed in legal proceedings, and, of course, it can never amount to more than the certain per cent of the increased value produced by the levee works, but the assessments must be uniform and equal.

If property is already burdened with levee bond issues and is not producing enough to pay past due assessments, there is little hope that they will be able to pay for future assessments, and then, of course, there will be no flood protection if that is made dependent upon local contribution.

There are some who say that there are rich landowners and rich corporations in some of these levee districts that should come to the rescue and put up the money. This might be the case if the United States Government was a beseiging enemy sending word that unless a certain amount of money is forthcoming the city will be destroyed. The day has not yet come in America when we are going to demand tribute for saving the life and property in a community or levy an assessment upon a man to save him from drowning.

The raising of this "local contribution" is not to be likened to taking up a collection for a charitable enterprise, which rich men are expected to make large donations to and poor people small ones, but they must be handled in a legal manner.

The advocates of local contribution fail to take into consideration that the damages are caused by agencies outside of the levee districts or States, and that the damage is not caused by any act or negligence of those suffering from the damage. Under every theory of American law the source of damage and the responsibility therefor is the main factor and the penalty is laid against the party or parties causing the damage.

However, under the local contribution theory, these people that are damaged not only suffer the injury, but also have the additional penalty laid upon them of having to pay the money necessary to prevent the damage from the outside source. The advocates of local contribution practically pay no attention to the "regions from which the flood waters come" and without this, of course, there can be no fair solution of the problem.

Taking into consideration the amount of money already invested by the United States in the levees, the absolute necessity of levees in navigation, the direct taxes that will flow into the United States Treasury on account of the resumption of normal activities, the prevention of interference with interstate commerce and the delay of the United States mails, the amount of money already contributed by local interests amounting to $292,000,000, the United States can ill afford to do anything else than supply the funds for flood-control works.

A mere reading of the statements of the conditions of the levee districts and the necessity of having a unified, comprehensive system of flood control under one authority, as hereinafter set forth, is sufficient to convince anyone that the position of the committee is justified.

The testimony showed that the local interests have not been able in the past to supply the money necessary to bring the levees up to the 1914 standard grade, and after the flood of 1927 their financial condition is so bad that there is no hope that they will be able to raise any money to apply toward the payment of the costs of the new flood-control works necessary.

1. TO AVOID DIVIDED RESPONSIBILITY WHICH RESULTED IN WEAK LEVEES

LOCAL CONTRIBUTION IS RESPONSIBLE FOR FAILURE OF PRESENT LEVEE SYSTEM

Colonel Potter testifies that some levee breaks resulted from the inability of local districts to pay a share of the expense of levee construction:

Colonel Potter on local contributions

(P. 2240)

The CHAIRMAN. Did each one of them have a crevasse?

Colonel POTTER. I really do not know as to two crevasses. I do not know whether they were both in one district or one in each district, but the two districts are there together, and I never thought to look to see which district the crevasse was in.

The CHAIRMAN. Did they ask you for money that you could not supply?

Colonel POTTER. No, sir; we gave them money which they could not meet.

The CHAIRMAN. And consequently the work is not done?

Colonel POTTER. Consequently the work is not done; no, sir.

Commissioner West shares the opinion of Colonel Potter that it would be almost impossible to get contributions from the districts below Helena, Ark.:

(P. 3054)

The CHAIRMAN. Now, will you tell the committee; can you conceive of a community in any one of the levee districts being reconciled to permitting a crevasse-breached levee to remain unconstructed, if that particular community or district had the necessary funds available for the reconstruction of that levee?

Mr. WEST. Oh, unquestionably they would make every effort to close the crevasses.

The CHAIRMAN. And if they could raise the funds they would do so, would they not?

Mr. WEST. They certainly would.

The CHAIRMAN. They certainly would not permit the crevasse to stay there?

Mr. WEST. No.

The CHAIRMAN. If they could possibly raise the money.

Mr. WEST. Oh, no; it is inconceivable that they would do a thing of that kind.

The CHAIRMAN. All right. Now, in the testimony given by Colonel Potter with reference to expenditures—or rather with reference to the expenditure of the coming allotment of $10,000,000 provided by the flood control act, which money will become available this winter—he stated that it would be almost impossible to get the necessary contributions from the districts below Helena and he doubted if this contribution could be gotten from any except a very few districts below Cairo. Is this opinion of Colonel Potter shared by the rest of the members of the Mississippi River Commission, including yourself?

Mr. WEST. It is by me. Of course, I can not speak for the other members.

Any plan which is constructed around the idea that local interests must contribute, even if financially unable to do so, is, in the opinion of Commissioner West, "a paper plan" only, doomed to certain failure:

Mr. West on local contributions

(P. 3069)

Mr. Cox. There are districts which you know have been unable to cooperate to the extent of making their contribution?

Mr. WEST. Yes; many times.

Mr. Cox. And that has resulted in your being unable to execute your plan, has it not?

Mr. WEST. It has.

Mr. Cox. Measures dictated by your judgment, or by the judgment of the commission, you have not been able to put into effect, because of that inability to cooperate?

Mr. WEST. Quite frequently that has occurred; yes, sir.

* * * * * * *

Mr. Cox. Yes. If they have been unable to contribute in the past, it is fair to assume that now, even now they are unable to contribute, is it not?

Mr. WEST. Far less able now than in the past; yes, sir.

Mr. Cox. Yes. And to enforce a provision of that kind would, in effect, be penalizing their poverty, would it not?

Mr. WEST. Well, if what we are told by many of the representatives of the various basins, who are the best informed, is true, it would be impossible.

Mr. Cox. It would be impossible?

Mr. WEST. Yes.

Mr. Cox. And the condition that had existed in the past would continue hereafter, if that was a provision of the law, would it?

Mr. WEST. Well, if you made that a provision of the law and these people are at all honest—and I believe that they are absolutely honest—you would simply have a paper plan; you would never have that plan transferred to the ground.

Mr. Cox. Well, in the interest, then, of control, no such provision should be incorporated into the law; should it?

Mr. WEST. No——

Mr. Cox. Is that not true?

Mr. WEST. Not if you are in earnest about carrying the provision into execution.

And according to Mr. West, the system requiring local contributions has made an unequal partnership with "too many small partners of varying strength and disposition" and has now caused a delay of three years in the execution of work under way:

(P. 3068)

Mr. Cox. Assuming that the Congress would have granted or would have appropriated all of the money that the commission might have needed, do you not agree that the weakness in the law under which we have been operating has been the provision requiring local contribution?

Mr. WEST. Yes, sir. Otherwise, the plans that are three years short of completion under the present law, if money had been placed in the hands of the commission, could have been completed.

Mr. COX. Then that provision is the vice of the law, is it?

Mr. WEST. Sir?

Mr. COX. That is the weakness in the law, is it not?

Mr. WEST. Yes; too many small partners of varying strength and disposition, to cooperate with the main controlling partner.

2. IMPOSSIBILITY OF GETTING CONTRIBUTIONS FROM LOCAL INTERESTS, AS SHOWN BY LOCAL ECONOMIC SURVEY

INABILITY OF LEVEE DISTRICTS TO CONTRIBUTE FURTHER

The testimony given in the hearings established the fact that those districts in which the greatest damage was done, and in which the people are most in need of aid, are the districts in which the people are least able to contribute to the cost of flood control. The sparsely settled agricultural districts, given over to plantations where cotton and cane are the principal products, were so overwhelmingly ruined that years will be required for their rehabilitation.

In some of those districts the bonded public debt, representing previous local expenditures for flood control, runs as high as three-fourths of the assessed valuation of the districts; and in other districts it will be found that the total liens and liabilities against the property of the districts, including the bonded public debt, and real estate mortgages against private property, exceed the total valuation of the property of the district available for assessment for taxes or benefits.

Many public officials testified that their districts have reached the limits of bonding and taxation under present laws, and that it will be absolutely impossible for them to participate in any plan for flood control which contemplates that they shall bear any part of the financial burden. They have the spirit and the courage to put themselves in to the extent of their ability, to fight the elements in order to win back their homes, but of goods, wares, and merchandise they have none, having reached the point where individual credit and public credit are alike ruined.

Not only did the mighty flood sweep away their homes, their cattle, and their tools and implements, but the water remained on the ground for so long a time thereafter that there was no opportunity for them to plant crops during the year. Under these depressing circumstances, it is no wonder that districts defaulted in the payment of interest on their outstanding bonds, the records of which will be found in the hearings, and that individuals could not meet the payments of principal and interest provided for in their mortgages.

This situation involved the merchants of these districts and also the local banks upon which the planters and merchants rely for financing from one season until the next. Every bank in one of the counties in Arkansas had failed as a result of the dreadful conditions brought about by the flood and the consequent failure of crops. How can it be expected that these people, without money and without credit, shall contribute to the great expense of establishing additional flood control?

Aside from the economic survey made through officials in the levee districts, hereinafter shown, the committee also received communications from mayors of cities, public officials, bankers, merchants, and scores of people generally throughout the districts affected, all testifying to the fact that the people in those districts have been bled white by taxation to provide the $292,000,000 already expended by the taxpayers in the lower valley on levees for flood control. They submit that these expenditures have reduced them in many districts to a condition of insolvency. They say they have exhausted their credit, both public and private, and ask if they may be relieved from any further burden at this time in protecting them from the floods which periodically descend upon them. The details of their unfortunate situation appear in the communications which follow hereafter.

The statements following show the financial status of each district; the extent of the damage it suffered from the record flood of 1927; the ability of each district to produce crops, and thereby contribute to its own rehabilitation; and a consideration of the question of how much, if anything, could be contributed by each district toward the cost of adequate protection. Nobody questions the veracity or integrity of the officials making these reports.

FACTS SHOWING LEVEE DISTRICTS ARE UNABLE TO CONTRIBUTE ANYTHING FURTHER TO FLOOD-CONTROL WORKS

A questionnaire was sent to each levee district on the Mississippi River by the chairman of the Flood Control Committee. Subsequently information as to the general conditions of the people in the levee districts was requested from officials and business men.

The following replies to the questionnaire and letter were received.

The losses set out below do not include any estimate of losses arising from suspension of busines activities nor do they include sums spent by the various States and political subdivisions thereof on attempted protection work. Losses of railroad, telegraph, and telephone companies are not included.

The page numbers listed below refer to the detailed statements concerning the levee districts which appear at the end of this chapter:

Scott County levee district, Missouri: The public bonds and real-estate mortgages equal to more than three-fourths of total assessed valuation. Unable to pay interest on public debt this year. Only half the farmers can raise money to plant 1928 crops. Unable to raise funds to contribute (p. 36).

Levee district No. 3 of Mississippi County, Mo.: The public bonds and real-estate mortgages equal to about four-fifths of total assessed valuation. District's sinking fund wiped out by bank failures resulting from 1927 flood. Jadwin plan would wreck the district both physically and financially (p. 37).

St. John levee and drainage district, Missouri: Outstanding public bonds and real-estate mortgages aggregate about $13,482,038; assessed valuation, $8,647,674. Tax delinquencies greatest in history. Schools forced to curtail terms. District defaulted payment on bonds and interest for 1927. If flood control depends upon local contribution, then can hope for no protection because can not pay (p. 37).

St. Francis levee district, Missouri: Outstanding public bonds and real-estate mortgages, $22,329,700; assessed valuation, $18,000,000; flood losses in 1927, $3,414,775. Can not market additional public bonds. Farmers unable to borrow any more. Burden of taxes to combat flood run from $2.50 to $3 per acre. Could not stand further assessment for flood control (p. 38).

St. Francis levee district, Arkansas: One hundred and sixty-five miles of levee. Outstanding public bonds and real-estate mortgages, $53,686,000; assessed valuation, $40,000,000. Suffered heavily from floods. Flood losses, 1927, $8,349,684. Red Cross helped many. Revenues insufficient to pay interest or sinking fund reserve on public debt. Can not float any more bonds (p. 39).

Helena improvement district, Arkansas: This is a metropolitan district, solvent, and otherwise in good condition (p. 39).

Cotton Belt levee district, Arkansas: Outstanding public bonds and real-estate mortgages, $5,365,913; assessed valuation, $2,436,862. Can not raise additional funds for flood control because legal limit of bonds has been reached. Red Cross still feeding thousands (p. 39).

Laconia levee district, No. 1, Arkansas: Outstanding public bonds and real-estate mortgages, $565,000; assessed valuation, $320,000. Flooded early in 1927, due directly to inability to finance flood-control works. Further taxation equivalent to confiscation. Practically whole population supported by Red Cross. "Dazed and bewildered" inhabitants will abandon the district unless Government takes over the expense of flood control (p. 40).

Laconia drainage and levee district, Arkansas: Outstanding public bonds and real-estate mortgages, $2,437,075; assessed valuation, $942,459. District has reached the limit of its resources and can not contribute further (p. 41).

Southeast Arkansas levee district, Arkansas: One hundred and forty-seven miles of levee. Outstanding public bonds and real-estate mortgages, $13,571,657; assessed valuation, $12,500,000; 1927 flood losses, $7,211,905. No more bonds can be sold, and income not sufficient to pay current indebtedness. Public bonds represent money spent for protection against floods. Unless Government assumes further burden for flood control district can not pay out. Most of inhabitants fed by the Red Cross (p. 41).

Fifth Louisiana levee district, Louisiana: Two hundred and forty-six miles of levees. Outstanding public bonds and real-estate mortgages, $18,543,986; assessed valuation, $37,141,433. Revenues for next two years pledged. Flood control requiring contribution will not help because resources are pledged, limit of bonded debt reached, and people staggering under taxes and debts (p. 41).

Atchafalaya Basin levee district, Louisiana: Two hundred and seventy miles of levees. Outstanding public bonds and real-estate mortgages, $37,308,350; assessed valuation, $73,000,000. "Sugar Bowl of Louisiana." Thousands unable after 1927 flood to return to homes until August, when it was too late to produce crops. Sixty thousand were rendered homeless by 1927 flood. District has anticipated revenues through 1934, and therefore unable to pay any part of cost of flood control (p. 42).

Lafourche Basin levee district, Louisiana: Outstanding public bonds and real-estate mortgages, $16,933,300; assessed valuation, $42,445,124. District anticipated its 1928 revenue to combat 1927 flood (p. 43).

Lake Borgne Basin levee district, Louisiana: Outstanding public bonds and real-estate mortgages, $5,896,450; assessed valuation, $18,524,132; 1927 flood losses, $5,325,000. District apparently in good condition (p. 43).

Orleans levee district, Louisiana: This is the metropolitan district of New Orleans, and is in good condition (p. 43).

Pontchartrain levee district, Louisiana: Outstanding public bonds and real-estate mortgages, $11,793,865; assessed valuation, $43,243,177. Integrity of 125 miles of levees in this district essential, as break in line in flood time would cover New Orleans from 5 to 10 feet deep (p. 43).

Board of Mississippi Levee Commissioners, Mississippi: One hundred and ninety-eight miles of levee. Outstanding public bonds and real-estate mortgages, $55,291,142; assessed valuation, $62,937,309; 1927 flood losses, $36,011,142. People burdened excessively by taxes, in face of fact they are unable to derive revenue from lands on account of 1927 flood and can not contribute (p. 44).

Yazoo-Mississippi Delta levee district, Mississippi: One hundred and seven miles of levee. Outstanding public bonds and real-estate mortgages, $87,020,000; assessed valuation, $115,000,000; 1927 flood losses, $10,172,440. Has not had a break in its front line of levees for 30 years. Because of terrific losses, people along the river have had difficulty to live, being deprived by flood of chance to make crops (p. 44).

Reelfoot levee district, Tennessee: Outstanding public bonds and real-estate mortgages, $1,220,000; assessed valuation, $2,753,406. Works in Tennessee are worthless unless the works in Kentucky are maintained, and it seems the danger to this district is from the adjoining district to the north, furnishing another reason for undivided Federal control (p. 45).

Fulton County levee board, Kentucky: Outstanding public bonds and real-estate mortgages, $1,840,000; assessed valuation, $1,000,000. Levee not up to standard. District deeply in debt and without funds to improve levees. Can not contribute to cost of flood control (p. 46).

3. IMPOSSIBILITY OF ENFORCEMENT IN TIMES OF DISASTER

Illustrative of the inability of some of the local levee districts to meet the situation confronting them following the 1927 overflow and to make contributions for the closure of crevasse breached levees, it is noted that the Mississippi River Commission had to waive the requirement of local contribution in the following instances and rebuild the levees at these localities entirely at Government expense. This was done with the approval and consent of the Secretary of War (p. 3839).

CREVASSES CLOSED ENTIRELY AT GOVERNMENT EXPENSE

Colonel Potter

(Pp. 2076–2079)

The CHAIRMAN. Let me ask you this: Are all levees repaired that are necessary to protect the main river?

Colonel POTTER. They are all repaired; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And one-third of that money was paid by the local levee districts?

Colonel POTTER. In the first and second districts; yes. In the third district, yes, without exception. In the fourth district we undertook the levees on the main river and we are——

The CHAIRMAN. What do you mean by that?

Colonel POTTER. To close the crevasses.

The CHAIRMAN. Without contribution?

Colonel POTTER. Without contribution.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Why did you make that distinction between the various districts?

Colonel POTTER. Because we could not get the money and we had to close the crevasses.

The CHAIRMAN. That is what I have been trying to get out of you for the last 10 minutes.

Colonel POTTER. I know that you know the conditions, and I assumed——

The CHAIRMAN. We do not know anything about it. We are trying to learn. We want it for the record, anyhow.

Colonel POTTER. In the fourth district—the fifth Louisiana district put up every cent of money in the third district, and they did not put up a cent of money in the fourth district. The latter was so far behind——

The CHAIRMAN. Did they have some money that they did not put up?

Colonel POTTER. They claimed they did not. We have no proof as to that.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know of any districts that held out on you and kept their money in the sock when they should have put it up for flood control?

Colonel POTTER. I do not believe there are any.

The CHAIRMAN. The Dorena crevasse: Do you know where that is?

Colonel POTTER. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is that repaired?

Colonel POTTER. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. At whose expense?

Colonel POTTER. Two-thirds the Government and one-third local.

The CHAIRMAN. And Knowlton?

Colonel POTTER. Knowlton is entirely Government. There was a district that could not put up its money.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. That is above Vicksburg, too, is it not?

Colonel POTTER. Yes; I overlooked that.

The CHAIRMAN. How about Mound Landing?

Colonel POTTER. The district has met its one-third and it is done.

The CHAIRMAN. Frenchtown?

Colonel POTTER. There are a couple of districts up there that are just below Pine Bluff, and those have been done long ago.

The CHAIRMAN. Who paid for them?

Colonel POTTER. The local people put up their money.

The CHAIRMAN. South Bend, on the Arkansas?

Colonel POTTER. It is closed and the funds were donated. One-third was put up by the local district.

The CHAIRMAN. Pendleton?

Colonel POTTER. The same way.

The CHAIRMAN. Two-thirds and one-third?

Colonel POTTER. Yes; two-thirds and one-third.

The CHAIRMAN. Medford?

Colonel POTTER. The same way.

The CHAIRMAN. Whitehill?

Colonel POTTER. Whitehill, two-thirds and one-third.

The CHAIRMAN. Laconia?

Colonel POTTER. Laconia was entirely at Government expense.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. That is above Vicksburg, is it not?

Colonel POTTER. Yes.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. I knew there were a lot of them up there.

Colonel POTTER. Yes. There were two crevasses in the White River district that I overlooked.

The CHAIRMAN. Junior crevasse?

Colonel POTTER. Junior crevasse was caused by a steamship running into the levee, and it was a very small matter and it has been closed. The local levee district furnished their one-third.

The CHAIRMAN. Caernarvon?

Colonel POTTER. Caernarvon is not in our hands. It is done by agreement with the local people, and the condition there I can not quite tell you about.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not closed anyhow, is it?

Colonel POTTER. It is being closed, as I understand it. I do not know in what stage it is. Mr. Shoenberger can tell you better than I.

Mr. SHOENBERGER. It is closed.

The CHAIRMAN. Winter Quarters?

Colonel POTTER. That is closed entirely at Government expense.

The CHAIRMAN. Glasscock?

Colonel POTTER. Entirely at Government expense.

The CHAIRMAN. Brabston?

Colonel POTTER. That is closed at Government expense.

The CHAIRMAN. Bougere No. 1?

Colonel POTTER. Government expense.

The CHAIRMAN. Bougere No. 2?

Colonel POTTER. Government expense.

The CHAIRMAN. Cabin Teal?

Colonel POTTER. On the one-third-two-thirds basis.

The CHAIRMAN. Cottonport and Moreauville?

Colonel POTTER. All of them are done by the State of Louisiana, the Louisiana engineers. We did not go in there at all.

The CHAIRMAN. McCrea?

Colonel POTTER. McCrea is practically completed.

The CHAIRMAN. How paid?

Colonel POTTER. Entirely at Government expense.

The CHAIRMAN. Melville?

Colonel POTTER. The same.

The CHAIRMAN. The same what?

Colonel POTTER. Almost completed and will be completed in a few days, and entirely at Government expense.

Mr. COX. Colonel, you are not yet adhering to the law strictly, are you?

Colonel POTTER. We had violated the law; that is, we decided——

Mr. COX. You were just completing the job?

Colonel POTTER. What was due to this flood we must meet. We could not leave the crevasses open.

The CHAIRMAN. Why could you not leave them open?

Colonel POTTER. Of course, we physically could leave them open. It would be rather an uncharitable act. We could have left them open. We felt it was the duty of the Government just as much to close those crevasses as it was to make the high-water fight. It was a part of the flood.

Mr. COX. That is what you did it for?

Colonel POTTER. Yes, sir.

Mr. COX. So you did not have the option to leave them open or not, if you wanted flood control?

Colonel POTTER. No; we did not think we had any option. It had to be done.

Mr. SWING. In every one of those instances where the Government paid the full expense you first made an honest effort to try to comply with the law by compelling the local people to pay, did you not?

Colonel POTTER. We did everything that we could.

Mr. SWING. And they could not put up the money, and then you went ahead without it?

Colonel POTTER. Yes.

4. UNITED STATES SHOULD HAVE EXCLUSIVE CONTROL TO RENDER FLOOD-CONTROL SYSTEM EFFECTIVE

To adhere strictly to the local contribution requirement for financing the flood-control work would, according to Colonel Potter, make it impossible even to do the work necessary to bring the levees up to the 1914 grade, according to his testimony which follows:

(P. 3459)

Mr. WILSON. Colonel, I believe a majority of the districts you named are either insolvent or have passed their limit to secure any bonds. If you required this one-third contribution from them, could your plan be effective if they could not meet the allotment?

Colonel POTTER. It could not.

Mr. WILSON. Even for the 1914 grade?

Colonel POTTER. Even for the 1914 grade. If you find that these people can not put up that amount of money, our recommendation should not be followed.

Mr. WILSON. Take the Atchafalaya, for instance. The report to us shows it is absolutely hopeless, and a number of others are insolvent, and probably the majority of them could not meet the allotment.

Colonel POTTER. That is what I feared. I fear if this appropriation comes this year that we can not spend it for levees under the present conditions.

Mr. WILSON. And that is just to bring it up to the 1914 grade?

Colonel POTTER. That is just to bring it up to the 1914, yes; and, as I said to-day, it is only a deterrent against these little districts that will be importuning for levees that are free. It is a small matter financially for us.

Mr. WILSON. Then to make the plan effective, even if you are going to bring the levees up to the 1914 grade and section, it will be necessary for the Federal Government to do the work; furnish the money?

Colonel POTTER. If you are convinced of the financial inability of those districts to put up the money, that would be undoubtedly true. We do not know or we have no way of knowing—I really believe, and I believe it more than I did when I wrote that paragraph of the report; that is, I believe it more now, that they are unable to put it up, than I did believe it when I wrote the paragraph in the report.

NATIONAL DEFENSE AND NATIONAL WELFARE SUFFICIENT JUSTIFICATION FOR FULL GOVERNMENT PAYMENT FOR LEVEE SYSTEM

FLOOD CONTROL ESSENTIAL TO THE NATIONAL DEFENSE AND NATIONAL WELFARE

Colonel Potter

(P. 2463)

The CHAIRMAN. Do you think that the control of destructive floods on the Mississippi River is essential to the national defense of the country?

Colonel POTTER. Well, I would not say it is essential, but I think it would have considerable bearing on it. I can not imagine what situation we would have been in during the late war if this flood had occurred, with transportation torn up.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you think the control of these destructive floods of the Mississippi River is essential to the national welfare?

Colonel POTTER. I do.

Colonel Kutz

(P. 2842)

The CHAIRMAN. Do you think the control of destructive floods in the Mississippi River is essential to national defense?

Colonel KUTZ. Yes, sir; I do.

The CHAIRMAN. You think the control of destructive floods of the Mississippi River is essential to national welfare?

Colonel KUTZ. I do.

(P. 2847)

Mr. COX. Colonel, if there was not a living soul in the valley would you not still favor the controlling of these waters in the same manner as recommended by the commission?

Colonel KUTZ. Our plan might be different.

Mr. COX. But still you would favor the harnessing of the water or controlling the water and not permitting them to split the country in two?

Colonel KUTZ. I think the Mississippi is a valuable part of the transportation system of the country and that even if there was no one living in the valley the river ought to be controlled for that reason.

Mr. COX. As a matter of national defense, if for nothing else?

Colonel KUTZ. Yes, sir.

LEVEE DISTRICTS ARE INTERDEPENDENT

THE INTERDEPENDENCE OF LEVEE DISTRICTS AND THE NECESSITY OF PLANNING THE WORKS WITHOUT REGARD TO DISTRICT LINES OR STATE LINES

Heretofore as long as the flood-control policy was one of "levees only," it was the general rule that expenditures for levee work were confined to the payment of work within the levee district itself. There was, it is true, a recognition of the fact that different levee districts within the same natural basin were interdependent as regards protection from overflow, and particularly was this fact realized by the district farther downstream, that freedom from overflow depended upon the integrity of the levee line in the sister district, as well as on that of its own levee district. But this recognition did not go to the extent of the lower district coming to the financial assistance of the upper district in promoting their common safety. Probably this was for the reason that there was always work to be done in every district bringing the levees up to the continually increasing grades and the local work was given priority in consideration and execution. It should be stated in this connection that there was one exception to this general statement, which was the Tensas Basin levee district in Louisiana that did spend money in Arkansas for its own protection.

In the present plans submitted by the Chief of Engineers and by the Mississippi River Commission there is a broader conception of the flood-control problem than was shown in the "levees only" policy, and there is brought forcibly to mind the fact that a comprehensive flood-control plan must obliterate levee district lines and even State lines in the working out of a solution for the whole valley.

Taking, for example, the Birds Point to New Madrid riverbank flood way, and assuming that it is the correct solution to apply in the situation, the Chief of Engineers disregards district lines and even State lines and plans a work in Missouri to protect a city in Illinois.

In the instance of the Boeuf diversion, the resultant reduction of the flood height on the main river by abstracting enormous quantities of water from the main river will ameliorate the situation confronting the levee districts in the State of Mississippi and in Arkansas above the mouth of the Arkansas.

Similarly the Atchafalaya spillway will reduce the high-water burden of those levee districts on the main river below Red River Landing, including the Pontchartrain district on the opposite side of the river below Baton Rouge.

The city of New Orleans, in common with the Pontchartrain district, the Lafourche district, and the Lake Borgne district, will be the beneficiaries of the flood way in the Atchafalaya district, just as that portion of the Atchafalaya district fronting on the Mississippi River to a lesser degree and the other mentioned levee districts to a greater degree will be the beneficiaries of the spillway at Bonnet Carre, in the Pontchartrain district.

It may help to enlighten this question and show the absolute necessity of coordination of effort through the adoption of a general and comprehensive plan to bring about a successful solution of flood control to introduce here an excerpt from the testimony of Mr. Charles H. West, for 18 years a member of the Mississippi River Commission:

(P. 3054)

The CHAIRMAN. Well, now, every basin is related to every other basin along the Mississippi River, is it not?

Mr. WEST. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And while it might be sufficient unto itself to protect the inside of its own levees, the breaking of its levees might affect another district?

Mr. WEST. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is that true?

Mr. WEST. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. And consequently every natural basin and every levee district along the Mississippi River must be considered in a comprehensive plan of flood control, must it not?

Mr. WEST. If you want to make a success of it—if you want to carry out a successful plan.

(P. 3061)

The CHAIRMAN. Now, in your opinion, is not the Federal Government the only agency that could possibly cope adequately with the destructive floods of the Mississippi River?

Mr. WEST. I am quite sure of it.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you think that the Federal Government should have the exclusive direction of the location, size, or other arrangement of all levees, spillways, by-passes, or other flood-control devices?

Mr. WEST. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. Should the State or any local interests be permitted to decide the location, size, or arrangement of any levees, spillways, by-passes, or other flood-control devices?

Mr. WEST. No. The entire plan and the entire carrying out of the plan should be under one direction, whether it be one person, the commission in its present form, or in any other form; but it should be one agency.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, can the decision as to whether flood-control works should be constructed, and where, and the size be safely left to the communities along the Mississippi River?

Mr. WEST. There would be as many variations in the character of structure and plan and strength as there were districts.

The dreadful consequences which might result from the refusal, failure, or stark financial inability of one or more districts to contribute to the expense of controlling works may be gleaned from the testimony of General Jadwin, Chief of Engineers of the United States Army, as follows:

(P. 4125)

The CHAIRMAN. Suppose Arkansas and Louisiana do not go in on your plan and contribute, then no work will be done?

General JADWIN. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Is it your idea that Mississippi is going to be good and come in?

General JADWIN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Would you build this fuse-plug levee in order to relieve Mississippi in spite of the fact that Arkansas and Louisiana did not go in?

General JADWIN. If Mississippi contributed, then we could build levees on the Mississippi side. That would protect them. This water would come down the main river, and if no contribution was made by Arkansas it would cause a break in the levee wherever it happens to come.

The CHAIRMAN. So Mississippi would have to defend on the higher levee?

General JADWIN. If they just raise the amount they contemplate raising, that 3 feet would take care of her absolutely.

The CHAIRMAN. The diversion, then, is not necessary, and a fuse-plug levee is not a necessity to protect Mississippi, according to your plan.

General JADWIN. Wait a minute. Raising it 3 feet would cause the water to go over the levee on the west side.

The CHAIRMAN. And Louisiana would likely be flooded?

General JADWIN. Yes, sir; under those conditions.

In this testimony, it may be noted, General Jadwin naïvely suggests that any district which may fail for any reason to contribute to the cost of flood control might have turned onto that unfortunate district the fury of the flood. In this connection attention is invited to the fact that the districts which have borne the brunt of previous flood disasters are the districts which are now unable to raise any money to contribute further, and, to the people of those districts, the plan of General Jadwin constitutes a pronouncement of doom.

Col. Charles L. Potter, president of the Mississippi River Commission, admits that under the system of insisting upon local contributions to the cost of flood control there have not been sufficient funds collected in the past to do the work as it should be done:

A COMPLETE SYSTEM

(P. 2250)

The CHAIRMAN. In other words, every levee district that I have mentioned that borders on the Mississippi River is essential to be considered in any comprehensive flood-control plan of the Misssisippi River; is that it?

Colonel POTTER. Or on the tributaries as far back as the back waters go.

The CHAIRMAN. Anyhow, on the Mississippi River; is that correct?

Colonel POTTER. It will be.

The CHAIRMAN. And again I will ask the question: You have not had sufficient money to do the entire job as it should be done under the system that there had to be local contributions in order to use the money for flood protection?

Colonel POTTER. We have not.

And Mr. West, of the Mississippi River Commission, testifies positively that the Federal Government could and would have put in efficient controlling works if it had not been obligatory to consider the local interests.

(P. 3053)

The CHAIRMAN. If the Government did not have to consider the local interests, it could have put in proper flood-control works there, could it not?

Mr. WEST. And would have done so.

At another point in his testimony, Colonel Potter admits that no flood-control plan can be successful if the integrity of every portion of the levee system be not strictly maintained:

(P. 2464)

The CHAIRMAN. Can the decision as to whether flood-control works should be constructed and where and the size be safely left to the communities along the river?

Colonel POTTER. I think not.

The CHAIRMAN. Would a flood-control plan be successful if it permitted of the omission of any part of a necessary levee construction that breaks the integrity of the levee line?

Colonel POTTER. No.

6. LEVEE TAX SYSTEMS IN STATES IN LOWER MISSISSIPPI VALLEY

TAXES FOR LEVEE PURPOSES

The evidence before the committee disclosed the following facts in regard to the levee taxes levied in the seven States in the lower Mississippi Valley:

Illinois, Kentucky, Tennessee: Based on an ad valorem tax on real estate. Benefit tax. Bonds limited to 90 per cent of benefits as determined by commissioners and constitute direct tax lien on lands in district. No vote of landowners required, but schedule of benefits reviewed by court.

Missouri: Based on an ad valorem tax on real estate. Benefit tax. Bonds limited to 90 per cent of benefits as returned by commissioners and confirmed by court. Vote of landowners required before bonds can be issued.

Arkansas: Based on real-estate betterments.

Mississippi: Based on ad valorem tax on lands and personal property; $1 to $1.50 per bale tax on cotton; 2 cents to 5 cents acreage tax and privilege taxes on businesses and occupations.

Louisiana: Ad valorem tax 0.32 mills on the dollar, based on 100 per cent cash valuation on all property of State, constituting what is known as general engineer fund.

The levee-district taxes and forced contributions permitted by law to be annually levied and collected in the district are as follows:

Tax: An ad valorem tax limited under the constitution, as a general proposition, to 5 mills on the dollar, based on a 100 per cent cash valuation. However, by a vote of the people of the district, an additional ad valorem tax of 5 mills on the dollar may be levied. The fifth Louisiana levee district is the only one that has voted for the 5 mills additional tax.

Forced contributions: Different in each levee district. The following is a typical case: 5 cents per acre on all lands within the district; $100 per mile on railroads of standard gauge; $20 per mile on railroads of less than standard gauge, and $1 per bale on all cotton grown within the district.

An additional special ad valorem contribution of one-fourth mill on the dollar was also authorized by section 6, article 16, of the State constitution of 1921, to be levied and applied solely toward compensation for injury and destruction of property appropriated by the district for levee and for levee drainage purposes.

LEVEE DISTRICTS ON THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER FLOODED IN 1927

The following are a list of the levee districts, on the Mississippi River, showing those flooded in 1927, and a few statements from the levee districts and individuals taken from the record of the hearings, in regard to the inability of the levee districts to pay the cost of any additional flood-control works:

Scott County levee district, Missouri: Was not overflowed by flood of 1927.

Levee district No. 3 of Mississippi County, Mo.: Was not overflowed by flood of 1927.

St. John levee and drainage district, Missouri: Overflowed by Mississippi River crevasse at Dorena, Mo.

St. Francis levee district, Missouri: Overflowed by flood of 1927 through Dorena, Mo., crevasse and St. Francis River.

St. Francis levee district, Arkansas: Lower end of district overflowed by crevasses in Mississippi River levee at Whitehall, Ark., and Dorena, Mo. Back side of district flooded by water from tributary streams, St. Francis and Black Rivers.

Helena improvement district, Arkansas: Was not overflowed by flood of 1927.

Cotton Belt levee district, Arkansas: Overflowed by back water from the Mississippi River and the White River, Ark.

Laconia levee district No. 1, Arkansas: Overflowed by back water from the Mississippi River and the White River, Ark.

Laconia drainage and levee district, Arkansas: Overflowed completely by crevasses in Mississippi River levees at Knowlton and Laconia, Ark.; as well as by White River water.

Southeast Arkansas levee district, Arkansas: Flooded four distinct times in 1927 by crevasses in Arkansas River levees at South Bend, Medford, and Pendleton, Ark.

Fifth Louisiana levee district, Louisiana: Overflowed by five breaks in Mississippi River levees at Cabin Teele, Winter Quarters, Glasscock, Brabston and Bougere, La.

Atchafalaya Basin levee district, Louisiana: Overflowed by numerous breaks in Bayou des Glaises levees, and crevasses in the Atchafalaya River levees at McCrea and Melville, La.

Lafourche Basin levee district, Louisiana: Overflowed at the extreme lower end of the district by crevasse in Mississippi River levee at Junior, La.

Lake Borgne Basin levee district, Louisiana: Overflowed by artificial crevasse at Caenarvon, La.

Orleans levee district, Louisiana: Was not overflowed by flood of 1927.

Pontchartrain levee district, Louisiana: Was not overflowed by flood of 1927.

Board of Mississippi Levee Commissioners, Mississippi: District completely overflowed by break in Mississippi River levee at Mounds Landing, Miss.

Yazoo-Mississippi Delta levee district, Mississippi: Entire lower end of district overflowed by water from crevasse at Mounds Landing, Miss.

Reelfoot levee district, Tennessee: Not overflowed; but the entire territory in the basin beyond the jurisdiction of the district submerged by water from the Mississippi River.

Fulton County Levee Board, Kentucky: Was not overflowed by flood of 1927.

FACTS SHOWING LEVEE DISTRICTS ARE UNABLE TO CONTRIBUTE ANYTHING FURTHER TO FLOOD-CONTROL WORKS

A questionnaire was sent to each levee district on the Mississippi River by the chairman of the Flood Control Committee. Subsequently information as to the general conditions of the people in the levee districts was requested from officials and business men.

The following replies to the questionnaire and letter were received.

The losses set out below do not include any estimate of losses arising from suspensions of business activities, nor do they include sums spent by the various States and political subdivisions thereof on attempted protection work. Losses of railroad, telegraph, and telephone companies are not included.

STATEMENT BY SCOTT COUNTY LEVEE DISTRICT, MISSOURI

District has 14 miles of levee on west bank of Mississippi River; 40,000 acres of cleared land in district; assessed valuation, $1,805,125; outstanding tax bonds, $605,500; real-estate mortgages, $800,000; 1927 flood losses, $18,000, caused by expense of high-water fight.

District flooded five times since 1897; levee grades changed three times; district is strictly agricultural, producing wheat, corn, cotton, alfalfa, cowpeas, and watermelons; farming has been unprofitable since 1919, and only 50 per cent of farmers have money or credit to plant 1928 crops; taxpayers have no other source of income; practically none able to borrow from intermediate credit banks.

Estimated cost of adequate flood control runs from $35,200 up, depending upon which plan adopted; maximum sum district can raise for new construction, about $8,000; would refuse to contribute anything to proposed Missouri flood way.

Witness: J. F. Misfeldt, president Scott County (Mo.) levee district (p. 1043):

"The people will not authorize further levee taxes, and even if they did they could find no sale for levee bonds. While the levees did not break this year, they are badly in need of raising and strengthening. The local people can not do this. There is only about $8,000 in the treasury, and no more can be raised. As a result of the fight with the Mississippi there is against the lands, in addition to the bonds, a mortgage indebtedness of over $800,000, or about $30 per acre, all of which aggregates more than 75 per cent of the value of the land. The district will not be able to pay the interest on its bonded indebtedness this year, but feels that it can try to take care of its other indebtedness if the Federal Government will only take care of the flood-control burden from this point on."

STATEMENT BY LEVEE DISTRICT NO. 3 OF MISSISSIPPI COUNTY, MO.

District has 26 miles of levee on west bank of Mississippi River; 64,515 acres of cleared land in district. Assessed valuation, $5,327,991,63; outstanding tax bonds, $1,574,600; real-estate mortgages, $2,500,000; 1927 flood losses, $45,000, caused by expense of high-water fight.

District flooded five times since 1897; levee grades changed three times. District's sinking fund wiped out by bank failures due to 1927 flood. Construction fund sufficient to bring levee line up to 1914 grade; thereafter can issue no more bonds or increase taxes. District strictly agricultural, producing wheat, corn, cotton, cowpeas, alfalfa, and watermelons. Farmers generally have no other source of income. Returns from agriculture since 1919 have not exceeded cost of production. Many farmers are unable to finance 1928 crops as only a few were able to arrange for a land-bank loan after the 1927 flood.

Estimated cost of adequate flood control runs from $150,000 up, according to which plan is adopted. District can contribute toward construction only from funds now pledged, but would contribute nothing to proposed Missouri flood way.

Witness: R. A. Barry, president levee district No. 3, Mississippi County, Mo. (p. 1046):

"It is impossible for the district to finance or aid to finance the Nation's job of controlling the river.

"The Jadwin plan would wreck our district both physically and financially."

STATEMENT BY ST. JOHN LEVEE AND DRAINAGE DISTRICT, MO.

District has 51 miles of levee on west bank of Mississippi River; 100,000 acres of cleared land in district; assessed valuation, $8,647,674; outstanding tax bonds, $7,662,904; real-estate mortgages, $5,819,134; 1927 flood losses, $2,115,180.20.

District overflowed five times since 1897; levee grades changed three times. Dorena crevasse in 1927 occurred in a nonstandard levee within this district, flooding 400,000 acres. As a result of overflow and crop losses, tax delinquencies are greatest in history, 614 tax suits having been filed; loan companies have foreclosed scores of mortgages; 38 schools have been forced to curtail terms; 3 banks have failed; and levee district defaulted in payment of bonds and interest in 1927.

District exclusively agricultural, producing cotton, corn, and hay. Taxpayers have no material income from other sources. They have been unable to borrow from intermediate credit banks. Returns from agriculture since 1919 have not exceeded cost of production.

Estimated cost of future flood control not given, but district can contribute no part of cost.

Statement by W. S. Edwards, secretary of St. John levee and drainage district of Missouri:

"Then have this mighty Government say to this people: 'You can secure protection against future floods if you help pay for it. Such a policy is not in keeping with sound fundamental procedure. How can a people make and pay a new obligation running into the millions when they can not pay the old obligation?'

"When legislation is enacted which imposes on the territory a further burden in payment for flood control, in so doing the death sentence to the plan has been passed, for I knowingly state that much if not all the territory could not meet the requirement. Then, if flood control is made contingent upon a participation by local districts and if, as is true, the districts could not meet the requirements, then what is the alternative? This might be suggested, that the districts cover their contribution by passing to the Government each its pro rata of the whole of the district bonds; but this is not workable.

"Economy in time is the true substance in this matter. The enemy may appear any day. Prepare now. Delay not.

"Bonds must be secured under the law and can only be issued where there has been decreed by the court a benefit in excess of the cost. In such a procedure every person to be taxed must be brought into court where he may defend his rights or wrongs, as he chooses to call them. Then in so doing, if the Government set in motion a policy to make the landowners pay a part of the cost of flood control, the courts must adjust the thousands upon thousands of tax assessments made necessary by such a plan. Nothing but time can answer the delay occasioned. Such a policy is unthinkable.

"In New Madrid County, Mo., the average mortgage and bonded indebtedness is more than $78 per acre. Nine months after the time for payment of 1926 taxes had passed, 40 per cent of the taxes for that year remained unpaid. Three banks in that county have failed during the last year. This district has defaulted on its bonds."

Statement by New Madrid County Bankers' Association and St. Johns levee and drainage district, New Madrid, Mo. (p. 4647):

"The landowners and taxpayers in southeast Missouri face a serious financial condition due to a series of recurrent disasters climaxed by the 1927 flood.

"It has become necessary for mortgage holders, bankers, and landowners interested in this territory to meet together and to cooperate to the end that sufficient financial assistance may be provided to enable farm lands to be cultivated in the 1928 season.

"It has come to the attention of the meeting that a Mississippi River flood-control plan has been submitted to the Congress by Gen. Edgar Jadwin, which plan provides that territory already overburdened with reclamation taxes and mortgage debts incurred in the development of such and shall further be burdened with the entire costs of all rights of ways, land damages, and drainage diversions incidental to such works, together with 20 per cent of levee construction costs, and urge Representatives in Congress to defeat plan."

STATEMENT BY ST. FRANCIS LEVEE DISTRICT, MISSOURI

District has 58 miles of levee on west bank of Mississippi River; 230,000 acres of cleared land in district; assessed valuation, $18,000,000; outstanding tax bonds, $8,429,700; real-estate mortgages, $13,900,000; 1927 flood losses, $3,414,775.

District has been overflowed four times since 1897; levee grades have been changed twice. District almost exclusively agricultural, producing cotton, corn, and alfalfa. Taxpayers have no material income other than from agriculture with which to pay taxes. Returns from agriculture since 1919 have not exceeded cost of production. On account of heavy bonded indebtedness, no more bonds can be sold. Farmers not able to borrow money through intermediate credit corporation.

Estimated additional cost of adequate flood control, $3,500,000.

Statement by Alphonse De Lisle, president St. Francis Levee district of Missouri, Caruthersville, Mo.:

We have the legal right to issue additional bonds to the amount of $700,000 to finance further construction. While that is true, it would be simply childish to attempt to sell any further issues to build levees or participate in levee construction.

Witness: James A. Finch, attorney, St. Francis levee district (p. 996):

"Levee and drainage taxes have been so burdensome that in seven years in eight counties of southeast Missouri over 400,000 acres of land (one-sixth of all the land) have been sold for taxes or for failure to pay farm mortgages. In 1893, before improvements were started, this land sold at $2, $3, up to $10 per acre. The taxes at present average $2.50 to $3 per acre. Up to July 1, 1926, there were $53,000,000 of bonds against these lands.

"On account of the tremendous burden of taxes assessed to keep water off the land, even prior to the flood of 1927, the land had greatly decreased in value, and there is no sale for it whatever now."

STATEMENT BY ST. FRANCIS LEVEE DISTRICT, ARKANSAS

District has 165 miles of levee on west bank of Mississippi River; 1,100,000 acres of cleared land in district. Assessed valuation, $40,000,000; outstanding tax bonds, $35,686,000; real-estate mortgages, $18,000,000; 1927 flood losses, $8,349,684.

District has been overflowed five times since 1897; levee grades changed three times. Crevasse in 1927 occurred at Whitehall, at extreme lower end of district, where substandard levee went out. District suffered heavily from floods on numerous tributary streams.

District exclusively agricultural, producing cotton, corn, wheat, hay, fruits, and vegetables. Returns from agriculture since 1919 have not exceeded cost of production. Farmers have been unable to borrow money through intermediate credit corporation. Many have been helped by the Red Cross. While this district is one of the largest on the river and is solvent, its revenues are insufficient to pay interest on and retire additional bonds.

Estimated cost of future flood-control works, $4,076,431.

STATEMENT BY HELENA IMPROVEMENT DISTRICT, ARKANSAS

District has 5.5 miles of levee on west bank of Mississippi River protecting the city of Helena. Assessed valuation of district, $6,225,514; outstanding tax bonds, $820,000; real-estate mortgages, $2,740,000; 1927 flood losses, $4,489.20, caused by expense of high-water fight.

This metropolitan district has never been flooded, but levee grades have been changed three times. District is solvent.

STATEMENT BY COTTON BELT LEVEE DISTRICT, ARKANSAS

District has 25.25 miles of levee on west bank of Mississippi River; 52,558 acres of cleared land in district. Assessed valuation, $2,436,862; outstanding tax bonds, $1,786,400; real-estate mortgages, $3,579,513; 1927 flood losses, $25,000.

District has been overflowed on average of once in four years; levee grades changed three times. District is exclusively agricultural, producing cotton and corn. Farmers have not made money since 1919, and their money and credit is exhausted. They are unable to borrow money from intermediate credit corporation.

Estimated cost of adequate flood control not known, but district can not raise additional funds as legal limit of bonds has been reached.

Statement by W. F. Craggs, president Cotton Belt levee district No. 1, Elaine, Ark.:

"The floods are getting larger each year, and the burden on people living behind them has increased until this country is bankrupt. Our levee board, of which I have been a member for 15 years, has issued all of the bonds we could, trying to keep our levee above the increasing floods, and this increased taxes until the burden is more than property owners can stand. Majority of property owners have been forced to let them go delinquent, and will have to be sold for taxes, and the worst thing we have confronting us who want to put any money in our lands, with so great a burden of taxes, is how we will pay interest on our bonds. The loan companies have been carrying the interest over from year to year hoping the farmers would get in shape some day. But I can see no future under the existing conditions.

"The State taxes have been extended trying to help conditions, but the recent flood has put the people in such shape they are barely existing, living from hand to mouth, and the Red Cross is still feeding hundreds of thousands of families, because the landlord is not able to do so and can not get advances from the banks.

"For these reasons the people are wholly unable to contribute any portion whatever of the cost of flood-control works or rights of way for levees, spillways, and flood ways, and any plan which depends on contributions of any amount whatever by them will fail utterly.

"It is imperatively necessary to lay before the Congress a true statement of the destitute conditions of the people who are being called on to put up money to finance flood-control work."

Witness: J. G. Burke, representing the Helena improvement district and the Cotton Belt levee district (p. 1149):

"There was no crop whatever on a large portion of the land in the district. The tenants who inhabit this agricultural district are not going to return to it unless they are told they will be given adequate flood protection by the Federal Government.

"The landowners will be absolutely unable to replace the improvements on their lands, on account of the mortgages already existing and the great burden of taxes, in the face of no flood control. Neither the Federal land bank nor the other banks will lend the farmers any more money, because they can not see how the farmers will get the money to repay them. They have reached their limit. Unless immediate action is taken to protect the property owner and the tenant these lands in the flood-stricken area will be abandoned."

STATEMENT BY LACONIA LEVEE DISTRICT NO. 1, ARKANSAS

District has 20 miles of levee on west bank of Mississippi River just north of junction with White River; 16,000 acres of cleared land in district. Assessed valuation, $320,000; outstanding tax bonds, $365,000; real-estate mortgages, $200,000; 1927 flood losses, $200,000.

"District has been overflowed on average of once every three years since 1893; levee grades have been changed three times. As a result of numerous overflows district has been unable to meet Government allotment for new construction in recent years. Crevasses at Knowlton and Laconia in 1927 occurred in early stages of flood, due directly to district's inability to pay for flood-control works. No crops were produced in this district in 1927. Practically all of the people in the district were supported by the Red Cross.

"District is strictly agricultural, producing cotton and corn. Farmers have not made any money since 1919 and have no other material sources of income. They are thoroughly discouraged and will abandon their properties unless the Government takes over the expense of flood control."

Statement by M. A. Partin, president Laconia levee district No. 1:

"In 53 years I have seen the waters of the Mississippi at flood tide increase from mere overflows to terrific floods, the 1927 flood striking a new level, 4½ feet above any previous water, and it seems there is no limit to the future height which might be attained. In more than half a century spent in the Delta I have never seen such distressing conditions.

"We have watched our plantations devastated by the flood, tenant houses swept away, corn, hay, and planting seed destroyed, and the prospect so discouraging that some of our citizens have given up their land to seek homes elsewhere.

"Others seem dazed and bewildered, unable to decide what is best to be done under existing circumstances, with their lands taxed to the limit to assist the Government in holding the flood waters, yet having no protection, and finding themselves in a deplorable, helpless condition, without adequate levee protection, without money, and without means of raising any more.

"Banks are hesitating in regard to making loans on Delta lands, landowners not able to finance themselves, labor moving away, in consequence of which a large portion will necessarily lie idle, while our levee, State, and county tax must be met or go delinquent. Interest on our outstanding bonds must be paid and no revenue, no source of income to meet the indebtedness.

"The entire loss of the 1927 crop and the destitute conditions prevailing at the commencement of this year's crop are disheartening beyond description.

"Further taxation in my district means confiscation of property. We have gone the limit of taxation, and we are lost beyond redemption unless the Government takes absolute control of the flood situation."

Witness: Dewitt Poe, representing Laconia levee district No. 1, Desha County, Ark. (p. 1163):

"All of the banks in this county failed following the 1927 flood."

STATEMENT BY LACONIA DRAINAGE AND LEVEE DISTRICT, ARKANSAS

District has 20.5 miles of levee on west bank of Mississippi River; 25,640 acres of cleared land in district. Assessed valuation, $942,459; outstanding tax bonds, $1,074,075; real-estate mortgages, $1,363,000; 1927 flood losses, $17,000.

District has been flooded on average of once in three years by backwater from below; levee grades have been changed three times. District is exclusively agricultural, producing cotton and corn. Returns from farming since 1919 have not exceeded cost of production. Farmers have no money or credit, and no other sources of income.

Estimated cost of adequate flood protection not given, but district has reached limit of its resources.

STATEMENT BY SOUTHEAST ARKANSAS LEVEE DISTRICT, ARKANSAS

District has 147 miles of levee, 62 miles on the south bank of of the Arkansas River and 85 miles on the west bank of the Mississippi River; 290,500 acres of cleared land in district. Assessed valuation, $12,500,000; outstanding tax bonds, $8,571,657; real-estate mortgages, $5,000,000; 1927 flood losses, $7,211,905.

District has been overflowed by every major flood from 1882 to 1927, except 1922. Its Mississippi levees held in the 1927 flood, but breaks in the Arkansas River levees at South Bend, Pendleton, and Medford overflowed the district four distinct times, drowning out agriculture all year. Farmers in this district are in desperate financial condition. They are overmortgaged; their money and credit have been exhausted; most of them are dependent upon the Red Cross for support.

After having lost $136,000 through the failure of a bank after the 1927 flood, the district raised $76,000 to meet an allotment called by the Mississippi River Commission. It would have defaulted in the payment of bonds and interest in 1927, but for fact that Louisiana interests dependent upon this district's levees for protection came to the stricken district's assistance.

Estimated cost of adequate flood protection varies in plans suggested, but district is utterly unable to pay any part of the cost.

From Judge Street's testimony, p. 1456:

"With such a showing our credit is gone. No more bonds can be sold and our income is insufficient to take care of present indebtedness."

Statement by W. D. Trotter, president southeast Arkansas levee district, Dermott, Ark.:

"We have been borrowing money from our local banks for the past several months with which to meet our bond and interest payments, due to the depleted condition of our treasury. We owe on March 1 for interest, $50,475; and have in our treasury less than $10,000. We can issue no more bonds under our act. Seriously speaking, without going into details as to figures, which have already been furnished you, I can see but little chance of paying our indebtedness, much less any further contributions. However, if the Government should take over the flood-control problem to the end that it would complete same at the cost of the Government, I honestly believe we could by doing some refinancing manage to pay our bonded indebtedness; but unless the credit of this country is restored, which can only be done by the Government taking over at its expense this problem, we will never be able to pay what we already owe, which money has been used for the construction of flood protection.

STATEMENT BY FIFTH LOUISIANA DISTRICT, LOUISIANA

District has 246 miles of levee on west bank of Mississippi River; 594,432 acres of cleared land in district. Assessed valuation, $37,141,433; outstanding tax bonds, $6,043,986; real-estate mortgages, $12,500,000; 1927 flood losses, $8,790,560.

District has been flooded on average of once every five years; levee grades changed three times since 1893. Five crevasses in this district's substandard levee line occurred during the 1927 flood, overflowing the entire district. The crevasses occurred at Cabin Teele, Winter Quarters, Glasscock, Brabston, and Bougere.

District is strictly agricultural, producing cotton, corn, and hay. As a result of the agricultural depression since 1919 and heavy flood losses, farmers are all in debt and their credit is about exhausted. They have been unable to borrow money through the intermediate credit corporation. Estimated cost of adequate flood control is $1 to $20 per acre, depending upon which engineering plan is adopted. The district probably has exceeded its legal tax limit and can issue no more bonds or certificates of indebtedness. It has no means whatever of raising additional money.

Statement by F. H. Schneider, president fifth Louisiana levee board:

"All of revenues of board pledged according to law to fiscal agent for next two years or until sufficient funds accumulate to take care of certificates. Our ability to borrow has been exceeded beyond its legal limits.

"We have reached the limit of tax burden our people can bear without confiscation of property. Illustrating more forcibly the financial straits of the district, during the month of December the Government allotted $100,000 to our district for necessary repair and maintenance of organization and equipment, with the proviso we should put up one-third, or $33,333. This we could not do, so repair work and maintenance was halted and necessary preparation for high-water fight was delayed. Just yesterday we were enabled, by special ruling of the Mississippi River Commission, to establish credit with the Government by turning over to them our equity in levee machines and equipment which had been bought with contributory funds; in this way frozen funds were released and preparation, so far as the limited amount thus released would go, is being made to combat probable spring floods.

"A flood-control bill requiring local contributions will be of no benefit to us, for the reason our resources are pledged, the limit of our bonded indebtedness has been reached, and our people are staggering with overdue taxes, flood losses, and mortgage indebtedness to such an extent no further increase in revenues from the taxpayers can be expected."

STATEMENT BY ATCHAFALAYA BASIN LEVEE DISTRICT, LOUISIANA

District has 270 miles of levees, 122 miles on west bank of the Mississippi River, 5 miles on south bank of Old River, 61 miles on east bank of the Atchafalaya River, and 82 miles of levees on interior streams; 1,000,000 acres of cleared land in district. Assessed valuation, $73,000,000; outstanding bonds, $17,058,350; real-estate mortgages, $20,250,000; 1927 flood losses, $15,559,274.

District has been flooded eight times since 1876; levee grades changed three times. During the 1927 flood the district was overflowed by breaks in the levees on the Red River and Bayou des Glaises levee districts, as well as by the Melville and McCrea crevasses in the Atchafalaya River levees.

District is primarily agricultural, producing sugar, rice, and cotton. It is known as the Sugar Bowl of Louisiana. It was the last district freed from flood water in 1927. Thousands of farmers could not return to their homes until August. It was then too late to produce any money crops. Farmers sought such employment as could be found and were assisted by the Red Cross. Their accumulations of a lifetime were swept away. Their credit is exhausted.

Estimated cost of adequate flood protection, using the Atchafalaya River as a spillway, is $52,500,000. District unable to pay any part of this cost, as it has anticipated its revenues through 1934.

Witness: Andrew Gay, president board of commissioners Atchafalaya Basin levee district (p. 1298):

"The flood of 1927 will materially reduce the revenue of the district, and the necessity of meeting interest on outstanding indebtedness and the redemption of bonds and certificates as they fall due preclude continuance of levee construction and maintenance by the district. A number of uncompleted levee contracts will have to be abandoned by arrangement with the contractors. The high-water fight in 1927 cost the district almost $250,000. The total spent on levee construction and maintenance since 1890, including contributions from the Mississippi River Commission and from the State of Louisiana itself, aggregates $23,000,000. The local district is actually unable to carry on further.

"The people of this district are a courageous people and will come back if they are given a fair measure of protection against floods. Over 60,000 people were driven from their homes. The levee taxes are so burdensome that it is impossible for the district to contribute any further to flood protection. The people of Louisiana have borne this burden for many years, and they are no longer financially able to continue it. It would be literally impossible either for the district or for the State to furnish rights of way for the flood ways needed in Louisiana."

STATEMENT BY LAFOURCHE BASIN LEVEE DISTRICT, LOUISIANA

District has 120 miles of levees on west bank of Mississippi River; 197,839 acres of cleared land in district. Assessed valuation, $42,445,124; outstanding tax bonds, $4,443,300; real-estate mortgages, $12,500,000; 1927 flood losses, $775,000.

Lower end of district was overflowed in 1927 by water through crevasse at Junior, La.

District is largely agricultural, and farmers have not made any money in nine years. District anticipated its 1928 revenues to make the high-water fight in 1927.

STATEMENT BY LAKE BORGNE BASIN LEVEE DISTRICT, LOUISIANA

District has 50 miles of levee on east bank of Mississippi River; 30,000 acres of cleared land in district. Assessed valuation, $18,524,132; outstanding tax bonds, $2,798,500; real-estate mortgages, $3,097,950; 1927 flood losses, $5,325,000.

District was flooded in 1922 and 1927. In the recent flood an artificial crevasse was made in the levee at Caernarvon to relieve the flood heights at New Orleans with the understanding that New Orleans would underwrite the resultant damages. Claims aggregating $5,000,000 were subsequently assumed by the city of New Orleans. Levee grades have been changed four times.

District is largely agricultural, but trapping is an important industry. Crops produced are garden truck and rice. Farming has not been profitable recently. Farmers generally have no money or credit, and could not take advantage of loans through intermediate credit corporation.

STATEMENT BY ORLEANS LEVEE DISTRICT, LOUISIANA

District has 25.9 miles of levee on Mississippi River, protecting the city of New Orleans and Orleans Parish. Assessed valuation, $585,987,165; outstanding tax bonds, $60,813,300; real-estate mortgages, $341,000,000; 1927 flood losses, $600,000, caused by expenses of high-water fight.

This district covers a large metropolitan area and is solvent. Its levee grades have been changed three times.

STATEMENT BY PONTCHARTRAIN LEVEE DISTRICT, LOUISIANA

District has 125.4 miles of levee on east bank of Mississippi River; 250,000 acres of cleared land in district. Assessed valuation, $43,243,177; outstanding bonds, $3,683,865; real estate mortgages, $8,110,000; 1927 flood losses, $310,833.66, caused by expense of high-water fight.

Levee grades changed three times. District is largely agricultural, with numerous sugar and lumber mills and oil refineries. The principal crops are rice, sugar, corn, tobacco, and vegetables. Farmers have not made any money since 1919 and much land is now idle. Few were able to borrow money through the intermediate credit bank. District has anticipated its revenue for four years.

Pontchartrain levee line is immediately above the city of New Orleans on the Mississippi River and integrity of this district's levee line absolutely essential for safety of that city, as a break in the levee line within 20 miles of the city would flood New Orleans 5 to 10 feet deep.

Business conditions are poor, and in spite of the optimistic statements published by a few of the business leaders around January 1 to encourage an impoverished people, no sign of improvement is seen.

Any plan which depends on contributions of any amount whatever may as well not be adopted, as any plan dependent upon local contributions will be doomed to failure before and after its adoption.

In the case of this levee district it will require from 36 to 40 years to pay off and liquidate the present indebtedness of the board; and this indebtedness represents a sacrifice upon the part of a people which have made such an heroic fight in the past as to deserve the unstinted consideration and sympathy of the Federal Government.

Trust that a large majority of the Members of the present Congress will give heed to the plea of an impoverished people and adopt a plan that will give unconditional relief.

STATEMENT BY BOARD OF MISSISSIPPI LEVEE COMMISSIONERS, MISSISSIPPI

District has 198 miles of levees on the east bank of the Mississippi River; 701,346 acres of cleared land in district; assessed valuation, $62,937,309; outstanding tax bonds, $19,280,000; real-estate mortgages, $36,011,142; 1927 flood losses, $34,109,663.

District has been flooded 10 times since 1887. The most disastrous overflow was in 1927 when a standard grade and section levee at Mound Landing gave way, completely flooding the district. The water remained until July and only a few farmers were fortunate enough to make even a small crop; thousands of farmers were ruined; their property was destroyed; their credit exhausted; practically none was able to borrow money through intermediate credit corporation.

Estimated cost of adequate flood protection over $3,000,000.

Statement by Ernest Kellner, secretary-treasurer, Board of Mississippi Levee Commissioners, Greenville, Miss.:

"Reasons why our levee district can make no further contribution to match Government allotments:

"Depleting the treasury of all funds and creating a deficit of $110,769.10.

"The taxpayers' inability to pay amount of taxes due 1927, thereby making the district's revenue only a very nominal one.

"In this connection the financial status of the individual taxpayer prior to the flood must be considered. The deflation in prices of our farm products, i. e., cotton, during the years of 1920 and 1921, coupled together with prevailing prices less than cost of production during the succeeding years, practically bankrupt the taxpayer and hence the large individual mortgage indebtedness, and upon this the flood in 1927, unable to raise any crops—cotton or foodstuffs—leaves the taxpayer in a bankrupt state, unable to meet his taxes or other obligations.

"The board with its reduced revenue is compelled to stop all levee work, and has no funds to make a high-water fight during this spring should it become necessary to do so.

"The cultivated lands, comprising some 701,000 acres of land, is at present burdened with a debt of $78 per acre, which will render the floating of any additional loans extremely doubtful if not impossible."

Witness: J. S. Allen, representing the Board of Mississippi Levee Commissioners (p. 1260):

"The levee boards can no longer continue to pay, and unless the Government will assume full responsibility for protecting its own interest and that of its people against the ravages of its own waters, then the valley will prove a canker upon the heart of the Nation."

Witness: Walter Sillers, sr., Board of Mississippi Levee Commissioners (p. 1288):

"The district is financially unable to strengthen its levees. The people are almost ruined by taxes and the necessity of paying interest on indebtedness, in the face of the fact that they are unable to derive any revenue from their lands."

STATEMENT BY YAZOO-MISSISSIPPI DELTA LEVEE DISTRICT, MISSISSIPPI

District has 107 miles of levee on the east bank of Mississippi River; 1,185,000 acres of cleared land in district. Assessed valuation, $115,000,000; outstanding tax bonds, $27,020,000; real estate mortgages, $60,000,000; 1927 flood losses, $10,172,440.

This district is one of the largest on the river. Its financial condition is good. Many years ago the district began to build its own levees at its own expense. It has not received a dollar from the Mississippi River Commission for levee construction in 22 years. Moreover, it has voluntarily contributed some $3,000,000 to the Mississippi River Commission for bank revetment. It has not had a break in its front line for 30 years, yet a break in a lower district levee in 1927 caused heavy damages in the upper district.

District is exclusively agricultural, producing cotton, corn, and hay. Since 1919, however, farmers have not made a profit from their operations. In the section of the district overflowed in 1927 the farmers have no money and little credit. They were unable to take advantage of intermediate credit corporation loans. They have no material income from other sources.

Estimated cost of adequate flood-control work $2,000,000.

Statement by J. W. Cutrer, president Yazoo-Missouri Levee Board:

"It is literally true that because of the terrific losses suffered by the people along the Mississippi River many are reduced to grave extremities and have lived with difficulty, being deprived of the opportunity to make any crops during the past year, and conditions are still most deplorable.

"Any provision which requires local contribution begs the entire question.

"The people of the Mississippi Valley are unable to contribute further to the prevention of destructive floods. The entire population is prostrated in practically every sense of the word. All of their land is pledged, mortgaged, and burdened with taxes, and defaults are almost as numerous as the encumbrances. The taxes which have been assessed for levee protection have been increased to the breaking point. Taxes have not only been levied on the river counties, but on the interior counties as well. In addition, there have been acre taxes, taxes on production, and even occupational and license taxes, and these for levee purposes only.

"The district has spent on levee construction over $23,000,000, without Government aid."

STATEMENT BY REELFOOT LEVEE DISTRICT, TENNESSEE

District has 4.6 miles of levee on east bank of Mississippi River; 41,559 acres of cleared land in district; assessed valuation, $2,753,406; outstanding tax bonds, $810,000; real-estate mortgages, $410,000.

District flooded on average of once every five years; levee grades changed once. District is exclusively agricultural, producing cotton, corn, alfalfa, and vegetables. Returns from agriculture since 1919 have not exceeded the cost of production. Taxpayers have no material income from other sources; their money and credit are about exhausted.

Estimated cost of adequate flood control about $2,000,000, which district if enlarged would be wholly unable to raise. Levee should be extended 55 miles to afford protection for west Tennessee delta. Unprotected section has suffered heavily from increased flood heights due to higher levees across river in Arkansas.

Statement of W. B. Amberg, attorney, Reelfoot levee district:

"The limit of indebtedness which can be incurred was fixed at the time of organization of the district and can not be revised upward without reorganization and probably not then. It is now practically impossible to sell the remaining $75,000 of bonds which have been authorized or any part of same.

"Annual requirement for amortization of bonds outstanding is $13-266.10. Amount necessary to cover other expenses of the district is $7,000 annually, making total annual requirements $20,266.10.

"This amount exceeds the income for the past year by reason of poor tax collections."

Statement by A. E. Markham, secretary-treasurer Reelfoot levee district, Tiptonville, Tenn.:

"The Reelfoot levee district has no funds available except the annual assessments collected from year to year and this money is all needed to pay bonds and interest coupons. Bonds were sold in an amount authorized by the decree organizing and establishing the district sufficient to construct the Reelfoot levee in Tennessee, and the proceeds of such bonds have been used in said construction, leaving no surplus.

"The Fulton County levee board, in Kentucky, which has jurisdiction over the Kentucky part of the Reelfoot Levee, say that they have no funds available for further work and have reached their legal limit on taxes. We believe this to be true. The result is that the protective works in Tennessee are worthless unless the works in Kentucky are maintained, the levee protecting the two areas being a joint one in fact though not in law.

"Levee and drainage bonds in Tennessee are now practically unmarketable. Most of the drainage districts have defaulted in payment of interest and principal. There is only one levee district organized under the 'drainage law' in Tennessee, and by reason of this fact and the depressed condition of the territory in question there is no prospect of being able to sell bonds in the near future, if at all.

"During the past three years the low price of cotton, which is the principal crop in west Tennessee, and the damage and losses occasioned in 1927 by the flood in the Mississippi River, have brought about a financial depression of great seriousness. Until another crop is made, at a profit, it will be out of the question to attempt to raise money for levee construction, especially new construction.

"The burden of the people in the Mississippi flood plane on the Tennessee side has been consistently made greater each year by the construction of and enlargement of levees on the west side of the river. This has progressively raised the high-water stage in Tennessee. The funds of the United States Government have contributed to this condition. The building of the levee in Missouri north of New Madrid, almost completed in 1927, increased the normal stage on the east side of the river about 2 feet, adding to the normal cost of the high-water expense at least $30,000. The expenditures for this purpose in Tennessee and Kentucky have used up all available funds."

STATEMENT OF FULTON COUNTY LEVEE BOARD, KENTUCKY

District has 18 miles of levee on east bank of Mississippi River; 20,000 acres of cleared land in district; assessed valuation, $1,000,000; outstanding bonds, $1,090,000; real estate mortgages, $750,000.

District flooded in 1912 and many times prior thereto; levee grades changed three times. District almost entirely agricultural, producing corn, cotton, wheat, and alfalfa. Farmers have not made any money since 1919, and few have money or credit. Can pay no increased taxes.

Estimated cost of adequate flood control $163,919, which district is wholly unable to raise.

More than one-third of the levee taxes of our own district for the year 1927 are now past due and delinquent, and with but very little prospect of them being paid without sale of property for taxes. Our levee is not up to standard. Our district is very deeply in debt, and without funds to do any improvement work on our levee.

Because of the enormous losses suffered by the people in the Mississippi Valley in the flood during the spring of 1927, many of them are bankrupt, and many unable to finance for the next crop. Many are even homeless and even destitute.

Witness: Roscoe Stone, representing the Fulton County levee district (p. 1075):

"The district grows some of the finest cotton in the world, for which there is always a market at high prices, but the moving of the farmers out and back and the loss of getting in a great deal of acreage has practically ruined the population financially."

THE JADWIN PLAN

1. Knowledge of Mississippi River necessary to devise comprehensive plan.
2. Scope of Jadwin plan.
3. Objections to engineering features of Jadwin plan.
4. General objection to the Jadwin plan.
5. Sufficient data not available to devise reliable and safe engineering plan.

USURPATION OF DUTIES OF MISSISSIPPI RIVER COMMISSION BY CHIEF OF ENGINEERS

The members of the committee were amazed to hear General Jadwin claim that he had exclusive authority to prepare plans for the flood control of the Mississippi River. He claimed this authority because of the rivers and harbors act of January 21, 1927, which authorized him to make a survey of the Mississippi River and certain of its tributaries, primarily to ascertain if the development of water power was feasible, and incidentally for flood-control purposes. However, no appropriation had been made by Congress for the survey, and the Chief of Engineers clearly violated the law in undertaking to make this survey before the appropriation therefor was made available by Congress.

The act of June 28, 1879, creating the Mississippi River Commission, contains the following provision:

It shall be the duty of said commission to take into consideration and mature such plan or plans and estimates as will * * * prevent desrtuctive floods * * *; and when so prepared and matured, to submit to the Secretary of War a full and detailed report of their proceedings and actions, and of such plans, with estimates of the cost thereof, for the purposes aforesaid, to be by him transmitted to Congress.

This provision of existing law was in no way repealed or superseded by the act of January 21, 1927, and is still in full force and effect. The Mississippi River Commission, therefore, is the only duly authorized agency empowered and directed by Congress to prepare flood-control plans on the Mississippi River. There is no law upon the statute books which authorizes the Chief of Engineers to call upon the Mississippi River Commission to submit to him its flood-control plans. On the other hand, the commission is specifically directed by law to submit its plans to the Secretary of War, who is directed to transmit the same to Congress, without giving him any discretion as to whether he approves of the commission's report or not.

Instead of the law as enacted by Congress being carried out, the Chief of Engineers took it upon himself to prepare a flood-control plan, expended a large sum of money never appropriated by Congress in doing so, called upon the Mississippi River Commission to submit its plan to him, and when received, suppressed it and transmitted his own plan to Congress through the Secretary of War and the President. In fact, it was not until General Jadwin was called upon by the Flood Control Committee of the House to transmit the Mississippi River Commission's report to it that the report saw the light of day, and when before the committee, the General charged that the committee had received the commission's plan "through the back door."

In order that the law might be complied with and that Congress have properly before it the report of its duly auhorized agency for flood control on the Mississippi River, the chairman of the Flood Control Committee requested Colonel Potter, president of the commission, to send a copy of the commission's report to the Secretary of War, to be by him transmitted to Congress. This was done by Colonel Potter on February 15, 1928, but, to date, the Secretary of War has not seen fit to comply with the law, and has not transmitted the report to Congress.

The fact that in the report of the Chief of Engineers the Mississippi River Commission was relegated to a mere advisory capacity on flood control and as this report was approved by the Secretary of War and transmitted to Congress by the President, the committee not knowing upon what this radical action was based, did not care to go into an investigation as to the reason for that action, as a new commission could be provided that would be broad enough to include such of the personnel and organization of the Mississippi River Commission as would be found beneficial, and as might be transferred to it.

WHY PANAMA CANAL ACT WAS FOLLOWED

The problem of controlling the destructive flood waters of the Mississippi River is probably one of the biggest engineering projects the world has ever known, greater than the Panama Canal, and certainly greater than any other engineering project of modern times. Its importance to the country is such that the handling of the problem should be by an agency of such recognized engineering ability, talent, and experience that the entire Nation would have confidence in their acts.

This project is not the ordinary river and harbor project and should be taken out of the category of one of the thousands of duties now devolving upon the Chief of Engineers of the Army. Whoever is going to solve it should give his entire time and attention to the work.

With this in mind a search was made for a proper precedent and no better one could be found than that supplied by the building of the Panama Canal. Therefore, the bill follows closely the act creating the Isthmian Canal Commission and the organization used in the planning of the construction of the Panama Canal.

The bill adopts no specific engineering plan, but contains merely a general direction of the powers to enable the commission to do the work. Congress should not pass an act containing hard and fast rules in engineering directions that might have to be changed when the engineers got on the ground to do the work.

Why the Jadwin plan could not be adopted is explained very fully hereinafter.

1. KNOWLEDGE OF MISSISSIPPI RIVER NECESSARY TO DEVISE COMPREHENSIVE PLAN

WHOSE ADVICE SHOULD BE FOLLOWED IN MISSISSIPPI RIVER FLOOD-CONTROL MATTERS?

The committee was impressed by the fact, through the testimony offered, that not only does flood control and river improvement on the Mississippi River call for technical qualifications of a high order, but there are a multitude of problems that come up that require intimate knowledge and special information of local conditions to assist in the proper solution of these problems. It should be plainly evident that this special experience and the fund of information as added to from year to year should constitute perhaps a greater asset than technical proficiency alone with those engineers who are charged with directing the work of flood control on this river.

EXPERIENCE ON MISSISSIPPI RIVER ESSENTIAL

Hon. Dwight F. Davis, Secretary of War

(P. 3813)

Secretary DAVIS. I think not; because experience on the Mississippi River is essential to any engineer, I think, who must study the problem. The Mississippi River is a very ornery beast and it is different from any other engineering problem, as far as I know of, in the hydraulics of the world, probably, and from what I know, talking with citizens and engineers and everybody, it requires a great deal of actual experience on the river to come to an intelligent conclusion as far as actual advice is concerned.

SPECIAL QUALIFICATIONS REQUIRED OF ENGINEERS TO ENABLE THEM TO DEVELOP A METHOD OF FLOOD CONTROL

(P. 2112)

The CHAIRMAN. * * * You do not mean that it is necessary absolutely, for an engineer to have an intimate knowledge of the river in order to arrive at a flood-control report? You do not mean that, do you?

Colonel POTTER. I do.

* * * * * * *

The CHAIRMAN. * * * Is the Mississippi different from any other river?

Colonel POTTER. It seems to be. Formulas that apply to other rivers do not seem to work worth a cent on the Mississippi.

The CHAIRMAN. So you have to have Mississippi River hydraulics as well as other hydraulics?

Colonel POTTER. That is my opinion.

* * * * * * *

The CHAIRMAN. But his—an hydraulic engineer's—judgment would not be worth much unless he had an intimate relation with it?

Colonel POTTER. I would not want to characterize it that way.

The CHAIRMAN. It would be worth a lot, then?

Colonel POTTER. I think it would be worth a lot; but there are certain things we have learned about the Mississippi River that might——

Mr. COX. That only experience with the Mississippi could supply?

Colonel POTTER. Yes. Take the case of bottle necks. They are all talking about taking out bottle necks. When I first came on the river we took out the greatest bottle necks ever known on the river.

The CHAIRMAN. Where was that?

Colonel POTTER. Arkansas City. The distance between the levees was 0.85 mile, whereas the average was 3 or 4 miles, and the next narrowest place is 1¼ miles.

The CHAIRMAN. You are talking about bottle necks with reference to levees?

Colonel POTTER. Yes; we took out that bottle neck, and we expected a big decrease in flood level above that point. We got 0.9 of a foot above it, but got 3½ feet below it, and we had the biggest fight of our lives to hold the levee above Greenville.

I do not think the hydraulic formula would show that, but I know we did it.

KNOWLEDGE OF RIVER NECESSARY TO PREPARE PLANS

Charles H. West

(P. 3053)

The CHAIRMAN. All right. Now, Colonel Potter testified to the effect that even expert engineers in civil life could not take flood-control data and reports and evidence, submit them to an examination and evolve or prepare a proper method of flood control for the Mississippi River without intimate connection with the river. Is that true in a general way, would you say?

Mr. WEST. I believe it is.

COLONEL POTTER'S QUALIFICATIONS AS AN ENGINEER ON MISSISSIPPI RIVER

SEVENTEEN YEARS ON MISSISSIPPI RIVER

(Pp. 2017, 2018)

Three years at Memphis as district engineer.
Secretary of Mississippi River Commission, 1010 to 1012.
District engineer, St. Paul, on Mississippi River, 1912 to 1915.
President Mississippi River Commission since March, 1920.
From 1911 to 1912 division engineer at St. Louis.

From the above it will be noted that Colonel Potter has had 17 years' experience on various kinds of works connected with the Mississippi River, and he is better qualified to prepare plans for the control of the flood waters than anyone connected with the Corps of Engineers.

QUALIFICATIONS OF CHARLES H. WEST AS AN ENGINEER AND EXPERT ON MISSISSIPPI RIVER

FORTY-EIGHT YEARS ON MISSISSIPPI RIVER

(P. 3041)

Graduate University of Illinois.
Member American Society Civil Engineers.
Member waterway division of American Society.
Member Mississippi River Commission, 1910 to 1928 (18 years).
Surveyor, inspector, and assistant under the Mississippi River Commission, engaged on works in Arkansas, northern Louisiana, and in Mississippi for a period of 18 years.
From 1898 to 1910 chief engineer Mississippi levee district.

From the above it is noted that Mr. West had 48 years' continual service as an engineer in connection with flood-control work on the Mississippi River.

GENERAL JADWIN'S EXPERIENCE ON MISSISSIPPI RIVER

MADE EIGHT VISITS TO MISSISSIPPI VALLEY

(Pp. 3561, 3564)

General JADWIN. * * * I * * * was assigned to duty at San Antonio as chief engineer of the Eighth Army Corps. While there, the big flood on the Mississippi occurred, and I went over to New Orleans——

The CHAIRMAN. What year was that, now?

General JADWIN. That was in 1922.

The CHAIRMAN. The flood of 1922?

General JADWIN. Yes, sir; the flood of 1922, and I went down to the break below New Orleans to see it.

The CHAIRMAN. That was known as Poydras at that time?

General JADWIN. Poydras break; yes, sir. * * *

* * * * * * *

The CHAIRMAN. Now, General, we will start with April, 1927. Tell the committee when your attention was first called to the need of activity in your department in regard to the Mississippi River and its flood. * * *

General JADWIN. I think probably, Mr. Reid, I became rather more than ordinarily interested at the time of the 1922 flood. It occurred to me that I should like very much to see that.

The CHAIRMAN. You are going to talk first about 1922?

General JADWIN. Yes, sir; it was a big flood, and that is the time I made the trip over to New Orleans to see the river in flood. That started me wondering as to whether the system under which the work was going was entirely proper. I had no official connection with it until I came into the office of the Chief of Engineers three and one-half years ago.

* * * * * * *

The CHAIRMAN. Just tell us in a general way from April, 1927, your connection with the Mississippi River flood, personally and officially.

General JADWIN. Yes, sir. * * * I made seven trips during that period, which were from April 24 to May 4; May 6 to May 12; June 1 to June 10; October 4 to October 14; October 27 to November 5; November 13 to November 25.

The CHAIRMAN. You made seven trips in all?

General JADWIN. Seven trips to the valley in connection at first with the relief work and starting concurrently the matter of studying on the plan for the amelioration of these floods.

2. SCOPE OF JADWIN PLAN

The report of the Chief of Engineers submitted to the committee for consideration a project providing for certain flood-control works between Commerce, Mo., and Head of the Passes, as sufficient to control a flood like that of 1927 or one 25 per cent greater as measured at Cairo, Ill., containing items covering the following:

First. Raising and strengthening the main levees on the Mississippi River.
Second. Bonnet Carre spillway.
Third. Atchafalaya flood way.
Fourth. Boeuf Basin flood way.
Fifth. Birds Point-New Madrid river-bank flood way.

6. Revetment for river improvement.

The report shows that the cost of these items will amount to $296,400,000, of which the local interests are expected to pay $37,440,000, which is 20 per cent of the cost of the items from 1 to 5, inclusive.

3. OBJECTIONS TO ENGINEERING FEATURES OF JADWIN PLAN

"SERIOUS REFLECTION ON GOVERNMENTAL AUTHORITIES RESPONSIBLE," SAYS LEADING ENGINEERING MAGAZINE

The following is an editorial appearing in the Engineering News-Record, March 8, 1928 (p. 386):

No progress

Moreover, with cost altogether disregarded, there remain fundamental doubts as to the technical soundness and efficacy of the plans—doubts clearly expressed by many engineers outside Government circles, and clearly enough realized by Members of Congress. The New Madrid flood way, shallow diversion channels a dozen miles wide the sufficiency of which was merely guessed at, reliance on haphazard crevasse formation to relieve an overburdened channel, levees flowing within a foot of the top in a great emergency, such elements of the plan utterly failed to engage that confidence vital to the undertaking of the great enterprise. That this should be the case is a serious reflection, indeed, on the governmental authorities responsible.

Confronted with these conditions, Congress must nevertheless act, if relief from the threat of disastrous floods is to be provided reasonably soon. If it can not act on the plan before it, then, obviously, it must create an organization competent to work out a dependable plan, with full and correct costs. Such information is indispensably necessary before the scope of the enterprise is capable of definition. At the same time actual work in the field will have to be started, even before the estimates are at hand.

A perusal of the objections made by distinguished engineers against the engineering features of the Jadwin plan and a reference to the proof in the record in support of their objections will convince any fair-minded person that the committee was entirely justified in refusing to adopt the Jadwin plan as a project or to include it as a part of legislation on flood control. The objections were made by engineers not only eminently qualified by education and training, but they were engineers of the highest standing in their profession. This, together with actual experience on the Mississippi River for many years, and the fact that their official positions impose upon them great responsibility for the safety of life and property in their districts, and since they were actually engaged in flood-control work year after year, there can be no doubt that their advice should be given great weight. Unless proper methods of flood control shall be adopted and executed, these engineers not only will suffer personal discomfort, but their districts will sustain great financial loss and their communities be exposed to ruin.

No better group of engineers, Army or civilian, on Mississippi River flood-control problems could be assembled, and no one can say truthfully that each did not know his subject.

Of all the engineers whose testimony is in the record, not one of them, aside from the Army engineers was willing to approve the Jadwin plan in its entirety, and many of them pointed out fatal defects, as may be seen in their testimony.

OBJECTIONS TO JADWIN PLAN OF EXPERIENCED RIVER ENGINEERS

Col. Charles L. Potter is president of the Mississippi River Commission with 17 years' experience on the Mississippi River and has been president of the commission for eight years. Capt. Charles H. West is the senior member of the Mississsippi River Commission with 48 years' experience on the river and has has been a member of the commission for 18 years. Both of these men are civil engineers of the highest reputation and this fact, coupled with their continuous service in fighting the destructive flood waters of the Mississippi River, makes their opinion on the engineering features carry great weight.

Both of these commissioners testified in regard to the engineering features of the Jadwin plan and characterized the fuse-plug device at the head of the flood ways, as proposed in his plan, as not dependable and likely to produce results not anticipated nor provided for. They suggested that more study should be given to the subject before any of the flood ways proposed by General Jadwin were constructed, as will be seen from the testimony hereinafter set forth (pp. 58–59, 61–63).

Speaking directly of the Birds Point-New Madrid River bank flood way proposed by General Jadwin, Colonel Potter was of the opinion that it was not feasible from an engineering standpoint, as will be seen from his testimony hereinafter set forth (p. 63).

Mr. John Klorer, of New Orleans, an engineer of high standing and commissioner of public property of the city of New Orleans, with 30 years' experience fighting the flood waters of the Mississippi River, and during the 1927 flood directly in charge of the protection of the city of New Orleans, characterized the Jadwin plan as being defective in the adoption of the fuse-plug levee, because it provided for no controlling works, because it failed to provide for disposing at Morgan City of the excess flood waters diverted from the Mississippi River, and on account of the insufficient factor of safety provided for the main river levees, as will be seen from his testimony hereinafter set forth (p. 65).

Walter Y. and James P. Kemper, engineers of high reputation with lifelong experience in fighting the lower Mississippi floods, objected to the Jadwin plan not only on account of the fuse-plug levees and uncontrolled spillways, but pointed out that so great an amount of water was to be thrown down the Atchafalaya Basin that it would be impossible for the basin to take care of it and would needlessly destroy thousands of productive acres, as will be seen from their testimony hereinafter set forth (pp. 61, 64–65).

L. T. Berthe, C. E., a consulting engineer of wide experience, in charge of flood-control protection for southeast Missouri, stated that the Jadwin plan was not only bad on account of the use of the fuse-plug levee device and the uncontrolled spillway, but that it would not do the things claimed and would leave the city of Cairo and southeast Missouri without adequate flood protection, as will be seen from his testimony hereinafter set forth (pp. 60, 64).

J. R. Adams, a member of the State Board of Engineers of Louisiana and for many years connected with the construction and maintenance of levees on the Mississippi River below the mouth of the Arkansas River, gave as his objection to the Jadwin plan the excessive amount of water diverted from the Mississippi River through the Boeuf flood way, which, in his opinion, exceeded the capacity of the flood ways to take care of, without causing damage almost the equivalent of a failure of the levee system, as will be seen from his testimony hereinafter set forth (p. 61).

J. S. Allen, chief engineer of the Board of Mississippi Levee Commissioners, with 38 years of experience in combating the floods of the Mississippi, 10 years of which was under the Mississippi River Commission and 28 years in association with the levee board, stated as his objection to the engineering features of Jadwin's plan that the fuse-plug levee will not function, questioning the probability of the fuse-plug crevasse opening the necessary width to permit the escape of a sufficient volume of the flood waters to relieve the main river, as will be seen from his testimony hereinafter set forth (p. 60).

Several chief engineers of transcontinental railroads traversing the Mississippi Valley, with many years' experience endeavoring to protect their lines from the ravages of the destructive floods, objected to the use of the fuse-plug levee as a new and untried device, the efficacy of which was doubted. Among these engineers, whose testimony is hereinafter set forth—pages 59, 60. 64, 66, 67—were the following: Hadley Baldwin, chief engineer of the Big Four system; E. F. Mitchell, chief engineer of the Texas & Pacific Railroad; E. A. Hadley, chief engineer of the Missouri Pacific Railroad; Harry Bortin, consulting engineer for the Louisiana Railway & Navigation Co.; Robert H. Ford, assistant chief engineer of the Rock Island lines; and a committee of the chief engineers of all the railroads operating in the Mississippi Valley, headed by A. F. Blaess, chief engineer of the Illinois Central Railroad.

The special flood-control committee of the American Engineering Council also raised the objection of the effects of the diversions proposed by General Jadwin and suggested further study, as will be seen from an extract from the committee's report hereinafter set forth—page 63.

EXPERIENCED RIVER ENGINEERS WHO SAY THAT MISSISSIPPI RIVER COMMISSION PLAN IS BETTER THAN JADWIN PLAN

As between the plan proposed by General Jadwin and that proposed by the Mississippi River Commission, there is a striking unanimity of opinion on the part of the civil engineers who are in close touch with flood problems in the Mississippi Valley that the plan proposed by the Mississippi River Commission is superior to the plan proposed by General Jadwin. That is the attitude of the following engineers:

W. L. Head: Chief engineer, Yazoo Mississippi Delta Levee Board, since 1918 (p. 4723).

George C. Schoenberger: Chief engineer of Louisiana; formerly with United States Government under the Mississippi River Commission in the fourth Mississippi River district, part of which time in local charge of levees, part of time on revetment work; 1917 to 1925, assistant State engineer of Louisiana, and member of board of State engineers in charge of levee work on the Mississippi River and Arkansas River from Pine Bluff to Red River; 1917 to present time, chief State engineer of Louisiana and member of board State engineers, executive head of board and general charge of flood-control work for Louisiana (p. 4723).

S. P. Reynolds: Chief engineer St. Francis levee district of Missouri since 1908 (p. 4723).

R. B. Kohnke: Acting chief engineer of Orleans levee board; 1924 to 1926 assistant engineer Orleans levee board; from which time, acting chief (p. 4723).

W. E. Ayres: Consulting engineer with firm of Ayres & Miller, Memphis, Tenn., for past 15 years, work principally on drainage and flood control, State of Arkansas (p. 4723).

Lucius T. Berthe: Consulting engineer; civil engineer for 30 years; 22 years on hydroelectric power, drainage, and flood control; 3 years with J. D. Schuyler, a consulting engineer, in applied hydraulics, he having become nationally known for the development of the hydraulic-fill dam for water power (p. 4723).

J. S. Allen: Chief engineer Board of Mississippi Levee Commission; 38 years of experience—10 years in the Government service under the Mississippi River Commission and 28 years in association with the levee board, the last 6 years as its chief engineer (p. 4723).

John Klorer: Commissioner, Orleans levee board, and a civil engineer; from 1895 until 1912 in the employ of the United States engineer service in the Mississippi River Commission office of the fourth district, with the exception of three years employed on other work in Mexico, including surveys for river improvement by the Mexican Government; from 1912 until 1920 a member of the board of State engineers, State of Louisiana; in 1920 appointed city engineer of New Orleans and served in that position until May, 1925, at which time elected a member of the commission council (p. 4723).

H. M. Pharr: Chief engineer St. Francis levee district of Arkansas. With above levee district entire life; first as assistant engineer and now as chief engineer (p. 4723).

W. H. Hudson: Chief engineer Sny Island levee drainage district; 18 years' experience; 2 years on highway, 16 years drainage and flood-control work in the States of Arkansas and Missouri (p. 4723).

Henry Bortin: Consulting engineer for Louisiana Railway & Navigation Co. (p. 4040).

Hadley Baldwin: Chief engineer Cleveland, Cincinnati, Chicago & St. Louis Railway (p. 4036).

Robert H. Ford: Assistant engineer, chief engineer Rock Island lines, Chicago, Ill. (p. 4032).

E. A. Hadley: Chief engineer Missouri Pacific Railroad, member American Society of Civil Engineers; member Railroad Engineers Association; engaged principally on railroad work (p. 4028).

R. W. Barnes: Chief engineer, Southern Pacific lines (p. 4026).

E. F. Mitchell: Chief engineer of Texas & Pacific Railway Co.; practiced engineering since 1882; mostly railroad work; familiar with Arkansas-Louisiana floods; member American Society of Civil Engineers (p. 4014).

A. F. Blaess: Chief engineer Illinois Central Railroad, graduate University of Michigan, 1895; been with Illinois Central since 1897, in engineering department (p. 3758).

J. P. Kemper: Civil engineer; practiced all his life in Atchafalaya Basin (p. 4501).

Walter Y. Kemper: Civil engineer; practiced on Atchafalaya entire life (p. 4173).

J. R. Adams: Member Louisiana State board engineers; connected with work on Mississippi River since 1912 (p. 3016).

ENGINEERING OBJECTIONS IN GENERAL TO JADWIN PLAN

The main points of contention, as developed by the evidence of engineers were—

(1) That, by the failure to use regulating works of known capacity to divert the water from the main river, and the failure to control and confine the water after it left the main river would not only produce dire results on the communities through which the flood waters passed, but might fail to relieve the main river as expected, thereby causing crevasses on the main river.

(2) That the use of a fuse-plug levee device in the Jadwin plan as a substitute for a controlled engineering structure was said to be a radical and a doubtful departure from sound engineering practice. The results from its use were said to be highly problematical, inasmuch as there is no way of determining in advance the size of the opening made by the crevasse and therefore no sure way of estimating, much less limiting, the quantity of water that would pass through it.

(3) The fuse-plug levee is described as a low and weak section of the existing levee, and designed to break by the action of the flood waters. The history of the crevasses on the Mississippi River indicates that there is no way of telling how little or how much water will escape through a crevasse, evidence being cited that in one case at least the river continued to rise after a crevasse had occurred instead of falling. Natural crevasses rarely exceed a mile in width. Flood waters making the crevasse sometimes dig what is known as a "blue hole" and let out great quantities of water uncontrolled, while other crevasses only produce small breaks and have little or no effect on the flood heights. An additional objection is made that the use of the fuse-plug levee device will subject the territory to secondary floods, causing needless damage on account of inability to close the crevasse before the second flood, as happened in 1927.

SPECIFIC ENGINEERING OBJECTIONS TO BIRDS POINT-NEW MADRID RIVER-BANK FLOOD WAY

The specific engineering objections urged against the Birds Point-New Madrid river-bank flood way proposed in the Jadwin plan were:

(1) The necessity under the Jadwin plan of the return of the water diverted at Birds Point to the Mississippi River at New Madrid will cause it to pile up at the latter point, thus reducing the slope and velocity and resulting capacity of both flood way and main river to such extent that the actual lowering of flood height at Cairo will not be 6 feet as needed but probably only 3 feet in periods of maximum floods.

(2) That this objection is well founded, the flood of 1913 was cited to show that in that year the waters flowed through this location 15 miles wide, or three times wider than the proposed one, with an average depth of 6 feet and operating as a result of 11 crevasses near Birds Point and failed to reduce the Cairo gauge more than 3 feet.

(3) That this objection was well founded, attention is called to the fact that Colonel Potter testified that he did not consider the project feasible from an engineering standpoint.

(4) A still further objection to the plan is that should it accomplish the results anticipated in the Jadwin plan, Cairo would still be without adequate protection, pointing out that the maximum flood brings the water to the very top of the levee.

(5) Attention is called to General Jadwin's testimony whereby he modified his plan during the hearings by substituting 10 miles of fuse-plug levees at the north and south ends instead of cutting down the entire 70 miles of levee from 58 to 55 feet, as indicated in his written report, thereby calling forth further objection to the use of the fuse-plug levees condemned as bad from an engineering standpoint.

SPECIFIC ENGINEERING OBJECTIONS TO BOEUF BASIN FLOOD WAY

The specific engineering objections urged against the Boeuf Basin flood way proposed in the Jadwin plan were:

(1) It is needlessly wasteful of land and endangers cities and communities. Within this area there are 70,000 people whose lives would be endangered by the rush of water through the confined channel.

(2) The side levees along the flood way are constructed with lesser cross section and strength than standard levees.

(3) The backwater area is needlessly increased by inundating a section of the country that is very rarely flooded.

(4) The flood way, only being subjected to water once in 12 years, would possibly cause the side levees to fail with a rapid rise of water in the flood way.

(5) The fuse-plug levee instead of the control device is objectionable for the reasons heretofore stated.

(6) Failure of the fuse-plug device to limit the amount of water might cause the overtopping and failure of the guide levees along the flood way.

(7) General Jadwin's plan and testimony shows that the flood way will be an average of 120 miles long and 13 miles wide and that when flowing to capacity the water in the flood way will be 20 feet deep. The comment is made that, if such be true, the depth of water will overtop the ridges on both sides of the flood way at points where no guide levees are provided, thus flooding the entire territory over to the Mississippi River on the east and menacing with overflow the towns of Colliston, Merrouge, and Gallion, and adjacent territory on the west.

(8) That the backwater from the Boeuf Basin flood way will go around the end of the west guide levee near the Ouachita River and submerge the town of Columbia and probably the city of Monroe.

(9) Failure of General Jadwin to provide plan for levees as in the Mississippi River Commission plan to limit increased backwater effects accruing from flood-way flow will subject to backwater flooding the towns of Vidalia, Ferriday, Clayton, Waterproof, and surrounding territory, which area would not otherwise be flooded. Attention is called to the fact that the Mississippi River Commission has met this condition by the construction of auxiliary levee beginning at Bougere on the Mississippi River and extending northwesterly along the Tensas River.

In the discussion of the diversion channel or flood way from the mouth of the Arkansas River to the mouth of the Red River, it has been referred to in the various reports submitted, and in the testimony before the committee by several names, viz, Cypress Creek diversion, Boeuf Basin flood way, and Tensas Basin flood way.

It should be stated in explanation that the old mouth of Cypress Creek, Ark., located about 25 miles below the Arkansas River and about 12 miles above Arkansas City, is the site selected for the upper end of the proposed flood way, and for that reason perhaps the proposed floodway has been designated as the Cypress Creek flood way by some persons. Other persons have designated it as the Tensas flood way for the reason perhaps that the greater part of its length is in what is known as the Tensas levee district.

A much more correct designation is the Boeuf diversion or Boeuf River diversion, for the reason that the Boeuf River is the axis of the flood way for practically its entire length.

SPECIFIC ENGINEERING OBJECTIONS TO ATCHAFALAYA FLOOD WAY

The specific engineering objections urged against the Atchafalaya flood way proposed in the Jadwin plan were:

(1) Fuse-plug device objections as heretofore stated.

(2) Both the failure to provide continuous levees and to extend them far enough to the south needlessly subjects large areas to overflow and will submerge certain towns which should be protected.

(3) That the towns of Melville, Simmesport, and Morgan City are in the path of the flood way and are not sufficiently protected for the reason that the flood waters might surround the towns, and if the levee should fail on account of not being seasoned, the entire town would be destroyed and the people might be cut off from escape.

(4) That the amount of water diverted down the Atchafalaya section is in excess of the discharge capacity of the lower end of the Atchafalaya flood way. The Jadwin plan makes no provision for taking care of this excess which is about 500,000 cubic feet per second, or the equivalent of one-third the high-water discharge of the Mississippi River in front of New Orleans.

TESTIMONY AGAINST JADWIN PLAN

The following is the testimony of civil engineers referred to above, with long experience on the Mississippi River, concerning the impracticability of the Jadwin plan:

FUSE-PLUG LEVEES

DISCHARGE THROUGH CONCRETE SPILLWAY CAN BE DETERMINED EXACTLY; DISCHARGE THROUGH A FUSE-PLUG OPENING NOT DETERMINABLE IN ADVANCE

Colonel Potter

(P. 2365)

The CHAIRMAN. Well, I would like to have you tell us why the Mississippi River Commission plan includes a spillway constructed at Cypress Creek at an estimated cost of $9,000,000, where the Army plan provides for a fuse-plug levee section at the same location. Tell the committee why the commission elected to spend $9,000,000 constructing this spillway if a fuse-plug levee will do the work, and be much cheaper, and at the same time be engineeringly correct.

Colonel POTTER. We thought the water should not go out, or should not continue to run out through that spillway clear down to the bank-full stage, and possibly below that, if there was a crevasse or hole through there, and we wanted it to automatically shut itself off at a certain level, 54.4 feet, I think it was.

* * * * * * *

The CHAIRMAN. Is there any way to tell the amount of water that will go through your concrete spillway that costs $9,000,000?

Colonel POTTER. You can tell exactly, at any stage.

The CHAIRMAN. And that is not true with regard to the fuse-plug levee, is it?

Colonel POTTER. No; because you do not know how wide it is going to be. It is like a crevasse. You can measure a crevasse after it starts, but you can not estimate in advance how much the crevasse is going to take.

The CHAIRMAN. That is what I say. There is no way that you know of that you can anticipate the amount of reduction in flood height with a fuse-plug levee, is there?

Colonel POTTER. I know of no way; no, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Would it be possible to know the various flood heights at different points along the river through the use of a fuse-plug levee?

Colonel POTTER. Well, of course, the flood heights would depend upon the amount of water that goes through.

The CHAIRMAN. That is what I say. So it would be an unknown factor until the water was actually coming through, would it not?

Colonel POTTER. Until the water was actually coming through.

(P. 2366)

* * * * * * *

The CHAIRMAN. There is no dependence that can be placed upon it, then, is there?

Colonel POTTER. Well, the only lack of dependence is the inability to gauge in advance the amount of water that will go through that flood way.

* * * * * * *

Colonel POTTER. There should be something at either end of it to limit its width.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Colonel POTTER. But whether it will be the full width of the opening or not, I do not think anybody can tell in advance.

The CHAIRMAN. That is what I mean.

Colonel POTTER. But it would be flowing over that thing, and would probably break the whole length of it, and might cut into the levee unless it would be controlled in some way at the ends—into the real levee, I mean.

* * * * * * *

(P. 2367)

* * * * * * *

The CHAIRMAN. All right. Now, is there any difference in the effectiveness of a crevasse, in the ordinary sense of the word, and an opening created by a controlled spillway?

Colonel POTTER. Well, the crevasse is liable to become more effective by extending beyond the limits set for it.

The CHAIRMAN. All right. And has it not sometimes happened that it becomes less effective?

Colonel POTTER. It might become less effective.

The CHAIRMAN. You remember the Torras crevasse in 1912, do you not?

Colonel POTTER. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Tell the committee what the effect was there. Did the gauge height continue to increase after the Torras crevasse?

Colonel POTTER. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. That is true, is it not?

Colonel POTTER. Yes, sir. More water was coming down than went through it, evidently.

COULD NEVER ANTICIPATE QUANTITY OF WATER

By Harry Bortin, consulting engineer for the Louisiana Railway & Navigation Co.

(P. 4042)

The CHAIRMAN. I will ask you another way: Do you believe uncontrolled spillways can be made to work, or can protect against a flood that might come, or the water that might come from it?

Mr. BORTIN. Answering your question, Mr. Chairman, I am very much inclined to agree with Mr. Grunsky, that in all work of such large importance it is very essential to predetermine the places where your spillways will be, and have them in the form of concrete weirs, and determine the exact places where your flood ways will be, and the exact area, and economic situation of the properties that will be effected; and I believe that when a survey of that kind is thoroughly and exhaustively made, the problem will resolve itself into a simpler aspect, which will enable it to be better solved.

The CHAIRMAN. I will ask you again, do you think water coming through an uncontrolled spillway could be anticipated so that you would know that your railroad would be safe in the path of it?

Mr. BORTIN. You would never know, in my opinion.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

Mr. BORTIN. In fact, people at the present time have an opportunity to fight the flood. Say it only goes 6 inches above your fuse-plug levees, I can see where people would not be able to do anything, or, if anything at all, then perhaps it would be too late.

CAN NOT ESTIMATE DISCHARGE THROUGH FUSE-PLUG LEVEE

E. A. Hadley, chief engineer, Missouri-Pacific Railroad

(P. 4031)

Mr. WILSON. If a fuse-plug levee blew out and became a crevasse, you couldn't estimate the amount of water you would get, could you?

Mr. HADLEY. No; there would be no way of estimating that * * * and, together with other engineers who have testified here, have never heard of a fuse-plug levee until I read this report.

NEVER HEARD OF FUSE-PLUG LEVEES

By E. F. Mitchell, chief engineer, Texas & Pacific Railroad

(P. 4015)

The CHAIRMAN. * * * Had you ever heard of a fuse-plug levee before the Jadwin report?

Mr. MITCHELL. I never had heard of one until I read that in the Jadwin report, but I think I understand what is meant by it, just the levees as they exist at their present height, to be overtopped or perhaps blow out from any of the overflows.

FUSE-PLUG LEVEES WILL NOT FUNCTION PROPERLY

By J. S. Allen, chief engineer, Mississippi levee commissioners

(P. 4668)

In my opinion, based on 38 years of service on the levees, the so-called "fuse-plug" in the vicinity of Arkansas City will not function upon the terms assumed—i. e., 900,000 second-feet—no break (and the fuse plug is assumed to break) within my knowledge has ever discharged 600,000 second-feet. For instance, it is estimated that the flow down the Tensas Basin coming from the breaks at South Bend, Pendleton, and Melford during the flood of 1927 was about 600,000 second-feet (three breaks, mind you). Then, how can one break in the "fuse plug" amount to so much unless artificially widened? I claim that this can not be successfully done, because the velocity of the flow after the flood way is filled will not be strong enough to remove the material on the ends of the break, after being dynamited, to any appreciable extent. (The artificial crevasse at Caernaryon is illustrative.)

(P. 4669)

The plan is not based upon sound engineering principles, but is based on the assumption that a crevasse will occur in a levee some 15 or 20 miles in length at some time, and that this crevasse will bring about a given result, which assumption is not borne out by the records.

MAY BE NECESSARY TO USE DYNAMITE

By Lucius T. Berthe, consulting engineer

(P. 3004)

Mr. WHITTINGTON. If you do not mind, will you tell us what a fuse-plug levee is, how it differs from any other levee?

Mr. BERTHE. I had never heard of a fuse-plug levee, in exactly those terms, until the Army engineers' plan was published. * * * It is intended to operate something like a safety valve. It is intended to hold a certain portion, and when it gets over that certain portion it blows up. * * *

The CHAIRMAN. * * * You can not tell whether that will fuse or not, can you?

Mr. BERTHE. You can not tell that; no.

* * * * * * *

The CHAIRMAN. And if it is a buckshot levee, what about that?

Mr. BERTHE. If it is a buckshot levee, it might not open up for days, and it might necessitate the use of dynamite to open it up. If you have a sharp, quick rise, it may be entirely ineffective and you lose your main levee anyway. When a safety valve is put in for that purpose, it ought to be very definite, so you know when it is going to operate. In this case you do not know.

* * * * * * *

Mr. BERTHE. * * * One of those fuse plugs does go by Arkansas City and the city would be protected by a ring levee. Supposing the crevasse would occur close to the ring levee. It is a very probable matter that it would eat on the end until it cut into the main levee protecting the city. * * *

The CHAIRMAN. Now, tell the committee this: You got at Arkansas City all the people in there inside of a ring levee.

Mr. BERTHE. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. And if what you say might happen occurred it would eat down to the ring levee?

Mr. BERTHE. If a crevasse occurred right close to the ring levee, it might be very difficult and it might be impossible to protect that ring levee from cutting and the city would be flooded.

The CHAIRMAN. And if surrounded by water they would be unable to escape.

Mr. BERTHE. They would be unable to escape, unless they had enough levee left to get out on.

BOEUF BASIN FLOOD WAY

FLOOD WAY WOULD BE REQUIRED TO CARRY 50 PER CENT OR MORE THAN 1927 CREVASSE VOLUME

Colonel Potter

(P. 4529)

Mr. WILSON. Colonel, would it be possible, in your judgment, to divert through the Boeuf spillway 900,000 second-feet of water and give it the same or greater protection than it now has?

Colonel POTTER. I can not see that we could do it. If you are going to divert the water through it or use it as a spillway, it is sure to be flooded in certain years in addition to what it now is. There has been no water through there; there was no water through there in 1922, so it was not affected in 1922. If it had not been for the breaks on the Arkansas River where the levees, we admit, were not built up to grade or section, because they had been built but not finished and were built against Arkansas River floods, there would have been no flow down there in 1927.

Mr. WILSON. And if you put 900,000 feet there, that is more than what went through this year, is it not?

Colonel POTTER. Oh, yes, sir; much greater; 50 per cent more and probably more than that.

FEARS GREATER DISCHARGE IN FLOOD WAY THAN CALCULATED QUANTITY

By J. R. Adams, assistant State engineer of Louisiana

(P. 3016)

The plan (for the Boeuf River flood way) provides that the water will enter the flood way through a fuse-plug levee. By this it is meant that some 25 or 30 miles of this levee will be left in its present weakened condition. * * * The idea is * * * that in periods of floods, greater than that of 1922, the water will flow over the top of this 30 miles of levee until the levee has failed or crevassed in some one or more places. * * * No one can safely say how many breaks would occur, what the extent of the break will be, or what the amount of the water discharged through these breaks would be. It is conceivable that in the event of a flood of larger proportions than the 1922 flood that there might be breaks in this levee line sufficient to discharge more than 900,000 cubic feet per second into this flood way.

BOEUF BASIN WOULD BE FLOODED EVERY THIRD YEAR

J. P. Kemper

(P. 2870)

Mr. KEMPER. Under those conditions the fuse-plug levee at Cypress Creek would have "blown" in 1912, 1913, 1916, 1920, 1922, and 1927, or about every third year. That can be expected; that the water will go into the Boeuf Basin every third year under the Jadwin plan.

And still General Jadwin says that the Bayou Boeuf flood way would, under his plan, have as much protection as it now has.

COMMENTS ON DIVERSIONS

RESERVOIRS SHOULD BE INVESTIGATED BEFORE FLOOD WAYS CONSTRUCTED

By Colonel Potter

(P. 2108)

Colonel POTTER. * * * I want some time to study it and see if certain other features can not be brought in to reduce the cost or make the plan more feasible.

The CHAIRMAN. What have you in mind?

Colonel POTTER. I have strongly in mind reservoirs on the Arkansas and White Rivers and other tributaries.

The CHAIRMAN. What else have you got in mind?

Colonel POTTER. That is principally the thing. * * *

I believe there is a possibility of control of the Arkansas and White so as to avoid these spillways and flood ways. * * *

I would not put anything of that kind on those people until I had made a thorough study. * * * But I can tell you now that I would rather live behind that levee with a 4-foot raise and a 12-foot crown and a 6-to-1 slope on the back side and a 4 to 1 on the front side, and the right to fight for my life and property than to have that thing put down on me.

(P. 2295)

Mr. WILSON. Then if you had this reservoir storage of 600,000 feet up the Arkansas and White, that would relieve the amount of water collected from Old River to go down the Mississippi and the Atchafalaya to that extent, wouldn't it?

Colonel POTTER. Just as much as at Cypress Creek.

Mr. WILSON. The Cypress Creek will be the same as the source of the Atchafalaya, which will be divided between the Atchafalaya and the main river to carry on down.

Colonel POTTER. That is the reason I would study the Arkansas before I would put in the Tensas Basin flood way or the Atchafalaya flood way.

DIVERSIONS CONSIDERED LAST RESORT

By Mr. West

(P. 3058–3059)

The CHAIRMAN. Now, Colonel Potter's testimony developed the fact that he was not entirely in sympathy with the idea of the proposed flood way through the Tensas Basin as a means of reducing flood heights at Arkansas City. His statements are to the effect that he was almost disposed to sign a minority report on this particular item. Now, has your study, has your investigation of this particular point, been sufficiently extensive to justify your recording your opinion one way or the other as to the practicability of making use of reservoirs in the Arkansas and White Valleys in preference to the recommended flood way?

Mr. WEST. If reservoirs could be found that would reduce the discharge in the main river at the mouth of the Arkansas River as much as the diversion would reduce it, and even though the reservoirs would cost more than the diversion, it would be infinitely better for the whole problem. It would save the million or two, or more, acres that the flood way would destroy. It would be better for the river itself, because diversions are not good, except as a last resort, to save leveeing further. They are not good for the development of the stream itself, and unless they are absolutely controlled at the head, the entrance, and throughout, they can be more harmful, perhaps, in the long run than they will be beneficial.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, now, the question was——

Mr. WEST. So I only look upon diversion as a matter of last resort.

The CHAIRMAN. All right. Now, the question was this: Has your study and investigation on this particular thing been sufficient to justify you in stating your opinion that it is necessary to proceed with the flood ways at this time——

Mr. WEST. No.

The CHAIRMAN. Or do you incline to agree with Colonel Potter? What is your answer?

Mr. WEST. We suggested in our report that we needed more time to study this particular question, to balance reservoirs against flood ways. I do not think that there would be any time lost in the construction of the whole structure by giving time for that study. It would only delay the time of beginning the flood ways, and the balance of your work would take longer than to construct the flood ways, so that the flood ways could be completed even though you delayed a year or two; they could be completed before you could complete the necessary work along the main river. Then why hurry and make a possible mistake? Why not make a more exhaustive investigation and study of the possibilities of reservoirs?

The CHAIRMAN. All right. Then you are inclined to agree with Colonel Potter in that, are you?

Mr. WEST. I fully agree with Colonel Potter in that; yes, sir.

FURTHER STUDY RECOMMENDED OF DIVERSION CHANNELS

(By flood-control committee of American Engineering Council)

(P. 4919)

The adoption of any specific plans for diversion channels should wait upon far more complete studies of the areas involved and of the probable effects of such diversions.

UNCONTROLLED SPILLWAYS

COLONEL TOWNSEND, PAST PRESIDENT MISSISSIPPI RIVER COMMISSION, OPPOSED UNCONTROLLED SPILLWAYS

Walter Y. Kemper, quoting Colonel Townsend

(P. 4187)

Now, as to controlled spillways, Colonel Townsend says:

"* * * the spillway prevents any escape of water below a predetermined stage, thus protecting the navigable channel during low water from an injurious reduction in flow; it also gradually increases its discharge as the river rises, and does not cause any violent changes in velocity even at high stages; a crevasse, on the contrary, suddenly permits a large volume of water to escape from the river at a high stage, and suddenly increases river velocities above it by the rush of water to the crevasse while it checks velocities below it by diminishing the effective head which is forcing the water toward the sea."

CAIRO-NEW MADRID FLOOD WAY

NOT FEASIBLE FROM AN ENGINEERING OR FINANCIAL STANDPOINT

By Colonel Potter

(P. 2116)

The CHAIRMAN. You do not consider the problem at Cairo very serious, then?

Colonel POTTER. It is in a bad locality for floods, but I do not look for the danger of Cairo being overtopped. I do not look on it as anywhere near as probable as a great many people do.

The CHAIRMAN. As a matter of fact, you do not consider it serious enough to set the levees back 5 miles in order to relieve it?

Colonel POTTER. I do not.

The CHAIRMAN. Or do you think the 5-mile setback and the removing of the bottle necks will relieve it?

Colonel POTTER. I do not.

The CHAIRMAN. Neither one?

Colonel POTTER. I do not think that the proposed flood way to the west is either feasible from an engineering standpoint or from a financial standpoint.

(P. 2456)

Mr. NELSON. But that would be an average interval between floods of about what?

Colonel POTTER. If we start in 1910 * * * four floods in 17 years.

Mr. NELSON. Assuming a flood came this often, what would be the effect on the levee?

Colonel POTTER. There would not be any levee left after any one flood. We had a case at Vicksburg where the water this year overtopped a levee which went across to prevent the circulation of water around West Pass, and the water on either side of it I do not believe differed by a foot. It tore that levee all to pieces and bored holes into the ground 46 feet deep, below the ground level. If you start a flood over the top of a levee it is going to tear that levee all to pieces.

PREDICTS HIGHER LEVEL OF WATER AT CAIRO WHEN JADWIN PLAN IS COMPLETED

Hadley Baldwin, chief engineer Cleveland, Cincinnati, Chicago & St. Louis Railway

(P. 4037)

Mr. COX. Might I interrupt you just there? I did not understand that the flood levels are raised at Cairo. They are simply greater freeboard than raising of levels, etc.

Mr. BALDWIN. For a given flood, for a given volume of water passing Cairo when the Jadwin plan is completed, if it is completed and its integrity is established, there will be a higher level of water fixed for Cairo than in any situation that has ever happened before.

NO PROTECTION PROVIDED FOR CAIRO AGAINST THE MAXIMUM FLOOD PREDICTED

By L. T. Berthe, consulting engineer

Summarizing the various features of the Army plan we find that the same is not only economically unfeasible but contains serious and dangerous engineering experiments. We find that regardless of the fact that it purports to be and is put forward as an ultimate or comprehensive plan, that the actual net effects only give a normal protection against a 1927 flood and that such degree of protection, if any, which will be afforded by such works against the greatest predicted flood as cited in that report is entirely problematical, except as related to the city of Cairo and the communities across the river in Missouri where no protection is provided against such predicted flood, but instead those communities are sentenced to the inevitable disaster when it occurs.

ATCHAFALAYA FLOOD WAY

SIX INCORPORATED TOWNS TO BE FLOODED

By J. P. Kemper

(Pp. 2853, 2854)

The effect of this will be to submerge more than a million acres of cultivable land, of which at least half is in cultivation, 250 miles of railroad, by severing four main lines into New Orleans, entirely interrupting communication from the west, overwhelming the great Southern Pacific bridge at Morgan City, as well as its other bridge over the upper Atchafalaya River and numerous smaller bridges.

* * * * * * *

The railroads are notified, vaguely, in the plan to open up and raise their roadbeds, presumably at their own expense, clearly without expense to the Government.

Over 400 miles of highways will be subjected to inundation, including 85 miles of the Jefferson Highway between New Orleans and Winnipeg and 50 miles of the Old Spanish Trail between New Orleans and California.

There will be subjected to inundation six incorporated towns of from 300 to 5,000 inhabitants. The plan proposes to isolate three of these with ring levees, the towns paying half the cost. The other three—Berwick, Patterson, and Franklin—do not appear to be provided for. Within the area proposed to be submerged are no less than eight large sawmills, with a daily capacity of 600,000 board feet, and numerous small mills.

MORE WATER SENT DOWN ATCHAFALAYA BASIN THAN COULD BE SAFELY CARRIED

By Walter Y. Kemper, civil engineer, Franklin, La.

(P. 4173)

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Kopp asked the specific question as to what the objections were to each plan. Don't go into details, but just tell generally what you think about the plans.

Mr. KEMPER. The principal objection to the Jadwin plan, so far as the Atchafalaya Basin is concerned, is that it attempts to put more water into the Atchafalaya Basin than can be safely carried through it. I don't think any system of levees can be built that will carry that amount of water safely through the basin. They attempt to carry that water through by a system of levees that is only partial, and I heard the general testify to-day that there would be no backwater in this locality here.

ENGINEERING OBJECTIONS IN GENERAL

PROPERTY RIGHTS DISREGARDED IN BOEUF AND ATCHAFALAYA FLOOD WAY PLAN

By John Klorer

(P. 4768–4769)

I have your letter requesting me to state concisely my views on the Jadwin flood-control plan and also on the plan submitted by the Mississippi River Commission.

To begin with, I have no hesitation in saying that in my opinion the plan of the Mississippi River Commission is the more satisfactory one offered as the solution of the flood-control problem. It provides for a greater margin of safety in its levee grades and introduces no questionable departures from engineering practice on the Mississippi River, such as are proposed in the Jadwin plan, and which, in my opinion, will be disappointing in the results expected.

I have discussed some of the features of this plan with civilian engineers of long experience and who are familiar with the Mississippi River problem from Cairo to the Gulf, and these engineers are practically of one mind, and that is that the Jadwin plan fails to meet the requirements of the situation.

To be specific and beginning at the upper end of the valley, let us discuss the situation in the vicinity of Cairo. General Jadwin uses in the design of his plan the maximum probable future flood height confined by levees, as submitted by United States Weather Bureau, and estimated at 66 feet on the Cairo gauge. In paragraph 13 of his report he states:

"The serious problem begins at Cairo at the confluence of the Ohio and the Mississippi. From here to New Madrid the main levee on the west bank chokes the river unduly and should be set back sufficiently to lower the head of water by 6 feet in an extreme flood."

From the information furnished me as to the depth of water over this proposed flood-way area, and which information was supplied by Mr. Berthe, the engineer for the particular levee district affected, it is questionable if the desired discharge and, therefore, the expected reduction on the Cairo gauge will materialize. But even should it materialize, the proposed reduction brings the flood line to elevation 60 feet, which is the top of the levee at Cairo, and leaves the Cairo levees without any freeboard.

The precarious situation of Cairo with its 15,000 lives, which is emphasized in several places throughout the Chief of Engineers' report, does not seem to be much improved by resorting to the heroic methods proposed at the expense of the people in Missouri.

The outstanding fundamental principle upon which General Jadwin's plan rests is the efficacy of fuse-plug levees that are expected to break at the head of flood ways and expected to give certain stipulated discharges through these flood ways. The quantities calculated to go through these fuse-plug openings are large quantities—900,000 cubic feet per second in the instance of the Boeuf flood way and 1,500,000 cubic feet per second in the instance of the Atchafalaya flood way. If these quantities do not go through these respective flood ways the difference must go down the main stem of the river and will affect flood heights accordingly. Should the actual quantity diverted through the Atchafalaya flood way, for example, be as little as 10 per cent below the estimated quantity, then the amount involved in this small percentage, viz, 150,000 cubic feet per second, is equivalent to 2.5 feet increase on the Angola gauge, while the margin or freeboard provided for by General Jadwin on the lower Mississippi River improved levees is only 3 feet.

I wish to invite your attention to the fact that there are no controlling works of any kind at the head of the Atchafalaya flood way that will limit the flow of the water into the Atchafalaya Basin, so as not to exceed a predetermined definite quantity, or that will induce it to enter the said basin up to any predetermined definite quantity. To assume that the flow of water past the latitude of Red River Landing will crevasse the "fuse-plug" levees, and will divide in the orderly and well-behaved manner proposed in the Jadwin plan—one-half going down the main river and one-half down the flood way—without having a protected and controlled opening of known dimensions, and will so divide, simply on the dictum of a person, is to attribute to that person the powers that King Canute aspired to when he ordered the sea tides to subside.

I wish also to invite your attention to the totally inadequate provisions made in the Jadwin plan at the lower end of the flood way for getting this water to the Gulf with minimum damage. It is practically dumped at Morgan City with the assumption that it will get out some way, somehow.

The same disregard for the rights of property is shown in the Boeuf flood way, passing through the Tensas district, where the water is dumped at the lower end of the basin in such quantities as to flood 285,000 acres of land not now affected by backwater overflow, and which could be protected by the construction of an auxiliary levee as provided for in the plan of the Mississippi River Commission. It is not urged that the acreage now flooded by backwater in such floods as 1927 be reduced, but it is urged that no additional land be surrendered to backwater.

This particular basin, comprising the southeast Arkansas district, the Tensas district, and the fifth Louisiana district, and having a total combined acreage of 3,517,626 acres, will have 2,525,000 acres dedicated to flooding purposes, including the 1,440,000 acres within the limits of the Boeuf flood way, as shown in the Jadwin plan, and the additional area flooded by the Jadwin plan over and above the area to be flooded by the Mississippi River Commission plan is 625,000 acres.

I can not help believing that if the factor of resultant damages had been considered in the preparation of the plan, irrespective as to who was to pay such damages, the plan would be materially different.

With reference to the plan submitted by the Mississippi River Commission, I believe the outline of work provided for and designated at its "comprehensive plan" will remove all our future flood troubles. There is a proposed modification that has appealed to me, and this as a result of the statement of Colonel Potter that he believed that there may be a possibility of utilizing available reservoir sites in the Arkansas and White Valleys to the extent that may supply sufficient storage to obviate the necessity of constructing the Boeuf flood way. This possibility should be investigated to the fullest before expending any funds on the Boeuf flood way.

I have confined the above discussion to the engineering features, knowing full well that you needed no expression of opinion on the subject of "local contributions" to assist you in the formulating of your conclusions on this subject.

JADWIN PLAN LACKING IN ENGINEERING DETAILS

Report of committee of railroad chief engineers submitted by A. F. Blaess, chief engineer Illinois Central Railroad

(P. 3759)

The comprehensive plan recommended is an advance over any scheme for flood control heretofore presented, but it lacks so much of being complete in engineering detail that it is not possible to develop definitely what effect the execution of the plan will have on the railroads located in the affected territory.

NO PROVISION FOR FLOOD WATERS AT MOUTHS OF THE TRIBUTARIES

Robert H. Ford, assistant chief engineer, Rock Island Lines, Chicago, Ill.

(P. 4032)

The Jadwin plan would, apparently, increase the flood waters within this area by confining the main river in such a way as to further raise the flood heights at the mouths of these tributary rivers, with no compensating protection provided. This must inevitably extend the flooded area and the flood period within the basin, with its resultant effect throughout this territory through which the Rock Island operates. It must further affect adversely its tracks and roadway as well as its ability to perform its service as a common carrier.

No maximum flood elevations are found in the Jadwin plan at Helena or other key points, but by deduction from the Cairo gauge elevations it is estimated that the plan contemplates a flood stage at Helena from about 56.8 during the 1927 flood to 59.

The plan apparently makes no provision for the additional river waters coming from these tributary rivers and the back flow from the Mississippi River during the time that they are held back by the walled water created by the levees in the Mississippi River at the mouths of these tributary rivers.

4. GENERAL OBJECTIONS TO JADWIN PLAN

Aside from the technical objections offered by noted engineers which have been already presented, the committee has received objections from governors, mayors of cities, officials of levee boards, and other distinguished citizens in the lower Mississippi Valley. At the conclusion of each one presented, reference is made to the page of this report where the statement may be found.

Hon. John E. Martineau, Governor of Arkansas, protests that the lower valley should not be expected to pay for its own funeral to benefit other sections.

Hon. Alfred H. Stone, of Mississippi, charges that the figures of General Jadwin on "total cost" are misleading.

Hon. O. H. Simpson, Governor of Louisiana, declares that adequate protection is not given under the Jadwin plan to the people of Louisiana.

Hon. F. D. Sampson, Governor of Kentucky, states that the Jadwin plan is incomplete, impracticable, and will lead to disaster.

Hon. Oscar Johnston, of Memphis, Tenn., attacks the "fuse-plug" levee idea.

Officials of Tensas Parish, La., protest against the damages they would suffer if the Jadwin plan be carried out.

Officials of Ouachita Parish, La., point out that national highways in the parish would be destroyed under the Jadwin plan.

New Madrid County (Mo.) Bankers' Association condemns Jadwin plan and appeals to Members of Congress to prevent it becoming a law.

In view of the objections of noted engineers, which can not be answered, relating to the engineering features of the Jadwin plan and the protests from public officials and distinguished citizens throughout the lower valley who will be subject to flood damages, the committee did not feel justified in writing the Jadwin plan into law. Any meritorious part or feature of it may be adopted by the commission created by the bill recommended by the committee.

TESTIMONY AGAINST JADWIN PLAN

The following is the testimony of public officials and others, referred to above, concerning the impracticability of the Jadwin plan:

PREDICTS FAILURE OF PLAN

Brief of Gov. F. D. Sampson, of Kentucky

(Committee Document No. 13)

In paragraph 2 of the Jadwin report it is stated:

"The plan is a comprehensive one, providing for the maximum predicted as possible, and for future expansion to meet changing conditions."

Comment: The evidence before the Flood Control Committee clearly indicates that the plan is incomplete, impracticable, and will result in a continuation of the same lack of systematic flood control which has been the chief cause of the 1927 and previous disasters. The failure of this plan, if adopted, is predicted, because it will be impossible for many of the districts involved to bear their share of the cost, and failure to construct the system at any considerable number of points would mean the failure of the whole plan, even were it otherwise unobjectionable. A chain can be no stronger than its weakest link.

ARMY ENGINEERS SHOULD NOT INVADE THE LEGISLATIVE FIELD

By Hon. FINIS J. GARRETT, Representative from Tennessee

(P. 1737)

You can not, by legislative act, take a man's property away from him for public use without compensation.

The matter of protection of life and property is not the only thing to be considered. There is protection of commerce and the protection of the Postal Service, which are purely and wholly national.

If you build a levee to protect a section where there is commerce, where there is Postal Service, and in so doing you injure private property at the place where there is no commerce, you should pay damages or hold owner harmless.

I say very frankly that I think the engineers and commission should have brought to Congress a plan, "Here is what we think is going to solve the physical features of this problem. Now it is up to you. We presented you the engineering data. We leave the legal field to you, because that is your proper field." I think they might very properly have done this and left out comments and recommendations touching rights of way.

PRINCIPLES OF JUSTICE, LAW, EQUITY VIOLATED IN JADWIN PLAN

By Oscar Johnston, Memphis, Tenn.

[Excerpt from brief printed as Committee Document No. 22, p. 2]

The Jadwin plan stipulates that the several States affected shall enact suitable legislation prohibiting the construction of levees or other works in the alluvial valley without permission from the War Department. At the same time this plan stipulates that it does not protect the owners of thousands—yes, hundreds of thousands—of acres; it does not propose to pay the owners of these unprotected acres for any use or damage to their lands. Thus the plan says to the owners of the land: "We will not protect you, we will not compensate you, nor will we permit you to protect yourselves." This is contrary to right, justice, law, and equity.

FLOOD WAYS DESTROY SOME COMMUNITIES TO SAVE OTHERS

Brief of Gov. John E. Martineau, of Arkansas

(P. 2500)

The Jadwin plan consists, in part, of strengthening existing levees and moving back in the "bottle necks." Some local benefits unquestionably could be established by this procedure, but by far the major portion of the Jadwin plan depends upon spillway relief. The spillway feature, however, involves an entirely different principle, inasmuch as the spillway feature can be established as a decided detriment and menace to the contiguous territory, not aiding its own particular section, but threatening it with destruction in order to benefit some other community. Surely, the lower valley should not be requested to pay a portion of its own funeral in order that other sections may survive.

Furthermore, the lower valley has reached the point of financial collapse, due to overtaxation for special improvements, and trying to protect itself against the flood waters of 41 per cent of continental United States.

JADWIN'S COST FIGURES MISLEADING

Hon. Alfred H. Stone, of Mississippi

[Excerpt from brief printed as Committee Document No. 16, p. 1]

The figures quoted from General Jadwin's recommendations, $296,400,000, are misleading when accepted with the words "Total cost." The very report from which the figures are taken, elsewhere in its own language, completely negatives any such suggestion. * * * There is no way of determining in advance the actual cost of an adequate plan of flood control, about which there is such a divergence of expert opinion as to the methods and means necessary to accomplish the result. * * * These figures are without substantial foundation.

UNDUE SHARE OF COST ALLOTTED TO LOUISIANA BY JADWIN PLAN

By Hon. O. H. Simpson, Governor of Louisiana

(P. 1777)

First. Adequate protection is not given the people of the Tensas Basin.

Second. Satisfactory provision has not been made to protect the rights of the people of the Atchafalaya Basin.

Third. The local contributions suggested would be both unfair in principle and an inordinate burden upon the citizens and taxpayers of Louisiana.

Fourth. Furthermore, the proposed plan seeks to avoid substantial increase in the present height of levees in other States by creating outlets or spillways in Louisiana, thereby saving additional expense to the National or other State Governments; yet it proposes Louisiana alone shall pay the major portion of the cost of these outlets.

JADWIN PLAN INCREASES FLOOD DANGER

[Statement from Tensas Parish, La.]

(P. 1978)

Adoption of Jadwin measure instead of lessening danger of overflows and territory affected thereby would increase this danger and increase the territory affected. Unalterably opposed to the waters of the river being turned in upon us at Cypress Creek and then permitted to run wild through the most fertile portion of the State.

CONSIDERATION SHOULD BE GIVEN WATER STORAGE ON WHITE, ARKANSAS, AND RED RIVERS

[By police jury, Ouachita Parish, La.]

(P. 1967)

Flood ways as proposed in Jadwin's report for Tensas Basin would destroy large alluvial sections in northeast Louisiana. East and west Federal-aid improved highways, Missouri Pacific and Illinois Central Railroads destroyed three months per year. Opposed to spillway through Tensas Basin until serious study and exhaustive survey indicates the necessity thereof. Proper consideration should be given storage of waters on White, Arkansas, and Red Rivers.

JADWIN PLAN CONDEMNED BY FINANCIAL HOUSES

RESOLUTIONS ON JADWIN PLAN

Resolutions adopted at meeting called by New Madrid County (Mo.) Bankers' Association and St. Johns levee and drainage district and attended by representatives of St. Louis investment bankers, representatives of bond houses holding levee and drainage bonds in southeast Missouri, representatives of life-insurance companies and loan companies holding mortgages in this territory, together with members of the New Madrid County Court and taxpayers from the various southeast Missouri counties (p. 4647)

Resolved, That this meeting do condemn the Jadwin plan, both as to its plan of financing and its engineering features, and that our Representatives in Congress be requested to do all in their power to prevent the Jadwin plan from becoming a law; and furthermore be it

Resolved, That said Representatives be urged to make every effort to secure legislation in this session of Congress, to the end that the Federal Government shall assume full responsibility for the construction and maintenance of flood-control works, including the costs of rights of way and the payment of all damages incidental to the construction of such flood-control works on the Mississippi River.

LESSON LEARNED AT MOUND CREVASSE APPLICABLE TO "FUSE-PLUG" OPENINGS

Brief submitted by Hon. Oscar Johnston, of Memphis, Tenn.

The plan provides for a fuse-plug levee at Cypress Creek. The idea of the plan is that at a given height in the water this "fuse plug" will blow out, break, or be overflowed, permitting the escape of a given quantity of water; the maximum of this quantity is stated in the plan at 900,000 cubic feet per second. The greatest crevasse, I believe, that has ever occurred in the Mississippi Levee was the break at Mounds Landing when the water stood approximately 19 feet above the level of the ground. This break was a half mile in width. The water swept through with an unprecedented velocity, and yet it is only estimated that the flow through this crevasse was approximately 500,000 cubic feet per second. This crevasse washed out a lake or "blue hole" more than 100 feet deep, and cut a channel more than a mile back into the interior, destroying 5,000 acres of land by depositing sand of such character as to prevent successful cultivation of the soil in the future. If such a result happens at one of the fuse plugs, it would be almost an impossible task to restore the levee without looping or building back for some distance. A few successive breaks of this sort at the same point would shortly result in a channel being cut from the head to the mouth of the spillway.

Those of us who have lived behind levees the greater part of our lives are decidedly of the opinion that levees have a perverse way of not breaking at points where they are expected to break. Frequently water is impounded and raised temporarily as the result of a windstorm; frequently windstorms bring about waves that wash into and cut through a strong levee standing several feet above the crest of the water; frequently levees are undermined by water seeping through below the base.

We believe from practical experience, as opposed to engineering theory, that such spillways as are constructed should be of the type commonly known as controlled, or should be left open at the head and leveed along the sides so that the flow of water through the spillways may be controlled and regulated.

5. SUFFICIENT DATA NOT AVAILABLE TO DEVISE RELIABLE AND SAFE ENGINEERING PLAN

Mr. John F. Stevens, who testified before the committee, was chief engineer of the Panama Canal, preceding General Goethals in the work. The following statement appeared in an article in the New York Evening World, Tuesday, January 24, 1928:

General Goethals never boasted of his great accomplishments, and when the canal was mentioned in his presence he always insisted that two men—Theodore Roosevelt and John F. Stevens—had far more to do with the successful building of the canal than he. He had followed Stevens as chief of the work of construction and his admiration for his predecessor was evident at all times.

GAVE CREDIT TO STEVENS

"Stevens," he would say in this quiet way, "was one of the greatest engineers that ever lived, and the Panama Canal is his greatest monument. He was a wonderful organizer and a remarkable judge of men. He had unerring insight in the selection of his assistants, and I found when I went to Panama that his organization was about as perfect as anyone could make it. The result was that more than half of the work was done for me in advance."

Mr. Stevens was president of the American Society of Civil Engineers for 1927, and is now on the board of direction and a member of the executive committee. He is also an honorary member of the society, being 1 of 15 honorary members out of 13,000 members.

Mr. Stevens was given the John Fritz gold medal three years ago for his achievements on the Panama Canal and as administrator for the Russian railways during the war. The John Fritz gold medal is the highest honor that can be paid in the engineering world. It is a medal that is given by the four great engineering societies of the United States—the American Society of Civil Engineers, the Mechanical Engineers, Electrical Engineers, and Mining Engineers, and is given for an outstanding achievement. It is international in its scope and at the present time there are only 23 holders, among them Thomas Edison, Alexander Graham Bell, Lord Kelvin, General Goethals, and Marconi.

Mr. Stevens believes that further study should be made of the problem before any definite engineering plan is adopted. In view of the fact that Mr. Stevens is perhaps the most eminent engineer in the United States, if not in the world, the committee attached great weight to his testimony:

NOT SUFFICIENT DATA AVAILABLE TO PREPARE FLOOD-CONTROL PLAN

Mr. Stevens

(P. 4284)

My idea is that there has not been proper time, and sufficient data has not been accumulated in order to prepare a comprehensive plan of flood control. * * *

Now, I can not conceive, with my wide experience with engineers, extending over more than half a century, that any body of men, with the additional data that could be collected in four or five months, can in six weeks or two months prepare plans which will cover all possible future contingencies on the Mississippi River.

Mr. Stevens said that it would take a very short time to decide on certain basic things that should be done, and that work on those things should be started without delay, but he believed that there were some very vital things embraced in both plans that need more elucidation. He developed the idea that levees should be strengthened at once.

FURTHER STUDIES SHOULD BE MADE BEFORE PLAN IS ADOPTED

[Report of advisory flood-control committee of American Society of Civil Engineers]

(P. 4913)

Fourth. It is important that, before embarking upon so large a project, careful estimates be made, and be made known, of the local, territorial, corporation, and individual expenses to be incurred for rights of way, drainage works, relocations of railroads and highways, and other collateral items, additional to the governmental costs, and apparently to be borne by other agencies.

Fifth. With such additional information and the further studies recommended by the Mississippi River Commission and the reservoir board, it may then be determined what is the real relative advantage of a complete spillway-floodway plan compared to less than complete relief by such means, supplemented by storage reservoirs at favorable sites, or other methods.

NOT SUFFICIENT DATA TO FORMULATE COMPREHENSIVE PLAN

[Brief submitted by M. G. Barnes, chief engineer Illinois waterway construction, on behalf of Gov. Len Small, of Illinois]

The Chief of Engineers has made a report stating the cost to be less than $300,000,000. The Mississippi River Commission, which has had charge of the river for nearly a half century, has made another report covering practically the same items, but has placed the cost at nearly $800,000,000. These reports are made under great pressure to accomplish a certain result within a given time. Civilian engineers generally do not believe that either report is sufficiently comprehensive or that their authors have exhausted the field to determine whether the remedies proposed are all sufficient. From the personal study that I have made of the situation I have found a woeful lack of topographical information from which a careful or scientific study could be made.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER COMMISSION PLAN

1. Salient features of Mississippi River Commission plan.
2. Mississippi River Commission plan v. Jadwin plan.
3. Comparison of Jadwin plan and Mississippi River Commission plan.
4 "Levees only" policy of Mississippi River commission.
5. Mississippi River Commission repudiated by General Jadwin.

1. SALIENT FEATURES OF MISSISSIPPI RIVER COMMISSION PLAN

The committee had before it the report of the Mississippi River Commission, the duly authorized agency of the Government on the flood control of the Mississippi River, which provides for the same items as does the Jadwin plan, with the following exceptions:

First. It includes the Mississippi River from Rock Island, Ill., to the Head of Passes.

Second. It provides for the raising of levees on the Mississippi River higher than the Chief of Engineers' plan, so as to provide a freeboard of 4 feet between Rock Island and Cape Girardeau and 5 feet between Cape Girardeau and New Orleans. The Jadwin plan does not specify the freeboard, but provides for raising the levees slightly above the grade of the maximum predicted flood.

Third. It provides for a spillway at Caernarvon for the protection of the city of New Orleans, in addition to the Bonnet Carre spillway. In doing this the Mississippi River Commission follows the recommendations of the spillway board appointed pursuant to an act of Congress.

Fourth. It provides for the additional protection of Cairo by raising the levees to 70.4 feet, instead of the use of the Birds Point-New Madrid river-bank flood way, and suggests further study for raising a part of the city of Cairo.

Fifth. It provides for a diversion of 600,000 cubic feet per second through the Boeuf Basin flood way instead of 900,000 cubic feet per second, as provided by the Jadwin plan, and in doing so it adopted the recommendations of the diversion board appointed to study this particular problem.

Sixth. It provides for a diversion of 950,000 cubic feet per second through the Atchafalaya Basin flood way instead of 1,500,000 cubic feet per second as provided by the Jadwin plan, and in doing so it adopted the recommendations of the spillway board appointed pursuant to an act of Congress.

Seventh. It provides for the further study as to the possibility of reservoirs being substituted in the plan and for a study of other diversions.

It recommends the present adoption of an interim plan costing $407,500,000 as a part of a comprehensive plan costing $775,000,000.

The difference in the costs of the plans is due to the fact that the Jadwin plan does not include in its figures the costs of rights of way, flowage rights, and damages, while the Mississippi River Commission plan figures in the costs of these items, and in addition provides for a greater factor of safety, as well as including the tributaries within its jurisdiction.

The Mississippi River Commission plan recommends that local interests be required to pay one-third of the costs to bring the present levees up to 1914 grade, estimated to amount to $15,440,367 for all levees under its jurisdiction.

The difference between the comprehensive plan and the interim plan of the Mississippi River Commission is that the interim plan only provided for a flood protection equivalent to that of the 1927 flood, with 1 foot freeboard, and leaves out the Caernarvon spillway and reduces the amount for stabilization, revetments, and levee building.

2. MISSISSIPPI RIVER COMMISSION PLAN VERSUS JADWIN PLAN

Broadly speaking, there is much that is in common in the plans for flood control submitted by the Mississippi River Commission and by the Chief of Engineers, respectively. Both plans provide for increases in levee grades and levee cross section; both plans include the spillway feature; and both plans provide for diversion channels to carry off water in excess of the quantity that is deemed advisable to confine between the levees on the main river.

But it is to the degree in which these different methods of flood control are respectively used, and to the difference in the margin of safety provided, and to the introduction of a new untried device, known as a "fuse-plug levee," that differences in engineering opinion have arisen as to the relative merits of what is known as the commission plan and what is known as the Jadwin plan.

There was also a pronounced difference of public opinion on that phase of the subject dealing with "local contributions," as set forth in the respective reports, but this seems to have dissipated, and those who now hold for local contributions do so, not because they think it is just and equitable, but do so rather for the restraining effect such procedure may have on possible future demands that may be made on our Government for other projects perhaps not as meritorious.

Beginning at the upper limits of what was the original jurisdiction of the Mississippi River Commission from Cape Girardeau to Cairo, there is no difference between the commission plan and the Jadwin plan as to the method of improvement proposed, both plans providing for an increase in height and cross section of the existing levees, except that the amount of increase in grade is dependent upon the acceptance or rejection of the proposed method of reducing the flood height at Cairo by means of the Bird Point to New Madrid River bank flood way.

The situation at Cairo is a perplexing one. The present grade of the Cairo levee is 60 feet on the gauge. The 1927 high water reached an elevation of 56.3. Had there been no crevasses the gauge would have read 58.5. It is estimated by the Mississippi River Commission that a probable maximum for a theoretical future flood would be 65.4, and by the United States Weather Bureau as 66 on the Cairo gauge. The Mississippi River Commission recommends raising the levees to a grade of 70.4, with a desire for further study into the practicability of raising a portion of the city of Cairo. This proposed additional height of 10.4 feet to the present levee grade, even though it includes a freeboard margin of 5 feet, is considered by the Chief of Engineers as unthinkable, and he plans to lower the ultimate flood line by setting the levee back about 5 miles on the Missouri side of the river, counting on a reduction of 6 feet in flood height by so doing. Colonel Potter, president of the Mississippi River Commission, expressed the opinion that the proposed 5-mile setback is not feasible from an engineering standpoint to accomplish the purpose desired (p. 2116). There is grave doubt in the minds of some engineers familiar with the situation that the anticipated reduction of 6 feet in flood height will materialize. This opinion is based on the observation of the conditions that obtained during the 1912 and 1913 high waters, which apparently demonstrated that a flood way through the same territory 15 miles wide or three times wider than the proposed one, and operating as a result of 11 crevasses near Bird Point, reduced the flood height at Cairo only 3.2 feet. (Berthe's testimony, p. 4200.)

The gravity of the situation at Cairo is emphasized in that General Jadwin accepts 66 feet as the maximum probable high-water reading for that point (par. 100), states that "the city should not be subjected to the jeopardy of levees higher than they now are" (par. 124), which is elevation 60 on the gauge (par. 124), and in his design for the protection of the city he assumes a reduction of 6 feet in the height of the flood, thus making the future maximum high-water elevation flush with the top of the levee.

There is also the objection raised to this proposed riverside flood way in the Jadwin plan in that it will result in creating an undue increase in flood heights in the vicinity of New Madrid where the diverted water will return to the river and at which point the river must build up a "head" sufficient to compensate for the flattened slope resulting from a lowering of the height at Cairo, in order to pass the same discharge as previously passed.

The supplemental feature recommended in the Jadwin plan of removing a part of the dike on Tiptonville Ridge to facilitate the discharge at the point of construction is looked upon with distrust by many engineers and considered as an invitation to a cut-off with its attendant disturbance of the river regimen for miles above and below, something which the Mississippi River Commission has been desirous of preventing by the construction in the past of expensive bank revetment at this locality. The Mississippi River Commission states its position clearly in paragraph 344 of its report:

> The commission adheres to its policy of preserving the river generally in its present form and can not subscribe to a plan of flood control or of improvement for navigation that involves the formation of cut-offs. Rather, the commission believes that its first duty to navigation and to flood control is to prevent cut-offs.

The preponderance of engineering opinion familiar with Mississippi River hydraulics is in agreement with the commission on this point.

The next point of contention between the Jadwin plan and the Mississippi River Commission plan is at the vicinity of the mouth of the Arkansas, where both plans recognize that the capacity of the main river below the mouth of the Arkansas is insufficient to carry the river discharge between levees except at unjustified expense. The Mississippi River Commission plan contemplates the withdrawal of 600,000 cubic feet per second and diverting this amount at Cypress Creek through a controlled intake and conducting it between continuous levees located in Boeuf Basin to the lower end of the Tensas Basin.

The Jadwin plan proposes the withdrawal of 900,000 cubic feet per second at the same place, makes the flood way considerably wider by permitting its width to be determined by the location of existing ridges that run parallel with the general direction of the flood way, rather than as determined by engineering calculation, thereby involving greater rights-of-way damages, but having the compensating advantage of reducing the expenditures for levee raising on the main river. The question resolves itself into a determination as to what is the proper balance to be maintained between flood-way capacity behind the levee and expenditures for levee raising on the main river. Manifestly, if sufficient water is taken down the flood way there will be no necessity for raising the levees at all on the main river from the mouth of the Arkansas going downstream for a long distance.

It is urged by the interested property owners affected by the proposed flood way that the Mississippi River Commission plan of diverting 600,000 cubic feet per second is the plan that recognizes the limitation of using the Boeuf diversion to its capacity, consistent with some regard for property rights. Testimony has been offered (Schoenberger, Senate Hearings, p. 243) to the effect that the crevasse discharge entering this basin in 1927 was practically 650,000 cubic feet per second, and flooded this basin as well as the Tensas Basin to an average depth of 12 feet, and, to increase this quantity to 900,000 cubic feet per second, as proposed in the Jadwin plan, is practically to condemn the greater part of that basin for flood purposes. The alluvial basin extending from the Arkansas on the north to Red River on the south, in which this flood way is to be located, comprises 3,517,626 acres, of which 2,525,000 acres will be dedicated for flooding purposes, 1,440,000 acres being within the flood way itself as designed in the Jadwin plan.

A comparison of the respective plans shows that there are 625,000 acres of land dedicated to flooding by the Jadwin plan in excess of the similarly flooded land by the Mississippi River Commission plan. Two hundred and eighty-five thousand acres of this land are not now affected by backwater and can be protected by an auxiliary levee, as provided for in the plan of the Mississippi River Commission.

It is pointed out that this auxiliary levee is essential and necessary, since the situation is no longer one of backwater reaching an elevation that is controlled by the river elevation at the entrance or lower end of the levee system at Point Breeze.

With the Boeuf Basin flood way in operation, there will be water entering this part of the basin at a much higher elevation than that which will prevail at Point Breeze. This fact seems to have been recognized and provided for in the Mississippi River Commission plan, but overlooked or ignored in the Jadwin plan.

As a general proposition, the flood-control problem becomes more complicated as we progress downstream, by reason of the decreasing discharge capacity of the lower part of the river, the additional flood contribution from tributaries, and the wider extent of the valley subject to inundation with increasing population and increasing values. At the mouth of Red River, which is the southernmost or last tributary entering the Mississippi River, nature has provided a diversion channel of its own, the Atchafalaya River being capacious enough to take not only what the Red River contributes at its maximum discharge but as much more again than is taken from Mississippi in flood times.

The distinctive feature of this particular diversion channel is that it delivers its flow directly into the Gulf or without any part being returned to the main river farther down.

The obvious and logical conclusion arrived at in dealing with the problem of handling excessive flood volumes at this locality during superfloods is to utilize the Atchafalaya outlet, increased to the fullest or maximum extent consistent with minimizing damages to the area through which it flows.

Here again the difference in opinion or judgment as to how much water should be abstracted from the main river manifests itself in the respective plans submitted by the Mississippi River Commission and by General Jadwin.

The Mississippi River Commission plan provides for a spillway capacity or diversion through the Atchafalaya of 950,000 cubic feet per second while the Jadwin plan provides for a diversion of 1,500,000 cubic feet per second.

There is also a difference of opinion indicated as to the total volume to be handled at the latitude of Red River Landing. The Mississippi River Commission plan allows more liberally for reservoir capacity of the main river and for storage in the backwater area at the lower end of the Tensas district and arrives at a total of 2,650,000 cubic feet per second; the Jadwin plan is based on an assumed discharge of 3,000,000 cubic feet per second.

While the quantitative consideration of the future theoretical flood is less in the plan of the Mississippi River Commission, the difference is not as great as indicated by these figures for the reason that the levee grade prescribed by the Mississippi River Commission is 5 feet above the theoretical high water, or at elevation 65 on the gauge, while the levee grade in the Jadwin plan is to be 3 feet higher than the present grade at Red River Landing, or Angola, and equivalent to 60.5 on the gauge.

Manifestly a superiority of 4.5 feet in levee grade affords considerable latitude for increased discharge capacity both through the main river and through the Atchafalaya spillway.

Each additional foot of rise so contained would add to the discharge capacity past the latitude of Old River (Red River Landing) about 135,000 cubic feet per second. (Par. 78, report of the spillway board.)

The design and plan of the spillway board for the proposed spillway down the Atchafalaya Basin and located on the west side of the Atchafalaya River has been adopted and incorporated in toto in the comprehensive plan submitted by the Mississippi River Commission; while the plan proposed by General Jadwin goes much further in diverting about 55 per cent more water from the Mississippi River and making use of an additional floodway on the east side of the Atchafalaya.

The Mississippi River Commission plan, through the adoption of the study made by the spillway board, gives more regard to the safe conduct of the waters to the Gulf by reason of recognizing the limited discharge capacity of the Atchafalaya outlet at Morgan City. The Jadwin plan does not indicate how it is proposed to take care of the excess or surplus water (representing about one-third the high-water discharge at New Orleans), when it reaches Morgan City, without causing tremendous property damages to the highly developed country east and west of Morgan City. The backwater effect through openings into the floodway for drainage will be more extensive with the adoption of the Jadwin plan, there being a flooding of about 350,000 acres of land in cultivation and not subject to inundation except during years of superfloods such as 1882 and 1927. (Walter Kemper, C. E., p. 4177.)

On that part of the main river from Red River Landing to the Head of Passes the proposed treatment of the flood problem will be:

(a) To increase the cross section of the levees and to raise them corresponding to the grades adopted in the respective plans, which grades vary in elevation due to the greater or lesser quantity of water abstracted from the main river at Red River Landing, under the respective plans.

(b) To increase the discharge of the lower river and to lower the flood heights by the construction of a spillway or spillways on the east side of the river discharging into tide-level water.

The principal difference in the two plans is that the Jadwin plan provides one spillway at Bonnet Carre, 30 miles above New Orleans, which the Mississippi River Commission plan provides for the Bonnet Carre spillway and an additional one at Caernarvon, 13 miles below New Orleans. The Jadwin plan objects to the Caernarvon spillway below New Orleans for the following reason:

A spillway below the city operating to the limit of its capacity to hold the flood stage to 20 on the Carrollton gauge would create velocities 12 per cent in excess of those created by a spillway above the city operating to hold the same flood to the same stage. A spillway at Caernarvon was considered and discarded on this account. (Par. 102.)

Responsible engineering authorities in the city of New Orleans familiar with the situation and informed as to the arguments raised against the proposed supplemental spillway at Caernarvon favor its inclusion as provided for in the plan of the Mississippi River Commission. It is pointed out that the objection cited by General Jadwin does not apply if consideration is given to two spillways, one above and one below the city, but applies only in the consideration of the alternative location for one spillway.

A feature of design in the flood-control works recommended in the Jadwin plan that provoked considerable discussion was the "fuse-plug levee." This is a device proposed to serve as a weak link in the levee chain, and intended to fail at the entrance of the respective flood ways much in the manner that a crevasse occurs. It is offered as a substitute for the usual type of engineering structure that serves where a controlled intake is contemplated. The preponderance of opinion of experienced levee engineers was adverse to its use for the purpose intended and favorable to the controlled intake provided for in the Mississippi River Commission plan.

3. COMPARISON OF THE JADWIN PLAN AND THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER COMMISSION PLAN OF FLOOD WORKS ON THE MAIN RIVER

LEVEES FROM ROCK ISLAND, ILL., TO CAPE GIRARDEAU, MO. (435 MILES OF RIVER)

Jadwin plan	Mississippi River Commission plan
Not provided for.	Levees improved in section and height under the "interim plan" and the comprehensive plan at an estimated cost of $10,500,000, grade to be 4 feet above the highest water; river slope 1 on 4; land slope to contain a saturation line of 1 on 7 within a cross section of the levee.

LEVEES FROM CAPE GIRARDEAU, MO., TO THE MOUTH OF THE ARKANSAS RIVER

Jadwin plan	Mississippi River Commission plan
Jadwin plan provides for raising the levees to a grade slightly above the height of the maximum flood and referred to in the testimony as being a grade from 1 to 2 feet above the said flood. The estimated cost of this work is $53,900,000.	The Mississippi River Commission "interim plan" provides for raising and enlarging levees to a height of about 1½ feet above the 1927 confined flood and with standard cross section at a cost estimated to be $22,000,000. The comprehensive plan of the Mississippi River Commission provides for raising the levees to a grade of 5 feet above the maximum probable flood and having standard cross section, the cost of which raising and enlargement is estimated to be $110,000,000.

LEVEES FROM THE MOUTH OF THE ARKANSAS TO THE MOUTH OF THE RED RIVER

Jadwin plan	Mississippi River Commission plan
Levees raised to a grade 3 feet above present grade and equivalent to a reading of 63.5 on the Arkansas City gauge and 60.5 on the Red River Landing or Angola gauge. The estimated cost of raising and enlarging to standard section is $59,300,000.	Levees raised in accordance with the interim plan to a grade of about 1½ feet above the 1927 confined flood and equivalent to a reading of 64.5 on the Arkansas City gauge and a reading of 59.5 on the Red River Landing or Angola gauge. The estimated cost of this raising and enlarging to standard section is $47,000,000. The comprehensive plan of the Mississippi River Commission provides for a 5-foot freeboard over maximum probable flood and equivalent to a grade of 71 on the Arkansas City gauge and 65 on the Red River Landing or Angola gauge. The cost of this levee raising and enlargement to standard section is $163,000,000.

LEVEES ON MAIN BELOW THE MOUTH OF THE RED RIVER

Jadwin plan	Mississippi River Commission plan
Jadwin plan provides for levee raising to a grade 3 feet above the present grade at Angola and as far down as Bayou Sara, then gradually tapering out to no increase at Bonnet Carre. Below Bonnet Carre the levee grades remain unchanged. The cost of the above is estimated at $18,700,000.	The Mississippi River Commission in their interim plan raise the levees to a grade 2 feet above present grade at Angola, then tapering to no raise at Plaquemine, La., and increasing the levee section to the required standard. Below Plaquemine, La., the levee grade remains unchanged. The estimated cost of the levee raising and enlargement is $15,000,000.

The comprehensive plan of the Mississippi River Commission provides for a 5-foot freeboard above the maximum probable flood at all points, with spillways in operation. The levee raising and enlargement under this plan is estimated to cost $53,500,000.

BONNET CARRE SPILLWAY

Jadwin plan

The Jadwin plan provides for a spillway to cost $8,200,000, providing for no costs of rights of way or damages.

Mississippi River Commission plan

The Mississippi River Commission provides for a spillway in both the interim plan and the comprehensive plan estimated to cost $8,200,000 and in addition makes provision for payment of rights of way and damages, estimated at $3,300,000, or a total of $11,500,000.

CAERNARVON SPILLWAY

Jadwin plan

There is no provision in the Jadwin plan for a spillway at this locality.

Mississippi River Commission plan

The Mississippi River Commission provides in its comprehensive plan only for the construction of a spillway similar to the one at Bonnet Carre to cost $10,000,000, including rights of way and damages.

BIRDS POINT-NEW MADRID, MISSOURI FLOOD WAY

Jadwin plan

Main levee setback on Missouri side average distance of 5 miles from Birds Point to New Madrid, a distance of 57 miles by levee and 72 miles by river.

Grade of setback levees 60 feet on Cairo gauge.

Present grade levees on Mississippi River 50 feet on Cairo gauge.

Fuse-plug section 10 miles long at Birds Point to allow inflow of water.

Fuse-plug section 10 miles long at low end of flood way just above New Madrid, which will have to crevasse to permit flow back into river.

Both fuse-plug sections formed by cutting down present river bank levees 3 feet.

River bank levees left as is, except those cut down for fuse plugs, their grade being 58 feet on Cairo gauge.

Crevassing of lower fuse plug may suddenly increase volume of flow in the Mississippi River to such an extent as to cause disaster to New Madrid.

Area in flood way 144,000 acres, 60 per cent of which is improved and cultivated.

Cost of flood way, including right of way, drainage, and damage $26,598,480.

Concrete spillways for fuse-plug sections will cost $16,000,000.

No freeboard provided in event of maximum flood.

General Jadwin claims flood way will lower gauge heights at Cairo 6 feet during maximum flood.

Grade of controlling levees at Cairo, 60 feet on Cairo gauge.

Mississippi River Commission plan

Does not provide for flood way, stating to such flood ways investigated and discarded for reason results not reliable or definite and cost prohibitive. Provides protection by levees enlarged and raised to a grade equivalent to 70.04 feet on the Cairo gauge.

No diversion channel from Cape Girardeau or vicinity to any other point on the Mississippi River at or above the Arkansas River seems at present feasible, as equal or greater protection can be secured by levees at decidedly less cost.

Increases river-bank levees to a height of 70.4 feet on Cairo gauge, this being the most feasible plan to protect this area.

Five-foot freeboard provided in event of maximum flood.

Colonel Potter stated proposed flood way not feasible, either from an engineering or financial standpoint; commission does not agree that flood way will lower flood height 6 feet at Cairo.

Grade of controlling levees, 70.4 feet on Cairo gauge.

Freeboard provided, none.

This section would overflow once in 10 years.

Present levees to be maintained unless too expensive.

Local interest to pay 20 per cent of cost of set-back levees, all costs of cutting down fuse-plug sections, furnish right of way, and pay all damages.

Population of flood way, 3,500.

Uses 144,000 acres of the total area of 279,000 acres in the two districts affected.

Fuse-plug device when crevassed would keep entire area flooded should flood stages repeat as in 1927.

This is the only flood way proposed which returns water to the Mississippi River and upon which any question was raised as to its effectiveness in lowering gauge heights.

Flood way proposed: General Jadwin states flood way was proposed for protection of Cairo only. Eliminating Cairo from the plan this area would be protected by levees only.

If Missouri did not contribute or acquiesce, if given the authority General Jadwin would cut the Missouri levees. This would flood St. Frances Basin down to Helena, affecting a population of at least 75,000.

Freeboard provided, 5 feet.

Colonel Potter states that with fuse-plug sections this area would overflow every four or five years.

Local interests furnish right of way for levee and pay one-third of cost of bringing levee up to 1914 grade and section.

No land flooded except that ordinarily flooded by backwater in the lower end of flood way.

Commission states that Cairo can be protected by levees, but is of the opinion that further study should be made of alternative methods.

BOEUF BASIN FLOOD WAY

Jadwin plan

Thirty-five miles fuse-plug section beginning 12 miles above Arkansas City and extending to point 23 miles below Arkansas City.

Discharge 900,000 second-feet.

Guide levees, of inferior section to those on Mississippi River.

Average width of flood way, 13 miles.

Arkansas City left in fuse-plug section, protected by ring levee.

Area in flood way, 1,440,000 acres.

Backwater area, 1,085,000 acres.

Ignores diversion board's plan and recommendations.

Cost, $7,700,000.

Includes no payment for right of way or damages.

Local people pay 20 per cent of cost and 50 per cent of cost of ring levees.

Volume of flow indefinite.

Flow through fuse-plug section caused by crevasses, thereby jeopardizing safety of guide levees of flood way by rapid rise and swift current.

Uses 2,525,000 acres of the 3,517,000 acres in the three districts affected.

Permits water to flow into backwater area without any plan to regulate or control same.

Population in flood way, including backwater area, 70,000.

Prolonged flood stages would weaken guide levees with possible disastrous results.

Mississippi River Commission plan

Four thousand feet concrete controlled spillway, 12 miles above Arkansas City.

Discharge 600,000 second-feet.

Guide levees, standard and same as on Mississippi River.

Average width flood way, 5¾ miles.

Arkansas City 12 miles below spillway, protected by commission grade levees on Mississippi River.

Area in flood way, 1,100,000 acres.

Backwater area, 800,000 acres.

Uses diversion board's plan as the best solution.

Cost, $107,000,000.

Pays for flowage rights and estimated damages.

Government pays all costs.

Volume of flow definite and controlled.

Flow through concrete spillway, volume at first being small and gradual increase allowing time for levees to season.

Uses 1,900,000 acres of the 3,517,000 acres in the three districts affected.

Limits area of backwater by interior levees, running from Mississippi levee west and north along Tensas River.

Population in flood way, including backwater area, estimated at 42,000.

Concrete controlled spillway may be shut off should guide levees weaken.

With fuse-plug device, repeating flood stages as in 1927 would keep this area continually under water.	Concrete controlled spillway could be shut off after major flood, thereby protecting area from minor flood stages.
ATCHAFALAYA FLOOD WAY
Jadwin plan	Mississippi River Commission plan
Discharge, 1,500,000 second-feet.	Discharge, 950,000 second-feet.
Fuse-plug sections on both sides of Atchafalaya River at its head.	Outlet widened by cutting down levees on west side at head to the natural surface of ground.
Width at head, approximately 16 miles. Indefinite and unreliable.	Width at head (permanent), 8 miles.
Flow through fuse-plug sections indefinite, depending upon crevasses.	Flow through cut-down sections definite, with no obstructions.
Break in fuse-plug sections may jeopardize entire flood-control works; would act same as crevasse with resultant damages.	Flow gradual and increasing slowly as flood stages increase.
Ring levees around Simsport, Melville, and Morgan City.	Protects Morgan City by levees and purchases Melville and Simsport, which are abandoned.
Ignores spillway board's plan and recommendations.	Uses spillway board's plan as the best solution.
Guide levees of inferior section.	Guide levees standard grade, same as Mississippi River levees.
Floods practically entire lower basin with backwater flowing through openings for drainage in guide levees.	Floods less area by backwater by 50 per cent. For reason fewer openings in guide levees for drainage, and levees extend nearer to Gulf.
Cost, $29,900,000; local interests furnishining all rights of way and paying all damages.	Cost, $52,500,000; Government pays all costs, including flowage rights and damages.
Population of flood way and backwater area, 40,000.	Population of flood way and backwater area, estimated, 30,000.

4. "LEVEES ONLY" POLICY OF MISSISSIPPI RIVER COMMISSION

The commission itself, a purely Federal agency, making its participation in the cost of the work dependent upon the acceptance by local districts of its arbitrary ruling, adopted and adhered to a policy of "levees only." Time and again it contended in public utterances and in the records that it was only by confining the river to its bed by a system of levees that floods could be averted and the flood waters of the Mississippi carried safely to the sea. The commission was intolerant with any other viewpoint and successfully resisted any effort to change its policy as well as discouraging any suggestion to investigate any other proposal.

In the pursuit of this policy the commission went a step further. It held to the view that in support of the "levees only" theory every outlet of the river but one should be closed, and did succeed in closing them all except the Atchafalaya Gap and the mouth of the river at the Passes.

The result of this policy is now part of the tragic history of flood control on the lower Mississippi in our own times. Five devastating epochal floods have visited the valley since the establishment of the commission. On the crest of each, millions of dollars of property have been borne to the sea. Countless thousands of patient, toiling people have been driven from their homes. Disease and sickness, the direct result at times of these floods, have taken the lives of hundreds. In 1882, 1906, 1912, 1913, 1922, and 1927 floods occurred, and upon each occasion advanced students of flood control protested in vain against adherence by the commission to this policy of "levees only," to be told by the commission, a Federal agency with practically arbitrary power, that the policy of "levees only" would be retained by the commission but that after each flood the levees would be built higher and stronger. Then came the flood of 1927 and the commission confessed its policy to have been a mistaken one and that not only did the river need levees but additional outlets as well to discharge its flood capacity.

But this confession did not come until after the 1927 flood and in mistaken and unyielding support of that policy the commission expended $170,000,000 of the local taxpayers' money as well as $71,000,000 of the Federal Government's money. It has been described as the monumental blunder of the age, as a policy stubbornly supported in the face of the most convincing opposition, a policy which led the way to tragedy and disaster over the advice of thoughtful and studious men. But it was planned and executed by the Federal Government—financed to a large extent by the localities—and the mistake of the policy was not admitted by the Federal Government until the localities had expended this huge sum, certainly enough over this long period of years at prices then obtaining to have provided flood-control works now recommended and which are believed to provide complete safety.

Thus it will be seen that a policy fixed by the Federal Government itself is largely responsible, if not entirely, for the prostration of the lower valley to-day.

But not only in this respect was the Government's policy fatal to success. There was, although not appearing to be, a divided authority in the construction of levees and a fatal weakness in restrictions placed upon the distribution of funds which left impoverished districts with weak and crevassing levees ever endangering the security of their neighbors. It is fundamental that, where the locality was required to supply the right of way for levees and to contribute one-third of the cost of their construction, local authorities would have something to say about how their funds were expended and how much of their area would be yielded up pro bono publico for the construction of levees.

A weak link anywhere destroys the strength of the chain; so it is in levee construction. It serves none but a wasteful purpose to construct 10 miles of flood-proof levees which are joined with 5 miles of weak and unstandardized ones. No agency expending local money and accepting local rights of way upon the giving of which the flood works are legally left dependent will be deaf to the pleas and intrigues of local politics, and many a levee line has been placed upon rights of way, out of local political consideration which would never have been employed had the commission exclusive jurisdiction and had the work been entirely financed by the Federal Government. Many districts were unable to meet their allotments and their levee lines under the law were left in a weakened and dangerous condition.

This situation was fully admitted by witnesses before the committee and fully commented upon by members of the Mississippi River Commission when testifying.

Thus the committee found upon its record of hearings:

First. That local communities from the date of the Louisiana Purchase until 1879 had at their own expense, not only provided all flood-control works upon the Mississippi, but had actually been meeting the National Government's obligation of maintaining and preserving the navigation of the river.

Second. That in this work these localities had expended in that period $125,000,000 from public funds and an unestimated amount from private sources.

Third. That, since the participation by the Federal Government, the localities have expended more than twice as much as the Federal Government, the amount being $170,000,000 for localities against $70,000,000 by the Federal Government.

Fourth. That, under the leadership of the Federal Government and over the advice of many others, this huge sum was expended in the mistaken policy of "levees only," a policy which led to the disaster of 1927 and practically nullified the benefits which should have been received from any such expenditure.

Fifth. That the Government's policy in making flood-protection works dependent upon local cooperation had developed a policy of divided authority resulting in no unified and complete system after the expenditure of nearly a half billion dollars.

Sixth. That the flood waters which devastate the lower valley rise in a widely spread area outside of the affected region and have little added to their volume in the lower valley, and that these localities have for years been shouldering the drainage burden of the Nation.

But if the committee found the record of the past to be amazing and unjust, the task which it was called upon to consider in future legislation was even more intolerable, if local contributions were to be maintained. For the recommendations which were now before the committee provided for a wide departure from the heretofore mistaken policy of the Mississippi River Commission. They included not only the employment of levees which were to be enlarged and strengthened, but for outlets in the form of spillways, diversions, and flood ways upon a comprehensive scale never before contemplated. These flood devices, admitted by their proponents to be in no sense local in any contemplated benefit, were in instances to be constructed in one territory for the protection of another, in one State to safeguard another, and so huge in their costs that to attempt their execution at local cost would result in the abandonment of the entire plan.

Witness after witness, including the Chief of Engineers, was questioned by the committee and invited to suggest some method of justly adopting some practical method of providing for these flood-control works at local expense, and not one could do so. Every local authority examined testified that, to make their execution dependent upon local financing, would be tantamount to forbidding their execution.

The Mississippi River Commission itself on this phase of the matter says:

While local participation in the cost of such works may be equitable, it is deemed to be impracticable as the benefits accrue to certain States at the expense of others.

It was the committee's conclusion that the control of floods on the lower Mississippi, if it is to be adequate and successful, must be a unified project for this purpose, directed under a single agency, and made dependent upon only the Federal Government for its execution.

The committee also had before it an accurate estimate of what the result would be if any flood-control plan was made dependent upon local contributions. It requested and received a financial statement from every levee board from Rock Island to the Gulf giving, not only the present depleted condition of its treasury, but likewise the prospects for future revenue in its district. Those statements are included in Chapter III of this report. They show conclusively the practical bankruptcy of these boards, the heavy obligations still outstanding, the declining value of its assessments, and that only confiscation would follow an attempt to tax them further.

5. MISSISSIPPI RIVER COMMISSION REPUDIATED BY GENERAL JADWIN

The Mississippi River Commission was not retained in the bill reported hereon as the agency in charge of flood control of the Mississippi River because the report of the Chief of Engineers of the Army, approved by the Secretary of War and transmitted to Congress by the President, repudiated it.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER COMMISSION CRITICIZED BY SUPERIOR OFFICER

(General Jadwin)

(P. 3587)

The CHAIRMAN. Don't you think it is the duty of this committee to consider the report and recommendations and considerations of the Mississippi River Commission, a duly authorized agency of the United States for the flood control of the Mississippi River, in the matter of a plan for the future flood control of the Mississippi River?

General JADWIN. I think you will have to decide that yourself. I do not think you are required to do it and it is not normal procedure, but if you want to do it and think you ought to do it, that is your duty.

The CHAIRMAN. You said this report came in by the back door.

General JADWIN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What do you mean by that?

General JADWIN. I meant I did not forward it up.

The CHAIRMAN. Why didn't you?

General JADWIN. Because there were so many things about it that I did not think were sound, it was better, I thought, not to send it up.

The CHAIRMAN. And you took it upon yourself to say that that report was not worthy of the consideration of Congress and you were going to stop it?

General JADWIN. That report I had called in from those people who were working for me, and I made my recommendations as I thought they should be.

(P. 4379)

General JADWIN. The present commission organization showed its defects in the preparation of the flood-control plans just completed. The Chief of Engineers had to prod the Mississippi River Commission to get a definite and constructive recommendation from them. And when their plan came, it was full of holes. The Chief of Engineers had no authority to make the commission correct glaring defects. In their first report they made no recommendation at all, but were led into a recommendation finally after being reminded that they had had 48 years in which to meet the study and that a report which recommended only further study would not meet their obligation.

VIEWS OF GOVERNORS ON LOCAL CONTRIBUTIONS AND JADWIN PLAN

On December 10, 1927, as the chairman of the committee, I addressed a letter to the governors of the States in the Mississippi Valley calling their attention to certain paragraphs in General Jadwin's report, and requesting them to advise the committee if the plan was satisfactory to their States, and if not, why not.

The following comments on the paragraphs of the Jadwin report as indicated are taken from briefs submitted by the governors of the several States in reply to this letter:

President's message transmitting the Jadwin report, paragraph 3.

The total cost of the recommended project is $296,400,000, distributed over a period of 10 years. This large sum is manifestly justified by the necessities of the situation and the benefits that will result. In determining the distribution of the costs, there must be considered not only the people of the valley itself, who receive the major portion of the benefits, but also the great mass of taxpayers who suffer less directly from Mississippi River floods and upon whom most of the burden of Federal taxation falls. It is axiomatic that States and other local authorities should supply all land and assume all pecuniary responsibility for damages that may result from the execution of the project. It would be revolutionary for the Federal Government to establish the precedent of buying part of the land upon which to build protective works to increase the value of the remainder. Similarly it would be very unwise for the United States in generously helping a section of the country to render itself liable for consequential damages. The Federal Treasury should bear the portion of the cost of engineering structures for flood control that is justified by the national aspects of the problem and the national benefits. It may even bear 80 per cent of such costs, but substantial local cooperation is essential to avoid waste. The portion this would leave to be borne locally for flood-control structures represents an expenditure of about $3, or 30 cents per year for 10 years, for each acre in the alluvial valley to be protected every year from Mississippi River floods. The value per acre, including railroads, towns, cities, and other improvements, is estimated at something over $200. It would seem that the States should share with the Federal Government the burden of assisting the levee districts and individual property owners, especially in view of the fact that the States benefit directly by the increased taxes from land made more valuable by reason of its protection.

Brief submitted by Governor Martineau, of Arkansas:

In our humble opinion we differ from the message of the President in the following:

First. In the opening sentence, "The total cost of the recommended project is $296,400,000." The figures $296,400,000 do not by any means represent the total cost of the recommended project that ultimately will have to be expended. In addition to the 20 per cent local contribution recommended, which above figures do include, the local communities or States will have to provide, at their expense, the following items, which should be added to the $296,400,000 to finally reach the total cost:

A. Rights of way for all levee structures.

B. Rights of way for all spillways and flood ways and drainage systems that might be found necessary.

C. Maintenance of levee at the head of flood ways deemed necessary in the opinion of the Chief of Engineers.

D. Guarantee of Government immunity from all damages.

E. To maintain all flood-control works after their completion (except controlling and regulating spillway structures).

The Jadwin report takes the position that the lands within the spillway area are not damaged and should be paid no damage. This, we consider, is the major economic mistake of the Jadwin plan, as unquestionably the owners of the lands will have to be paid for damages or flowage rights. This cost, we take it, would have to be borne by the States or local communities, by virtue of the damage-immunity guaranty and the rights of way proviso.

F. The assumption of the damage claims arising from the disrupted drainage system, the railroads, highways, etc.

The various expenses mentioned in connection with A, B, C, D, E, and F are not considered in the figures of $296,400,000, but will have to be anticipated before the project is completed. Therefore, we contend that the sum mentioned does not represent the total cost by any means. We would heartily concur in the next sentence, "This large sum is manifestly justified by the necessities of the situation and the benefits that will result" if the word "protection" were used in connection with "benefits." The sentence would then read as follows: "This large sum is manifestly justified by the necessities of the situation and the protection and benefits that will result."

The balance of the paragraph, "In determining the distribution of costs," etc., we differ with in the following respects:

We will first attempt to analyze the condition.

We feel that entirely too much stress has been placed upon the "benefit" feature and not enough emphasis upon the "protection" feature; in fact, it seems that protection of the valley has been lost sight of and that "flood control" has been treated in the nature of a special improvement project with necessarily accruing benefits to the local communities.

This is, however, not the case. Flood protection, not levee benefits, is the paramount issue.

We feel that, as the flood waters originate in and descend from such a wide area of the United States, the damage wrought is national in its scope and its resultant cost should be borne by the Government.

The Jadwin plan consists, in part, of strengthening existing levees and moving back in the "bottle necks." Some local benefits unquestionably could be established by this procedure, but by far the major portion of the Jadwin plan depends upon spillway relief. The spillway feature, however, involves an entirely different principle, inasmuch as the spillway feature can be established as a decided detriment and menace to the contiguous territory, not aiding its own particular section, but threatening it with destruction in order to benefit some other community. Surely the lower valley should not be requested to pay a portion of its own funeral in order that other sections may survive.

Furthermore, the lower valley has reached the point of financial collapse, due to overtaxation for special improvements, and trying to protect itself against the flood waters of 41 per cent of continental United States.

The figures used, of a total acreage cost of $3 for every alluvial acre at the ratio of 30 cents per year for 10 years, actually mean of the approximate total alluvial acreage of 30,000 square miles, or approximately 20,000,000 acres, there would be 8,000,000 acres included in the backwater and spillway area, which would leave only 12,000,000 acres to carry the entire burden of local contributions, which it has not the earning power to do. Considering the ratio in cultivation of this 12,000,000 acres, or 40 per cent, it would give only an approximate 4,800,000 acres, in the last analysis, to bear the burden, which would be excessive and impossible.

Brief submitted by Governor Sampson, of Kentucky:

The approval of the report of General Jadwin raises the issue as to whether flood control of the Mississippi River shall be under the supervision of, and financed by, the Federal Government, or whether it shall continue to be partially controlled and financed by the local levee districts and State governments involved, with Federal aid. The latter plan has been in effect since 1879. Crevasses at a dozen or more points, causing the destruction of thousands of acres of land and the loss of lives, homes, and towns have resulted during each successive flood. There is but one responsible agency which can formulate, erect, and maintain a protective system which will prevent or minimize similar disasters in the future, and that is the Government of the United States.

The suggestion that local assessments should continue to be made against the protected acres in the alluvial valley means that the owners of these acres will continue to be governed by their conflicting personal interests, with the result that the levees along some stretches of the river would be effective, along others weak, and that the whole plan will continue to be a failure for the protection of the valley.

"The cost of the recommended project is $296,400,000." It is apparent from the evidence published in the hearings before the Committee on Flood Control of the present House of Representatives that the cost of (1) rights of way for levee structure, (2) for spillways, (3) flood ways, (4) drainage systems, (5) guaranty of Government immunity from all damages, (6) maintenance of levees at the head of flood works, and (7) of all flood-control works after their completion, except controlling and regulating spillway structures, will mean at least an additional 30 per cent local contribution. The evidence has shown conclusively that many levee districts are now unable, as the result of the damage wrought by the 1927 and preceding floods, to make any further contribution at all, and we respectfully submit that the adoption of section 1 will be the equivalent to a statement that no adequate flood-control program is to result from these deliberations.

Jadwin report, paragraph 2:

2. The plan is a comprehensive one, providing for the maximum flood predicted as possible, and for future expansion to meet changing conditions. It includes a spillway above New Orleans, diversion flood ways in the Atchafalaya and Tensas Basins, a river bank flood way from Cairo, Ill., to New Madrid, Mo., together with strengthening and a moderate raising of existing levees. It is designed to prevent any material increase in flood stages. Channel stabilization and navigation improvement are included. Exclusive of rights of way, incidental drainage works, and damages, if any, recommended to be borne by local authorities, the estimated cost of flood-control works is $185,400,000, and of channel stabilization and mapping, $111,000,000; a total of $296,400,000. The distribution of cost must be determined by law. The suggestion is made that a distribution by which the cost of flood-control works in general is borne 80 per cent by the Federal Government and 20 per cent by the valley States, and the entire cost of channel stabilization is borne by the United States, would accord with the fiscal policy of the President and the precedents established by Congress.

The reorganization of the Mississippi River Commission, Federal control over structures within natural flood ways, and the comprehensive mapping of the alluvial valley are also recommended. Flood control of tributaries will be reported upon after the completion of surveys already authorized by Congress.

Brief submitted by Governor Sampson, of Kentucky:

The evidence before the Flood Control Committee clearly indicates that the plan is incomplete, impracticable, and will result in a continuation of the same lack of systematic flood control which has been the chief cause of the 1927 and previous disasters. The failure of this plan, if adopted, is predicted because it will be impossible for many of the districts involved to bear their share of the cost, and failure to construct the system at any considerable number of points would mean the failure of the whole plan, even were it otherwise unobjectionable. A chain can be no stronger than its weakest link.

Jadwin report, paragraph 25:

25. Economic necessity and local cooperation: As directed by the law relating to reports by the department, I submit a statement as to the general and local benefits of the plan and the local cooperation that should be required on account of local benefits. The question must be viewed from the standpoint not only of those in the valley needing flood protection but also of the taxpayers in other parts of the country, including the regions from which the flood waters come, who suffer indirectly from flood disasters, and on whom the bulk of the burden of Federal expenditure must fall.

Brief submitted by Governor Simpson, of Louisiana:

This makes clear some of the considerations which prompt the advocacy for local contributions, namely, the indirect taxation of those sections of the country not directly affected by the flood problem. Were these considerations weighed on the scales of justice?

If weighed upon the scales of justice, then where shall the line be drawn? If it be unjust that the extreme Eastern States and the extreme Western States shall indirectly bear a share of the expense of flood control, then it is injustice to the nth power that the State of Louisiana should be even indirectly taxed, to say nothing of the effect of superimposed taxation which is the result of local tribute. The extreme East and the extreme West are neither the ones causing the damage nor the damaged. But can the same be said of many of the States which go to constitute the drainage basin spreading out to the north of Louisiana and whose excess drainage overflows converge in this State to the constant peril of lives and property? Louisiana is the major damaged party. Does justice countenance that the damaged party shall pay further tribute as hostage against sustaining further damages?

Jadwin report, paragraph 26:

26. Several estimates of different well-protected parts of the Delta Valley result in an average price per acre of $224 when towns and all property, such as houses, roads, railroads, land, etc., are included. The total area of the valley originally subject to overflow is 29,790 square miles, or 19,065,600 acres, 12,000,000 acres of which is usable. This 12,000,000 acres at $224 per acre is worth about $2,688,000,000. Adding the probable value of New Orleans would bring this sum up to about $3,500,000,000. Movable property added would make it something like $5,000,000,000.

Brief submitted by Governor Martineau, of Arkansas:

General Jadwin attempts in this paragraph to establish a land valuation of $224 per acre for the 12,000,000 acres of usable land of the total 20,000,000 acres comprising the alluvial valley. To arrive at this figure he evidently added to the true valuation of these lands the true valuation of all personal property, cities, and towns, as well as all utilities and other improvements.

While the figures quoted may possibly reflect the combined total true valuation of the entire alluvial section of 20,000,000 acres, it must be borne in mind that these figures also evidently include all city and town personal property and utitlities, and it would not be fair to the lands of this section to shoulder the combined total true value upon them. It is a well-known fact that these lands possess a true valuation of approximately $50 per acre, can be bought for same, that they produce a return that substantiates this figure and not a true valuation of $224 per acre.

Unfortunately for this section, virtually all levee construction heretofore has been financed upon a direct land taxation, based upon the theory of resulting direct benefits derived by the lands from such levee construction. Personal property, while unquestionably benefited, has not shared in this construction cost; necessarily the very much overburdened lands had to shoulder all of the costs. (Whatever plan is finally evolved, this past mistake should be rectified so that personal property may bear its proper ratio of costs.)

Brief submitted by Governor Sampson, of Kentucky:

Even if true, the facts stated are not relevant. Local levee taxes have been levied on acreage, and personal property has never borne any ratio in flood control. The evidence before the committee has shown that 12,000,000 usable acres of land have an average assessed value of approximately $50 per acre, and it is against this land that the local charges for flood control, according to Jadwin's plan, would be assessed. And when it is considered that less than half of this is in cultivation, it is evident that it would be impossible for it to bear the burdens in addition to those now carried, which would be excessive and confiscatory.

Brief submitted by Governor Simpson, of Louisiana:

Here is an acreage appraisement averaged by dividing the total values by the total acreage. This is very much like going into a jewelry factory, obtaining the value of all the jewelry, of rough gold, of machinery, of buildings, etc., and estimating the value of the whole plant and saying the property is worth so much per ton. (See attached chart indicated for paragraph 26.)

Further: Exclusion should be made of the appraised value of the aggregate personal and movable property, the reason being that local contributions would, if levied, have to depend upon the issuance of local bonds. Such bonds could not be made to rest upon movable property. Calculations should be confined to the realty figures.

Jadwin report, paragraph 27:

27. The values and population behind the levees are increasing all the time. It has been estimated that damages from the 1927 flood were over $200,000,000.

Brief submitted by Governor Martineau, of Arkansas:

We coincide with General Jadwin here, but believe his damage figure of $200,000,000 entirely too small. Our figures as to damages for Arkansas were submitted to you in a questionnaire report.

Brief submitted by Governor Simpson, of Louisiana:

There have been increases in some localiites, and also substantial decreases in other localities. More recent estimates of the flood damages, as above stated, exceed $400,000,000.

Jadwin report, paragraph 28:

28. The plan for river control contemplates spending about $300,000,000, or about one-sixteenth of the value estimated above. On the basis of 12,000,000 acres of usable land, this is an average expenditure of about $25 per acre, but it must be remembered that this includes protection to cities, towns, etc.

Brief submitted by Governor Martineau, of Arkansas:

We concur with General Jadwin that the lands, cities, and towns represent a valuation and importance justifying the costs, although we do believe his allocation of such costs should not revert back exclusively to an acre basis, and not include personal property, if, in the last analysis, the localities and the States have to partially contribute to any cost of this plan.

Brief submitted by Governor Simpson, of Louisiana:

The property and the areas affected should not be interpreted in terms of acres. The protection of land, merely as such, is not sought. In the main, we seek flood control for the protection of lives and of homes; for safe conduct in the pursuit of livelihood; for the promotion of sanitation and health; for the protection of transportation and all means of communication—all those things which are in the desire of man but which require industry and perseverance, labor, and capital. It is well known that the area has several millions of acres, many millions more than there is any immediate need for. Surely we should not regard the problem in terms of acres. We outline the benefits of protection as interpreted in "the necessities of the situation," as safeguarding the conduct and development of interstate commerce, the promotion of navigation, the preservation of national welfare, the mobility of facilities in the national defense, and the safety of the United States mails.

Jadwin report, paragraph 29:

29. The cost of the project is unquestionably justified. It will prevent a repetition of the widespread disaster, human suffering, dislocation of the economic life of the valley, interruption of interstate commerce, and the effect on the general welfare of the Nation that attended the recent flood. The expenditure would be justified even though such a flood occurs but once in 150 years. It will prevent the less extensive flood disasters that are likely to occur at much more frequent intervals. The protection afforded to the cities back of the levees in the valley against a flood even greatly exceeding that just past is especially justifiable from a humanitarian standpoint, since an unexpected break in the levees at these places would probably result in serious loss of life and might be an unparalleled catastrophe.

Brief submitted by Governor Martineau, of Arkansas:

We heartily concur with this paragraph in its entirety.

Brief submitted by Governor Sampson, of Kentucky:

While heartily indorsing this paragraph, we would suggest that the first sentence should read:

"The cost of a comprehensive Federal plan of flood control is unquestionably justified."

Supporting this suggestion we desire to submit that exclusive jurisdiction is in the Federal Government.

In the pre-Revolutionary days the exclusive control of all navigable waters within the 13 Colonies was in the Crown. With the termination of the war this exclusive control was vested in the Colonies as affecting the streams within their borders. These 13 Colonies were sovereign domains—separate and apart each from the other. In the very nature of things, commercial war between these sovereigns ensued. Each State sought to gain advantage over its neighbor and things looked dark for the future of these sovereigns.

Relative to their navigable streams, it is apparent that many questions would arise concerning which their interests would differ. The stream might be the boundary line; it might rise in one State, traverse another, and empty into the sea in the third. Much bitterness was engendered in the effort to control commerce.

So it has been authoritatively stated that the conditions affecting the commerce of the country was the main contributing factor to the agreement between the States to form a cohesive government, culminating in the Constitutional Convention and this Federal Government of to-day.

We must never forget that our Federal Government is one of delegated power. Prior to the adoption of our Constitution, the respective States controlled the commerce and the waterways within their borders. In forming this new partnership of States and the creation of the Federal Government, they specifically agreed that the Federal Congress should have the power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations, among the several States, and with the Indian tribes."

We respectfully submit that the Federal Government at no time has ever relinquished its exclusive control of the navigable waterways of our country. Its exclusive jurisdiction has been construed to be such as permits its control upon the headwater streams which find their way to navigable waterways.

A State, nor any subdivision thereof, may not build a bridge within its own confines over a navigable stream unless and until it bespeaks permission of the Federal Government. A State, subdivision thereof, or individuals, may not deal to the point of interfering with commerce, with these navigable streams unless and until the Government to whom they have delegated this exclusive jurisdiction permits. So, if we are correct in the premise (and undoubtedly we are) that the control of commerce was the chief motivating factor in the union of the States, we would suggest that the main method of transportation, excepting a few stage coaches, was by way of water. Thus we have a condition in which the States surrendered and delegated to the Federal Government exclusive control of commerce between the States; and under that contract the Federal Government has jealously claimed exclusive power over these streams throughout the years and there is no way, except by constitutional amendment, whereby this power can be surrendered, even in part, to the respective States.

Referring specifically to the Kentucky situation, to state clearly the helplessness of our State to prevent the flood conditions which there obtain, I would recall your attention to the early remarks in this brief. In the early days, before our sister State, Missouri, with Federal aid, acting on plans of Federal engineers, took action in the matter, the flood waters of the Mississippi overspread the lowlands in Missouri, and our little river cities were safe in their higher elevations from any flood water that had visited that section. Then, Missouri, with Federal aid, under Federal law, endeavored to protect her lands from this overflow. Kentucky was without power to prevent its sister State from protecting its domain and was without power to prevent the course of the Father of Waters being changed. The control of the Mississippi River was in the hands of the Federal Government, and Kentucky must stand and receive the changed course of this mighty stream to its damage and detriment over many, many years. We respectfully submit that this changed condition, brought about in no part by our State, should not occasion a burden to our people, because of our constitutional weakness in this respect.

Brief submitted by Governor Simpson, of Louisiana:

"The cost of the project is unquestionably justified," but we conceive that the "necessities of the situation" justify a more extensive project and a more comprehensive plan even if at a greater cost.

"It will prevent a repetition of widespread disaster." Under the application of the rule of probabilities, no certainty prevails in the plan that would positively prevent a repetition of widespread disaster. The feeling would be one of hope but not necessarily of certainty, and it will take considerable time to restore confidence so essential to the sense of security. The execution of any plan would take years to complete. The time factor is inherent. This observation has a direct bearing on the capacity to pay of numerous levee districts. More bonds could not be sold until after the restoration of confidence and the reestablishment of a full sense of security. This is of the utmost importance, because it directly affects the weak links in the general chain.

The third sentence, "The expenditure would be justified even though such a flood occurs but once in 150 years." This sentence is not only admitted but contended without qualification. Concerning the last sentence of paragraph 29, exception is taken to the phrase "the protection afforded." We would change as follows: Substitute for the word "the" the word "full" and strike out the word "afforded." The first three words of the sentence would then read "full protection to." As the sentence would then read, it would express our sentiments exactly.

Jadwin report, paragraph 30:

30. The estimated cost of $296,400,000 for the construction of flood-control and navigation works does not include the costs of rights of way for flood-control works, the cost of any drainage works required therewith, nor the cost of any flowage rights that may be required, nor damages, if any, resulting from the execution of the plan. No questions of rights of way or damage arise in connection with the navigation works. Local interests should in the future as in the past provide all rights of way for flood-control structures. They best can obtain the land at a fair value, and vexing questions as to Federal ownership, administration, or police of the narrow strips of land will be eliminated. Their land is enhanced in value by the works. Tax collections show that the land in the upper Yazoo Basin has ten times the value that it had before it was leveed. The United States ought not to buy a part of the land to enhance the value of the rest.

Brief submitted by Governor Martineau, of Arkansas:

General Jadwin makes it clear in this paragraph that the cost of providing rights of way, flowage rights, or drainage necessary for the proposed flood-control works, or any ensuing damages, which would also include damage to highways, railroads, etc., should be borne by the localities or States on the theory that the lands are enhanced in value by the improvement.

General Jadwin so disposes of this major feature. This, however, is the crux of the whole situation. It is unthinkable that the people owning this vast area of land, approximately 2,000,000 acres of spillway, exclusive of Bonnet Carre and Cape Girardeau area, should have their lands converted at times into a raging river, carrying a volume of water approximately three or four times as great as the St. Lawrence River (and, who knows, might be much greater with the uncontrolled fuse-plug inlet) rushing over their homes and fields. There is but one just and honorable way to handle this situation; that is, to pay these people for their lands, or acquire the flowage rights, and pay for the resulting damage to drainage system, highways, railroads, etc. This would reach such a prohibitive figure that the Government alone could bear the cost.

As to the lands being enhanced in value thereby, the contention is without merit. Other lands will be rendered more safe, but it will not be these or any contiguous lands; it will be the lands farther removed (in most cases, land situated in other States). In fact, it is a national benefit (the spillway remedy virtually being the key to the Jadwin plan), is solving the question of flood levels of the parent stream, and therefore ceases to be of local nature.

Brief submitted by Governor Simpson, of Louisiana:

The first two sentences of this paragraph indicate a given estimate of known figures for some of the work contemplated but only constitutes a part of the whole. That part of the plan which is concerned with drainage works, flowage rights, cost of damages in the process of executing the general project, and the costs of rights of way, indicates cost items, estimates of which should be given and their aggregate should be added to the figure of $296,400,000 in order that there may be included a gross estimate of the entire project contemplated. It would then be more clearly shown that the Jadwin plan proposes to charge the local communities with heavy costs which, when added, would show a considerable disparity between the actual and apparent division of costs, more nearly reaching a division 50–50 instead of 80–20.

We can not agree with the third sentence of paragraph 30, which begins with the phrase "local interest should, etc.," on the following grounds:

1. We have declared against the principle of local contribution.

2. To give land to the National Government would be in effect a form of local contribution.

3. It may be found necessary to construct works in one State for the protection of another (in whole or in part).

4. What State would be willing to yield territory for the protection of another without acceptable compensation?

The contention involved in the phrase "should in the future as in the past" is attacked for the following reasons:

1. Submission to hardships in the past is no justification for a continuance of the practice.

2. The very fact that the practice advocated is a part of the past ineffective scheme should be in itself sufficient to condemn it, or at least it should furnish a strong argument against perpetuating the errors of the past.

To the fourth sentence, beginning with the phrase "They best can obtain the land," we take exception because the inferred reasoning in the sentence appears as follows:

1. You, the State, can buy the land cheaper than we, the Federal Government.

2. Therefore, you should buy it, giving your own citizens less money.

3. Because you can buy it cheaper than we, you should buy it and pay for it with your money.

4. After you have bought and paid for it you may then deliver it to us without compensation or refund.

5. We will then construct part of a national system for the Nation's general welfare on your land (or works, perhaps, for the special protection of some other State).

6. And after that we will be glad to shift the responsibility to you, as we do not wish to be concerned with the vexing questions of ownership, which may require policing, etc.

Such an attitude is manifestly unfair, to say nothing of the fact that it is developed upon the inoperable base of local contribution. Nor is there any need for relegating to the State the task of acquiring the needed land. Under proper provisions in the flood-control bill, the Federal Government could operate directly to acquire such land as it needed and on a basis equitable and fair to all. It has the right of eminent domain, and could follow the procedure of condemnation based on valuations made by three competent appraisers appointed by the United States district court, as was done in the instance of the Algiers naval station at New Orleans.

The next sentence:

"Their land is enhanced in value by the works."

Comment: While the word "works" is here not qualified, we will assume it to mean flood-protection structures. Even then it becomes difficult to determine the specific character of structures intended. But we will interpret the application as of "protection."

To enhance value is the creation of value.

Thus, protection enhances value equals protection creates value. Now, before proceeding, we must have a common understanding of the meaning of the word "value" as here applied. Since the inference is interwoven with a design to show a justification for additional taxation in the form of local contributions, we must qualify the word "value" as meaning "money value," since taxes are collected in money. It is well known that money values are made up by a plurality of factors and that the change, addition, or increase of no one factor alone necessarily changes the net results of value unless all other factors are known, and known to be constant. But is this the case? Everything about us is in process of flux. Influences are changing, the factors are variable. We are considering hundreds of miles of river and millions of acres of land. How, then, can it be positively stated that values will increase without simultaneously qualifying all the other value factors? Values may or may not increase. The quoted statement is not axiomatic, but purely speculative.

The next sentence states:

"Tax collections show that the land in the upper Yazoo Basin has ten times the value that it had before it was leveed."

Comment: The implication here conveyed is an additional attempt to interweave the relationship of cause and effect between flood protection and values. For purposes of reasoning, let us grant the statement. Even then may it not be other than the description of two parallel facts not necessarily related as cause and effect? We would indicate the expansion of world consumption of cotton, which has increased during the past 25 years from about 11,750,000 bales of American cotton to that recently obtaining of over 17,000,000 bales, during which period of time prices rose from around 7 cents in the midseason of the year 1904–5 to a price in 1920 of over 40 cents per pound and averaging a mean price level of around 20 cents per pound during the last seven years or so, or from 1920 to the beginning of the current marketing season. We would also indicate the collateral growth of the country in general and especially the intensive development of railroad transportation. Improvement in communication, increases of national and local population, the expansion of the money factors and the use of credit, the decline in the general purchasing power of the dollar and an especial factor through the value tributary to "quality." The application of this factor pertains to the growth of staple cotton, which commands a premium in the world's market. We can then readily see that economic growth and the growth of population have increased the value tributary factor of "need," and the expansion of money and credit must necessarily contribute toward the matter of price. Aside from these points, why did the Chief of Engineers single out the Yazoo Basin? He could readily have selected another illustration which may, however, have reflected an opposite result. We call attention to the sugar lands of the State of Louisiana which steadily declined in value simultaneously with the increase in levee improvements. Why should not the implication be made that, because these two facts are parallel, they establish a relationship of cause and effect, and that improvement of the levee systems in the State of Louisiana has caused land values to decline? This would be just as logical, but we do not contend that this is the case. We know that the decline in the value of sugar lands in the State of Louisiana is due to the operation of varied conditions and factors, some remote by hundreds of miles and separated by the Gulf of Mexico. For instance, we refer to the island of Cuba, wherein sugar is produced in great volume at low cost. This has increased the world supply of sugar, forcing world prices to low levels, as one of the contributing factors. Additional factors, not in any way related to, or connected with, levee protection or flood-control measures are destructive insects and what is known as the mosaic disease.

The next sentence states:

"The United States ought not to buy a part of the land to enhance the value of the rest."

Comment: If motive is implied, we agree with the statement. The United States ought not to buy a part of the land (with the purpose) to enhance the value of the rest, but if motive or purpose is eliminated, we disagree with the statement for the reasons previously mentioned in connection with the discussion of land-money value.

Before passing from the subject of the implied relationship between flood-control works and enhancing values, we again refer to the first line of paragraph 27, which is as follows: "The values and population behind the levees are increasing all the time." The express statement of this sentence is that values are increasing; that is, they are increasing even now before the proposed additional flood-control measures. This develops the following questions:

(a) If values have been and are increasing.
(b) If values will hereafter increase.
(c) Why need the predicted increase in values be attributed to the new measures of flood control?

In the absence of known extent, the inferences appear irreconcilable but also confirm the view that values are affected by numerous factors other than flood control.

Jadwin report, paragraph 31:

31. Such drainage works as will be required in connection with new interior levee construction are of direct benefit to the lands affected and their cost should be borne locally.

Brief submitted by Governor Martineau, of Arkansas:

We beg to differ again with General Jadwin. In most cases lands contiguous to new interior levee construction have already anticipated their drainage needs, and have constructed drainage systems that are adequate and are functioning properly, against which there are large outstanding bond issues. This new interior levee construction in a great many cases will disrupt the present flowage and cause great damage.

How will these drainage districts be benefited, and why should these same people have to bear the added costs again, in the form of a levee tax, for damages?

Brief submitted by Governor Sampson, of Kentucky:

Practically throughout the valley drainage works have already been built at local or private expense to conform to the present ineffective and haphazard plan of flood protection. The building of these works has in many, if not most, instances exhausted the credit of these localities. Should they now be burdened with them, with the additional expense of again conforming to another so-called comprehensive plan for their protection?

Brief submitted by Governor Simpson, of Louisiana:

It is admitted that drainage works are a benefit to the land drained and also of benefit to sanitation and to assist in the preservation of health. And it is for these reasons that exception is taken to the last line of the said paragraph in so far as the Jadwin plan is concerned or any other flood-control plan which may impair, obstruct, or destroy any of the drainage systems which now exist or which may exist prior to, or at the time of, the execution of such a plan. We have established drainage systems in all of the presently proposed spillway or diversion areas which would be subject to damage or destruction by these flood-control measures. The development and extension of these drainage systems has been under way for a great many years. Bonds have been issued based on special drainage taxes which would result in damage to bondholders in addition to the damage to landowners. Whenever works undertaken by the levee board have obstructed or impaired these drainage systems, they have been restored at the levee board's expense. It logically follows that, in all such cases, the National Government should bear the cost of restoration.

Jadwin report, paragraph 32:

32. It is a fundamental principle that no damages lie against either Federal or State Government, or local agencies, on account of an accidental crevasse in the levees. The plan has been drawn to reduce to a minimum the damage to lands and structures resulting from the flow at high floods through the flood ways. All property affected lies in the natural high-water bed of the river. Much of this land was transferred to the States by the swamp act approved September 28, 1850. The purpose of this act was to enable the States to construct the necessary levees and drains to reclaim the swamp and overflowed lands therein. The principle involved was not new, as the early French grants in the lower valley contained a proviso requiring the grantee to construct and maintain a levee line along the river front of his property.

In the State of Louisiana this old servitude has been transferred by the State to the levee district in which the land is located. Whether or not the servitude or flooding was transferred to private owners when the land was sold, the servitude existed when the land was granted to the States without cost. It should not now be paid for by the Federal Government. Moreover, the lands, with some exceptions, will have the same protection as is afforded by the present levee system, a protection provided partly at the expense of the Federal Government. The exceptions are the lands in the Bonnet Carre flood way and in the setback flood way from Birds Point to New Madrid. The acquisition of flowage rights by the State or local interests may be necessary in these cases. In any case, the lands should remain in private ownership in order that their productive capacity may be fully availed of. The United States does not in general own the bed of navigable streams; much less need it own land flooded only at long intervals. Damages, if any, which may be found legal and proper as a consequence of the plan should be met by the States, since these will be directly benefited by the works.

Brief submitted by Governor Martineau, of Arkansas:

General Jadwin in this paragraph goes to great length in an effort to justify the principle advanced, and while in some cases he has former court rulings to sustain his contentions, we wish to offer the following objections:

The southeast Arkansas levee district and the Tensas levee board of Louisiana, under whose supervision that portion of the land lies that is included in the Cypress Creek and Boeuf River spillway, in 1917 were told by the Mississippi River Commission that to close the natural outlet of Cypress Creek into the Mississippi River it would be necessary for the local communities to construct a drainage system to provide for the surface waters, and that when this was done the Mississippi River Commission would order the closure of Cypress Creek gap in the levee. This drainage suggestion was complied with, and the Mississippi River Commission ordered the said levee districts to deposit their one-third of the necessary money for the closure of the Cypress Creek gap in the levee, which the two levee boards did. However, to comply with this order of the commission, the levee districts sold additional levee bonds in connection with other works that were progressing at that time, which are at this time outstanding. The basis of value of these bonds is (as are all the others) for the protection and benefit of these lands (with others) that are situated within this proposed spillway, which if adopted will virtually destroy their real worth and purpose for which these bonds were sold.

In this case, would the "fundamental principle that no damage lie against either Federal or State Government" hold good, in case a fuse plug was installed and later was intentionally allowed to blow out?

This paragraph also recites that "the plans have been drawn to reduce the damage to the minimum." This, however, has not been done, as there is no doubt but that the resulting damage will be much greater with an uncontrolled spillway plan than with a controlled spillway.

The principle of swamp or overflow land grants from the Government to the State is raised. These lands were originally given by the Government to the States for the purpose of constructing necessary levees and drains to reclaim the swamp and overflow lands therein, and originated under the French Crown.

In compliance with the swamp and overflow land grant act of 1850, the States sold the lands so granted by the Government to prospective home builders, who with their descendants developed an agricultural empire, which in turn not only represented to the States themselves but also the Government one of the chief sources of their combined prosperity and dependency, the Government, as well as the States, sharing in the returns. In the last analysis, the States converted the funds derived from the land sales to the construction of levees, making this development possible for them and the Government alike.

If, now, some of these lands are necessary for spillways, why should the local communities (who have developed same) or the States not be recompensed therefor? The stipulation that the grants carried has been complied with and the Government has shared in the returns. It is well to bear in mind the amount per acre that the United States paid France for all of the lands included within the Louisiana Purchase, not so much from a dollar-and-cents standpoint but as a comparison with what the grants really represented at the time of donation.

We also differ again with General Jadwin wherein he states that "the lands within the spillway will have the same protection as now offered," as under his plan any effort to combat a threatened breach in the fuse-plug levee would be prohibited. We are also at variance with his opinion "that the lands would be just as productive as ever, with the exception of the years they were overflowed" as it would virtually be impossible to get any one to risk the hazard of farming or any financial interests to supply capital for investment therein on an agricultural basis. The result, in our opinion, would virtually mean abandonment of the entire acreage, except as a reforestation venture.

Brief submitted by Governor Sampson, of Kentucky:

This statement impresses us as wholly inadequate for the protection of the several counties of Kentucky and Tennessee, from Cairo to Memphis, where the construction of levees and revetments in Missouri has resulted in flowage damage and destruction along the eastern bank of the river in Kentucky and Tennessee. This damage has not resulted from any natural flowage of the flood water but has been caused directly by the protective works on the Missouri side. It is not fair that the cost of this destruction and damage should be borne by those thus damaged or destroyed. The same reason applies to the construction of other artificial spillways and flood ways. We are impressed that this is the fundamental economic error of the Jadwin plan. By the construction of the levees and revetments on the Missouri side of the Mississippi River the natural flow of water has been so changed as to cast it upon the eastern side and onto the lands of Kentucky and Tennessee. It is a well-recognized principle of law that the artificial change of the natural flow of water ought not to cast any burden upon those damaged by the change thus produced.

Brief submitted by Governor Simpson, of Louisiana:

To correctly analyze this statement, it is necessary to bear in mind that there are two classes of levees in Louisiana, one along the Mississippi and tributaries and the other as part of the works necessary for draining low lands, which have not gravity drainage.

The swamp-lands grant included lands far removed from the Mississippi River and were made to a great many States distant from the Mississippi. These grants were not made for the purpose of building levees on the Mississippi, but as shown in the title of the swamp land act of March 2, 1849, chapter 87 (9 Stat. L. 352), title, "An act to aid Louisiana in draining the swamp land therein."

Various courts, Federal and State, have uniformly interpreted the swamp-land grants to have been adopted in aid of the general policy on the part of the National Government to aid the individual State in reclaiming swamp and overflowed land. (Leovy v. U. S., 177 U. S. 621; Maringault v. Springs, 199 U. S. 47[illegible]; Kimball v. Reclamation Funds Commission, 45 Calif. 344; Packard v. Johnson, 4 Pacific 632; Sherman v. A. P. Cork Co., 98 Mich. 61, 57 N. W. 23; State v. County Court of Wayne County, 98 Mo. 362, 11 S. W. 758.)

These lands, after being transferred by the United States to the State of Louisiana were, in turn, transferred to private individuals and the following principle then became applicable: "Where land is owned by the United States adverse user of an easement over such land can not begin until title has passed to a private grantee." (Pauson v. Elgar, 4 Cranch. C. C. 454; Union Mill Co. v. Ferries, 2 Saw. 176; 19 C. J. 955 (174, Note 1).)

It is true that certain levee districts, in parts of Louisiana, have exercised the rights of servitude referred to, but this doctrine of servitude was departed from under the following circumstances:

Originally in Louisiana the rural sections of the State were composed of vast plantations fronting on navigable streams. This was in the day of the sugar barons and the indigo grandees when countless hordes of African slave labor, man, woman, and child, toiled unceasingly from daybreak until sundown. During that epoch, the principle of riparian servitude was equitable and just. With a change of times there came a change of conditions, so that what was once a principality in superficial extent was subdivided into small farms, villages, hamlets, and cities. The method whereby the entire burden of flood control was placed on the abutting owner then became unfair. Louisiana, in an effort to be just to its citizens under the changed conditions, reapportioned this burden of controlling the flood waters of the Mississippi by adopting this section of its constitution (sec. 6, Article XVI):

"Lands and improvements thereon hereafter actually used or destroyed for levees or levee drainage purposes shall be paid for at a price not to exceed the assessed value for the preceding year; provided, this shall not apply to batture nor to property, control of which is vested in the State or any subdivision thereof for the purpose of commerce.

"If the district has no other funds or resources out of which such payment can be made, it may levy, on all taxable property situated therein, a tax sufficient to pay for said property so taken not to exceed one-fourth of one mill on the dollar, to be used solely in the district were collected. This shall not prevent the appropriation of said property before payment."

The foregoing principles are supported by the reasoning of the Supreme Court of Louisiana in the case of Louisiana Society for Prevention of Cruelty to Children v. Board of Levee Commissioners of Orleans Levee District (143 La. 105). Through Mr. Justice Provosty it said:

"The dictating idea was that the immensely increased cost of constructing the levees, owing to their immensely increased size, had made it advisable, as a pure matter of economy, to locate the new levees at a much greater distance from the river than formerly in order that they might not have so soon to be moved back, and that the effect of this was to render this servitude of levee so burdensome that in common justice compensation ought to be made to the riparian proprietor or person whose property was being occupied by the new levee or put on the river side of it; that the levee was no longer as formerly a mere potato ridge along the side of the river bank, which the front proprietor could, and was required to, put up at his own expense, but a great public work, the cost of which should not be made to fall with crushing weight upon the front proprietor, but be distributed over the entire area to be protected; that the making of such compensation was impossible in the country parishes, where sufficient funds could not be provided for such compensation in addition to what was imperatively required for the levee work proper, but was in a measure possible in the city of New Orleans, where larger values were being protected and ampler means available."

Such were the considerations which led to the adoption of section 312 of the constitution of Louisiana for the year 1898, which section relieved urban property in cities having a population of over 5,000 from the riparian servitude for levee purposes; the present section (section 6, of Article XVI, Constitution of Louisiana, 1921) merely extended the principle to rural riparian property.

In Norwood v. Baker (172 U. S. 269) the Supreme Court of the United States had occasion to express itself upon the gross injustice and want of equity in thrusting upon the abutting property owner the full burden of a local improvement, the benefits of which inured to the general public. In that case the Supreme Court said:

"Where public improvement assessment is in substantial excess of the special benefit accruing therefrom, it is, to the extent of such excess, a taking, under the guise of taxation, of private property for public use without compensation."

It will, therefore, manifestly appear that in relinquishing the riparian servitude for levee construction, the State did not idly or foolishly give away a substantial right, but this departure was made necessary by changed local considerations, and was strictly in the spirit of the principles laid down by the Supreme Court of the United States in the above case.

Jadwin report, paragraph 33:

The project should be authorized subject to the condition that except when specially authorized by the Secretary of War, upon the recommendation of the Chief of Engineers, no Federal funds shall be expended upon the part of the project within any State until that State has accepted by appropriate legislation these conditions and responsibilities. The saving exception is suggested to cover the case where the procedure requisite to the enactment of the legislation would unduly delay the initiation of work of far-reaching benefit, particularly if such work is essential to the protection of another State which has fulfilled these conditions.

Brief submitted by Governor Martineau, of Arkansas:

To comply with this feature would be well-nigh impossible; opposition to the necessary State legislation would be made by the people living outside the flooded area, who would feel that they were doubly taxed and not receiving any special benefit. They would not, however, object to their ratio of tax from the Government. In addition thereto, under our State constitution, there is no proviso for such legislation.

Brief submitted by Governor Sampson, of Kentucky:

This suggestion shows the weakness of the proposed additional authority which would necessarily result from local contributions to the supported plan. We submit that the Congress should provide for a basic, comprehensive Federal flood-control plan, which should be owned, maintained, and controlled under Federal laws. It would be unfair to ask the Federal Government to provide the funds for building a flood-control system for which they would not have entire responsibility. It has already been definitely proven that it is impractical and ineffective to draw up a plan by which each locality can contribute to a general flood-control plan while chiefly interested in their own locality. At present it is necessary for some States and some localities to bear an unequal burden for the protection of their neighbors, and many such States and localities now find themselves in such a position that they can no longer bear this burden at all.

Since 1882 the States and local districts have expended for levee construction approximately $167,000,000, while the Government has expended $71,000,000. In addition to this, States and local districts have expended millions for flood protection on tributary streams, and this tremendous burden has been carried as long as it has been possible by the localities which have so frequently found themselves inadequately protected, even after expending these tremendous amounts.

Brief submitted by Governor Simpson, of Louisiana:

The differences which would arise under the provisions of this paragraph are sufficiently clear and well known, so that additional comment is unnecessary.

Jadwin report, paragraph 34:

The present flood control act provides that local interests shall pay one-third the cost of levee construction. The following table shows the proportions of the cost of levees actually borne in the past by the Federal Government and local authorities:

Amounts expended by the United States Government in the construction of levees and the amounts expended by States, levee districts, and communities interested from 1882 to December 31, 1926, covering cost of yardage placed, rights of way, interest, engineering expenses, repair work, high-water expenses, crevasse closing, etc.

Mississippi River Commission districts	Expended by United States from Government funds	Expended by United States from contributed funds	Expended by State and local organizations	Total
Northern	$3,127,533.49	$1,083,857.69	$9,916,110.91	$14,127,502.09
First and second	19,796,161.78	4,348,420.82	42,766,497.05	66,911,079.65
Third	27,614,208.84	5,852,103.37	34,782,460.96	68,248,773.17
Fourth	20,552,089.47	3,773,893.32	64,488,106.33	88,814,094.12

Per cent	30	7	63

Brief submitted by Governor Martineau, of Arkansas:

This table clearly shows that the States and local districts have expended for levee construction since 1882 approximately $167,000,000 to the Government's $71,000,000, or an excess expenditure on the part of the States and local communities of approximately $96,000,000. From 1717 until the swamp land grant act of 1850, a period of 133 years, there was no governmental contributions, all costs being borne locally.

In addition to all of this, there has been a great expenditure on the part of the State and local districts for levee construction and maintenance of the tributary streams that have a direct effect on the parent stream, of which no mention is made at all, but should unquestionably be taken into consideration. Incomplete figures from the tributary stream expenditure of Arkansas alone, outside of the Mississippi River Commission jurisdiction, show the amount to have been $17,016,534.58.

Brief submitted by Governor Simpson, of Louisiana:

This recitation of customs, practices, and expenditures in the past is a full exposition of injustice and shows clearly the underlying causes which have contributed to the ineffectiveness of past effort; and, if continued, will further demonstrate the weakness of divided control.

Jadwin report, paragraph 35:

35. In addition to meeting the costs shown in the table, the inhabitants of the valley have been subject to recurring flood damage. The direct damages suffered from the 1927 flood are estimated by the Mississippi Flood Control Association to have been $236,334,414.06.

Brief submitted by Governor Martineau, of Arkansas:

The indirect damage item is, in our opinion, as large or larger than the direct, which would make the financial loss appalling.

Brief submitted by Governor Simpson, of Louisiana:

Reference is avoided or omitted concerning any estimate of indirect damages. We feel that the unrevealed indirect damages are of the greatest moment to the national welfare. The ratio of economic effect between direct damages and the indirect damages is so extensive as to be nearly incalculable.

By way of illustration, let us assume that the world's rubber production was substantially destroyed by floods, blights, or for any other reason. While the direct damages to the rubber crop based on complete destruction would be large, it is difficult for the imagination to grasp the result of the indirect damages which the nations of the world would be obliged to sustain, and particularly is this so of the United States. The direct damages would be insignificant in comparison with any estimate that may be attempted to determine how such a catastrophe could affect the livelihood and the financial welfare of millions of human beings thousands of miles away from the points at which the direct damages were sustained. We need go no further than consider the effect upon the automobile industry and upon all of its interrelated industries. Cotton grown in the alluvial valley contributes to the employment of an untold number of human beings, both directly and indirectly, in extensive sections of the country hundreds of miles away from where it is grown. The destruction of this cotton, if it could not be substituted by cotton elsewhere obtainable, would thus obviously throw into unemployment the human beings aforementioned, resulting in great damage to the general economic welfare. The factors of indirect damages are of the greatest importance to the Nation as a whole. This reflects the effects upon interstate commerce in its strongest application.

Jadwin report, paragraph 36:

36. The table clearly shows that the people of the valley have borne much the greater part of the cost of flood protection, although the United States has given substantial aid. The local participation has furthered the keen interest of each locality in the proper execution of the work. It has afforded a check on pressure for the execution of works not economically justified.

Brief submitted by Governor Martineau, of Arkansas:

Surely a work that protects the very lives and property and means the existence of the people will hold their interest and aid. The body having jurisdiction surely should be competent enough to see that the work is economically done and essential.

Brief submitted by Governor Sampson, of Kentucky:

An adequate flood control of the Mississippi and its tributaries involves approximately 30 States. The plan must be worked out by Congress and other agencies of the Federal Government, and this plan when worked out no doubt will be intrusted to the War Department for execution. It will be given authority to retard, divert, and retain flood waters, and will be held strictly responsible for its successful execution. We could never have built the Panama Canal by depending upon local contributions, local suggestions, and local authority, and the War Department in executing the plan of Congress should not be governed by local authorities. However, should local contributions be made a condition precedent upon receiving aid from the Federal Government in each and every locality, the people in each locality would expect to have their say. The plan must break down because of too much advice and because of a failure of contributions from many localities, they either being unable to contribute anything or not having the legal authority to make the contribution. We note that General Jadwin asserts that local contributions would create local interest and advance the development. We are quite sure it would have the opposite effect. It is very doubtful if all of the conflicting interests and conflicting elements could be brought in harmony with a great coordinated plan of flood control within the next 50 years, if ever. If we must wait for this plan, then we may expect to see many destructive floods before any relief is secured.

Brief submitted by Governor Simpson, of Louisiana:

The last sentence of this paragraph is: "It has afforded a check on pressure for the execution of works not economically justified." Local participation will also act as a check on works which may be economically justified regarded from a national point of view, in so far as the works intended to be placed in one locality or one State for the protection of another. Further, we contend that this policy has operated and will continue to operate as a check on the execution of works which were and are not only economically justified, but absolutely necessary.

Jadwin report, paragraph 37:

37. The division of cost has led to some divisions of control. The enlargement of levees affecting large areas has been delayed, in some cases, by the failure of a levee district to furnish its share of the cost. It is doubtful whether these disadvantages have counterbalanced the advantage of a local proprietary interest in the works.

Brief submitted by Governor Martineau, of Arkansas:

One of the major features, in our opinion, is the advisability of unit control, and that can be accomplished only by the Government.

Brief submitted by Governor Sampson, of Kentucky:

We agree with the first two sentences of this paragraph and submit that these are conclusive reasons for the rejection of the plan proposed. They are one, if not the chief, cause of the failure of the flood-protection works which have been heretofore built at such an enormous cost. The matter at present before the Congress is the protection of the lower Mississippi Valley from the flood waters which drain two-fifths of the area of the United States. The division of the huge cost of flood control among all the people, not only directly but indirectly benefited by it, would not greatly increase the per capita burden. The imposition of any additional charge upon the citizens and localities which have heretofore borne the burden, both of taxes and assessments for construction of levees and the still greater cost of crevasses in these levees recurring with each and every flood, would not only be unfair to them but would continue to delay the enlargement of levees and the building of flood ways and spillways affecting large areas, and thereby defeat a coordinated flood-control program.

Brief submitted by Governor Simpson, of Louisiana:

"The division of cost has led to some division of control," and always will, should have been added. A divided authority is no authority. If adequate flood control and protection are the objectives, and if we are to judge the future by the past, we must conclude that dependence on local contributions must inevitably result in continued ineffectiveness.

Jadwin report, paragraph 38:

38. The comprehensive plan now presented does not include the protection of areas whose reclamation is not economically justified, but contemplates that such areas be left open for temporary storage and the discharge of floods. If no local contribution is required, the law and the administration of this project must be relied on to prevent the construction of works not economically justified. If a contribution, small in comparison with the cost of work already done and to be done, will assist materially in retaining the proprietary interest and watchfulness of local authorities, it would seem to be justified.

Brief submitted by Governor Martineau, of Arkansas:

The requirements herein stipulated, we believe, would be impossible to comply with. If the people of this backwater area receive no governmental aid, upon what basis should they be required to assist a project that would inundate them and at the same time prohibit them from attempting self-protection?

In our opinion the backwater area provided for under this plan, extending from Pine Bluff on the north side of the Arkansas River, downstream, is already too large, as most of this area from Pine Bluff to a point slightly above the mouth of Bayou Meto should be protected.

Brief submitted by Governor Simpson, of Louisiana:

Provisions of law can be relied upon to prevent the construction of works deemed not justified and also would provide the means of and authority for the construction of such works as are deemed justified.

Also there will always be sufficient interest and watchfulness on the part of the local authorities with or without participation in the cost of construction. The instinct of self-preservation would be ever present.

Jadwin report, paragraph 39:

39. In view of the national aspect of the flood-control problem from the standpoint both of the cause and of the effects of the floods, and in view of the large sums spent in the past by the people of the valley for flood protection, the sacrifices they have made in meeting their allotments, the great losses suffered in the past flood, and the larger expenditures now required, it is believed that the United States should bear a larger proportion of the cost of construction than in the past, and that of the States or local interests be as small as consistent with the results desired. While the proportion must be determine in the wisdom of the President and Congress, a division by which the United States bear 80 per cent and local interests 20 per cent of the cost of levee construction and control works in general; and by which the United States bear 50 per cent and local interests 50 per cent of the cost of the special ring levees proposed at Morgan City, Melville, Simmesport, and Arkansas City, would be in general accord with the existing policy of the President and the precedents established by Congress.

Brief submitted by Governor Martineau, of Arkansas:

To the average citizen the meaning of this paragraph is that the Government would bear 80 per cent of the cost and the local communities 20 per cent; while we of the lower valley know that, with the other requirements, such as rights of way, flowage rights, maintenance, establishment of drainage conditions, and the responsibility of meeting all damage claims of draining railroads, highways, etc., when the final bill for this flood control is paid, the localities and States will have actually contributed virtually dollar for dollar with the Government, exclusive of the amount the Government contemplates expending for channel stabilization, which should be a direct charge against navigation and not flood protection, except that portion spent for revetment, which should be a direct charge. We, therefore, think the wording of this paragraph is not properly understood by the people, and that this proposed plan should have been more explicit, giving the estimated amounts in dollars and cents that the various requirements call for, and which the localities and States would have to pay in addition to the 20 per cent contribution item.

Brief submitted by Governor Sampson, of Kentucky:

This appears to us as distinctly incomplete. It should be clearly stated that in addition to the 20 per cent of cost which would be levied on local communities, already burdened with outstanding debts of approximately $75,000,000 in the form of bond issues, and which are generally maturing within the next 15 years, under the Jadwin plan, they will be required to provide rights of way for levee structures, spillways, and flood ways, the guaranty of Government immunity from all damages, and the maintenance of all flood-control works after their completion, the reconstruction of their drainage systems, the rebuilding of highways, and frequently the relocation of their homes and farm buildings at a cost of at least an additional 30 per cent. In other words, it means at least a 50–50 proposition. It is apparent from the evidence before the committee, and a matter of common knowledge to those acquainted with economic conditions in the Mississippi Valley, that these localities are unable to assume such a burden; and if we are to wait until all of the localities can bear what really amounts to a dollar-for-dollar assessment on the cost, there will be no adequate flood control of the Mississippi and its tributaries.

Jadwin report, paragraph 41:

41. On the basis suggested the total construction costs would be divided as follows:

By the United States:
80 per cent of general levee and control works	$147,360,000
50 per cent of special protection works	600,000
100 per cent of works for channel stabilization and mapping navigation	111,000,000
Total	258,960,000
By local interests:
20 per cent of general levee and control works	36,840,000
50 per cent of special protection works	600,000
Total	37,440,000

The local interests are also expected, under the project, to furnish rights of way and protect the United States against charges for flowage easements and damages.

Brief submitted by Governor Martineau, of Arkansas:

In our opinion this statement should reflect, in addition, the various cost items of the following requirements:

By local interests:
20 per cent of general levee and control works	$36,840,000
50 per cent of special protection works	600,000
Total	37,440,000
Cypress Creek and Boeuf River spillway:[1]
Flowage rights, easements, closing, etc	36,000,000
Railway damages, trestles, embankments, etc	7,800,000
Highway damages	3,900,000
Drainage damages and reestablishments	4,600,000
Atchafalaya spillway, flowage rights, damages, etc.[1]	48,000,000
Bonnet Carre spillway, flowage rights, damages, etc.[1]	11,500,000
Cape Girardeau setback:
Flowage rights for approximately 200,000 acres, at $30	$6,000,000
Maintenance of all flood works after completion	(2)
Maintenance of levees at head of flood ways	(2)
Unforeseen and incidental expenditures	(2)
Grand total	155,240,000

The grand total does not reflect the maintenance of all completed flood works, nor the levee at the head of flood ways and unforeseen and incidental expenses.

If you would deduct from the item of $111,000,000 the contemplated expenditures for channel stabilization (not including revetment work) and the local communities take credit for all of the expenditures made necessary by the various requirements above cited, it will mean that when the flood-control project is completed and paid for as under the Jadwin plan the local communities will have spent virtually dollar for dollar with the Government upon this completed project.

Jadwin report, paragraph 42:

42. While $37,440,000 is small in comparison with the amount to be spent by the United States and with the amounts already spent by the people of the valley, it must be remembered that these people still owe considerable sums on their bonds on which the money spent was raised. Some of the levee districts are also near the limit of their bonding power under present State law and also near the limit of their credit. However, it is not equally clear that this expenditure, spread over a 10-year period among four or more States would constitute an unreasonable burden on the States themselves, in view of the increased taxable values which will result from the improvement.

Brief submitted by Governor Martineau, of Arkansas:

General Jadwin leaves the impression that $37,440,000 is the amount that will have to be expended by the localities and States. This reflects by no means the expenditures that will have to be made to meet the requirements. In addition thereto, the localities and States already have an approximate outstanding debt of $75,000,000 in the form of bond issues, sold to purchasers all over the United States, the proceeds of which were spent for flood protection, and which mature over an approximate period of the next 15 years, with interest. There are also other outstanding bonds issued for general improvement, which the localities and States in their depleted financial condition hardly know how to anticipate.

We beg to again differ with General Jadwin, knowing that the combined expense will be an unreasonable and impossible burden.

Brief submitted by Governor Sampson, of Kentucky:

In paragraph 42 General Jadwin implies an increased taxable value from the improvement. In the light of past experience, where this illusion has constantly been held before the localities of the valley and where it has been destroyed following each successive flood, it is increasingly difficult for them to assume an additional burden with the vain hope that they are going to be able to pay additional taxes superimposed upon those they have already found themselves unable to bear.

Brief submitted by Governor Simpson, of Louisiana:

The sentences of this paragraph truly reflected the financial condition of the levee districts prior to the great flood of 1927. Conditions were sufficiently bad then as a result of cumulative effort and cumulative expense in the form of continued high taxation; these districts and the citizens living and working there have been bled white in paying items of cost which should always have been borne by the National Government. If conditions prior to the flood of 1927 were deplorable even then, they are indeed tragic now. This subject can not be treated statistically, for the reasons that the only dependable figures available are those which were prepared previous to the 1927 flood. Since the flood, conditions from a financial point of view are so chaotic as to make it nearly impossible to reduce the damage, and results from the damage, to any semblance of a financial statement. As stated elsewhere, it may not be difficult to pick out one piece of property that has been destroyed and then calculate the direct damage limited to the value of the item destroyed. The disruption of normal effort, however small that effort may appear, is more far-reaching than any statistical attempts can gather. Employment has been disrupted, the normal conduct of business has been dislocated; but who can estimate the values destroyed through the loss of confidence and the necessary sense of security so essential to the restoration of normal pursuits? If before the flood they had reached or nearly reached the limits of their bonding power and the limit of their credit, what must the real state of affairs be now if we could but accurately determine them?

Further: Let us revert to the meaning of the phrase "bonding power." The inference here is that the States or districts have the legal power to issue more bonds. But this right does not force people to buy them. From a financial point of view (and we are talking about the financing of the plan) we are not only interested in the legal right of a State to issue more bonds, but in the conditions which govern their marketability. Bonds are sold only to conservative investors, and conservative investors require assurance of security.

The reasoning in the Jadwin report seems to follow these processes:

1. That levee construction, etc., will enhance value. (This has been shown to be speculative.)
2. That by virtue of this preconceived notion time will develop an increased margin of equity.
3. That by virtue of this conceived possible future increased equity additional bonds could be sold.
4. Through this process of reasoning the security of bonds is being based on values yet to be.
5. Bonds would be issued in the present to be secured by something which might or might not take place in the future.

Further: It is generally known that bond financing is founded upon the following:

1. On the basis of value existing now.
2. The actual issuance of bonds is made to rest upon only a fraction of existing value, as there must be a margin of equity.
3. Buyers of bonds depend for their profit upon interest.
4. Buyers of bonds do not buy bonds to be secured on values to be attained at some time in the future.

So much for these elementary financial factors. There is no necessary connection, therefore, between the right of a State or district to issue bonds and the established marketability of those bonds. How, then, may money be raised at present from impoverished districts if they are without the ability to sell their bonds and with their business life so disrupted as to make any additional direct taxation wholly unthinkable?

Further: Here again reference is made to values: "Increased taxable values which will result from the improvement." Exception is taken to this statement, for we deny that increased taxable values will result from the improvement. It may or may not be the case that taxable values may increase, but we deny the implication of the word "result." We detail a series of considerations which immediately arise:

1. As shown under a previous paragraph, values are conjectural.
2. That values are influenced by the action of many factors.
3. That there is no certainty of the increase of taxable values.
4. That even if taxable values will ultimately increase, nobody now knows when or to what extent.
5. That even if taxable values will increase, this may or may not take place even without the improvements mentioned.
6. That there is no established relation of cause and effect as expressed in the statement.
7. That the taxable values may not increase.
8. That the taxable values may decline.
9. That the payments exacted then would force an immediate collapse of any weak link in the chain.
10. A collapse of any weak link in the chain would disrupt unification.

It is our hope that, relieved of the unjust and well-nigh intolerable burden under which we have struggled for generations, and encouraged by the sense of security which absolute protection from destructive floods will engender, agriculture, industry, and commerce will ultimately develop, and the alluvial valley grow into a vast internal market, with greatly increased purchasing power. A beneficent circle will then be commenced, wherein the funds, usefully employed in conquering floods, will prove, not an expense, but a necessary, constructive, and valuable investment destined to yield to the entire Nation a return dwarfing even that derived from the original purchase of the great Territory of Louisiana.

Jadwin report, paragraph 147:

SUMMARY OF PROJECTS

147. I recommend the adoption and authorization of a comprehensive project for the flood control of the Mississippi River in its alluvial valley and its improvement from the Head of the Passes to the Ohio River as set forth in this document, to be prosecuted under the direction of the Secretary of War and the supervision of the Chief of Engineers; the project to include the flood ways, spillways, levees, channel stabilization, mapping, etc., hereinbefore recommended, with such modifications thereof as in the discretion of the Secretary of War and Chief of Engineers may be advisable, and the maintenance of a navigation channel from Cairo to New Orleans not less than 300 feet in width and 9 feet in depth, all at an estimated initial cost of $296,400,000, with $6,000,000 annually for maintenance after completion of project, with such distribution of costs as may be specified by law after considering the statements on economic necessity and local cooperation in paragraphs 25 to 42, inclusive. Its adoption should be made subject to the provision that, except when authorized by the Secretary of War upon the recommendation of the Chief of Engineers, no funds appropriated by Congress for the execution of the project shall be expended on works within a State until that State by appropriate legislation—

(a) Has undertaken to provide without cost to the United States and when required the rights of way for all levee structures and such drainage works as may be made necessary by new levee construction.

(b) Has consented to the maintenance of the levee at the head of flood ways within the State at the grades and cross sections necessary in the opinion of the Chief of Engineers for the security of the levee system and the lands protected thereby.

(c) Has agreed to hold and save the United States free from all damage claims resulting from the construction of the project; and to maintain all flood-control works after their completion, except controlling and regulating spillway structures.

Brief submitted by Governor Martineau, of Arkansas:

The various phases of this paragraph have been discussed heretofore, with the exception that we hardly see how the proper allocations of costs between the States can be reached and thereafter enacted into State laws.

Section (a). The feature of providing spillway and flowage right of way has been, in our opinion, one of the major objections to the plan as a whole.

Section (b). We believe all maintenance, as well as construction costs, should be governmentally borne.

Section (c). This section of paragraph 147 presents another major objection—the damage-immunity clause, coupled with the spillway rights of way.

The maintenance feature is a heavy and continuous burden that is not well defined, as it is not known whether the spillways will be kept cleared of underbrush or not and pay for all the other features of perpetual maintenance of rights of way of spillway and levees.

Jadwin report, paragraph 149:

149. I further recommend that legislation be enacted:

(a) Prohibiting any obstruction not affirmatively authorized by Congress to the flood discharge capacity of the alluvial valley of the Mississippi River below Cape Girardeau and providing that it shall not be lawful to build or commence the building of any levee or other structure in said alluvial valley, or in any flood way provided therein unless the work has been recommended by the Chief of Engineers and authorized by the Secretary of War.

(b) Providing that the penalties and procedure applicable to violations of the laws for the protection and preservation of the navigable waters of the United States, enacted in sections 12 and 17 of the river and harbor act of March 3, 1899, shall apply to violations of the above provision of law.

(c) Providing that existing laws relating to the acquisition of lands, easements on rights of way needed for a work of river and harbor improvements shall be applicable to the acquisition of lands, easements, or rights of way for flood-control works.

(d) Amending sections 3 and 4 of the act of June 28, 1879, constituting the Mississippi River Commission; to provide that it shall be the duty of said commission to advise on all questions relating to the improvement of navigation on the Mississippi River and the prevention of destructive floods which may be referred to the commission by the president of the commission or higher authority, and to provide that the president of the Mississippi River Commission shall have the qualifications now prescribed by law for the Assistant Chief of Engineers, and shall receive the rank, pay, and allowances of a brigadier general of engineers while actually assigned to such duty by competent orders.

Brief submitted by Governor Martineau, of Arkansas:

Section (a) of paragraph 149: Why should the citizens of a community that receive no flood protection be prohibited from protecting themselves?

Section (b) To not apply where no protection or flowage rights have been acquired.

Section (c) We concur.

Section (d) No comment.

In the brief submitted by Governor Sampson, of Kentucky, regarding the Jadwin report paragraphs 29, 33, 39, 42, 47, 60, 140, 142, 147, and 148 of the Jadwin report were commented upon in the following manner:

From the report of Maj. Gen. Edgar Jadwin, Chief of Engineers, containing the plan of the Army engineers for flood control of the Mississippi River in its alluvial valley, we have selected the following excerpts, the salient and practicable portions of which we consider of paramount importance in general support of the practically unanimous opinion of the people of Kentucky that there should be developed by the Congress a policy of complete Federal control of the flood waters of the Mississippi River and its tributaries.

SUMMARY OF COMMENTS ON JADWIN REPORT

Brief submitted by Governor Martineau, of Arkansas:

Briefly analyzing the Jadwin plan:

There are two major features to consider—namely, the engineering feature and the economic feature.

The engineering features, with the following adjustments, we believe sound and practicable in the main.

First. Substitution of controlled spillways for uncontrolled spillways.

Second. Hastening of tributary survey and the ultimate governmental assumption of same.

The economic features we believe impossible and impracticable, our position being that flood control of the Mississippi River and its tributaries is a national responsibility in its entirety and should be remedied, maintained, and controlled permanently by the Government.

Brief submitted by Governor Sampson, of Kentucky:

Having disagreed with the fundamental economic principles underlying General Jadwin's program, it is hardly necessary for us to comment on his summary. We respectfully submit that the Commonwealth of Kentucky believes that the economic suggestions in the Jadwin report are impossible and impractical, and we feel that the flood control of the Mississippi River and its tributaries is a national responsibility and that it should be established, controlled, and maintained permanently by the United States of America.

Brief submitted by Governor Simpson, of Louisiana:

We summarize as follows:

1. The Mississippi River and its numerous tributaries traverse interstate areas.

2. These rivers are unconscious of State boundary lines.

3. The combination of these rivers constitutes the national-drainage system.

4. The problem of their regulation and control is national.

5. The National Government is able to function without the cooperation of any agency outside of the Federal control.

6. Regardless of legal considerations, legal rights, constitutional duties, or responsibilities, the administration of any plan is doomed to failure that does not provide for a unified control and a centralized authority.

7. Any financial plan is organically bad that hinges upon fractional contributions depending on volition or future possible inability of a small minority.

8. Generally accepted business principles have not been applied in the organization plan for administering the works.

9. The economic statements made as to questions of value are not axiomatic but are merely speculative.

10. The river must be prevented at any cost from destroying the homes and lives of American citizens. The American home is more than mere property.

11. It is not the history of the National Government to be restrained in the accomplishment of worthy objects by the fear of conferring benefits upon its people, but it is the duty and the responsibility of our Government to guard against grave public dangers to its citizens.

12. Even if the proposed division of costs as between the Federal Government and the States, sections, or districts affected were assumed to be practicable, there would still remain the unsolvable problem of allocating the subdivisional costs equitably and fairly among the sections affected.

13. The engineering plan provides works in one State to be partly paid for by another; in one levee district for the protection of another; and in one county or parish for the protection of another.

14. Sound engineering plans should not be violated in order to conform to theoretical or legal boundary lines.

15. It is natural and logical and unavoidable for engineers to conceive flood-control plans based on what they know to be sound engineering principles. They are dealing with a problem that disregards State and other lines. Their plans in turn must deal with the problem as they find it. They must disregard all map boundary lines. They can not help doing so, since the river is national and the problem is national. They recognize this and so do we.

POSTAL RATES

Mr. BECK of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the pending postal bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

Mr. BECK of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I desire to direct the attention of the House this morning to the provisions of H. R. 12030, a bill to revise postal rates, now pending in the House. There are some gross inequalities, some glaring discriminations, and some distinctly unfair and unwise provisions contained in that measure, and it is for the purpose of having the Members of this body give some advance thought to this legislation before being called upon to pass upon the measure with their votes that I am calling it to your attention at this time.

This measure is intended to revise existing postal rates, to correct evils in the schedule of postal rates now in effect. It is conceded by everyone that present postal rates are prohibitive and inequitable and that they have brought harm to both the mail-using public and to the revenues of the Government; and it is because of the demands of the mail-using public for relief that this legislation is now introduced. Therefore, unless the provisions of H. R. 12030 suggest an improvement over present conditions the legislation does not answer the purpose for which it was intended.

I have carefully studied recent testimony by representatives of the Post Office Department to see if I could ascertain any definite and fixed plan of the department for the handling of this situation and I must admit that the testimony reveals nothing of the sort.

We are at present faced with a grossly inequitable state of affairs in the Post Office Department. A glance at the figures from the department shows that on first-class matter the Government is making an annual profit of almost $90,000,000, while on second-class matter the Government is suffering a loss of almost $90,000,000 yearly. The mails were created as a service to all of the people of the country, to aid and assist in the prosperity of the Nation; yet, on first-class matter, which touches all of the people of the country, we find the Government exacting a profit of nearly $90,000,000 annually, while on second-class matter, a special service rendered to large newspapers and magazines, we find the Government paying a subsidy through a deficit of approximately $90,000,000. Third and fourth class mail matter are just about paying their way, there being but approximately $4,000,000 loss on third-class matter and a slight loss on parcels post, or fourth-class matter.

Now, what program does the Post Office Department bring to us for the solution of this situation? It seems simple, and one would surmise that the department suggests a reduction in the first-class rate on the theory that the mails were never intended to make a profit and that the department would suggest an increase in the rate of each class now sustaining a loss; but is that the recommendation of the Post Office Department? It is not.

On first-class mail we find no suggestion that there be any reduction on that portion of the matter which has provided the large profit. The department does suggest that the rate on private mailing cards be reduced from 2 cents to 1 cent, but this was done because in increasing the rate to 2 cents in 1925 the revenues from that matter dropped from $10,000,000 to approximately $2,000,000, and this rate is reduced now in order to get back the volume and with it the revenue which the department lost by making the private-mailing card rate prohibitory.

It is worthy of note that in increasing the rate on private mailing cards to 2 cents the department then estimated that the revenues would increase from $10,000,000 to $20,000,000, whereas, in fact, they decreased from $10,000,000 to $2,000,000.

Mr. Speaker, I am not condemning the present suggestion of reducing this rate from 2 cents to 1 cent. I approve of it. I agree that the way to increase revenue is to reduce the rate, thereby increasing the volume, and I am glad to accept that suggestion as it applies to first-class matter; but if it is a good rule on this class of mail matter, it ought to be a good rule on other classes, concerning which I shall speak later.

One would assume that with a deficit of approximately $90,000,000 on second-class mail matter the Post Office Department would suggest some method of stopping that loss and of obtaining sufficient revenue from this class of mail matter to defray the cost of its transportation. Does it do this? It does not. But, on the contrary, the department extends very apparent sympathy to the suggestion that the rate on this class of matter be further reduced and the deficit actually increased.

It can not be contended here that the reduction in the rate will increase the volume as on private mailing cards, for the volume on newspapers and magazines is not fixed by the rate of postage as on third and fourth class matter, but is regulated entirely by subscriptions to the publications, so that reducing the rate on this class of matter can mean but one thing and that is a further loss of revenue to the Government and an additional subsidy to newspapers and magazines carried in second-class mail. What logical reason can be found for the course of conduct pursued by the department in reference to second-class mail matter as compared with its conduct toward other classes of mail matter? The only conclusion I can reach is that there seems to be something in the common rumor that this is a newspaper administration and that this reduction of the rate on this class of mail matter is nothing more nor less than a bold attempt to curry favor in the coming campaign. Not only is it a bold attempt to curry favor, but it does so at the expense of the common people of this country; and bear in mind, Mr. Speaker, that this subsidy does not help little newspapers; it means practically nothing to them; it is a direct benefit to the great metropolitan dailies and magazines, both of which, as a matter of fact, are earning enormous profits and really do not require any further governmental charity to be extended to them.

Now, as to third-class matter, we find that under the provisions of this bill a small merchant sending out less than 200 pieces in one mailing, or less than 20 pounds at one time, will get no reduction from the present exorbitant and prohibitive rate. Does the Post Office Department explain why it discriminates in favor of the large mailer who mails more than 200 pieces at a time, or whose mailings weigh more than 20 pounds, against the little fellow who probably runs a grocery in a village or a general store at a crossroads? It does not.

Again, on third-class matter we find, as on private mailing cards, that when the present rates were adopted in 1925 the department made a bad guess. The department prophesied that from a 50 per cent increase, or increasing the rate from 1 cent to 1½ cents for 2 ounces, the Government would get greatly added revenue; but in actual operation in the first year the Government lost in this class of matter alone, directly because of the increased rate, about 900,000,000 pieces of mail matter. If it is wise to reduce the rate on private mailing cards to recover that volume and revenue, would it not be wise to reduce the rate on third-class matter for the same purpose? Does the department apply the same rule to private mailing cards and third-class matter? It does not. If the theory of low rate great volume is good in one place, why is it not good in another, and more so in view of the fact that Mr. Stewart, the Postmaster General's assistant, in testifying before the committee, admitted that third-class mail is a benefit to the department in that it is business-producing literature which creates the volume in first and fourth class matter. I venture the suggestion that a thorough analysis of the United States mails would produce ample proof of the fact that the Government could well afford to carry third-class matter at ½ cent for 2 ounces because of the benefits the department receives in added volume to other classes of mail matter.

Another most interesting point in this regard was brought out by a witness who testified before the committee to the effect that the Canadian rate on this type of matter is lower than ours. I have made some investigation, Mr. Speaker, and I find that a business man in Canada can mail third-class matter from Canada to a Member of this House at his office in Washington for less money than it would cost a merchant here in Washington to send the same communication to the same Member at the same address. I defy any Member of this House to point to a single piece of legislation in the history of these United States in which any Government department was ever so bold as to recommend that the people of this country be charged more for using their own service than would be charged foreigners for using the same service, but that is the fact in this bill, astounding as it may seem, and it is now possible, and will continue to be, if this bill is adopted as it stands, for Canadians, British, Mexicans, and innumerable other countries to sell their wares to Americans at a mail-selling cost of two-thirds the price charged Americans for using their own mail service in making their sales. This is a most astounding and unpatriotic suggestion, and I am amazed that the Post Office Department, where thorough familiarity with foreign rates should exist, would be guilty of such a suggestion.

It would appear from the record that it is possible for other nations with much smaller volume, much less machinery, much less transportation facilities, to carry their mail matter on a basis sufficiently economical to produce a rate lower than our own. If Canada can produce a rate of 1 cent for 2 ounces on third-class matter I think the suggestion by our Post Office Department that we require a rate of 1½ cents for 2 ounces needs investigation, for such gross inefficiency must be productive of greater evils than merely inequality of postal rates.

I have sought for an explanation of the conduct of the Post Office Department in suggesting this prohibitive and discriminatory rate for third-class matter and I find on page 41 of the testimony recently taken by the committee a statement by Mr. Stewart to the effect that a good many people who are now denied the privilege of using third-class mail because of the prohibitive rates are using in its place newspaper advertising, and then follows this illuminating discussion:

Mr. RAMSEYER. The second-class mailers are urging us to increase the rate on third class.

Mr. STEWART. I think they are very well satisfied with the amount of business they are getting from third class now.

It would appear, therefore, that the large metropolitan dailies not only get away with a subsidy from the Post Office Department of approximately $90,000,000 a year, but that they attempt at least to dictate the rates that shall be applied to other classes of mail matter in an endeavor to cover up their own deficit. With facts like these staring us in the face, Mr. Speaker, is it any wonder that this administration is known as a newspaper administration? And knowing these facts are we to wonder at the false and misleading propaganda now being carried by the press.

Now, as to fourth class or parcel post, this department of the mail service, Mr. Speaker, was created for the specific benefit of those who live in remote sections and who at the time of the creation of this service had no adequate delivery service available.

The history of the Parcel Post System is a continuous story of increasing volume and decreasing rates. It has lived through several salary increases without the necessity for any increase in the rates for the simple reason that its constantly growing volume has produced the revenue to take care of salary increases.

When salaries were increased in 1925 parcel post was within $6,000,000 of being self-supporting, and at that time the Postmaster General testified that if it continued to operate on the same basis it would be self-supporting in approximately one year.

At the time of the increase in rates second class had a deficit of about $73,000,000, as compared with $6,000,000 on parcel post. Practically no increase was put upon second-class mail matter, but parcel post was burdened with a 2-cent service charge, which it was estimated would make parcel post produce something like $18,000,000 additional.

As I stated before, the Parcel Post System was originally created and has since been operated for the benefit of the farmer and those living in the rural sections of the country, and yet, notwithstanding its practically self-supporting condition, the Post Office Department placed this additional burden upon the farmers of the country for the benefit of metropolitan daily newspapers and magazines; and from the testimony on page 236 it would appear that in the year 1926, by reason of this prohibitive service charge, parcel-post business for the first time in the life of the service practically stood still, while the receipts of the express companies advanced more than $7,000,000. Again, we find that the rule adopted on private mailing cards of reducing the price to increase the volume and thereby increase the revenue is not used when we come to parcel post—and why?

I have searched diligently, Mr. Speaker, for the answer to that question, and I find it on page 401 of the testimony.

At that point in the testimony there is a discussion concerning the suggestion of the farm bureaus that a director of parcel post be appointed to increase the volume of that class of mail matter, thereby increasing the revenue and making possible further reductions in rates, and in this connection Mr. Stewart, representing the Post Office Department, makes the astounding statement that where private interests—meaning, of course, the express companies—are engaged in business he does not believe it is the duty of the Post Office Department to go out and compete with them and take it away from them; and that, Mr. Speaker, is another policy of the Post Office Department which fully explains the statement of Congressman BUCKBEE, appearing on page 403 of the record, which reads:

Mr. BUCKBEE. I do not think, Mr. Stewart, that you have been sympathetic enough with the rural class.

I agree with the distinguished Congressman from Illinois. Mr. Speaker, it would appear from a careful analysis of H. R. 12030 and the testimony taken before the committee giving it consideration that on first-class mail matter the Post Office Department operates for the purpose of exacting a profit through that branch of the Postal Service, which reaches all the people; that on second class the Post Office Department operates exclusively for the benefit of the metropolitan daily newspapers and large magazines and delivers over to them as a subsidy the profit it takes from ordinary people on its first-class mail.

Third-class matter seems to be a foreign arm of the Post Office Department. That department is operated for the benefit of foreign nations, and on fourth-class matter, by the admission of the assistant to the Postmaster General, they operate for the exclusive benefit of the express companies. Now, in view of the tremendous injustice being done the mail-using public through present postal rates and their threatened continuance through this legislation, giving consideration to the needs of the farmer and present business conditions throughout the Nation, I contend, Mr. Speaker, that this matter needs to be given considerable thought; that we can not rely on the recommendations of the Post Office Department in fixing rates in that department, and that if the service is to be operated for the benefit of the people of this country without favoring any class we must seek a more sane, equitable, and sensible solution than is suggested in H. R. 12030.

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

OUR MERCHANT MARINE

Mr. REECE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and include some press editorials in reference to the speech I made on the merchant marine, and also a reference to some other matters.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

Mr. REECE. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Washington Post, and an article from the Journal of Commerce, of New York, relative to a speech delivered by myself upon the necessity for national defense of an adequate merchant marine:

[From the Washington Post, Saturday, March 24, 1928]

AMERICAN SHIPS

The House of Representatives on Thursday heard from the lips of a Member from a district in the interior—Representative REECE, of Tennessee—a stirring appeal for an adequate merchant marine as an auxiliary of the Navy. The national-defense feature of the merchant-marine problem has been overlooked by too many legislators. It happens that Mr. REECE was in the American Expeditionary Forces, and that his own observations and experiences drove home to him the vital fact that the United States is not safely protected if it does not possess merchant ships capable of serving as naval auxiliaries in time of war.

Mr. REECE pointed out that during the War of the Revolution armed merchantmen captured or destroyed three times as many enemy ships as did all the American warships combined. In the War of 1812 American merchantmen again gave a good account of themselves, inflicting six times as much damage upon the enemy as did the United States Navy. But for merchant ships the North could not have successfully blockaded southern ports in the Civil War, and during the war with Spain the few American merchant vessels available were as valuable as warships. One of them, the St. Paul, defeated a Spanish cruiser and a Spanish destroyer in a hot battle off San Juan, P. R.

The lack of merchant vessels during the late war was a serious handicap to the United States, besides necessitating enormous expenditures. The cost of unpreparedness in this field is estimated by Representative REECE at $8,000,000,000, of which $3,000,000,000 represents the cost of the war emergency fleet and $5,000,000,000 paid out in ocean-freight charges. Mr. REECE quoted the assertion of Admiral Gleaves, commander of convoy operations during the World War:

"The outstanding lesson which the experience of the war has driven home to us is the value both in peace and in war of a prosperous deep-sea merchant marine."

Every important merchant vessel under the American flag should be constructed with a view to its conversion into a naval auxiliary or transport in case of need. Its structural plans should be approved by the Navy Department, and a supply of 6-inch guns should be kept on hand with which to arm these craft. The personnel should be enrolled in the Naval Reserve, and should receive training under naval instructors. By encouraging and assisting in the creation of such a fleet the United States would not only save hundreds of millions in case of war, but it would save to the people hundreds of millions annually that are now paid out to foreign shipowners for the carriage of American commerce.

Mr. REECE emphasized the fact that while his constituents live in eastern Tennessee, remote from the coast, they are interested in national defense and in the promotion of ocean commerce. His testimony is supported by that of Fred Brenckman, representing the National Grange, who told the House Committee on the Merchant Marine that the question of developing the American merchant marine and the establishment and maintenance of trade routes was the most important matter of legislation now before Congress from the farmer's standpoint. The producers of the interior are more alive to the necessity of merchant shipping than ever before. They approve of the plans now under advisement in Congress for the encouragement of shipping.

Prosperity in peace and defense in war are the great benefits that will flow from the creation of a merchant marine. This task of building up American ocean shipping is now before Congress. By the exercise of constructive statesmanship this session of Congress can make itself memorable by solving the problem of the merchant marine.

[From the Journal of Commerce, New York, Friday, March 23, 1928]

ADEQUATE MERCHANT MARINE HELD VITAL—REECE, OF TENNESSEE, MOVES HOUSE IN MAKING SPEECH ON NAVAL SUPPLY BILL

WASHINGTON, March 22.—The American merchant marine, in all its war-time glory, was pictured on the floor of the House to-day in a stirring appeal for maintenance of a merchant fleet under the American flag.

Representative B. CARROLL REECE, Republican, of Tennessee, who possesses an enviable war record, during the course of the debate on the naval supply bill, reminded his colleagues "that as the Great War slowly recedes into the vista of the past we are in danger of losing our former sense of values in regard to American shipping."

HOUSE MOVED BY APPEAL

The membership of the House, which before another week is out, probably will be considering a shipping bill now being drafted by its Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, was visibly affected by the Tennessee warrior's appeal.

He gave a graphic picture of the part taken by the American merchant marine during the war emergency. He recalled how 2,300 ships were constructed for the purpose of transporting American troops to the battle fields of Europe. He emphasized that, due to war-time inflation, "this construction program cost us $3,000,000,000, a sum estimated to be four times as large as it would have been before the war."

"To this sum," he went on, "must be added another $5,000,000,000 paid out by the American people in ocean-freight charges as a penalty for not having an adequate merchant marine upon the outbreak of hostilities in 1914."

Declaring the people of his State have followed with interest and solicitude the varying fortunes of the American merchant marine, the Tennesseean said: "They know that without ample transoceanic service under the American flag they can not hope to secure the most advantageous freight rates when their surplus products are moved overseas to the great foreign markets."

POINTS OUT FOREIGN ACTIVITY

Stopping to explain that the citizenry of his congressional district are engaged for the most part in agricultural pursuits, Representative REECE declared, "They have watched with admiration the ingenious efforts of the Shipping Board to establish an adequate merchant service with inadequate ships, most of them built during the war for war-time use, and therefore, not the best suited for competitive commercial service to-day."

He asserted, "They have noted with growing concern the feverish shipbuilding activities of the other great maritime nations, and the launching in foreign shipyards of whole fleets of fast modern motor ships, destined, in the absence of construction legislation by the Congress of the United States, to drive our older war-built merchantmen from the seas."

Concluding, he said that, "Other American citizens on the farm lands of the interior patiently wait to see whether their chosen Representatives in Congress have at last fully come to realize 'the value both in peace and in war of a prosperous deep-sea merchant marine.'"

He referred to the words of Admiral Gleaves, United States Navy, commander of convoy operations during the war, in his "History of the Transport Service."

SENATE

FRIDAY, March 30, 1928

The Chaplain, Rev. ZeBarney T. Phillips, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O God, before whose face the generations rise and pass away, we humbly beseech Thee to bless our country, that there may be peace within our gates and prosperity in all our borders. In the light of Thy wisdom and under the guidance of Thy spirit we dedicate ourselves in love and loyalty to the welfare of this Nation. Where it is corrupt, purge it; where it is in error, direct it; where anything is amiss, reform it; where it is right, strengthen and confirm it; where it is in want, furnish it; where it is divided, heal it; that whether in plenty or in want, we may patiently and peaceably seek Thy kingdom and its righteousness, the only full supply and sure foundation both of men and nations. Grant this, O Father, through Jesus Christ, Thy Son, our Lord. Amen.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of the legislative day of Tuesday last, when, on request of Mr. CURTIS and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

LOCAL ASSOCIATIONS NOT LOBBYISTS

Mr. CARAWAY. I present a letter from the executive secretary of the Washington Council of Social Agencies. It is to correct what the association think an injustice to several organizations here, and I ask that it be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

There being no objection, the letter was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EXECUTIVE OFFICES
THE WASHINGTON COUNCIL OF SOCIAL AGENCIES,
March 29, 1928.

Hon. T. H. CARAWAY,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. CARAWAY: I am writing at your suggestion, in order that a statement made by the Judiciary Committee of the Senate in reference to the number of fake associations in Washington, in which the above organization, the Citizens' Relief Association, and the Consumers' League were listed, may be corrected.

The purposes of these organizations are as follows:

The Washington Council of Social Agencies is composed of delegates from private and public welfare organizations engaged in local welfare work who have themselves formed this council in order to encourage and develop cooperation between the welfare and civic agencies of the District of Columbia and to increase the efficiency of these agencies.

The council is supported by dues from the member agencies and voluntary contributions. Its by-laws provide that "the officers of the council, as officers, shall not appear before Congress for or against any measure or proposal. Their action before Congress shall be confined to written communications dealing with facts."

The Citizens' Relief Association is one of the member agencies of the council, and the managers of the association are appointed by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia for terms of three years. The funds of the association are for the most part obtained through an appeal jointly made with that of the Associated Charities, and the relief is distributed by the staff visitors of the Associated Charities. The association receives no congressional appropriation.

The Consumers' League is also a member of the Council of Social Agencies and was organized to improve working conditions for women and children by the enactment and enforcement of appropriate laws, and is the only one of the three organizations which might be considered a lobbying organization. It would have no objections whatever to the passing of the bill requiring the registration of lobbyists. Their president is the Rev. John A. Ryan, D. D.

Mr. Tucker, who was with me, and I understood that you would be willing to incorporate this letter in the RECORD, and we shall be glad to have this done.

Sincerely yours,
LOUISA S. ROBERTS,
Executive Secretary.

COL. CARL L. ESTES—OUACHITA NATIONAL PARK

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, Col. Carl L. Estes, a native of Kentucky but a resident of Texas, entered the Army as a private in the World War and went to France. His body is literally cut to pieces with honorable wounds received in the war. Parts of his ribs have been replaced by silver plates. He is now a colonel on the staff of the Governor of Texas. This week he came here representing the governor and the chambers of commerce of Texas to appear before a House committee in the interest of a bill pending to create a national park in the Ouachita National Forest in Arkansas. He brought with him a letter to the Secretary of Commerce, Mr. Hoover, for whom he performed some services of a social nature this spring. The letter was written by the campaign manager of Mr. Hoover in Texas, a friend and close associate of Mr. Hoover, who served with him for 14 years.

Colonel Estes saw Mr. Hoover and talked with him about 30 minutes. Mr. Hoover's secretary then called up the Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Work, and made an appointment for Colonel Estes to call and see Secretary Work, told him of the business that Colonel Estes wished to discuss with him, and, I believe, conducted him to Secretary Work's door.

Colonel Estes walked into Secretary Work's office. The Secretary spoke to him very abruptly, never asked him to be seated, told him that he knew for what he had come to his office, and that he knew all about Texas and Arkansas that he wanted to know, and, hardly giving Colonel Estes time to say anything, called him a liar and ordered him out of his office. Colonel Estes was never permitted to say what was the purpose of his visit, and the exchange of "compliments" which passed between them I shall not undertake to repeat. Then the Secretary got up very agitatedly, rang for other people to come in, and his conduct was such that Colonel Estes thought he was to be thrown out by some of the Secretary's faithful stand-bys, but they refused to take the serious view of the situation that the Secretary had taken.

The transaction was so disgraceful, it was such a cowardly thing for the Secretary of the Interior to do, to sit in his office and say to a man—I do not care who he might be or from what State he might come—the things that the Secretary said to Colonel Estes. And incidentally he said it in his office, when he could not have been induced to have said it to Colonel Estes in the corridor or elsewhere. He took advantage of the situation to insult a man who had offered to lay down his life when this country needed men, a man whose body, as I said, is covered with wounds, who is partially physically disabled, who came here as the representative of the Governor of the great State of Texas on a public matter, to discuss with the Secretary of the Interior a report that the Secretary had signed, I am sure without ever having read, in which he was opposing the creation of a national park in the State of Arkansas.

The first report—to show Senators how much intelligence went into it—in describing the location of the proposed park stated it was on the Arkansas River. The nearest point from the proposed park to the Arkansas River is many, many miles.

That does not tell all the story, Mr. President. That report was filed with the House committee, and somebody who was interested in it has taken that report out of the records and substituted another for it. I am not so much concerned about that, but I am concerned, Mr. President, that a young man of high character, a man whose services to his country have been honorable, a young man who stands high in the Commonwealth in which he now lives, who came here as the ambassador of the governor of a sovereign State, should have been denounced by the Secretary of the Interior in his office as a liar.

In the name of every American citizen I want to resent it; I would like to say that no one but a coward would have done it; and I shall waive all my senatorial privileges, if I have any, if the Secretary of the Interior wants me to answer.

Mr. President, I have here a copy of the letter that I mentioned a moment ago; and I desire to have it printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The letter is as follows:

MARCH 23, 1928.

Mr. LAWRENCE RICHEY,
Department of Commerce, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR RICHEY: I am inclosing you copy of letter of introduction for Col. Carl L. Estes, of Tyler, Tex., to Mr. Hoover.

I have wired you asking you to arrange an appointment for Colonel Estes on the morning of the 27th.

I sent you copies of the Tyler Courier of March 13, 14, and 15, and I want you and Mr. Hoover to know that in the entire State of Texas the very finest reception we received was in Tyler, and Colonel Estes made the address of welcome. We were met in the afternoon by a delegation of representative citizens headed by the colonel, given a dinner by the chamber of commerce. Colonel Estes made the address of welcome again and paid a very splendid tribute to the "chief."

The State of Texas is determined to get Mr. Hoover out here for the East Texas Chamber of Commerce meeting, and I am joining with Colonel Creager, as well as all other State Republican and Democratic leaders, to urge Mr. Hoover to come, not as a candidate for President, but as a guest of the State. The colonel will tell you all about it, and I am anxious to have him have a long chat with you.

I understand that some 50 counties are wiring the chief, urging him to attend this meeting, and, as stated in the letter of introduction, the colonel is the bearer of an invitation from the governor of the State.

The officials of the East Texas Chamber of Commerce telephoned me in reference to sending a delegation to accompany the colonel. I suggested that they not go to that time and trouble at this time, stating that in my opinion if Mr. Hoover can come he will do so.

I am going to ask you to compile all of these telegrams and have them available for the colonel upon his arrival; at the same time, please have Mr. Hoover keep an open mind about the invitation and not to make a decision until we arrive. In the meantime I hope you will watch his dates and see that he is not committed to any speaking date on or about the time of the east Texas meeting.

The entire State of Texas admires Mr. Hoover immensely, and it would be a wonderful thing for the State and for Mr. Hoover if he can see his way clear to come.

Colonel Estes will also ask you to help him in connection with the eight Southern States who are interested in the Ouachita National Park, as per the Shreveport telegram of March 21.

I would appreciate very much your introducing the colonel to Doctor Work, and I should like to see Colonel Estes return from Washington with the feeling that we had in some measure reciprocated for the very splendid reception and the generous and fair publicity which he has given us in connection with our campaign.

Colonel Estes will be at the Mayflower Hotel, and I am sending him a copy of this letter so that he will know who you are.

With very kindest regards, I am,

Sincerely,

J. F. LUCEY.

COMPENSATION FOR LOSSES AT ABERDEEN PROVING GROUNDS

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, in 1917 and 1918, after our country became involved in the World War, the Government took over about 30,000 acres of land in Maryland. On those 30,000 acres of land were located several thousand families, with their graveyards, churches, schoolhouses, and other community interests. Congress, wishing to deal fairly with those people, who were settled on one of the most fertile spots in Maryland, appropriated a sum of money to compensate them for their lands and the destruction of their business. To date, 10 years after the war, doctors who had their entire professional interests in that locality, storekeepers who had all their customers taken away from them, have not received a single cent of compensation. I have endeavored many times to get the War Department to take a position on this matter. In order to furnish additional information to Senators who may be interested in seeing that our citizens whose property has been confiscated secure some measure of justice, I ask to have printed in the RECORD a brief letter which I have written to the Judge Advocate General of the Army, which sums up and quotes the statements made at that time, and asks him why he does not approve the bill to compensate these people for the loss of their property.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, was that the land that was taken for an artillery proving ground?

Mr. TYDINGS. The land was taken for what is now known as the Aberdeen Proving Grounds.

In this connection, Mr. President—and I will only take a moment or so longer—I should like to say that several of these people have been forced to go through bankruptcy, because with the great stocks of goods bought before the Government took over this land, and with their customers taken away from them by the Government appropriating their land, they have had no market at all for their goods, and have had to let them stay there on the shelves year after year with no compensation whatsoever.

It is one of the most outrageous pieces of injustice that I have ever heard of in my life, and I sincerely hope that there will be enough fairness in the Senate of the United States to give these people the compensation which their case so richly deserves.

I ask that the letter to which I have referred may be printed in the RECORD following my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter referred to is as follows:

MARCH 3, 1928.

Maj. Gen. JOHN A. HULL,
Judge Advocate General, United States Army,
War Department, State, War, and Navy Building,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR GENERAL: While I am sure the Aberdeen cases were ably presented to you last Friday, I feel it incumbent upon me, as the author of the bill under consideration, to submit a few observations which I trust will be helpful in finally reaching a just solution without doing violence to national safeguards.

Let me preface my remarks with the statement that it is not quite clear in my mind just why the Committee on Claims of the Senate requested the view of the War Department on the merits of the bill. I realize that it is the regular custom, but in this case just exactly what the War Department promised to do, intended to do, and did do in 1917 is so plainly, succinctly, and unequivocally set forth in the documentary evidence available as to bar legal interpretations.

The facts are these:

An estimate of $3,000,000 was submitted on July 2, 1917, to purchase Kent Island for a proving ground. Successful political opposition arose there by people who did not own land but whose business would have been destroyed. (See General Ruggles's memo., February 3, 1926, sec. 3.) Then the second choice, Aberdeen, came under more serious consideration, and the people there became aroused.

An urgent deficiency appropriation bill (H. R. 5949) was introduced, carrying an additional item of $4,000,000, making $7,000,000 in all for a proving ground. In submitting this deficiency estimate to the Secretary of the Treasury under date of September 21, 1917, the Secretary of War said it was "for increasing facilities for the proof and test of ordnance material, including the necessary buildings, construction, equipment, land, and damages and losses to persons, firms, and corporations resulting from the procurement of the land for this purpose, including loss of business, trade, practice, etc."

The above is corroborated by General Ruggles's memoranda, section 4, wherein he states that, as the authorized agent of the War Department, he informed a public meeting of citizens "that it was the intention of the War Department to compensate them for all legitimate damage to business, as well as that arising from the taking over of the land."

Then please note the second paragraph of letter of September 21, 1917. The request for the additional $4,000,000 was predicated upon the experience at Kent Island "because of the probability of having to pay compensation for other damage than that included in the value of land."

The $7,000,000 was appropriated. The Secretary of War asked for that amount and received that amount to do just exactly what my present bill (S. 1640) was introduced to accomplish, i. e., reimburse those citizens of my State who at a time of great national stress patriotically submitted to the complete obliteration of their community and business.

It was reported to me that you took the stand that the passage of my bill would tend to remove all limits from the responsibilities the Government would have to bear in the exercise of its right of eminent domain, opening up an almost limitless field of claims against the National Treasury; that it was not in the amount of the present claims, but in the fact that the passage of the bill would mean that the Government has recognized as legal obligations all remote and consequential damages.

These claims are certainly in a well-defined and isolated class of their own. There was certainly a meeting of the minds between the authorized representatives of the Government and the claimants—a clear-cut bargain understood and expressed. In the present case Congress appropriated additional money in accordance with the War Department estimate to pay these consequential damages. I venture the assertion that never before and never again will a similar case arise; but in the future, if the War Department meets a similar situation and asks for and obtains money for a certain purpose, its promise should be its bond, invoking the right of eminent domain where previous mutual promises and understandings are not involved.

There are two questions involved in the proposed act. The first is whether, at this late date, the War Department can recede from its original promise and intention to use its influence to see that those suffering losses are compensated. The second is whether such a bill, if passed, would create any new or novel rights.

It will be noted that the bill gives those who deem themselves injured by the establishment of the proving grounds the right only to bring suit in the Court of Claims. The suits for damages will be subject to orderly judicial procedure and review by the United States Supreme Court.

The War Department got what it wanted by representing that it would make every effort to have all claims, including consequential and indirect, promptly settled, and a favorable report to the committee would certainly seem to be but a tardy fulfillment of that understanding.

The reasoning of Mr. Justice Peckham in United States v. Realty Co. (163 U. S. 427) is apt in this matter. On page 440 it is said:

"The Nation, speaking broadly, owes a 'debt' to an individual when his claim grows out of a general principle of right and justice; when, in other words, it is based upon consideration of a moral or merely honorary nature, such as are binding upon the conscience or honor of an individual, although the debt could obtain no recognition in a court of law."

The payment of consequential damages is frequently required by statute where lands are taken over for public purposes. (Montomery, 80 Ala. 489; Tidewater R. R., 107 Va. 562, 17 L. R. A. N. S. 1053; McGavock v. Omaha, 40 Nebr. 64; Kramer, 25 Nebr. 489; Denver v. Bryer, 7 Cal. 113; Ludlow, 47 S. W. (Ky.) 881; G. C. & S. F. Ry. v. Fuller, 63 Tex. 469; 2d Nicholson on Eminent Domain, 2d ed., sec. 311–2; United States v. Alexander, 148 United States 146.)

Mr. Justice Brandeis, in Mitchell v. United States (267 U. S. 341), the test case as to the rights of persons under the aforesaid act of October 6, 1917, said:

"States have not infrequently directed the payment of compensation in similar situations. The constitutions of some require that compensation be made for consequential damages to private property resulting from public improvements." (Chicago v. Taylor, 125 U. S. 161, 31 L. ed. 638, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 820; Richards v. Washington Terminal Co., 233 U. S. 546, 554, 58 L. ed., 1088, 1091, L. R. A., 887, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 654.)

Others have, in authorizing specific public improvements, conferred the right to such compensation. (See for example Earle v. Com., 180 Mass. 579, 57 L. R. A. 292, 91 Am. St. Rep. 326, 63 N. E. 10; Allen v. Com. 188 Mass. Acts and Resolves, 1895, chap. 488, art. 14; 1896, chap. 450; 1898, chap. 551; Re Water Supply, 211 N. Y. 174, 105 N. E. 213; Ettor v. Tacoma, 228 U. S. 148, 57 L. ed. 773, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 428; Joslyn Mfg. Co. v. Providence, 262 U. S. 668, 67 L. ed. 1167, 43 Sup. Ct. Rep. 684.)

"Congress had, of course, the power to make like provision here."

It will, therefore, be seen that the States frequently have adopted the liberal attitude toward its citizens and have paid them for the same kind of consequential damages that my bill gives the right to sue for. The policy is not new or unprecedented, but is followed in the more progressive jurisdictions.

I realize that it is proper as a general rule that the Government should not undertake to compensate people who are indirectly injured by reason of taking of property by the Government for public use, but there are exceptions to all rules, and it does seem to me that this is one of the exceptions. The Government has to take property somewhere, perhaps every day, and it often happens that some one is indirectly injured, but that is regarded as unavoidable and one of the hardships which a good citizen is expected to endure for the sake of the public. But in this case the injuries which a great many of the people suffered are not indirect or consequential except in a very technical sense of the word.

Here we have a case where the Government is not merely taking a piece of property, but took 35,000 acres of land, expelling the entire population and destroying a whole community, resulting in terrible losses—in fact, almost ruin—to the business and professions of a number of people.

It so rarely happens that the Government has to do a thing of this kind that when it does it, it seems to me to be only fair and just that the sufferers should be compensated.

I therefore trust that you can find it consistent with your duty to report back to the Claims Committee of the Senate that the record in the case proves that the War Department did everything it possibly could to keep its promise in 1917 and, of course, still is in favor of giving the claimants their day in court.

Very truly yours,

M. E. TYDINGS.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I do not want to object to speeches being made on the presentation of petitions and memorials, but there is a rule against it; and we have a unanimous-consent agreement this morning that after the conclusion of the routine morning business the Senate shall go into executive session. I should like, therefore, to have the morning business disposed of.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I understand the Senator from Maryland has concluded his remarks.

Mr. CURTIS. Yes; I merely made the statement lest some other Senator might desire to speak in connection with a petition or memorial.

NAVAL OIL LEASES

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I send to the desk an editorial from the New York World, which I ask the Secretary to read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the clerk will read, as requested.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

[From the New York World, Saturday, March 24, 1928]

SINCLAIR'S STORY

It is only five months since Mr. Martin Littleton, counsel for Harry F. Sinclair, made this statement in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia when Sinclair last went on trial on the charge of conspiracy to defraud the Government:

"It will be made clear in this case that Sinclair had no interest in the Continental Trading Co. (Ltd.). He had never had a bond which the Continental Trading Co. distributed. It will be made clear that he never passed a bond of the character mentioned here or anything else. It will be made clear that he was never the owner of bonds of the description mentioned here, and that he never passed the bonds to Fall or anybody on behalf of Fall. All this will be made clear from the evidence in this case when it is finished."

Thanks to the Senate and its investigation, we know more now than Mr. Littleton told us in October. We know, from Mr. Will H. Hays, that Mr. Littleton was wrong in saying that Sinclair "never had a bond which the Continental Trading Co. distributed"—that he did have such bonds, and that he had, in fact, a very considerable number of them. We know from Mahlon T. Everhart, Fall's son-in-law, that $233,000 worth of these bonds found their way into Fall's bank account. If anyone doubts the value of the Senate's investigation, and the relevancy of the information it has brought to light, let him consider these two facts alone and their importance in bringing Sinclair closer to the bar of justice. When the conspiracy case comes to trial again on April 4, Mr. Littleton will not repeat the statement he made to the jury last October.

It is the Senate, not the Department of Justice or any other executive branch of the administration, which has uncovered the facts in a sordid story.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, no criticism need be directed against Mr. Littleton for having made the statement quoted in this editorial. Presumably he was entirely honest in the statement, and merely repeated what his client had told him, but the question now presents itself as to whether it would not be entirely ethical upon the part of Mr. Littleton to withdraw from the case.

I offer, Mr. President, an editorial from the Grand Rapids Press on a related subject, which I ask to have read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the clerk will read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

MORAL VIGOR NEEDED IN POLITICS

Writing from Washington, Mark Foote notes with regret the action of President Coolidge in inviting Will H. Hays to a Cabinet dinner at the White House within a few days of the public revelation of Mr. Hays's unethical mismanagement of the 1920 campaign deficit and specifically his juggling of the Sinclair contribution. "This seems to be an age," says Mr. Foote, "of political cowardice. Within the present generation Roosevelt and Wilson acted differently under similar circumstances."

Mr. Coolidge during his presidential career has seemed to assume quite regularly that the end justified the means, that a man's character was not touched by the political company at his table, that there was no particular lack of ethics in using celery, breakfast pie, and the sheen of the White House napery to obtain the favor of a boss to whose principles he did not subscribe. It may have been no particular edification for Mr. Coolidge to have a man of the traditions of C. Bascom Slemp as his secretary, nor to pay White House honors to Len Small and Big Bill Thompson. But Slemp had delegates. And Thompson has votes. Mr. Coolidge's view seems to be that insulting votes is rather a profitless bit of high-mindedness.

It is said that Hays is self-attached to the Hoover banner in Indiana, and a natural assumption will be that the President's entertainment of Hays has something to do with Hoover's candidacy. Or it may simply be that while Mr. Coolidge looks back with regret and repudiation upon Mr. Hays's methods he also remembers with gratitude the net result to himself of Mr. Hays's services as chairman of the Republican National Committee. In either case, it will seem to many that the President has carried political trimming too far.

The social kindness paid Mr. Hays will handicap Hoover if that is thought to be the connection and nothing would be better for the Secretary of Commerce than a frank repudiation of Hays's alliance in Indiana. If the President entertained Hays on his own account, the public will be led justifiedly to think that he regards Hays's fund-raising methods as an error of judgment rather than a matter for moral strictures.

The Nation decidedly does not join in that estimate. It has had too much of callous politics. It has supposed that President Coolidge viewed the misdeeds of the Harding crew with indignation and regret. It is rather hard to retain that impression when the President sits down to meat with the man who solicited Sinclair's contribution and then covered the gift up and kept it secret by trading for checks. The dinner invitation to Hays was a mistake if the President has any care for the respect of those who look upon his high office as a place of heavy moral responsibility, a place for the setting of examples and for courageous leadership.

Abraham Lincoln was a skilled politician but this was his tenet: "I must stand with anybody that stands right—stand with him while he is right and part with him when he goes wrong." There have been Presidents who have not hesitated to make their friendship rest upon moral standards and to despise publicly and privately the man who failed to meet those standards. Mr. Foote names two in recent years. On the other hand, it is easy for Government to go morally bankrupt by degrees. Senator COUZENS recently flayed a fellow Senator for upholding the practice of "white lies" to obtain jobs for constituents or to give certain impressions to newspapers. His colleague replied that nowadays everybody did it.

Everybody shouldn't. And the best man to set the moral step for government is the man at the head of the procession—the President.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I offer for the RECORD, without reading, two other editorials dealing with the same subject.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the editorials will be printed in the RECORD.

The editorials are as follows:

[From the Detroit News, Wednesday, March 28, 1928]

WHAT A GHASTLY PICTURE!

It would be a healthy and encouraging thing if the moment contained definite evidence in responsible quarters of intention to apply a remedy for the evil disclosed by the Hays testimony in the oil investigation. In both Houses of the National Congress the political debates occurring almost daily amount to baitings of rival candidates for President or to wind-jamming over trifles.

Look back. The Hays limitation upon contributions to the 1920 campaign was made a large item. The Harding "return to normalcy" gained thereby not a little of its popular impetus. It was made a people's campaign, with no individual permitted to give more than $2,000. Hays himself was almost the equal of Harding as a figure before the country. He was the miracle man, Indiana's dynamo of action, a progressive who put Old Guard bosses into the background.

What a ghastly picture of hypocrisy it is now! Expenditures were made on a scale which the "people's campaign" could not and did not finance. Hays's popular subscription merely amounted to a political device. The big debt was carried along, and the big fellows sat back awaiting assessment. Thus it ended up in the black Sinclair mess—a sell-out of the Nation's oil reserves.

What can and should be done to prevent recurrence of the same thing or its equivalent this year admittedly is a hard question. But hard questions are usually the ones most in need of solution and a way always can be found. The first requisite is evidence of a realization of an evil, and the next, evidence of a sincere purpose to remove it. By and large, neither the one nor the other as yet has been made clear by the leadership of either great party.

The issue which should be most discussed tends, it appears, to be the least discussed.

[From the Philadelphia Record, March 26, 1928]

SOME NOTABLE ACHIEVEMENTS IN MENDACITY

To get the full value of the astonishing developments in the oil scandal it would be necessary to compare each new revelation with corresponding items in the past. Perhaps the only really enlightening method would be a compilation in parallel columns of statements, affidavits, and testimony in various parts of the record and related utterances as they have been corkscrewed out of reluctant witnesses in recent inquiries. That this would be a fascinating though arduous undertaking will be suggested by a glance at just two incidents.

There is, for example, the episode of the fake corporation that made $3,000,000 of illegitimate profits in an oil resale deal, out of which, the incontestable evidence is, Sinclair sent Fall $233,000 in Liberty bonds and contributed to the Republican National Committee $160,000. Now, compare those facts with the vehement assurances given to court and jury five months ago by the oil man's counsel, as follows:

"It will be made clear in this case that Sinclair had no interest in the Continental Co.; that he never had a bond which the company distributed; that he never was the owner of such bonds; and that he never passed such bonds to Fall or anybody on behalf of Fall."

For this interesting citation we are indebted to the New York World. But as we dip into the well of recollection we draw up one not inferior, we think, in public interest. Over against the familiar history of the $100,000 sent to Fall in Doheny's "little black satchel," and the detailed account by Fall's son-in-law of how he carried to that statesman the $233,000 of Sinclair bonds is to be placed Fall's written statement of five years ago:

"It should be needless for me to say that in any purchase or expenditure I have never approached E. L. Doheny or anyone connected with him or any of his corporations, or H. F. Sinclair or anyone connected with any of his corporations, nor have I ever received from either of said parties one cent on account of any oil lease or upon any other account whatsoever."

As a record of fraud and corruption this oil scandal has historic magnitude. But it is hardly less interesting and impressive as a study in monumental falsification.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

Mr. COPELAND presented a petition of sundry citizens of New York, N. Y., praying for the passage of legislation granting increased pensions to Civil War veterans and their widows, which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. FRAZIER presented papers in the nature of petitions from the Farmers Union Cooperative Oil Co. and Bloom Local, No. 204, of the Farmers Educational and Cooperative Union of America, both of Jamestown, N. Dak., praying for the passage of the so-called "Mistletoe bill" relative to the regulation of stockyards, which were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. WARREN presented telegrams in the nature of memorials from J. M. Schwoob, of the Cody Club, of Cody; the Commercial Club, of Clark; W. S. Metz and Will Metz, of Sheridan, all in the State of Wyoming; the Commercial Clubs of Bridger, Fromberg, Edgar, and Belfry, and L. H. Brooks, jr., of Cooke, and Dan Healy and E. P. Kelly, of Livingston, all in the State of Montana, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation authorizing the expenditure of Government funds in the construction of a proposed road from Red Lodge to Cooke City, Mont., which were referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

MUSCLE SHOALS

Mr. TYSON. Mr. President, the question of Muscle Shoals is not now before the Senate, but it probably will be again; and as I see that another effort is being made to get a part of the water powers of Tennessee, I send to the desk and ask to have read two telegrams that show the feeling that our people have about the matter.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the telegrams will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

NASHVILLE, TENN., March 29, 1928.

Hon. L. D. TYSON,

Care United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Permit me to urge resistance to plain usurpation of constitutional rights of Tennessee in and to its water-power resources which is embodied in Muscle Shoals bill as reported from Military Affairs Committee. Attempt made to seize Cove Creek and hold it in perpetuity as property of Federal Government under absolute control of Federal Bureau it is respectfully and earnestly submitted is direct challenge of rights of Tennessee inherent to statehood. Proposition seeking to compel capital developing other power resources along Tennessee River to pay revenue into Federal Treasury is further indefensible denial of sovereignty of Tennessee. Very language of section 17 shows conclusively that primary object in taking over Cove Creek would be creation of additional power at Muscle Shoals, and claim made in concluding sentence of section 18 that navigation and flood control are coordinate objects is but transparent subterfuge in order to give proposed usurpation color of legal warrant. Issue raised in this proposed measure is vital to Tennessee and it is vital to Nation. If Congress may despoil one Commonwealth of valuable rights held under Federal Constitution and unbroken decisions of highest tribunals, may it not similarly override any other State and all? I am speaking as your fellow Tennessean, voicing what I am deeply convinced is the hope and confidence of Tennesseans, regardless of political creed, that delegation at National Capital will stand as unit in unwavering and patriotic resistance to proposed denial of rights of State of inestimable value and to attempted violation of its sovereignty under Constitution.

E. B. STAHLMAN.

NASHVILLE, TENN., March 29, 1928.

Senator L. D. TYSON,

United States Senate:

Press publications indicate Morin bill links Cove Creek with Muscle Shoals and contemplates development of Cove Creek water-power site and sale of power by Federal Government. As officials authorized by State statute to exercise jurisdiction over development of water-power resources within Tennessee and supervision regulation and control of hydroelectric energy thus generated, we desire officially to protest against any proposed Federal legislation which provides for the development, supervision, disposition, or regulation by or under the authority of the Federal Government of water-power resources within Tennessee and which does not fully recognize and thoroughly protect the sovereign proprietary and revenue rights of Tennessee. Please call this matter to attention of Tennessee delegation.

TENNESSEE RAILROAD AND PUBLIC UTILITIES COMMISSION.

BOULDER DAM

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I heard read the telegrams that were presented by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. TYSON], in which certain legislation is characterized as an assault upon Tennessee; and the statement was made that other States might suffer like injuries and wrongs if such a precedent were set.

In this connection I am constrained to say that propaganda has been industriously circulated to the effect that Arizona had agreed to the so-called Boulder Dam bill as reported to the Senate. In reply I shall say that the Boulder Dam bill, Order of Business 606, Senate bill 728, as reported by the committee, constitutes one of the most cynical, sinister, and ruthless attempts ever made in the history of this Government to override the constitutional rights of a State. The bill, as reported by the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON], is a reckless and relentless attempt to override the State of Arizona; and if the Senate of the United States intends to remain in session until it shall have passed that particular bill, then Senators would better prepare to take an option on some overcoats, because the Senate will be here until the ides of November before it passes that bill.

I sympathize with the Senator from Tennessee in standing up manfully for the rights of his State; and I serve notice now that the Senators from Arizona and the Representative from Arizona are not prepared, and never will be prepared, to engage in any compromise to bargain away the rights of Arizona and thus make our State a vassal, servile thing instead of a proud column in the Union.

FLOOD CONTROL

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the other day I had the temerity to oppose the flood control bill after it was passed. It ran through the Senate so quickly that I did not have any opportunity to voice my opposition. I am glad to know that the Baltimore Sun has not approved the measure—at least, I so interpret this able editorial found in the issue of to-day—and I ask that it may be inserted, without reading, in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The editorial is as follows:

[From the Baltimore Sun of Friday, March 30, 1928]

THE MISSISSIPPI FLOOD BILL

Hasty passage of the Mississippi flood relief bill by the Senate, with practically no debate, will be accepted as meaning that the Upper Chamber is satisfied to turn the whole project over to a commission composed of the Secretary of War, the Chief of Army Engineers, the president of the Mississippi River Commission, and two civil engineers to be appointed by the President. The bill contemplates appropriations totaling over a 10-year period $325,000,000. No local contributions are required.

With the methods of carrying out the project there is no cause of complaint. It is an engineering job, and the less Congress has to do with details the better. But entire release of the States directly benefited by the improvement from any payment whatever sets a precedent which may prove very embarrassing not only in the future but in connection with extension of the present undertaking. For the $325,000,000 is but a starter. It takes care only of the stretch from Cairo, Ill., to the Gulf. Nobody ventures to predict what the ultimate cost of complete control of the Mississippi will be, though there are vague hints of a billion dollars.

Demand is expected for large-scale work on tributaries of the Father of Waters. If the Federal Treasury is made to bear the whole expense, it is hard to see where the business will stop. Mississippi Valley States, having been so generously treated, will be in a mood to return the favor, and with a score or more of States interested in getting Federal money for control of rivers emptying into the Mississippi, the stage seems to be set for a staggering outlay. This is one of the chief reasons for apprehension as to developments if localities seeking aid go scot-free of cost.

The Senate bill makes a lame apology for establishing such a precedent by insisting that it must not be viewed as a precedent. But we may well imagine that it will be brought up standing if it tries to demonstrate later on, when more millions are asked for protection against floods on tributaries of the Mississippi, that sauce for the goose is not sauce for the gander. And the Senate begs the question when it says that because Mississippi Valley States have contributed heavily in the past they should now be exempt. In fact, their contributions prove that flood control is a local as well as a national problem.

All proper sympathy and consideration could have been shown States which suffered so severely from the Mississippi's overflow by prescribing moderate local contributions, and by giving them whatever time was necessary to recuperate before being called upon to pay anything. An empire of rich agricultural territory will be redeemed. In decades to come it will be of enormous value, returning large revenues to the States in which it is situated. The whole country will profit, of course, from the rehabilitation, but it is the locality that will receive the principal benefits, the value of which can not be estimated.

In embarking upon a great improvement, certain to run far beyond any figure now set as the probable ultimate cost, this fact should have been recognized in justice to States not directly affected but which must assume a large share of the burden; and also in justice to a settled policy of the Nation, departure from which may have especially deplorable consequences when the work of flood control passes from the Mississippi proper to far-flung tributaries.

PAY RATES OF ARMY, NAVY, AND MARINE CORPS

Mr. BINGHAM. I present a letter from the Director of the Veterans' Bureau, with an accompanying estimate, which I should like to have printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Finance.

There being no objection, the letter, with accompanying statement, was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNITED STATES VETERANS' BUREAU,
OFFICE OF THE DIRECTOR,
Washington, March 23, 1928.

Hon. HIRAM BINGHAM,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR BINGHAM: In the previous estimates which have been submitted to you on the cost of the Tyson-Fitzgerald bill, the pay rates for the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps, which have been in effect since the act of June 30, 1922, were used. The attached revised estimate shows the increased cost of this bill based upon the rate of pay in effect prior to June 30, 1922, the period during which most of the emergency officers were discharged.

By using the pay rate in effect prior to June 30, 1922, the estimated annual increased cost of retirement is $2,294,265, or an annual increase of $151,125 over the estimates previously submitted. Of this amount, $132,900 is the annual increased cost for emergency Army officers over and above the estimate of cost previously submitted.

Very truly yours,

FRANK T. HINES, Director.

PRICE PREDICTIONS OF COTTON, CORN, ETC.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, on yesterday, when we were discussing the remarkable conduct of the Bureau of Economics in making a prediction as to the price of cotton, it was suggested in the debate by myself and other Senators that there ought to be an act specifically covering that offense, and seeking to prevent its recurrence in the future. I introduce a bill which I should like to have read—it is very short—and then referred to the proper committee.

The bill (S. 3845) to prohibit predictions with respect to cotton or grain prices in any report, bulletin, or other publication issued by any department or other establishment in the executive branch of the Government, was read the first time by its title, the second time at length, and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That it shall be unlawful for any officer or employee of any department or other establishment in the executive branch of the Government to include, or cause to be included, in any report, bulletin, or other publication issued by such department or establishment, any prediction with respect to prices of cotton, corn (maize), wheat, rye, oats, barley, flaxseed, or other grain, or to cause to be published any such report, bulletin, or other publication containing any such prediction, or to authorize the publication of any statement or interview containing any such prediction which is based upon information received from official sources. Any such officer or employee who violates the provisions of this act shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined not less than $10,000 or imprisoned for not more than five years, or both.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

FRIDAY, March 30, 1928

The House met at 12 o'clock noon and was called to order by the Speaker.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Blessed Lord, we are standing upon the threshold of a new day; it has come to us without a blemish; it is ours for good or ill. May we greet it with a smile, with a heart full of gratitude, and with a trust in Thy Providence. Thou knowest how prone we are to falter. Thy strength and guidance can help us keep it spotless, so this day abide with us. Give us real power to forgive wrongs, to suffer woes, and to love and to bear. Subdue and mellow the flush of passion and bless us with unmeasured peace and wisdom. As we cherish the flower without the blight, so may we appreciate the virtues and the joys of checkered human life. O God, help us to be happy, contented, free, and fearless; then any wrong that beats against us shall be in vain. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

"OUT IN ARIZONA"

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a short poem by Mrs. Mayo, wife of Captain Mayo, entitled "Out in Arizona."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

There was no objection.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include a beautiful poem entitled

"Out in Arizona," written by Mrs. Aida Mayo, a brilliant woman and wife of Capt. Chester Mayo, of the Navy, which is as follows:

"OUT IN ARIZONA"

By Aida Mayo

Out in Arizona,
Where God is all the time,
And where you're right within yourself,
And all seems pure—sublime;
Where mountain peaks reach skyward
To kiss the azure blue,
And the Mariposa lilies are blowing kisses, too;
Where virile pines keep watching
Like sentinels of old
O'er the earth so warm—alluring
You, upon her bed of gold;
Where the Indian paint brush,
The columbine so fair,
The blue bell and the flame flower,
Spread a Persian carpet rare;
Where all the stars in all the world
Are set up in your sight
Like diamonds in a chiffon veil
That search your soul at night—
'Tis there you know you've found yourself,
And only this is strife,
And only there is happiness
And love, and God, and life;
That death can ne'er o'ertake you
Where everything's in tune
And the harmonies in nature
Wrap you round, until you soon
Are thrilled with a new something
You ne'er have known before,
Out there in Arizona
In that land of more and more.

THE WELCH BILL

Mr. BERGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the Welch salary bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. O'CONNELL. Reserving the right to object, on what subject?

Mr. BERGER. On the Welch bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BERGER. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, several weeks ago 2,000 or more Federal employees organized themselves into a sort of a "Coxey army" and marched up the Capitol steps to appeal to the committee on reform in the civil service to report favorably the so-called Welch bill, which amends the salary rates contained in the present compensation schedules, and which provides a minimum salary of $1,500 per annum for all Federal employees.

MANUFACTURERS NEED NO COXEY ARMY TACTICS

I thought it unfortunate, not that these employees adopted Coxey army tactics but that the treatment which they are receiving from the Government of the richest country on the face of the earth should have compelled them to resort to such spectacular tactics to make their plight known.

Had they been manufacturers, bankers, or merchants of the wealthier classes they would not have had to resort to such methods, and, I dare say, their chances of getting what they want would be infinitely better.

WELCH BILL COMES NEARER TO DECENT MINIMUM

The Welch bill will receive my support, and I hope that the committee which has it under consideration will report it favorably, so that the House may have an opportunity of expressing itself on this important measure.

It has my support not because it is all that it should be, but because it is better than what the Federal employees are now getting, and apparently the best that can be gotten at this time.

The minimum it sets, $1,500 a year, comes closer to what the minimum ought to be, and closer to what it will eventually have to be.

HOW MY MINIMUM SALARY WOULD WORK

I have introduced a bill making the "full minimum" $2,000 a year.

My idea is to make the entrance salary of a person of legal age $1,500, but providing for an automatic increase of $100 a year for a period of five years until the full minimum of $2,000 is reached.

Thus the employee, entering the Government service at the age of 21 will, on reaching the age of 26, when he might be in a position to assume the obligations of supporting a family, get a minimum salary of $2,000 a year.

FOR ONLY ONE PERSON IN IMMEDIATE FAMILY

Furthermore, I would provide that only one person in the immediate family of the employee should be eligible for a position in the Government service.

If the basis of the minimum wage is to be the minimum needs of a family, it would be fair to confine it to the head of the family, although either the man or the woman could have that position in the Government service. And either the man or the woman could supplement the earnings of the other by taking private employment if he or she were so inclined.

WELCH BILL DOES NOT REACH DECENT MINIMUM

The obligation of the Government is to pay a salary that will enable its employees to enjoy some of the comforts to which our American standard of living entitles them. Their present wage will not permit them to live in accordance with that standard if they get less than $1,500 a year—and many of them do.

Even the $1,500 proposed in the Welch bill as a minimum will not give them that standard, if they have a family to support. And many of them have no families because the wage they get will not permit them to marry.

BEST POLICY FOR GOVERNMENT

I want to deal with the Federal employee justly for several reasons:

In the first place, I want the Government to be a model employer, to set the pace for private employers to follow, and not to bring down the standards so as to justify private employers in paying their employees starvation wages. I believe that it would prove to be best, not only for the worker, but also for the Government.

UP TO CONGRESS TO DO THE FAIR THING

In the second place, workers in private employment can enforce, or can at least make an attempt to enforce, their claims for better working conditions and a higher standard of living through their labor organizations. If they fail to do so, they can only blame themselves, since they can use all the weapons of a trade-union.

Federal employees have no such method at their command. They must rely on our sense of justice, and when we fail to perceive our duty clearly enough all they can do is adopt Coxey army tactics.

That being the case, an obligation is imposed upon us to find out what is their minimum need and give them that minimum.

THE BUDGET OF THE LABOR BUREAU

It does not require a detailed study of present living costs to show that no person can support himself and a family on less than $1,500 a year.

The Bureau of Labor Statistics recently prepared a budget, which represented the cost of "a minimum of health and decency," for a family of five. The average cost of this budget in 1926 was found to be $2,432.69.

That budget does not allow for any luxuries. It allows practically nothing for such emergencies as sickness. Little or next to nothing is allowed for vacations. In other words, that budget allows just enough for an existence.

It seems to me that the least we can do is give the Federal employees that low minimum.

GENEROUS WITH OUR "ALLIES" AND OUR CRUISERS

Our Government is usually generous. It has canceled billions of dollars due us from European powers—and did so with less discussion and concern than it manifests over the proposed increase in the salaries of Federal employees. Here we are told that the matter will require some more months of further study.

We have recently passed a naval program, by the terms of which we will spend about $300,000,000 for cruisers that will be useless for all practical purposes before their construction is completed.

AND EVEN MORE GENEROUS WITH PLUTOCRATS

What is more, we have been generous every time we met in reducing the income taxes of the rich. The Harding-Coolidge administrations have turned back about $3,000,000,000—three thousand million dollars—not to the workers, who do not earn enough to live right, much less pay an income tax—not to the Government employee, who must skimp every day of the year to make both ends meet; but to the superwealthy, the men and women who already have more than they know what to do with.

But the additional $60,000,000 for the Federal employees will require some more months of study.

In the present session the House voted to turn back $225,000,000 to the wealthy. Our Democratic friends felt that this was not enough—that $400,000,000 ought to be turned back.

And the manufacturers and business men of the Nation got what they were after in this House without marching up and down the Capitol steps. The revenue bill was disposed of in five hours general debate, but better conditions of the Federal employees by a few dollars annually demands many months of additional study.

WILL BE THE BEST POLICY FOR THE COUNTRY

It is estimated that if we enact the Welch bill it will add about $60,000,000 annually to the Government pay roll. That is not so much when we stop to think of some of the other things we have done in this session and in other sessions while the Federal employees continued to struggle.

Let us, for a change, help lift some of the burdens off the shoulders of the poorer class of our population. There will still be enough left to turn back to the wealthy some of their income tax.

And thousands of men and women who now have to deny themselves the ordinary comforts of life and rear their families under conditions that are deplorable will be made happier. In the end this will prove to be the best economy.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, in the consideration of the Private Calendar to-day I ask unanimous consent that the bills be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole, that the call begin at the star, and that only unobjected bills be considered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent that in the consideration of the Private Calendar to-day the bills shall be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole, and that the call shall begin at the star, and only unobjected bills shall be considered. Is there objection?

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. CULLEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on next Monday, after the reading of the Journal and the disposal of business on the Speaker's table, my colleague Mr. CELLER be permitted to address the House for 10 minutes.

Mr. TILSON. Would not the gentleman be willing to make that request for some other day?

The SPEAKER. The Chair would prefer not to recognize the gentleman on Monday.

Mr. CULLEN. Then make it Tuesday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that his colleague [Mr. CELLER] on Tuesday morning, after the reading of the Journal and the disposal of business on the Speaker's table, may address the House for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Tuesday, after the reading of the Journal and the consideration of matters on the Speaker's table, following the address of the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER], I may be permitted to address the House on the national defense for 30 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Dakota asks unanimous consent that on Tuesday, after the reading of the Journal and the disposal of business on the Speaker's table, following the address of the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER], he may by special order be permitted to address the House for 30 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. HUDSON. On the use of denaturants.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SNELL. To-morrow we have a long day, with four hours' debate on the import rubber bill. I wish the gentleman would select another day.

Mr. HUDSON. Then, say, on Tuesday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman modifies his request and asks that on Tuesday next he may be permitted to address the House for 20 minutes after the reading of the Journal and the disposal of business on the Speaker's table, following the address of the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON]. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

MUSCLE SHOALS

Mr. FROTHINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that those of us who disagree may put in minority views on the Muscle Shoals bill, H. R. 12448, from the Committee on Military Affairs, and be given five legislative days in which to do so.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. GARNER of Texas. I understand, then, that the Muscle Shoals bill will not be brought up within the five-day limit. If we give unanimous consent to the filing of minority views within five legislative days, it will not be expected that the bill will be considered within five days?

Mr. TILSON. It is not expected within five days.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may have five legislative days in which to file minority views on the bill H. R. 12448, relating to Muscle Shoals.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

RESIGNATION OF HON. WILLIAM R. GREEN

The SPEAKER. The Chair very regretfully lays before the House the following communication.

The Clerk read the communication, as follows:

MARCH 30, 1928.

To the SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES:

Herewith I hand you for presentation to the House copy of a letter which I have sent to the Governor of the State of Iowa tendering my resignation as a Member of this House, to take effect on the 31st of this month. The receipt of this resignation has been duly acknowledged by the governor.

Respectfully yours,

WM. R. GREEN.

MARCH 26, 1928.

Hon. JOHN HAMMILL,

Governor of Iowa.

MY DEAR GOVERNOR: I hereby tender my resignation as Representative in Congress from the ninth district of Iowa, to take effect March 31, 1928.

Very truly yours,

WM. R. GREEN.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oregon asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, WILLIAM RAYMOND GREEN is the forty-third chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means in a period of 139 years, and the fourth to serve for more than two Congresses in this office. He served on the committee under three preceding chairmen—Underwood, Kitchin, and Fordney—for a period of 10 years, during which he participated in the preparation of two revenue acts, two tariff acts, the adjusted compensation act, and many others. Prior to his entrance into Congress he was a lawyer for 29 years, during 17 of which he served as judge of the fifteenth judicial district of Iowa. Since the matters that come before the Committee on Ways and Means consist of mixed questions of law and fact, both by training and experience he was qualified in an unusual degree for the chairmanship. His services have justified his election.

He took the chairmanship in a critical period of its history. The country was overburdened with taxation. By a program of biennial revenue acts, great reductions have been effected in taxes and the burden is in the process of fair distribution. The settlement of the debts owing by our associates in the World War involved immense sums of money and corresponding difficulties. The return of alien properties seized during the war and provision for the payment of the claims of our nationals and of those of our former opponents required wisdom and discretion. There were also many other questions of the first importance, including amendments to the adjusted compensation act. These matters affected not only the welfare of our people in their entirety but our international relations as well. They involved our national honor and good faith. Many of them were new in our history and necessitated the development of new policies.

The authority to propose legislation required for the solution of such questions is invested in the Committee on Ways and Means. The chairman is held in a large degree responsible for the wisdom, sufficiency, and advisability of the legislation proposed. Judge GREEN proved equal to the demands of the hour. His abilities as a lawyer and strong natural grasp of complicated tax legislation, as well as of the other questions, have been of the greatest importance to the committee, the Congress, and the country. Judge GREEN has the rare gift of finding the common ground in disputed matters and of proposing solutions that will accomplish the results desired. This has been illustrated many times in the consideration of revenue bills, the legislation for the return of the alien property, and in the amendments to the adjusted compensation act. He also has the faculty for getting things done. By the use of the opportunities for leadership afforded by the chairmanship and by tireless industry, well-informed and clear thinking, and by insistence upon prudent legislation he has notably assisted in the restoration of normal conditions. Each succeeding year has seen a steady and growing prosperity.

He is expert in tax legislation. In 1925 he traveled extensively in Europe, conferring with the chancelleries of the great nations and with those having legislative control of their finances, that he might have more accurate and definite understanding of their solutions of problems similar to our own. The information so gained and the sound conclusions derived by him therefrom have been of very great advantage to us.

The chairmanship of Ways and Means is a noble fellowship. Its roll contains some of the most honored names in American public life. To mention only those of comparatively recent years, there are Dingley, of Maine; McKinley, of Ohio, afterwards President of the United States; Payne, of New York; Underwood, of Alabama; Kitchin, of North Carolina; Fordney, of Michigan; and GREEN, of Iowa [applause]—leaders of their day, who have left upon the public mind a memory of irreproachable service. The legislation enacted under their leadership affected the private interests and public welfare of our growing millions. It is to the glory of the Republic that no question was ever raised as to their private integrity, their public honor, or their incorruptible manhood. [Applause.] The high traditions of this fellowship has been maintained and enhanced by the achievements of its latest member, Judge GREEN. Historians must record his services and the important legislation that bears his name or was prepared under his direction with generous commendation when writing the story of the recent years.

Judge GREEN was elected as chairman of the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation created by the revenue act of 1926, and the organization and conduct of its work was intrusted to him. With wisdom and discretion he selected the personnel of its staff and so directed their activities that most essential assistance was given in the preparation of the pending revenue bill and valuable and timely information concerning the revenue laws and their administration was furnished to the Congress and the country.

On February 20, 1928, the President of the United States nominated him for appointment as judge of the United States Court of Claims, and on March 12 the Senate confirmed his appointment. He now retires from the Congress of his own volition to return to that public service which claimed the activities of his earlier manhood. His ripened judgment, legal attainments, and legislative experience will make his service as a member of the national judiciary of very great value.

I voice to-day the praise of a man whose important services have added to the comforts and increased the prosperity of our people and sustained the honor of our country at home and abroad.

The House regrets the voluntary retirement of a Member whose distinguished abilities, good comradeship, and unceasing devotion to a great task have largely contributed to its record of good work well done. In addition to these qualities of mind and heart, his kindly courtesy, generous consideration of others, courage, and intellectual integrity have earned for him, irrespective of party affiliation, our highest esteem and enduring affection. He can read his title clear to that highest of all encomiums of faithful and effective public servant. He has won a memorable place in the honorable ranks of those who have worthily served their country's needs. [Applause.]

I append the list of the chairmen of the Committee on Ways and Means since the beginning of the Government of the United States under the Constitution. It is furnished from a source which I believe reliable. In the 139 years there have been 43 chairmen. Sereno E. Payne, of New York, was chairman during six Congresses; Thomas Fitzsimmons, of Pennsylvania, William M. Morrison, of Illinois, and WILLIAM R. GREEN during three Congresses; 17 served during two Congresses and 22 during one Congress.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House of Representatives, the minority leader, Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee, is not present to-day. I want to say in his behalf that if he were here he would concur in what the gentleman from Oregon has said concerning Mr. GREEN and in the other good things that others may say about him. I have heard Mr. GARRETT express himself about Mr. GREEN, and I know I speak for him when I say he greatly respects him and gives him his greatest wishes on his journey through life.

Mr. Speaker, speaking of the chairmanship of the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives, I think it is the most effective office for the American people outside of the Presidency. [Applause.] I say frankly that if you will take the chairmanship of the Ways and Means Committee and put it in the hands of a man who will not serve his country as faithfully, as loyally, and as patriotically as he should, the economic conditions of the country would suffer and no one could foretell what they would be. I repeat that it is one of the most important places in our political life, especially our economic political life, and I would rather hold it, speaking for myself, than any other place outside of the place of all places, the Presidency of the United States.

Speaking of Mr. GREEN, I believe I express the sentiment of every Member of this House when I say that we, one and all, believe in the honesty of BILL GREEN. [Applause.] When I leave the House of Representatives, of all things I would rather have it said of me that "We respected him; we believe he was honest; and we believe he did his duty to the best of his ability." That can be said about BILL GREEN. [Applause.]

He and I have had our little differences here. We have not always agreed; but that is a natural thing. When two men have disagreements, both temperamentally constituted like the gentleman from Iowa and myself, especially myself, we are likely to express our differences in the most forceful way we can, and on my part sometimes more forcefully than possibly I should; but there has never been a time—and I am sure the gentleman from Iowa will realize it—that in our contests in this arena I did not have respect for his honesty of purpose and his patriotism. [Applause.] It is the most natural thing, after all, for men to have differences in judgment; but as long as we are patriotic, as long as we love our country, and as long as we are doing the best we can with the lights before us no man has the right to criticize more than our judgment.

Mr. GREEN'S heart, gentlemen, is in the right place in legislation. It is with the masses of the people. [Applause.] Take the legislation he has brought forth and take the recommendations that have been made to him about legislation and you will find out where BILL GREEN stands, and where his intellect and his heart was. He has always favored legislation that had for its purpose the taxing of people according to their ability to pay and not according to their necessities. [Applause.] If it had not been for him, in my judgment, the surtaxes at the present time would not be what they are. Neither would some other taxes be on the statute books at the present time if it had not been for Mr. GREEN. [Applause.]

I congratulate the bench on getting your services, sir. I regret the loss of your services here, but if I had been in your place I think I would have done the same thing. I would have accepted this nomination. You have reached three score and ten years of age. This arena is no place for a man to carry the banner who has reached such years unless it is in an advisory capacity. I say this with all respect to my ancient friends, because I am getting along myself. [Laughter and applause.] I congratulate you and I do not question your motives in accepting this position, because they are noble and you are going back to your first ambition.

As to the purpose for which you were given this place, at some future and more appropriate time we may discuss that, but for you there is nothing but the highest than can be said. You will make a just judge. You have made a courteous, fine chairman. [Applause.] I only wish that every one will hold his temper, as chairman of the committee, as well as you have controlled yours. If some others I know of were in that position I doubt if they could control their tempers as well as you have.

Mr. Speaker, I think a great deal of Mr. GREEN personally. I only hope, and I hope intensely, that my relations with the future chairmen of the committee will be as pleasant as they have been with Mr. GREEN. I have every reason to expect and believe this, because I have great respect for the one I understand is to be the next chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HAWLEY]. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, in conclusion let me say I speak the sentiment of every Member of this House, Democrat and Republican, when I say that when the gentleman from Iowa leaves these portals to-morrow we wish him long life, we wish him good health, we wish him contentment and much happiness. [Applause, the Members rising.]

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, ladies, and gentlemen, in behalf of the Members from Iowa, Mr. GREEN'S immediate colleagues, I want to thank the majority and the minority leaders of the Ways and Means Committee for the kind things they have said about our colleague. We know they are all true, for we have known Mr. GREEN the longest and the most intimately.

This occasion is for us, his colleagues from Iowa, one fraught with pleasure and yet tinged with regret. We are pleased because our colleague at the end of his services in this House is receiving the praise of all without regard to past or party differences. It is a recognition we would covet not only for him but for his State. We have regrets that are akin to personal sorrows because he will meet here with us no more in this great national forum and because he will be more absent from us in the State where we have known him so long.

I think I have always known Mr. GREEN; at least, I am not conscious of a time when I did not know him. He has always been honored in his home State. As has already been said, he served for 17 years on the district bench and his services in that capacity were faithful, intelligent, and diligent. [Applause.] For an equal number of years he has served in the House of Representatives and what those services have been and how highly they have been esteemed by those most closely associated with him on the Ways and Means Committee we have already been told by the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HAWLEY] and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER]. It is in the committee rooms that men are most accurately measured. It is there that they are most tested and the approval that they receive there is generally the approval of the whole House.

We honor Mr. GREEN in Iowa beyond words that I can use to express it. He has brought to our State its second highest honor in the House of Representatives. The first honor belongs to the late Col. David B. Henderson, who attained the Speakership. The chairmanship of the Ways and Means Committee, which our colleague has held so long and so well, is, I think, easily the second honor that has fallen to our State in this House.

But best of all, ladies and gentlemen, is the consciousness that all the services which Mr. GREEN has rendered here to his State and to his Nation have been entirely and always for the public good. [Applause.]

A public career of 34 years is an honor to any man. No one can weather the political storms of so many years unless he has inherent merit in him. No one can retain the confidence of the people through so many political changes and vicissitudes unless he has the capacity for meritorious service. Mr. GREEN has withstood all those tests and he has survived all those storms and vicissitudes.

We are glad that our colleague is not retiring from public services. He is simply transferring them to the calling in which he first won distinction. He will work in surroundings more congenial and more in harmony with the years that are coming upon him than he could possibly find in this too-often turbulent body.

Mr. GREEN, I want to assure you, on behalf of your colleagues from Iowa, that it is with regret we part with you in this House. We shall miss you here where so many of us have so often sought your counsel and advice. We shall miss you in the old home State. I want to assure you also that you have now at this parting, as you have had through all the years, the esteem and the love of those who have been associated with you in official life both in Iowa and here in the House of Representatives. We wish you well in the new duties which you will undertake. We hope that the years of your life may be many more and that they may be happy years. And however many, we know that in your life and in all your work you will continue to honor your State. [Applause.]

Mr. OLDFIELD. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, while we all very much regret to lose Mr. GREEN as our chairman, we are all delighted that he has such a splendid position and one where he will feel so much at home. He was a judge on the circuit bench of the State of Iowa before he came to Congress. I know he will make a splendid judge. Mr. GARNER has told you, and properly, that Judge GREEN's heart is in the right place. There can be no question about this. Of course, I have not always agreed with Judge GREEN, but there has been no bitterness in any contest in which Judge GREEN and myself, or any other Democrat for that matter, have engaged. The fact is, I think if Judge GREEN lived down in my country he would be a splendid Democrat [laughter], because he certainly has done everything in his power to write a just taxation measure at every opportunity he has had, and he is one of the very few Republicans I know who, I believe, would do that if they were in his position. [Laughter.]

As I have said, of course, we do not always agree. If I agreed with any Republican about everything I would be suspicious about myself. [Laughter.] But we really love Judge GREEN. He is a wonderful companion. He has been most courteous and kind to every member of the committee. He has had quite a burden to carry. I do not think there is any Member of this House who fought more courageously against the powers that be not only in his own administration but the powers that be in his own State on the estate-tax proposition. [Applause.] They sent a great delegation to Washington from both the State of Iowa and the State of Texas, and I have always believed they did this for the purpose of embarrassing and for the purpose of forcing Judge GREEN and JACK GARNER to do that which they knew they should not do—support the repeal of the estate-tax provision. The delegations from these two States filled our committee room, and be it said to the honor of Judge GREEN and JACK GARNER that they never wavered, they never flinched, they never flickered on any proposition that in their hearts they believed in. [Applause.]

The Ways and Means Committee is a great committee, and I think the chairmanship of that committee is one of the most powerful influences in our Government. We have had some wonderful chairmen. Uncle Joe Fordney was a wonderful chairman. I served under him, and I served under Claude Kitchin, one of the ablest men I ever have known and the greatest debater I ever saw on the floor of the House.

So we have been very fortunate, and I think we are fortunate that we are going to have an able gentleman to take Judge GREEN's place. [Applause.]

When the Democrats come into power again, which I hope will be in the near future, we will furnish also some able gentlemen, some one whom the Republican side of the Ways and Means Committee can also love as chairman of that committee.

Now, we wish Judge GREEN all the luck, all the pleasure, all the joy that comes to the office to which he is going to-morrow. We regret to see him go, and yet we are proud to see him honored by his President and his administration. [Applause.]

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Speaker, there is one thought that has been expressed here to-day with which I can not agree, and that is the intimation that after a person reaches the age of 70 years he should be here merely in an advisory capacity [laughter]; that after that period he must go on his way with a degree of stillness and with a voice very much moderated.

Whether we be old or young, it is the future that has the greatest significance for us, even though we be near to the twilight hour. I must say for Judge GREEN and myself that we do not agree with the intimation expressed. [Laughter.] Now, there is something pathetic whenever a Member leaves this House. It means the partial breaking away from friendships, from long associations; it means the end of service in this great forum. But how beautiful it is when such a tribute can be paid as has been rendered to-day by Republicans and Democrats alike to Judge GREEN, of Iowa. It means that, however intense their partisanship may be in politics, there is deep down a respect for every Member—for his honesty, his sincerity, and earnestness in public service, whatever his political views may be. Indeed, this must be so, for we could not have a House of Representatives in which all are cast in the same mold, in which all have the same views. Whence would there be progress if such were the case?

I can not add to the eulogy of Judge GREEN's services. He has brought in here three revenue bills, something more than a dozen settlements of foreign debts, and I would especially mention his most excellent management of the alien property bill, a measure which will have an influence far beyond our own border in that it speaks for peace and good will for one of the great nations of Europe, a nation with whose government and sovereign we were in a bitter war not long ago.

Judge GREEN, we are loath to say to you, "Farewell." When you have been invested with the new position we shall often think of you, and we hope that you will think of us—that your thoughts will turn to those here who have been your friends and who always will be your friends. We wish for you, in the new position which you are to take, success and efficiency, and we wish for you personally the richest blessings of health and of long life. [Applause.]

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to say a word, but it is perhaps not out of place that a Member of the minority outside of the radiant circle of the Committee on Ways and Means should take the opportunity to express his very great interest in this occasion and unite in what has been said about the gentleman who is on the point of terminating his service as a Member of the House. Now and then we encounter individuals who seem to diminish in importance the more we see of them; but now and then we encounter individuals of whom exactly the contrary is the case, and the latter is true with reference to our colleague, so far as I am concerned. [Applause.]

After all, of course, the personal qualities constituting character are the qualities which count for most. Those qualities are summed up in one term when it is literally applied and interpreted, and that is the term "gentleman"; and we can all say who know our friend that he has worn and wears without reproach "the grand old name of gentleman." [Applause.]

We are now reversing the sentiment of the Mark Antony pointment, usually describing such appointment as political. plause.] We could not under any circumstances come to say about our friend—

> The evil that men do lives after them;
> The good is oft interred with their bones—

because in his attitude and purposes there has been no evil, and only good. [Applause.]

One fact prompting me to say anything is that my own State of Virginia has given to the great office which Mr. GREEN has filled several distinguished men, among them the father of my colleague, Mr. TUCKER [applause], and I am glad to believe that the Iowa Representative has measured up to the high standard to which those Virginians conformed. [Applause.]

He now goes upon the bench. We have sometimes known those in the ranks of the judiciary who were under just criticism; but it is safe to say that he will never be under any deserved adverse criticism. [Applause.] I have not the slightest misgivings that our friend in his service on the bench will measure up to the example and to the conception of the greatest official whom the State of Virginia or any State has given to the Judiciary Department, John Marshall, and enjoy an honorable career as an able, incorruptible, industrious, patient, and therefore satisfactory judge. [Applause.]

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, as one who served with Judge GREEN and under him as a member of the committee of which he was chairman, and also in the relationship of majority leader to the chairman of a great committee, I wish to say a few words before Judge GREEN leaves this body. Others have spoken of his services in this body, and I shall not attempt to enlarge upon what they have said. What I shall say will be for the most part in regard to the qualifications for the work to which he is going, which his native ability and his services here give him for that position.

Judge GREEN was on the bench for 17 years before he came here, having been transferred by the people from the bench to this forum. He has now served for more than a third of a century in these two capacities. By his own volition he now goes back to his first love, the bench.

Mr. Speaker, in my judgment, the services that he has rendered here in the House fit him most preeminently for the work that he is to take up. There is a cult scattered pretty generally throughout the country who try to make people believe that a man who has served in political office is thereafter unfitted for the judicial ermine. Some headway has been made in that direction, so that when one who has served in other public office is appointed to the bench we have those who criticize the appointment, usually describing such appointment as political. Yet the history of our Federal bench, including the Supreme Court and the other courts of our country, disproves such a contention.

Men who have served their country in a legislative capacity such as Judge GREEN has, a political forum, if you will, have had the benefit of broadening influences that can not be gained in any other way. If I were called upon to make the selection of judges and had it within my power to do so, I would give high credit to services of that kind in making up my mind as to the probable fitness of a man for judicial work.

I regard the work done here by Judge GREEN in formulating and debating legislative propositions and in the thorough scrutiny and dissection of the bills that he has had to consider here in the House as of incalculable benefit to him in the work that he is about to take up. He will go from this forum and begin his new work not as a novice, but one who has had the benefit of a wide and broadening experience, which has eminently fitted him for the duties that he is to perform hereafter. The country is to be congratulated upon having in this important position the services of a man so well qualified, ripened in judgment as well as mature in years. I hope that he may serve on the bench to which he is going a term equal in length, as I am sure it will be in usefulness, to that served heretofore on the bench and equal to the period he has served here in this House. [Applause.] I know that I voice the wishes of both sides of the House when I say that we wish him Godspeed, good health, and a long and happy service in the distinguished position to which he is going. [Applause.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, after the remarks that have been made by my colleagues, relative to the services of Judge GREEN as a Member of this House, and as chairman of the great Committee on Ways and Means, there remains nothing that I can add. It has been my privilege to serve with Judge GREEN as a member of that committee for 10 years, and under him during his period as chairman. In all that time we have found him eminently fair, showing judicial temperament, both in the handling of the committee and in the character of the testimony presented to it. Frequently we hear Members of Congress referred to in a derogatory and perhaps in a derisive manner. I think the nomination of our colleague to this high position on the bench is a direct contradiction of such statements as that. I say that every Member of the House to-day can consider himself complimented in that the President of the United States has seen fit to select one of our Members for one of the highest judicial positions in the country. It shows that public service here is merited and sometimes rewarded. We Members may regard our positions on a higher plane as a result of this very proper appointment.

It has been said that Judge GREEN would not have received this honor had he not been in public life. Very likely that is true, because having distinguished himself for a period of 17 years by his service in this House, his qualifications for promotion in another line of public service were made perfectly apparent.

Judge GREEN, the Ways and Means Committee will miss your guiding hand. In order to accustom ourselves in a slight degree to our loss, a few days ago it was suggested that we have a meeting of the Committee on Ways and Means without your presence, and under the leadership of our incoming chairman. We did not want to unduly burden the future incumbent, the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HAWLEY], with too extensive labors at that first meeting, and so there was but one subject of business brought up. It was the unanimous, spontaneous, and nonpartisan view of the assembled committeemen that we wish you to take with you to your new position some evidence of our regard and appreciation. One of the requisites of a good judge is punctuality. Therefore we felt that as you assume your judicial position you ought to have a reliable timepiece, "made in America." [Applause.] I consider it a very great honor and privilege in behalf of the 24 remaining members of the Committee on Ways and Means, after your resignation, to present to you this slight token of our esteem and appreciation, and to assure you of our best wishes for your future success. We ask you to wear this timepiece, with chain attached, as a daily reminder of our association with you and as a memento of the love and appreciation of your colleagues of the Committee on Ways and Means. Your monogram is engraved on the outside and it bears within the case the following inscription: "Hon. WILLIAM R. GREEN. From his associates, Committee on Ways and Means, Seventieth Congress. March 30, 1928." [Applause.]

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, as the day approaches when I shall sever my connection with this House I find it is no easy task. It makes a pull at the heartstrings.

I came here before the Great War, passed through all its exciting years, and have remained until the normal conditions of peace have been with us for some years. History will write large the record of Congresses that raised $40,000,000,000, sent across the broad ocean 2,000,000 men, and had another 2,000,000 ready to go. Nor will it soon forget the Congresses that, after the termination of the greatest war ever known, have successfully brought the country back to a condition of peace with all nations and a prosperity seldom before seen. In this epoch-making period our country has become a world power, one of the greatest, if not the greatest, in the galaxy of nations. Those who have served here during any part of this era, or are serving now, have a right to be proud of the record of this House during all of this period and I rejoice that I have been able to take a part in it.

I know there are some who, for the sake of a few cents a line, are continually trying to depreciate Congress. There is nothing new in this. It has been the case from the beginning of our Government, and in fact ever since legislative assemblies have been founded, and always will be. There are always those who are incapable of construction or leadership themselves who fancy themselves capable to criticize those who lead in action. Then, too, there will be honest differences of opinion as to governmental policies. Every citizen has a right to criticize Congress, and proper criticism will often be helpful. But there is another class of critics who distort or misrepresent the acts of Congress, whom I wish might some time run for a place here in order that they might learn what the people of their districts think of them. [Applause.] I do not know of any of these who would not be glad to be here if they could get the votes. There is no system of government that is not subject to human frailties, but those who attack our system are met with an irrefutable argument in the unrivaled advancement of our Nation, whose affairs are directed by Congress.

The Members of this House belong to a body which shapes the destiny of a great Nation. Nowhere else are affairs of such supreme importance determined as by the House, which represents 110,000,000 people living in a land whose resources are incalculable and education most widely diffused. The mere membership in this House is an honor, and I value it most highly.

There are those who can only see great Congresses that loom up in the dim distances of the past. Speaker Reed once said, "A statesman is a successful politician who is dead." I do not need to defend Congress, but I wish the country could have an opportunity to understand better what Congress does. I am satisfied the historian of the future, with unbiased mind and discriminating eye, will do it justice. Permit me at this time to present an important fact for the record of the present day.

I have been here for nearly 17 years. Through the war and since I have seen great measures passed for raising and expending billions of dollars. The change in the wording of a phrase, even the placing of a comma, in bills passed by the Ways and Means Committee might change the measure to the injury of the country and to the immense benefit of some private individual or individuals. So, also, with appropriations, where a slight shift might change the action of the Committee on Appropriations from a proper to a highly improper course. During the war and after the war there were scandals in other departments upon which I shall not comment now. I wish, now, to call the attention of the country to the fact that, although the fierce light of publicity has continuously been turned upon Congress, there has not been during all these 17 years a shade of suspicion of graft or corruption cast upon the official acts of any Member of this House. [Applause.] There are few legislative bodies anywhere of which the same can be said, and I am proud that as my last act in Congress I can assert it without fear of contradiction.

I have always been one of those who believed in the prerogatives of Congress as established by the Constitution, and always desired to maintain the rights and privileges of the House. It is the duty of Congress under the Constitution to control legislative action, and I never have believed in its resigning those powers. On the contrary, I have always thought that Congressmen should not be merely rubber stamps to register the views of some one else. Rather, a Congressman should represent and lead his district. The people must always look to this House as the guardian of their liberties and the protection of the weak against the strong. Great powers result from great wealth, and if the time ever comes when the owners of swollen fortunes dictate the policies of our Nation, the day of the communist and the anarchist will be near at hand. [Applause.] I do not distrust the people. Their sober judgment, when sufficient opportunity is given for reflection, is usually a safe guide. Although not always correct even then, my study of history leads me to conclude that the intuition of the masses has, on the whole, been nearer right than the judgment of the classes.

So, also, I have confidence in the collective judgment of those who represent the people here. Those whom I see around me to-day were selected by their constituents because they had something in them that made them worthy of their post. Most of them were outstanding figures in their districts before they came here. I have over and over again observed the capacity and ability of those with whom I came in contact demonstrated on the most trying occasions. If I have had any measure of success during my service in Congress, I owe it largely to the efficient and extremely able support that has been given me by other Members, and especially by the members of the Committee on Ways and Means. I can not sufficiently express my appreciation of the fact that the House has always given me its confidence. Members have, of course, differed with me. As independent thinkers this must be so, but in the passage of great measures this confidence of the House has been an invaluable aid to me. The gentleman from Texas and myself have often clashed on this floor in a semihumorous way. I have forgotten the things he said on these occasions, but I shall always remember one appellation he gave me, because I think he was in earnest when he said it. He called me "the old Roman from Iowa." [Laughter and applause.] If I deserve it, it is the highest title that I ever had or ever will have.

The greatest compensation for service in the House is the association with so many good fellows—I hope the ladies will permit me to include them in the term. [Applause.] The Members must be such or they would not be here. To speak accurately, I would say that it is in part because of that characteristic that they have found favor with their people. The friendships formed here are not confined to one side of the aisle. Neither Republicans nor Democrats have a monopoly of those faculties which draw one Member to another. The most delightful associations that I have ever formed in my life I have made here, and I shall always treasure their memory.

I leave the House with the greatest regret. Those who know anything about Iowa politics realize that I had nothing to fear from the coming primary or election, but I felt the need of lightening my official duties and escaping from the annoyances and harassing features of political life, which have broken down so many men before their congressional careers should have ended.

I would be less than human if I did not deeply appreciate the kind words that have been said of me to-day—no doubt far more than is my due—and the beautiful watch that has been presented to me. I hope it will be preserved by my descendants as a memento of my services. I can only say that I have tried to be fair and just to all, and if I have an enemy in the House I do not know it, and I hope I never will. With the kindest feelings and best wishes to all, I bid you an affectionate adieu. [Prolonged applause, the Members rising.]

REREFERENCE OF A BILL

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that Senate bill 2306 be rereferred to the Committee on Indian Affairs. I do this after discussing the matter with the chairman of the Committee on Claims.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Montana?

There was no objection.

APPOINTMENT OF SECOND LIEUTENANTS

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on a bill I have introduced, H. R. 12452, further to provide for the national defense.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, in order that the readers of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD may understand the provision of H. R. 12452, which I am commenting upon, I hereby reproduce the terms of the bill in full:

Mr. McSWAIN introduced the following bill; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed:

A bill (H. R. 12452) further to provide for the national defense

Be it enacted, etc., That each year in order to determine and decide which individuals should be commissioned as second lieutenants in the Army, the Secretary of War shall arrange a single list of all the eligible persons that have made application for appointment as such, including the graduates of the United States Military Academy; and the names upon said single list shall be arranged without preference to any group, class, school, college, or academy where said persons may have graduated and without any discrimination in favor of or against enlisted men in the Army that have shown by examination and service record that they are qualified to be commissioned as officers, but said names upon said single list shall be arranged in the order of individual merit, ability, leadership, education, military training and experience, and personal aptitude for the service, including physique, temperament, and initiative.

SEC. 2. Beginning at the top of said single list so arranged, the President of the United States shall take in regular order a number of names equal to the number of vacancies in the Army to be filled by the appointment of second lieutenants, and shall appoint such persons to said office and nominate them to the Senate of the United States for confirmation, to the end, and with the purpose and intent, that the very highest quality of officer material, available from all possible sources, shall become officers in the United States Army.

SEC. 3. All acts and parts of acts inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. Speaker, the purpose of H. R. 12452 may not be manifest upon its face, but its correct interpretation and application should bring about such results as to commend itself to every fair-minded and just person that wishes to promote the efficiency of the Army. Undoubtedly that efficiency depends primarily upon the quality of officers in the Army. The purpose of the bill is to insure to the Army the very highest quality of individuals to become officers. How does the bill operate to thus insure the highest quality of officer material available from the young men of the Nation that wish to become Army officers? It is simply the application of common sense to the problem of filling vacancies in the grade of second lieutenants in the Army. All officer material is fed into the Army from the bottom. Every general must commence at least as a second lieutenant. Therefore, it is highly desirable that the second lieutenants be recruited from those individuals best qualified in character, education, military training, and general adaptability for the service.

The plan by which such highest available quality of young men is ascertained for commissions as second lieutenants is simple. It provides that from all sources, from all military schools, from all schools having Reserve Officers' Training Corps units, senior grade, from the ranks of the Army itself, and from the United States Military Academy, there shall be arranged a list and that vacancies shall be filled by commencing at the top of the list and taking names in the order of such arrangement until all vacancies are filled. The arrangement upon the list must be left to the Secretary of War, as directed by the bill, to take into consideration natural ability, character, qualities of leadership, personal initiative, education, military training and experience, and temperamental fitness for the service. He must arrive at the proper arrangement of these names upon the list by looking at the qualities and qualifications of each individual. That may be difficult to do, but it can be done. It is such a problem that requires somebody to exercise discretion and judgment. It may work injustices, but in human affairs ideal justice is not possible.

But, Mr. Speaker, it will accomplish better results than the present mechanical method. The present method consists in taking, first, all of the graduates of the United States Military Academy and offering commissions to every one of them if there be a sufficient number of vacancies. If it happens that there be enough graduates from the Military Academy to fill all the vacancies, then there is no chance for anyone else, however well qualified, however much military experience he may have, however preeminent may be his fitness for the service. Such an arrangement as now prevails must, if justified at all, proceed upon the theory that every single graduate of the Military Academy possesses higher qualifications in ability, character, education, military training, and temperamental fitness for the service than any other single individual throughout the whole Nation. Such an assumption can not be established by the facts. It is undoubtedly true that the qualifications of the graduates of the Military Academy are, on the whole and upon the average, very high. But knowing many of those graduates of all ages, and having appointed a number of cadetships, and knowing hundreds and thousands of men educated and trained in other institutions, I can not admit, and I do not believe that any reasonable person will affirm, that each and all of the graduates of the Military Academy possess higher qualifications in the particulars enumerated than all of the graduates of the other military schools and colleges throughout the Nation. As against 250 graduates a year at the Military Academy, there are more than 10,000 graduates of other military schools and colleges having military training in Reserve Officers' Training Corps, and surely among these thousands there will be found individuals that have abilities superior to the abilities of the inferior men graduating at the Military Academy. Any fair-minded person must admit the truth of these statements upon mere reflection. Therefore the purpose of the bill is of pre-eminent importance in the progress of national defense. For that reason it is my sincere desire that the War Department, seeing its justice, will report favorably upon its enactment and thus place it upon record as insisting that the very highest qualifications possible shall henceforth mark the officers of the United States Army.

THE M'NARY-HAUGEN BILL AND THE FITZGERALD-TYSON BILL

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the special order of the House the Chair recognizes the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] for 10 minutes. [Applause.]

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, there are in America two schools of thought with respect to the agricultural problem. One school of thought maintains that there is nothing Congress should do in order to stimulate agriculture throughout the Nation. Those who belong to this school of thought maintain that the farmer should be left to work out his destiny as best he can. The other school of thought maintains that in view of our economic system, and because of handicaps which that system has placed in the way of the prosperity of the farmer, it is the duty of Congress to act. I belong to the latter school of thought. I am profoundly convinced that there is a great agricultural problem with which it is our duty to deal, and to deal with now. I believe that certain legislation which has been proposed will bring measurable prosperity to the farmers of America.

I know there are those who put aside this question with a sneer. They characterize it as merely a calamity howl. The figures of the Census Bureau do not sustain this view. There were in 1910 more farmers in America who owned their own homes than there were in 1925. Let me give you the exact figures. In 1910 the full owners of farms throughout the Nation was 3,948,722. In 1925, 15 years thereafter, there were 3,868,332 persons who were full owners of their homes and farms; that is to say, in 1925 there were in this Nation 80,390 less persons who were full owners of their homes and farms than there were in 1910. Mr. Speaker, these figures reveal a tragedy. There has been great prosperity and development in many lines of industry and manufacture since 1910. The wealth of the Nation has enormously increased. It is even said that the wealth of the Nation has almost doubled since 1910. Great fortunes have been made in many lines of endeavor. The deposits in our banks have increased amazingly. I was told recently by a gentleman well informed in financial matters that the banks of New York during the past winter had so much money on deposit that they were sending out persons soliciting loans at a very low rate of interest. He said these banks had more money than they could loan at the usual rate of interest and in order to keep their deposits working they were sending out agents urging people to borrow these deposits at a low rate of interest. Transactions on the stock market have risen to fabulous figures. On one day this week 4,700,000 shares of stock changed hands on the New York Stock Exchange. On several days during the current week more than 3,000,000 shares changed hands. Stocks in many corporations have advanced to a point no one ever supposed the price of these stocks would reach. Railroad stocks, which sold less than seven years ago for $20 per share are selling to-day for more than $100 per share. America has become the dominating nation in the financing of the world, yet amidst all this prosperity little, if any, prosperity has touched the farmer, except possibly during two or three years. His condition is even worse to-day than it was in 1910.

I have not the figures before me, but I am told that the number of home owners in the cities is very much larger than the number of city home owners in 1910. The cities have gone forward while the farmers upon whom the Nation must depend for all permanent prosperity have gone backward. He is gradually but steadily losing his home.

Much of the prosperity which the Nation has enjoyed is attributable to discriminatory legislation by Congress. The manufacturer enjoys a practical subsidy. The tariff laws protect him to a large extent from foreign competition. When by law you cut off competition you are practically conferring a subsidy. The railroads by law are permitted to charge a fair return upon their investment. We have spent millions in improving the ports of our cities in order that commerce might freely come and go. Yet when it is suggested that Congress should legislate in the interest of the farmer, the reply is made that the farmer must take care of himself, that the cry for agricultural relief is merely a calamity howl, that the farmer can work out his own salvation without any help, that if he does not prosper it is because he is lazy or incompetent, that he needs no help from Congress or from any other source. I would to God, Mr. Speaker, that it were true that the American farmer needs no help, but when the reports of the Census Bureau tell me that the home owner of the farm is on the decrease, when the number is less now than 18 years ago, when more than 1,000 banks in the agricultural sections failed in less than four years, when thousands of farmers have given up in despair and see their homes and farms put up under the hammer of the auctioneer, when auction sales are on the increase, when hard-working farmers are unable to pay even their taxes, I can not rid myself of the profound conviction that it is the duty of Congress to act in some way and to act now.

Mr. Speaker, if those who believe there is a great farm problem with which it is the duty of this Congress to deal are divided, we can not hope to accomplish very much. In the last Congress I voted against the McNary-Haugen bill. The President vetoed the McNary-Haugen bill, and even if the friends of farm relief had been at that time united, the measure could not have been passed over the President's veto. I preferred another measure. I thought it was more practicable to begin the great effort to stimulate agriculture by passing the so-called Aswell bill, but the majority of those who favor action in respect to the agricultural problem were of a contrary opinion. The McNary-Haugen bill, amended in many respects, now has a favorable report from the Committee on Agriculture. Inasmuch as I can not get exactly what I want, I am going to accept the measure upon which a large majority of the friends of agricultural relief in this House have agreed, and I do this without apology to any man. [Applause.] I accept this measure because, as I have said, it is the best I can get. I accept it because it comes from the committee with amendments which have greatly improved the McNary-Haugen bill passed by the last Congress. Therefore I shall vote for the McNary-Haugen bill when it comes up for consideration in this House because I am profoundly convinced it is my duty to do so. [Applause.] I shall vote for it because I believe the sentiment of the district I have the honor to represent is overwhelmingly in favor of some action by Congress with respect to the agricultural problem. I shall vote for it because every farm organization in America with a single exception has indorsed the measure. I shall vote for it because, to my sorrow, I see the tenant class increasing, while the home-owner class is decreasing in number. And this is particularly true of the section from which I come. I shall vote for it because it is the only measure which will be helpful to the farmer upon which I will have the opportunity to vote before this session of Congress ends.

I believe there is much in our economic system, built up by legislation, which is inherently wrong. God knows I would change the system if I could, but I am confronted by a condition and not a theory, and because of this condition I say to you gentlemen of the House of Representatives, inasmuch as the system is here, the time is at hand for the Congress to do something to inject life and health into the agriculture of the Nation.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POU. I yield.

Mr. DOUGHTON. I will ask my colleague if it is not also a fact that not only home owners have greatly decreased, but farm mortgages and farm indebtedness have greatly increased?

Mr. POU. I understand that to be true.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this is about all I intended to say at this time. I hope the McNary-Haugen bill will be speedily brought into this House for discussion and for action. I am quite sure the Committee on Rules will report favorably a special rule providing for early consideration of the measure.

Mr. Speaker, the McNary-Haugen bill is, after all, but an experiment. After it becomes a law, it is quite probable that certain amendments may be found desirable. Those who oppose legislation of this character may as well understand that the fight for farm relief has just begun. I submit that those who have opposed legislation for farm relief may well pause and consider now. There are, gentlemen, Members on both sides of the center aisle who represent agricultural districts and who know that there is no prosperity amongst millions of farmers in this Nation. If the efforts of these men are not successful in this session of Congress, the fight will be resumed in the December session. If they are not successful in the December session, the fight will be resumed in the next Congress. The fight will never end until there is legislation which will inject some measure of prosperity into the agriculture of this Nation, or until our present vicious, unjust, and un-American economic system is changed by law. This system has stood so long that no one can reasonably hope for a change in the very near future. Therefore, those who know that agriculture is to a large degree stagnant throughout the Nation must unite for some legislation which will bring measurable relief.

After all, Mr. Speaker, we are only asking for justice. Some years ago there was a great man in the White House who had a way of coining phrases which people could not forget. That man was Theodore Roosevelt. [Applause.] I am proud to number myself as one of his friends. He frequently made use of a phrase of two words which people can not help remembering whenever the name of Theodore Roosevelt is mentioned. These two words were "square deal." Here to-day, in my humble way, I am asking only for a square deal for the farmers of America. These men are not asking for a subsidy. They are only asking that, inasmuch as the manufacturer is protected, inasmuch as the railroad is permitted to exact a profitable return, that they, too, shall be considered by the Congress in the legislation which the Congress enacts. Inasmuch as Congress by legislation has given to the manufacturer a profitable market, the farmers of America have a right to ask that Congress legislate in order to enable them to dispose of their surplus crop at a fair profit. You have given the manufacturer a market in which there is no destructive competition in the protective laws you have passed. The farmer has a right to ask, indeed, has the right to demand, that Congress should also help him find a profitable market for the surplus product of his toil. In making this request, I say in the name of Theodore Roosevelt, the farmer is only asking a square deal. He demands nothing more, he has a right to expect nothing else.

I can not resume my seat, Mr. Speaker, without referring to another measure, which, I submit, ought to have consideration before this session of Congress adjourns. I shall only take a moment of time. I refer to the disabled emergency Army officers' retirement bill. Let me give you the parliamentary history of this measure. In the Sixty-seventh Congress the so-called Tyson-Fitzgerald bill passed the Senate by a vote of 50 to 14; in the Sixty-eighth Congress it passed the Senate by a vote of 63 to 14; in the Seventieth Congress it passed the Senate February 15, 1928, without a record vote.

Mr. Speaker, since the armistice was signed 500 of these wounded officers have passed into the great beyond. If we are going to do anything, Mr. Speaker, in this regard, it ought to be done now. I understand the committee has made a favorable report. Now, I submit, in view of the legislative history of this measure, it should be included in the legislative program of this House. Let us meet the issue squarely. Let us vote this measure up or down. The measure should not be defeated by strangulation. Parliamentary tactics certainly should not prevent consideration.

Mr. HAMMER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POU. I yield.

Mr. HAMMER. As a member of the Rules Committee, may we not have a special rule to consider the bill?

Mr. POU. You will have at least one vote, and I believe you will have a rule from the Committee on Rules whenever the request is made. I will say to my colleague from North Carolina that in the last Congress the Committee on Rules granted a special rule providing for the consideration of this eminently just measure, but the rule was agreed to during the closing days of the last Congress, and for some reason action was not taken.

Remember, gentlemen, these are the officers who led the charges in the great World War. Their wounds bear testimony to the part they took in the struggle to save civilization to the world. They are the men who led the charge at Chateau Thierry on that hot July day, a charge that was followed up with other charges which never ended until the Germans were brought to their knees.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POU. Yes.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Is the gentleman referring to the Fitzgerald-Tyson bill?

Mr. POU. I am.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I think there is hardly anyone in my district who has not petitioned me in favor of that bill.

Mr. POU. I am glad to hear it.

Mr. Speaker, I am convinced there has not been a minute since the Tyson-Fitzgerald bill passed the Senate the first time when it would not have received a majority vote in this House if a vote could have been had. There are only a little more than 3,000 of these officers living; originally there were thirty-five hundred. Let us not sidetrack this measure, but let us pass it if we are going to pass it at all before more of these men die. Because of their wounded condition the mortality among these officers is larger than it would otherwise be. Officers in the Navy from civil life enjoy the privilege of retirement similar to those embodied in the Fitzgerald-Tyson bill. Let there be no discrimination against similar officers of the Army. The necessary appropriation will not be large. As I have said, already 500 of these officers have died. Let us, before this session ends, pass this act of justice to the remaining 3,000. [Applause.]

SECOND INTERNATIONAL IMMIGRATION AND EMIGRATION CONFERENCE

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. SNELL). Under the special order the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCREYNOLDS] is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I have asked for this time to discuss H. R. 10167, which is a bill to authorize the President to accept the invitation of the Cuban Government to appoint delegates to the Second International Immigration and Emigration Conference, to be held at Habana commencing on to-morrow, March 31, 1928.

This bill is now pending on the calendar of this House. The bill was introduced and referred to the Foreign Affairs Committee, of which I am a member, and was reported out by that committee over my protest.

When the committee met on last Tuesday, they designated the bills of that committee that were to be called up by its chairman on Calendar Wednesday, day before yesterday, and this bill was one among the number. On that date, the chairman, after calling other bills, notified me that he would call this bill next, and at that time I raised the point that there was no quorum in the House and the Members were called to the House, and I am informed so soon as many found out the character of this bill they signified such opposition that the chairman refused to call it.

Feeling that I am somewhat responsible for the failure of the passage of this bill up to this date, I desire to state my reasons for so doing.

This bill was drawn by the State Department and sent to the chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee for introduction, as is the usual manner in cases of this character. Although the Secretary of State had knowledge of the fact that the passage of this bill was bitterly contested and doubtful as to its passage, regardless of the responsibility of Congress, he has seen fit to have the delegates appointed to attend this convention, and I presume that they are either now in Cuba or on their way. This is merely another demonstration of the high-handed proceedings that are often resorted to by departments to use their own power, even if that is in question. I feel that the action of the Secretary of State in this matter is an unwarranted act on his part, and one which deserves rebuke by this legislative body.

Why was it necessary for that department to have this bill introduced if they did not feel that it was necessary to have the concurrence of Congress, yet now they are acting upon their own initiative.

Shortly, I might say, that I consider the immigration question purely a domestic one, about which we do not need the suggestions or concurrences of other nations. The policy of this Government has been thoroughly established on this question by the immigration act, which was passed in May, 1924. It took many years to establish this right, that Congress should control immigration, as required by the Constitution of the United States. In the early history of this country it was left to treaties and conventions.

The treaty between the United States and China, proclaimed February 5, 1870, contains the following language:

> The United States of America and the Emperor of China cordially recognize the inherent and inalienable right of man to change his home allegiance, and also the mutual advantage of the free migration and emigration of their citizens and subjects, respectively, from the one country to the other for purposes of curiosity, of trade, or as permanent residence.

Anyone who is familiar with the history of this country and the result of this agreement and the effects that it had upon the people of California when that country was overrun by the Chinese can readily understand the irrevocable injury and great disaster that was happening to our country. Various agreements were made through the State Department modifying this agreement, but the people of this country did not get relief from what was known at that time as the "Chinese peril" until the exclusion acts were passed in 1882 for a period of 10 years and then in 1892 made permanent. This was the result of this country endeavoring to treat the immigration question as a matter of treaty.

Another evidence of this country undertaking to treat with other countries on this subject was in 1908, when President Roosevelt made what was called a "gentlemen's agreement" with Japan, which was not even submitted to the Senate of the United States for ratification, and, it might be said, did not rise to the dignity of a treaty, yet was respected by this country for some 16 years.

There were those in this country at that time, and even up to this time, who advocate that questions of immigration should be left to the powers of state either by treaties or conventions.

The Hon. George W. Wickersham, formerly Attorney General of the United States, is quoted as saying that immigration matters should be dealt with, so it seemed to him, by negotiations with these foreign countries. The agreement which might be reached through negotiation would not necessarily be a treaty but the sort of agreement which customarily is made by the executive branch of our Government, as, for example, the International Postal Convention.

There is quite a range of international agreements not rising to the dignity of a treaty respecting which throughout our history the executive Government has acted without reference to the treaty-making power.

If such agreements were made and accepted as a means of regulating immigration, it would rob Congress of control over our domestic policy and partially surrender to foreign countries an agreement as to our internal affairs. The control of immigration by treaties or conventions would endanger the rights of the American people in a most serious problem. This question was absolutely settled by Congress in May, 1924, when the immigration act was passed, to which I have heretofore referred; but even when that act was under consideration before the committee of the House the executive department sent to that committee an amendment to be inserted in the following language as an exception to section 3:

> An alien entitled to enter the United States under the provisions of a treaty.

This amendment was unanimously rejected, but had it been adopted the immigration question would have been controlled by the State Department whenever it saw fit to make a treaty.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. That may have been proposed in those words, but it was intended to fulfill the words of then existing agreements, and thereupon the committee wrote into the law a provision permitting aliens to come under then existing treaties.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I thank the gentleman for his suggestion.

After this amendment was refused, evidently not willing to relinquish their power, the State Department submitted to the conferees an amendment which provided that certain provisions of this bill shall not apply to the nationals of those countries with which the United States, after the enactment of this act, shall have entered into treaties by and with the advice of the Senate by the restriction of immigration. Do not these amendments as sought by them show plainly that the State Department at that time still desired to leave the question of immigration open to treaties made by that department?

It is the history of all the departments that they are always seeking more power and oppose the relinquishment of any power which they possess. This is true of all the departments of Government, and if power is continued to be given to them it would result in a bureaucratic form of government which is even worse than a monarchial form of government, because bureaucracy is not responsible to anyone. As was said by my distinguished colleague on the floor of the House a few days ago, in a monarchial form of government you would know who to shoot or hang.

The committee, in making their report on this bill, quotes the Secretary of State's letter to the President requesting this authorization. In that letter, among other things, he says, first, the United States appears to be in some degree committed to the participation in this convention, not only by reason of the fact that it was formerly represented in its previous conference held in Rome in 1924, but more especially because one of the members of the delegation of this country voted in favor of the convening of a second conference.

It is customary that whenever the President desires to appoint delegates to a convention or international conference that he comes into Congress for an authorization for the appropriation to cover their expenses, such as was done in the bill now pending. Why should we, as Members of Congress, vote for this present authorization and be bound from the fact that we had delegates to the other conference, when no authorization or resolution was offered in this House to provide for the expenses of the delegates that attended the conference in Rome in 1924? Why was not a resolution offered at that time? It was due to the fact that the immigration bill was then pending in Congress, and Congress had refused to amend that bill as suggested by the State Department, leaving matters of immigration to international agreements, and the State Department well knew that no such resolution could be passed during that Congress. The result was that the President appointed five delegates to attend that convention without the knowledge of Congress, and we are now asked to use their acts as a reason for our action. As a matter of fact, only one member out of that delegation voted for that resolution.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Yes.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. Did any harm come from participation in the Rome conference?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I shall get to that in a few minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. It got us into this conference anyway.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I might ask, did any good come from it?

The act of the Secretary of State at that time, requesting the President of the United States to appoint delegates to the Rome conference, is further evidence that that department did not want to relinquish the right to determine this great domestic question by treaties or agreements. Had we given the right at that time to participate, we no doubt would have been responsible for our delegates' actions and embarrassed if we did not accept this second invitation.

What was discussed in the Rome conference? The conference was divided into four sections, and two of the sections were as follows:

> The measures to be taken to adapt emigration to the demand for labor in the countries of immigration, for cooperation between the immigration and emigration services of different countries.

Another:

> The general principles which should be adopted in treaties of immigration and emigration.

What do you think of this country sending delegates there to consider this question which had just been settled by Congress, or why should they attend this conference to discuss matters of this kind?

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Yes.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Might we not go there to confirm the position we have taken? And would it not be an act of disrespect or discourtesy not to attend this conference?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I do not think so, and I do not want to bind Congress to some action which the State Department took upon this question.

It can not be conceived but that all of the nations of the world are thoroughly familiar with our policy, but if a personal explanation was necessary, why was it not done at the first international conference, when our policy was bound to be fresh in their memories? You will see from this that our delegates were attending the convention without authority from Congress, and discussing the very questions which we, in our immigration bill, had settled, and yet the State Department now recommends that we accept and appoint delegates to this second international conference on account of the fact that we participated in the first conference.

In view of these facts, to pass such a resolution would be a ratification of their acts and a reflection upon this body. Many questions were discussed in that conference, such as passport and contracts, emigrants' charters, colonization, regulation of recruitment, and the statements were made and insisted upon by many delegates that it was competent to examine all questions concerning emigration and immigration.

Here are some of the principles finally adopted by that conference for transmission to the governments who had participated: The first, the right to emigrate though restrictions may be embodied for reasons of public policy or economic reasons, or for protection of material and moral interests of the emigrants themselves; the right to immigrate, though restrictions may be imposed for economic and social reasons, based in particular upon the state of the labor market and the necessity of safeguarding the hygienic and moral interests of the country of immigration; freedom of immigration and emigration should be recognized in the case of different members of the family of an immigrant already established in the country of immigration, unless there are personal reasons making this undesirable; that emigrants should enjoy such rights on the same conditions as nationals and on the same basis of reciprocity.

These are some of the principles that were adopted in that conference, and a copy of which was sent to all the countries who participated. You can readily see from what I have quoted above that various resolutions were passed at that conference about matters of which we have absolute control through Congress, and have already passed laws concerning the same.

It was argued by many delegates, according to the proceedings published, that immigration and emigration was an international question, and that the problems of immigration and emigration should be treated internationally.

What benefit did this Government derive from this conference? All of the resolutions adopted by that conference were transmitted to this Government, and upon my inquiry of the State Department a few days ago as to what action, or what had been done, with these resolutions, I was informed that the same had been filed in the Treasury Department and in the Labor Department without comment. Regardless of this fact, we are now asked to provide money for the expenses of what might be called another "junketing trip."

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield? Did not the American delegates make known the policy of this country as to immigration?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. About that I have no knowledge, but I am advised now that they want to go down there so that they can tell the other countries of the world what our settled policy is.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The world knows it by this time.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. It certainly would be presumed that they know it.

A few days ago, on March 19, I addressed a letter to the State Department requesting that they advise me as to what specific instructions were given to the delegates who attended the Rome conference. The answer to that inquiry was in diplomatic form, but said that this was considered confidential. In the same letter, inquiry was made as to out of what funds their expenses were paid, and the answer from the State Department was that their delegate was paid out of the general funds. They have what is known as an emergency fund in that department, and I presume that they felt that an emergency had arisen to send these delegates to Rome in 1924, and it was out of that fund, evidently, that the expenses of the delegate from the State Department were paid. Two delegates went from the Labor Department, and I am informed, not by that department, that their expenses were paid out of the immigration fund. I am rather of the opinion that the appropriations made for the enforcement of the immigration laws were not intended for the payment of delegates' expenses to an international conference on immigration.

Now, what do they propose to discuss at this second international conference? By examining the agenda I find that they are similar matters as those that were discussed in the other conference, such as professional selection of emigrants before starting from their country of origin; exchange of workers desiring to improve in the knowledge of the language or industrial and commercial customs of another country; agreement between countries concerned in wanting to favor the colonization of uncultivated lands; simplification of the visa formalities for immigrants; limitation of immigration only for the purpose of protecting the home labor market, and not to be applied to the members of the immigrant's family.

These are questions which strike at the very vitals of our present immigration laws, and the enforcement of which we consider absolutely necessary for the protection of our character of government, our standard of living, our institutions, and our liberty.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for five minutes more.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. There is also to be a report from the different countries as to what has been done by their respective countries toward putting in effect the resolutions adopted by the Rome conference. We have not as much right to meet in a conference on the question of immigration as we have on the right of the tariff, and I am sure you all are familiar with the embarrassing situation that arose at the Pan American conference which was held in Cuba not long since over the discussion of the tariff.

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Yes.

Mr. EDWARDS. Is it a fact that delegates have actually been named to this Habana conference without authority of law?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. In so far as this House is concerned, yes; without authority from this House. As to whether or not the President has the right to appoint delegates to a convention without the concurrence of the House, probably he has.

There are bills now pending before this Congress to regulate and control immigration from some of the Latin American countries, and, of course, their interests in that case will not be our interests.

It is insisted by some that by appointing delegates to this convention that we can be of great assistance to certain South American countries. The trouble with this Government at the present time is that they are undertaking to interfere too much and control the internal affairs of the South American Republics. We are not requested by them, neither is it our duty, to become the guardian of the South American countries; in fact, they resent it; they are entitled to exercise the sovereignty of their own nations, and on account of the policy which we have recently pursued in Nicaragua many of our boys are being ruthlessly murdered.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. They are not there by act of Congress?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Not by any means.

From recent developments it seems that the party in power will have sufficient to do to keep their own household in this country in order, and when they do, we will have less crimes and misdemeanors in high places, which have shocked and horrified the citizenship of this great Republic. [Applause.] The United States of America is our home, and it is our duty to protect it, and we can not protect it unless we have proper restricted immigration laws. Ever since the immigration act of 1924 was passed there has been a continuous effort on the part of certain organized minorities to lessen our restrictions, and it behooves the American people to see that not even the first step is taken that would in any wise cause this to be done.

American institutions rest solely upon the character of our citizenship. The people of the United States through their representatives in Congress should determine what character of people should come to this country, how many, and under what conditions. This is the power that we are exercising now, and it is the power we should continue to exercise, and no authority whatever should be delegated to anyone directly or indirectly to meet in convention with other nations to consider or discuss our established policy. It is too vital to our Nation, too vital to our institutions, our standard of living, our laws, and our rights as a free and independent people.

America must be kept American, without hindrance and without chance of being embarrassed, by being brought into a foreign conference of this character. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. LAGUARDIA). The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has again expired. By special order of the House the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LOWREY] is recognized for 15 minutes.

THE RESTORATION OF THE LEE MANSION

Mr. LOWREY. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, a piece of legislation which carries more than ordinary significance and interest recently passed both Houses of the Congress, and has now been signed by the President and thus becomes law. I refer to that paragraph of H. R. 10286 which provides $10,000—> for making an investigation and survey to determine the condition of the building and repairs necessary, and for commencing the restoration of the Lee Mansion as authorized in Public Resolution 74, approved March 4, 1925.

For years there has been a growing and a commendable feeling that Arlington should in some way be marked and remembered as the home of the heroic leader of the Confederate Army. John Ball Osborne, Military Order of the Loyal Legion, says in his book, The Story of Arlington:

Arlington will always remain closely associated with the name of Gen. Robert E. Lee, the leading military figure of the Southern Confederacy, for it was his home during 30 years and the place where his happiest days were spent.

Thirty years ago I came to Washington, as people occasionally do, with a party of sightseers, about a hundred people, all of them southerners. Most of them were on their first visit to the National Capital. I noted with grief, and yet with approval, their expressions that in and around the splendid residence of Robert E. Lee there was not one thing to remind us by atmosphere that this was once his home. There mingled into our party a stalwart New Englander, who had come to visit the grave of his father. As he heard these expressions from my southern friends, he quietly remarked, "I don't blame them; I should feel that way myself."

From that day to this I have had a growing conviction that this thing ought to be changed, and that one day it would be changed. "His enemies themselves being judges," Lee stands as one of the purest and gentlest and at the same time one of the most brilliant and heroic men in American history.

An editor of a great New York magazine referred to him recently as the most splendid and heroic character of the Civil War, and said, "I am glad to have the columns of this magazine used to honor his name." When I spoke from this floor on this subject some years ago, the lamented Congressman Osborne, from California, was the only Union veteran in the House. He wrote me a letter of cordial appreciation and assured me he considered it a privilege to join in such a cause.

Seven years ago, within two months after I began my service in the Congress, I began my advocacy of this measure with a speech in which I urged that the home of Lee should be restored, should be kept in its original form and beauty, and, like the home of Washington, should be held sacred in the hearts of our people. It has taken seven years for this to come to pass, but I remember the patriarch of old who served seven years, and then another seven, before he got the full desire of his heart. During these years I have often discussed this matter publicly and have urged it through personal appeals and private interviews enough, perhaps, to gain the reputation of a nuisance and a crank with people who were not interested in the subject. But I have found all along some happy surprises as to people who showed a vital interest in the matter. One of the most ardent advocates of the cause has been that brilliant penwoman, Mrs. Frances Parkinson Keyes, of New Hampshire, who was born in Virginia and maintains a spirit of loyalty and devotion to the Old Dominion and its people. Again, Public Resolution 74 was brought before the House and sponsored by Representative CRAMTON, of Michigan, son of a Union soldier, who has said to me that he received his high opinion of Robert E. Lee from his good father, who went South and fought against Lee for four years.

I think it might be interesting to have just here something of a brief history of Arlington.

On January 6, 1759, Mrs. Martha Dandridge Custis, a beautiful and wealthy young widow of Virginia, became the wife of Col. George Washington, the hero of Braddock's field. By this marriage Colonel Washington became the stepfather to two children, John Parke Custis and Martha Parke Custis. After their honeymoon Colonel and Mrs. Washington with the two children took up residence at Mount Vernon. The girl Martha, died at Mount Vernon in her seventeenth year. At 21 years of age the boy, who had come to be known as Jacky Custis, was married to Eleanor Calvert, aged 16, the daughter of Benedict Calvert, of Mount Airy, Md., and a descendant of Lord Baltimore.

During the latter years of the Revolution this stepson served as aide on the staff of General Washington. At the siege of Yorktown he was stricken with camp fever and died there immediately after the surrender of Cornwallis. General Washington adopted two children of this stepson, Eleanor, or Nellie, aged 2½ years, and George, aged 6 months. Thus General and Mrs. Washington, in their declining years, had again in their home two children, a boy and a girl, by the name of Custis, this time the grandchildren of Mrs. Washington.

In 1799 the illustrious master of Mount Vernon passed away, and was followed some three years later by his devoted wife. Mount Vernon became the property of Justice Bushrod Washington, a nephew of the general, and the grandson, George Washington Parke Custis, now 21 years of age, took up his abode on the Arlington estate. By reason of inheritance from both his father and his grandfather, he had just become one of the wealthiest men in the State of Virginia. On Arlington Heights, just across the Potomac from the new Capital City of the Nation, he erected a splendid mansion, with a frontage of 140 feet, and built of brick which had been made and burned on the premises under Mr. Custis's own supervision. The grand portico, 60 feet wide and 25 feet deep, and uplifted by eight massive Doric columns, is modeled after the Temple of Theseus at Athens. This mansion was completed in the year 1803, and it still stands in good state of preservation, looking majestically across the Potomac over the splendid National Capital, which has now grown to a city of more than a half million people.

At the age of 23 George Washington Parke Custis was married to Mary Lee Fitzhugh, aged 16, a descendant of the Randolphs from Virginia. The young couple took up their home in the newly completed Arlington house, where they reared their only daughter, Mary Ann Randolph Custis. As this beautiful Virginia heiress blossomed into young womanhood there came among her admirers a frequent visitor to Arlington, young Robert Edward Lee, a son of the dashing Revolutionary hero, Light-horse Harry Lee, and a descendant of an illustrious line of Lees coming all the way down from the days of William the Conqueror and the Norman Conquest. In 1829 young Lee graduated from West Point, second in his class. And two years later, in the drawing-room of Arlington House, the Rev. William Meade, afterwards Bishop Meade, performed the marriage ceremony uniting the lives of Lieut. Robert Edward Lee and Mary Ann Randolph Custis.

Although Lieutenant Lee had inherited the ancestral estate at Stratford, where some of his distinguished ancestors had been born and had spent their lives, he yielded to the earnest wishes of his wife's parents and took up his home at Arlington. This was the permanent home of the Lee family up to the 22d of April, 1861, when they went to Richmond, where Colonel Lee became General Lee, commander of the Confederate forces.

Not lightly or recklessly, as some have supposed, but with deep devotion and with deep emotion Colonel Lee resigned his commission in the Federal Army and, remaining loyal to his native State, consecrated his sword to the service of Virginia and the Confederacy. On Saturday, April 20, 1861, Lee wrote to Gen. Winfield Scott, resigning his commission as an officer in the Union Army. In that letter he said: "Save in defense of my native State I never again desire to draw my sword." And Mrs. Lee said later: "My husband has wept tears of blood over this matter." General Lee said to Mr. Blair, who sounded him at the request of President Lincoln about taking command of the Union Army, "Mr. Blair, if I owned the 4,000,000 slaves of the South I would sacrifice them all to the Union; but how can I draw my sword upon Virginia, my native State?"

When Lee and his family went to Richmond they left Arlington in the hands of John McQuinn, a faithful overseer of the family. Almost immediately the Union forces swept across the Potomac, took possession of Arlington Heights, and fortified it strongly as one of the important defenses of the Capital City against the armies of the Confederacy. The old mansion became the headquarters of the officers, and upon the surrounding grounds there arose a city of tents; the once spacious and peaceful lawns and groves resounded to the tramp and noise of a great military camp. From that day to this Arlington has remained in the possession of the United States Government.

As the Civil War progressed and military camps and hospitals in the vicinity of Washingon multiplied, the number of deaths among the soldiery ran up into thousands, and the question of burial places became a serious one. On May 13, 1864, General Meigs ordered that the soldiers dying in the hospitals at Arlington should be buried on these grounds. He is said to have pointed out the exact spot on the terrace bordering the garden very near to the mansion, where he ordered that a dozen bodies awaiting burial should be immediately interred. It is somewhat singular that the first of these to be lowered into the grave was a Confederate prisoner of war, and the next who was laid beside him was a Union soldier. This action of General Meigs was promptly sanctioned by the Secretary of War, and under an order dated June 15, 1864, 200 acres of the estate, including the mansion, were appropriated for a military cemetery. Within one year from this date the number of graves on the premises had reached 5,003. After the close of the war many of the Federal dead from the battle fields and camps in easy reach of Washington were removed to Arlington, and by June, 1870, the number of graves had reached 15,932.

I shall not take time to review the legal proceedings by which the Government finally established the undisputed title to the Arlington estate. Of course, the Lees never returned to this ancestral home, and for years since the War between the States Arlington has been known solely as a national cemetery, dedicated to the memory of those who have given their lives in the military service of their country. Not only does it contain the graves of thousands of Union soldiers but of many who wore the gray, and of many sons of both the blue and the gray, who gave or offered their lives to their country's cause in both the Spanish-American and the World Wars.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. SNELL). The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. LOWREY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for four additional minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. LOWREY. We of the South have been called on to pay tribute to the valor of the North, and gladly we have paid it. As worthy foemen we have honored the soldiers in blue; as honest foemen we have respected them; as reunited brethren we have worked with them; as comrades in arms our sons have shed blood under a common flag with theirs through two wars in a common cause. For more than half a century our money has been added to theirs to pension the veterans of the Grand Army, against which we fought; to buy, beautify, and maintain Federal cemeteries from Gettysburg to Vicksburg; to erect monuments to Federal leaders.

The loyalty of the South is established, sealed with the blood of her sons. Before the secession she had given largely to the building of the Nation. Since the reunion she has given just as generously. I would not say that she has come back to the Union conquered, because in her attitude toward the Government she has exhibited none of the animus of defeat.

The South has come back with head erect and eyes unafraid, having fought to her last energy for a principle which she considered vital, but accepting the issue of battle with good grace and honest courage.

In true Southern and true American spirit we now accept this national tribute to Robert E. Lee, not as an expression of sympathy or mercy to an unworthy cause or a recreant people, but as an expression of a nation's honor to one of that nation's greatest heroes, who deserves every tribute that may be paid to his high character, his great ability, and his splendid achievements. [Applause.]

THE DISABLED EMERGENCY OFFICERS' BILL

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is the gentleman going to discuss the private bills we have been waiting on so long?

Mr. SIMMONS. No.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, as the gentleman from Georgia has pointed out, to-day is supposed to be given over to the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar and many Members have been waiting patiently for their bills to come up. It so happens that I am on the other side of the question which the gentleman from Nebraska desires to speak about, so it would not be in good taste for me to object; but if any Member has a private bill on the calendar now is the time to object. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. LINTHICUM. What subject is the gentleman going to talk about?

Mr. SIMMONS. Golf and the disabled emergency officers' bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, I do not want to object, but I just wonder whether this is going to lead to more requests for time to address the House. I think there should be a sort of gentlemen's understanding that we will take up the Private Calendar after the gentleman from Nebraska has finished his remarks.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Speaker, if there are further requests I shall object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Speaker, on March 16 Senator BINGHAM inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, beginning at page 4745, a list of the emergency officers of the World War who will be beneficiaries of that bill should Congress pass it. I called attention to that list a few days ago, and I call attention to it again in order that Members may study that list, as it shows the men in their States who are beneficiaries of it, and know definitely what they are voting for if they feel inclined to support that bill.

It has been called to my attention that in the State of South Dakota there is a disabled emergency officer who holds practically all of the amateur golf titles in the northern half of that State. Those of you who play the game of golf know that it requires a man of considerable physical acumen and muscle control to play it at all and to win championships. This man is now receiving $35 a month as compensation for a tumor on a nerve of his leg and for arthritis of the right shoulder and neck. That is the hardening of the muscles of the shoulder and of the neck. If the disabled officers' bill becomes a law that man will receive $218.75 a month for life. That is what you propose to pay the golf champion of South Dakota under the provisions of this bill. What does that mean? It means you are going to pay to that man more than a disabled soldier gets under the law who has a rating of double total disability. This Congress in its generosity two years ago gave blind men, men who lost their eyes in battle, $150 a month plus $50 a month for an attendant, or $200 that blind men receive who lost their sight in battle. We felt we were dealing fairly by them; and now you are asked to pay a man who is the golf champion of his State, or, at least, the northern part of it, more money for life than you give to a man who lost both of his eyes on the field of battle.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman surely can not take this one exceptional case as typical of many of the hundreds of deserving cases he has before him?

Mr. SIMMONS. No; but I call the attention of the House to it because the record is full of cases of that kind.

I may say there are some who have battle disabilities but they are the great minority on this list, and while we are discussing, generally, the list, it is the opinion of one of the leading lawyers in the Veterans' Bureau that this bill, as drawn and as reported to the House by the World War Veterans' Legislation Committee, will give disabled retirement pay to dishonorably discharged officers of the World War.

It gives no consideration whatever to the widows or the orphans of the men who are dead. I say these things in all fairness because I want the Congress to know the facts when this bill comes up, and I assume some time it must come up for a vote. If you will study this list that is in the RECORD you will find the men of your State who are the beneficiaries of it, and, of course, it is for the Members of the House to decide whether or not they want to grant these benefits to these men.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will this require the approval of the Budget?

Mr. SIMMONS. The bill does not have it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired.

STATEMENT ON H. R. 12349

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a unanimous-consent request. For the information of the House I should like the privilege of printing a very brief statement with regard to the bill (H. R. 12349) introduced by myself, proposing an amendment of the Federal reserve act increasing from 15 days to 90 days the maximum time limit of paper of a member bank secured by eligible paper.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. UNDERHILL. They are the gentleman's own remarks?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes.

There was no objection.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following brief statement with regard to the bill H. R. 12349, introduced by myself, proposing an amendment of the Federal reserve act increasing from 15 to 90 days the maximum time limit of paper of a member bank secured by eligible paper:

This bill would amend section 13 of the Federal reserve act so as to increase from 15 days to 90 days the maximum maturity of advances which Federal reserve banks are authorized to make to member banks on their promissory notes secured by paper eligible for rediscount or for purchase by Federal reserve banks under the provisions of the Federal reserve act or by the deposit or pledge of bonds or notes of the United States. The only change which it would make in the language of the present law would be to change the word "fifteen" to "ninety," and the only legal effect which it would have would be to extend the maximum maturity of such advances from 15 days to 90 days.

Prior to the establishment of the Federal reserve system banks borrowed from their correspondents on their own promissory notes secured by the pledge of collateral in the form of paper acquired from their own customers, Government bonds, or any other good security which they had to offer; and there was no legal limitation on the maturity of such borrowings. This was the well-established method of interbank borrowing, and was mutually satisfactory to both parties. The original Federal reserve act authorized Federal reserve banks to rediscount for their member banks notes, drafts, and bills of exchange arising out of commercial transactions having a maturity not in excess of 90 days, and notes, drafts, and bills of exchange issued or drawn for agricultural purposes with maturities not in excess of six months; but it did not authorize Federal reserve banks to make direct loans to their member banks on the promissory notes of such member banks secured by such paper as collateral. To many member banks, however, the necessity of rediscounting many separate pieces of commercial paper with varying maturities and in varying amounts seems cumbersome and inconvenient, and they prefer to borrow from their correspondent banks on their own promissory notes, as they were accustomed to do before the enactment of the Federal reserve act, rather than to change their method of borrowing, so as to avail themselves of the facilities of the Federal reserve system.

This situation was improved to some extent by the amendment of September 7, 1916, which authorized Federal reserve banks to make direct loans to their member banks on their promissory notes secured by paper eligible for rediscount or for purchase by Federal reserve banks or secured by bonds and notes of the United States; but the maturity of such promissory notes of member banks was limited to 15 days. The privilege thus afforded is used quite extensively by member banks located in the same cities as Federal reserve banks or branches or in near-by places; but it is not availed of to any great extent by country banks, which find it inconvenient to renew their notes every 15 days. This results in much dissatisfaction on the part of the country banks and is one of the reasons why more State banks do not join the Federal reserve system.

Friction and dissatisfaction with the Federal reserve banks on account of the necessity of rediscounting their customers' paper instead of borrowing on their own promissory notes secured by such paper also grows out of the fact that frequently the Federal reserve bank finds it necessary to decline to rediscount some of the paper offered because it is found to be technically ineligible for rediscount under the Federal reserve act or undesirable from a credit standpoint. On account of this contingency a member bank offering paper to a Federal reserve bank for rediscount frequently does not know how much of it will be accepted and how much will be rejected. Member banks located at a distance from the Federal reserve bank thus are frequently forced to submit to the Federal reserve bank for rediscount an amount of paper in excess of the amount of credit which they actually desire, in order to be sure to obtain as much credit as they need. This causes dissatisfaction on the part of country member banks and gives rise to further criticism of Federal reserve banks.

These difficulties would be entirely eliminated by the amendment proposed in this bill, because a country bank desiring a certain amount of credit could make out its promissory note to the Federal reserve bank for the exact amount which it desires to borrow and offer as collateral security for such note eligible paper from its portfolio in an amount in excess of the note. If all of the paper offered as security is found to be eligible for rediscount and acceptable from a credit standpoint, no harm is done, since the member bank has not borrowed any more than it needs and the excess amount of paper offered for collateral security can be returned to the member bank or held by the Federal reserve bank as a basis for future credit. If part of the paper is found to be ineligible for rediscount or undesirable from a credit standpoint, there probably will still be enough to secure the note of the member bank and it will not be disappointed in its application for credit. This is the way in which country banks have been accustomed to deal with their city correspondents and is entirely feasible if they are permitted to borrow on their own promissory notes for periods of 90 days, but is impractical from the standpoint of country banks if they are not permitted to borrow for more than 15 days.

It is believed, therefore, that the enactment of this bill will be of much benefit to the country banks and will eliminate one of the principal causes of dissatisfaction and criticism of the Federal reserve system. It can do no harm, because the notes must be secured by paper which is eligible for rediscount or for purchase by the Federal reserve bank under the existing provisions of the Federal reserve act or by bonds and notes of the Government of the United States which Federal reserve banks are now authorized to purchase under the provisions of section 14 of the Federal reserve act.

A similar amendment is recommended by the Federal Reserve Board on page 49 of its annual report for the year 1927, wherein the board says:

> It would save much trouble and expense to both the member banks and the Federal reserve banks, since it would eliminate the necessity of listing separately the various pieces of eligible paper offered as collateral and would at the same time eliminate the necessity of frequent renewals. It would be especially helpful to country banks which are now deterred by the necessity of frequent renewals from using this more convenient form of borrowing from the Federal reserve banks.

PRIVATE CALENDAR

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the order of the House bills unobjected to on the Private Calendar will be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole, beginning at the star.

The Clerk will report the first bill.

DISBURSING OFFICERS OF THE ARMY

The first business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7166) to allow credit in the accounts of disbursing officers of the Army of the United States on account of refunds made to purchasers of surplus war supplies.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. ROWBOTTOM. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, if the gentleman from Kansas will permit, I would like to ask the gentleman if he does not know that these goods were bought by these merchants "where is and as is"; and if this is true, why should we refund this money?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. When the Congress authorized the Secretary of War to dispose of surplus war material they would take up a certain class of material and advertise it. They would count the number of bales of blankets in a warehouse—supposing they were blankets, for instance—and then would advertise so many bales of blankets of a certain grade. They would receive bids and would accept the highest bid. When they delivered them the purchaser would sometimes find that some of these bales contained rags or contained materials that were not blankets, and worthless. They would call this to the attention of the War Department and the proper officers would investigate the matter and give them credit upon their bid for this worthless material. This was allowed by the claims division of the department, but when it went to the auditor the auditor said, "No; these goods were bought 'as is,' and you must collect for them." These items were then charged back against the officer. If the amount was $50,000 it would be charged against a captain, for instance. Of course, he could not pay the $50,000, and it simply stands on the books. The accounts between the Government and the purchasers have been justly and equitably settled, but the charge now stands against the officer.

Mr. ROWBOTTOM. Will the gentleman yield for a question right there?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. ROWBOTTOM. Why were not these bales examined before they were sold by the Army officers?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Well, for instance, here is a warehouse with five or six hundred bales; they would have to open all of them. The chances are they would go down to the warehouse and open four or five bales of these blankets and on investigation would submit a proposal for bids, but later on it would be developed that some of the bales were found not to contain blankets, but worthless material.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Has the gentleman given us all the facts and all the law in the case?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. I do not suppose I have given all of the facts in all of these claims in this brief time.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I know the gentleman inadvertently overlooked the fact that these cases went to the Court of Claims.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And the Court of Claims held that the War Department had no power or authority to make refunds because the law specifically provided that the goods should be sold as is and where is.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. I beg the gentleman's pardon. The case of Jacob Levy & Bro. was decided by the Court of Claims as follows: That such terms of sale deprived the purchaser of the power to enforce adjustment, but left it optional with the Secretary of War.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. And he had exercised his option.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. But the Secretary of War had no such option. The Secretary of War could get his power only from the Congress and the law which authorized the Secretary of War to sell surplus supplies specifically provided, in order to overcome the very proposition now before the House, that they were to sell as is and where is, resulting in the Government getting a very low price for these goods. Then when these purchasers went in and bid for this property as junk and paid junk prices and they did not find silk or did not find blankets, although they bid for them as junk, they came in and said that they wanted their money back.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. I think the gentleman is making an argument which is unfair in this case. They did not bid for junk. The War Department advertised certain grades of blankets, and they bid on the blankets and not on junk; and when they were delivered junk instead of blankets, naturally they came back to their Government and said, "We bought blankets and you have given us rags."

Mr. LAGUARDIA. At $1.27 a bundle.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. At $1.27 a blanket.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Oh, no.

Mr. ROWBOTTOM. One dollar and twenty-seven cents a bale. Does not the gentleman know that there is more than $100,000 of refunds involved in this bill?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Yes; but it does not take a dollar out of the Treasury. They are settlements that have been made between the purchasers and the Government. The officer should not be held in the matter.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Without authority of law.

Mr. ROWBOTTOM. Mr. Speaker, I think we will have to object for the present until we get more information.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. What other information does the gentleman want? Let me proceed for a few minutes.

Mr. HARE. Let me ask, did the committee find in some cases where the Government set up pairs of shoes and the man who bid for a pair of shoes when he come to examine them found both shoes were for the same foot? He did not get a pair of shoes. In other words, the Government had deceived and misled him. As I understand, this is only to correct the books of the War Department.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. The War Department advertised these goods, making certain representations, and the purchasers bought under those representations. They did not get the kind of goods that the specifications called for.

Mr. WRIGHT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. WRIGHT. In some cases after the goods had been catalogued and advertised for sale "as is where is," and with the statement that the purchaser could inspect, when the purchasers went to inspect the goods they were told by the officer in charge that it was utterly impossible to inspect them because they were in bundles and boxes piled up to the ceiling, but they would exhibit samples of the goods on the day of sale, and samples were exhibited at the sale and goods were sold by the samples. When the goods were delivered perhaps they found shoes that were mismatched, one No. 6 and No. 8, two rights in one and perhaps two lefts in another. When they came to undergarments they might be saturated with tar or some preparation in which they had been packed for shipment overseas. Then the attention of the officer would be called to the damaged goods, and it would be settled by allowing the purchaser to pay an agreed price. This is not a charge on the Treasury but it is to carry out what the Government officials agreed to in the purchase.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. We can hardly say that it is not a charge on the Treasury when they bid a certain amount and did not pay the whole amount.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. They did not always pay in; sometimes the officer would say, "Here are goods that are not according to the sample," and the board would say, "All right; let them pay for those that are right and not pay for the balance." When the officer came to make his report Comptroller General McCarl refused to approve the credit to the officer's account, so the matter stands against the officer's personal account. There are a lot of claims like this in this bill, the only purpose of which is to correct the books of the War Department.

Mr. ROWBOTTOM. I think an amount of $104,000 is too large to go through in this way.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Will the gentleman wait? You can not get it through in any other way. The House has passed such bills twice, and now we can not get this one through because new men have got to study the question.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Is the gentleman referring to me? I can tell the gentleman a few stories about surplus supplies.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. I am not reflecting upon the gentleman from New York. There have been cases where the Department of Justice has ordered suit, and the United States attorneys have reported back that it would be impossible to secure a judgment. In this proposition you are simply depriving the officer from credit on claims that he could not have collected. Certainly the gentleman does not want to make the officer stand these charges which now rest against his account.

Mr. HUDSON. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. I yield.

Mr. HUDSON. At one time these goods were purchased by the War Department from somebody.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Not these goods.

Mr. HUDSON. Yes; they were purchased by the War Department and afterwards sold as surplus supplies.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. The War Department did not buy rags for blankets.

Mr. HUDSON. No; the War Department bought blankets, and they may have bought rags. Some officer was guilty, if it is true.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. The Members serving on the subcommittee have gone thoroughly into this.

Mr. HUDSON. I am not objecting to the bill.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. The officer who had charge of this sale had nothing to do with the buying of the goods.

Mr. ROWBOTTOM. Mr. Speaker, I object.

PROVIDING FOR SUNDRY MATTERS AFFECTING THE NAVAL SERVICE

Mr. VESTAL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to go back to H. R. 10276. The bill was reached the other day.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. COLTON. Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to object, but when the unanimous-consent request was preferred by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] it was expressly provided that we should start with the star number.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands that; but is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

[H. R. 10276, providing for sundry matters affecting the naval service]

Be it enacted, etc., That the General Accounting Office is hereby authorized and directed to credit the accounts of Capt. Arthur St. Clair Smith, United States Navy, and Capt. Charles T. Hutchins, United States Navy, in the amounts of $96.17 and $90.54, respectively, which amounts represent alleged losses sustained by said officers on account of fluctuation of exchange while serving as naval attachés at Peking, China, and which have been disallowed in their respective accounts by the General Accounting Office.

SEC. 2. That the General Accounting Office is hereby authorized and directed to credit the accounts of Capt. Frederick G. Pyne, Supply Corps, United States Navy, in the amount of $1,000, which sum was paid by the said Captain Pyne, Supply Corps, United States Navy, to Henry Moakley for special services rendered to the Navy Department by said Moakley in connection with an arbitration between the United States and the E. W. Bliss Co., of Brooklyn, N. Y., but which payment was subsequently disallowed in his accounts by the General Accounting Office.

SEC. 3. That the General Accounting Office is hereby authorized and directed to adjust and settle the claim of the Pace Institute, 30 Church Street, New York, N. Y., in the sum of $833.50, and the claim of the Benjamin Franklin University, Transportation Building, Washington, D. C., in the sum of $292.50, to cover the cost of instruction received at said institutions by certain naval officers who were duly authorized to receive such instruction during the fiscal years 1925 and 1926, and to pay the amount allowed from the appropriation "Contingent, Bureau of Medicine and Surgery," for said fiscal years.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 9334) for the relief of Morris J. Lang.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers, Morris J. Lang, who was a member of Headquarters Company, Sixty-first Regiment Infantry, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been discharged honorably from the military service of the United States as a private of that organization on the 4th day of March, 1918: Provided, That no bounty, back pay, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

With the following committee amendment:

Line 6, after the word "Sixty-first," strike out the word "Regiment."

The committee amendment was agreed to, and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

LEONIDAS L. COCHRAN AND ROSALIE COCHRAN BRINK

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 2020) for the relief of Leonidas L. Cochran and Rosalie Cochran Brink.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to patent to Leonidas L. Cochran, of St. Andrew, Fla., lots 9 and 13 of section 11, township 4 south, range 15 west, of the Tallahassee meridian, Florida, and to Rosalie Cochran Brink, of St. Andrew, Fla., lots 2 and 3 of section 10, said township: Provided, That the parties named pay for the land described at the rate of $1.25 per acre within six months after the approval hereof.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

WIDOWS OF CERTAIN FOREIGN SERVICE OFFICERS

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 10932) for the relief of the widows of certain Foreign Service officers.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Mabel Rees Coffin, widow of William Coffin, late American consul general at Berlin, Germany, the sum of $9,000, being one year's salary of her deceased husband, who died while in the Foreign Service; to Sarah Linard, widow of the late Drew Linard, late American consul at Piedras Negras, Coahuila, Mexico, the sum of $3,500, being one year's salary of her deceased husband, who died of illness incurred while in the Consular Service; to Catherine ReQua Johnson the sum of $6,000, being a year's salary of her deceased husband, Stewart Johnson, who was killed while American chargé d'affaires in Egypt; and there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, a sufficient sum to carry out the purpose of this act.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

WILLIAM HENRY JUDSON

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2525) for the relief of William Henry Judson.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this is one of the many bills on this calendar to correct a military record. This particular bill refers to the Civil War. This man enlisted in 1862 and deserted in 1863. The act of March 2, 1889, gave opportunity to correct records in certain meritorious cases. If we are going to make it the practice and custom to correct records of the Civil War, what is going to happen 25 years from now when the hundreds of thousands of deserters in the World War shall begin to come in to have their records corrected by act of Congress?

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Speaker, this soldier served one year and four months and was finally honorably discharged from the service.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Where was he honorably discharged?

Mr. HAWLEY. The gentleman will find reference to it on page 2 of the report. He was discharged in his own State.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Oh, no. He quit in 1863, and there was some fighting after 1863.

Mr. HAWLEY. The gentleman will find at the end of the first paragraph of the affidavit of William Henry Judson on page 2 of the report the following:

I was returned to my post of duty and the dishonorable discharge above mentioned was remitted.

He was only 16 years of age at this time and had already served more than a year.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. But the department says that without some testimony concerning the circumstances under which he left, and his whereabouts thereafter, it is impossible for the department to determine whether or not his case comes within the provisions of the act of Congress of March 2, 1889.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I object.

CROMWELL L. BARSLEY

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6152) to correct the military record of Cromwell L. Barsley.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, can the gentleman who introduced the bill give any reason why this man's record should be corrected by act of Congress?

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Speaker, the reason is because the War Department did not do it. A great many years ago this man and another soldier were accused and convicted of stealing either one or two turkeys. They gave him six months in the penitentiary. He has had an honorable discharge since. While I admit that the man ought not to have stolen the turkey, it looks to me as if he has been sufficiently punished.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. He was honorably discharged in 1899, and this happened subsequent thereto?

Mr. COLLIER. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I shall not object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers, Cromwell L. Barsley, who was a member of Company D, Fifth Regiment United States Volunteers, and Thirty-fourth Regiment United States Volunteer Infantry, and Company D, Nineteenth Regiment Infantry, United States Army, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a private of Company D, Nineteenth Regiment Infantry, United States Army, on the —— day of ——, ——: Provided, That no bounty, back pay, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 1, line 11, strike out the initial "D" and insert the initial "I."

Page 2, line 1, after the word "the," insert "23d" and after the word "of" insert "December, 1907."

The committee amendments were agreed to, and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended to read: "A bill for the relief of Cromwell L. Barsley."

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

MYRON C. BOND, GUY M. CLAFLIN, AND EDWIN A. WELLS

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1625) to carry into effect the findings of the Court of Claims in favor of Myron C. Bond, Guy M. Claflin, and Edwin A. Wells.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Myron C. Bond the sum of $48.04, to Guy M. Chaflin the sum of $499.79, and to Edwin A. Wells $116.67, all of said persons having been officers in the Thirty-first Regiment Michigan Volunteer Infantry, war with Spain, and which said sums were reported by the Court of Claims, and said sums are hereby appropriated.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

WILLIAM H. NIGHTINGALE

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2530) for the relief of William H. Nightingale.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, this is another bill to correct the record of a Civil War veteran. It is stated in the report that this man enlisted in 1861, and then went to Canada. Then he claims he reinlisted under the name of William Raymond. The records show that one William Raymond was enrolled on October 3, 1863, at Lexington, Mich., as a private in Company B, Eleventh Michigan Cavalry. Does the gentleman from Oregon claim that William Raymond is the same as William H. Nightingale?

Mr. HAWLEY. I am informed that they were one and the same person, and that he was honorably discharged.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I shall not object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers, William H. Nightingale, alias W. H. Raymond, who was a member of Company C, First Excelsior Brigade, New York Volunteer Infantry, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a member of that organization on the 29th day of June, 1861: Provided, That no bounty, back pay, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

EXCHANGE OF LAND IN PHILADELPHIA, PA.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 9368) to authorize the Secretary of War to exchange with the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. certain tracts of land situate in the city of Philadelphia and State of Pennsylvania.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WARREN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would like to get some information from the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. McSWAIN] on that bill. This bill provides for an exchange of Government property in the city of Philadelphia with the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. for the elimination of crossings and improvement of transit over the railroad. The committee has added an amendment to it to the effect that if the Government property is more valuable the difference shall be paid into the Treasury. The gentleman says in his report:

Furthermore, it is the opinion of your committee that should any such difference appear by such appraisal it shall not and will not constitute the basis of any claim against the Government and in favor of the railroad company.

I wonder if the gentleman would have any objection to an amendment to make that perfectly clear?

Mr. McSWAIN. What is the language of the amendment the gentleman proposes?

Mr. WARREN. Add at the end of the bill this language:

Provide further, That if it should appear by such appraisal that there is a difference in favor of the Pennsylvania Railroad, then said finding shall never constitute the basis of any claim against the Government by said railroad.

Mr. McSWAIN. The proposal from the railroad was to make an exchange. It was the railroad's own proposal, and in the interest of public safety, in pursuance of a scheme 15 years old, to eliminate grade crossings. If the railroad was willing to exchange the property itself without any difference, it seems to me there would be no objection to that proviso. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BECK], the author of the bill, see any objection to that?

Mr. BECK of Pennsylvania. I see no objection to that at all.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized, in his discretion, to exchange, upon such terms and conditions as he considers advisable, with the Pennsylvania Railroad Co., or its nominee, a tract of land extending from the west side of Delaware Avenue to the east side of Swanson Street situate and lying between Bigler Street and Packer Avenue, in the thirty-ninth ward, in the city of Philadelphia and State of Pennsylvania, containing 11.38 acres, said tract now forming a part of War Department reservation at Oregon and Delaware Avenues, situate in the city of Philadelphia and State of Pennsylvania, which said tract is no longer needed for military purposes, and to execute and deliver in the name of the United States and in its behalf any and all contracts, conveyances, or other instruments necessary to effectuate the conveyance of the fee title thereof to the Pennsylvania Railroad Co., or its nominee; and in return for the said tract of land so conveyed by him, the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to receive and take title thereto in the name of the United States and in its behalf, a tract of land situate on the west side of Delaware Avenue between Packer Avenue and Pattison Avenue, in the thirty-ninth ward, in the city of Philadelphia and State of Pennsylvania, containing 11.38 acres, which tract upon its acquisition shall form a part of the said War Department reservation and be subject to the same control and right of disposition as other portions of said reservation.

With a committee amendment as follows:

Page 2, line 21, insert: "Provided, That before any such exchange, the War Department shall have both of said parcels of real estate appraised by competent and disinterested persons acquainted with the values of real estate in the vicinity of such property, at the expense of the Pennsylvania Railroad Co., and if such appraisal show that the parcel of real estate to be conveyed to the United States be of less value than the parcel to be conveyed by the United States, then in such event any difference in value shall be paid in money into the Treasury of the United States, and be credited to the Military Post Construction Fund, prior to the conveyance of the title hereby authorized."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WARREN: Amend by inserting a colon after the last word on page 3 and add the following: "Provided further, That if it should appear by such appraisal that there is a difference in favor of the Pennsylvania Railroad, then said findings shall never constitute the basis of any claim against the Government by said railroad."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

MARY M'CORMICK

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5897) for the relief of Mary McCormick.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause to be paid from the appropriation "Pay of the Navy, 1925," to Mary McCormick, mother of Arthur James McCormick, late seaman, first class, United States Navy, the sum of $356.40, being an amount equal to six months' pay at the rate received by said McCormick at the date of his death.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

WILLIAM H. ESTABROOK

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 11107) for the relief of William H. Estabrook.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. ROWBOTTOM. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES], who introduced the bill, why the War Department can not show that this man was in the hospital during the epidemic of smallpox on which he bases his claim for desertion? The record does not show he was in the hospital during that time.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, the report of the War Department shows that he was in the hospital from November 24, 1864, to January 3, 1865. I think there is no dispute about his being in the hospital during that period as a patient. After that time he states that his company moved on and that the physician at the hospital requested him to serve as a nurse; that he did so serve until it was too late to rejoin his company, and after the war he went back to Michigan to his home. The War Department has no record, as I understand it, of his stay in the hospital while serving as a nurse, but there is no dispute about the fact that he was a patient in the hospital.

Mr. ROWBOTTOM. Did the gentleman say this man's commander said he was in the hospital acting as a nurse, or has the gentleman any statement from the doctors showing he served as a nurse?

Mr. MAPES. The soldier himself makes that affidavit.

Mr. ROWBOTTOM. He did not get anything from the doctor?

Mr. MAPES. No. I have a letter from an acquaintance and friend of mine about this man. The soldier himself is dead and his family think, and he thought during his lifetime, that this record did him an injustice, and they desire to have it cleared up.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Besides having the record cleared up, is there any pension accruing to any of his family?

Mr. MAPES. I am not certain about that; but I think not. I understand the man's widow is alive and if this bill should pass she might be entitled to a pension; but I am not absolutely sure about that.

Mr. HUDSON. Only by a special bill.

Mr. ROWBOTTOM. But the pension would not date back at all?

Mr. MAPES. No. No one has ever said anything to me about a pension for the widow. That is not the purpose of this bill. It is merely to correct the record of the soldier.

Mr. HUDSON. Is it not true that in those days the hospital records were very incomplete and that the affidavits set forth a very reasonable doubt as to their having been any real desertion?

Mr. MAPES. I think so. I will say that I have a letter from a friend of mine, in whom I have every confidence, in which he says this man returned to Michigan and was active in the G. A. R. at its encampments and otherwise, and in every way was recognized as a member of that organization in good standing; but he never had this record straightened up and his family is anxious to have it straightened up.

Mr. ROWBOTTOM. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. TILLMAN. I object for the time being.

T. ABRAHAM HETRICK

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 10714) for the relief of T. Abraham Hetrick.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what is the special reason for correcting this man's record by an act of Congress?

Mr. BLAND. The special reason is that the man claims—and supports his claim by affidavits—that he was wounded on April 6, 1865, three days before the surrender. The records of the War Department show that a man by this name, the initials not being given, was wounded. The spelling of the name was "Hetrich," while this man's name is "Hetrick." As I say, the records of the War Department show that a man by that name was wounded. Later, when he sought to have his record corrected, it was found that there had been stricken across the word "wounded" the words "not wounded, deserted." After being wounded he retired to his home and was not with his company when it was discharged, and then the entry of desertion was made. The facts are all set out in the report, so far as I know them.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. When was his company mustered out?

Mr. BLAND. My recollection is on April 25, 1865, shortly after the surrender, which was April 9, 1865.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. He was mustered in on February 4, 1865.

Mr. BLAND. That is very true, and there are affidavits showing that he participated in a number of engagements; I will not say a number, but in some engagements. Certainly he was in the Battle of Sailors Creek; he was wounded in the battle at Sailors Creek, and his father carried him home.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. There is a slight difference in the spelling of the name in the hospital records?

Mr. BLAND. The War Department does not say that, but there is a difference in the spelling of the name. My assumption is that "Hetrich" refers to the same man, but I can not say that is positively true.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I will give him the benefit of the doubt.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers and dependents, T. Abraham Hetrick, who was a private of Company I, Forty-ninth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been discharged honorably from the military service of the United States as a member of that organization on the 25th day of April, 1865: Provided, That no back pay, bounty, pension, or other allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

Roberts, who was a private in Company D, Second Regiment West Virginia Volunteer Infantry, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a member of said company and regiment on the 10th day of April, 1899: Provided, That no pay, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Reserving the right to object, who is the introducer of this bill?

Mr. JAMES. It is a Senate bill.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. I object, Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as nobody seems to know anything about the bill.

FRANKLIN B. MORSE

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3170) for the relief of Franklin B. Morse.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 6, strike out the initial "P" and insert in lieu thereof the initial "B"; and on page 1, line 9, strike out the language "but no pension, pay, nor bounty shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act" and insert "Provided, That no bounty nor back pay, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act."

ALBERT CAMPBELL

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4687) to correct the military record of Albert Campbell.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. ROWBOTTOM. Reserving the right to object, I want to ask the gentleman from New York what evidence there is in the hearings or in the report to show that this man went home on a pass?

Mr. SWEET. This man served in some of the most important battles of the Civil War—Chancellorsville, Fredericksburg, and Gettysburg. At Gettysburg he was taken prisoner and was permitted to go home on a pass; he reported to the provost marshal at Oswego and was permitted to go home and remain at home until called for. He never had been called for, and the record shows that he was not present with his company when it was discharged.

Mr. ROWBOTTOM. I shall not object.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of the pension laws Albert Campbell shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a member of Company B, One hundred and fifty-seventh Regiment New York State Volunteers: Provided, That no pension shall accrue prior to the passage of this act.

WILFORD W. CALDWELL

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 10038) for the relief of Wilford W. Caldwell.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. HUDSON. Reserving the right to object, what is the value of the land that would justify a man purchasing it for $1.25 an acre?

Mr. COLTON. I will say that all the land in that reservation was sold to homesteaders at $1.25 an acre.

Mr. HUDSON. In what year?

Mr. COLTON. Any year since 1915. It was sold to the homesteaders as they applied under the homestead law.

Mr. HUDSON. Very well.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to issue a patent under the homestead entry of Wilford W. Caldwell for the southeast quarter of the southeast quarter of section 35 and the southwest quarter of the southwest quarter of section 36 in township 1 south of range 1 east, Uintah meridian, Utah, upon compliance by said Wilford W. Caldwell with the homestead laws of the United States: Provided, however, That in addition to the usual fees and commissions payable under existing laws said entryman shall pay the sum of $1.25 per acre for the land so entered, which latter sum shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States and disposed of in the same manner as other proceeds derived from the sale of lands within the former Uintah Indian Reservation, Utah.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

MAURICE P. DUNLAP

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 9411) for the relief of Maurice P. Dunlap.

The Clerk read the title to the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, in view of the letter from the Secretary of State, I object.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Will not the gentleman withhold his objection?

Mr. WARREN. I will.

Mr. LINTHICUM. The Secretary of State does not oppose the payment of this sum, but he could not recommend it as a precedent. This man, Elias Chatzkelowitz, was over in Russia, and the money was given by his brother, T. Silverman, and was deposited with the Department of State by my former colleague Hon. Charles P. Coady on October 3, 1919, to be sent to this man. There was no American consul there in the Baltic Provinces at the time. It was sent by Mr. Dunlap through Mr. John A. Gade, the newly appointed commissioner to Riga. The man Chatzkelowitz was in such dire distress that Mr. Dunlap, hearing he had not received it, gave another $300 to Lieutenant Hardy, of the relief administration, and asked him to cancel the other. But the man got both sums, and was so hard pressed that he could not pay any of it back, and he has not been heard from since.

Mr. WARREN. The fact is that the man got both the amounts.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes; but you should not blame the consul for that. The consul is a man who does not get much of a salary and he should not be made the loser, for he was trying to relieve distress. Those were parlous times in Russia, and chances had to be taken to provide relief.

Mr. WARREN. The gentleman is asking the House to pass this bill as a gratuity?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I am trying to get this debt paid to the American consul. He was simply trying to relieve distress, and in doing that the man got the two amounts of money. I hope the gentleman will not object to it.

Mr. WARREN. I am not going to object to it on account of the next case, which I will not object to.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $300 is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for payment in full to Maurice P. Dunlap, American consul, to reimburse him for losses sustained in aiding relatives of an American citizen residing in Russia.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

MAX D. KIRJASSOFF

The next business on the Private Calendar was the House joint resolution (H. J. Res. 147) for the relief of the estate of the late Max D. Kirjassoff.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the estate of Max D. Kirjassoff, late consul in charge of the American consulate general at Yokohama, Japan, is hereby relieved from accounting for the balance of cash in his hands as such consul on June 30, 1923, and for collections, advances of funds, and disbursements as such consul for the period July 1, 1923, to September 1, 1923, inclusive, by reason of the destruction by earthquake and fire on September 1, 1923, of the cash on hand and all vouchers covering expenditures from cash on hand, cash collected, or funds advanced, during the period named.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

WILLIAM ESTES

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 11094) to correct the military record of William Estes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, it appears that this man served a certain length of time and then wanted to go home. He hired a substitute, and the records of both the substitute and he are somewhat unsound. It seems to me, even on the very best theory, that one who hires a substitute should not come in and get a special act of Congress to correct his military record. Therefore I object.

NEAR EAST RELIEF (INC.)

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 1287) for the relief of the Near East Relief (Inc.).

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BOX rose.

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman reserve his objection?

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. I reserve the objection.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, this bill has been pending for several sessions of Congress. It has come over regularly from the Senate, but has been killed in the House. It involves a large sum of money—$632,000.

Mr. UNDERHILL. If the gentleman will permit, it involves no amount of money at all.

Mr. FISH. It involves that amount of money indirectly. I hope the gentleman will give me an opportunity to attempt to explain the bill to his satisfaction.

Mr. BOX. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. Yes.

Mr. BOX. The gentleman from Texas understands that this bill has been before the Claims Committee for some time. He does not intend to object under the circumstances, but he is going to make some statements concerning the facts in the case which he thinks the House ought to have. He is not going to object.

Mr. FISH. I was simply going to appeal to the kind-heartedness of the gentleman. I know that he knows more about this bill than any Member of the House.

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. I do not know that that is true.

Mr. FISH. I have read the gentleman's report, and I thought I could appeal to his kind heart. If the gentleman from Texas is not going to object, I am not going to take up the further time of the House.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. Yes.

Mr. BULWINKLE. I do not know quite as much about this bill as does the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Box], but I am pretty good second.

Mr. FISH. I agree to that, and I submit that I am a good third.

Mr. BULWINKLE. If the gentleman will yield, this bill came up in the Sixty-eighth Congress. At that time, after it was reported from the Committee on Claims, I objected to it on the floor of the House. I did that for this reason: That the bill involved the collection of $662,000 by the Government from the Near East Relief for supplies furnished. And at the same time the Near East Relief (Inc.) had a claim for $334,000 against the Government on account of freight. I objected to it at that time for this reason: When the bill came before the committee this year I moved an amendment by which all claims of the Near East Relief held against the Government would be canceled. I trust that the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. HOWARD] will not object to it, because as far as the Government is concerned it can not collect this claim. It is now nothing more than a cancellation of what is on the books.

Mr. FISH. Let me say to the gentleman that if the Government attempts to collect it and should find some way of collecting it, it would mean that 15,000 orphans now supported by the Near East Relief would be thrown out of these orphanages and left without any relief whatever; that is, if the Government should take legal proceedings to collect the money. I do not want to make a speech. I would much rather appeal again to the great heart of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. HOWARD] without making it. If the gentleman needs any persuasion, I am sure a number of us would be glad to speak at length upon the subject.

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] and some of the others need a little bit of persuasion, and I am going to give some of it. I know that it does not place a white man in a happy attitude to be apparently objecting to an act of justice in behalf of an alleged charitable organization. However, Mr. Speaker, I made some little study of this alleged charitable organization. Many times when it came into my own country in the personality of its traveling officials they lived at my own home hotel, which is said to be the model modern small-town hotel of the world. My wife and I live there, and we became acquainted with these peripatetic travelers in the interest of this institution. Being chairman of a whole flock of Red Cross committees my wife naturally went out to help them make a drive for funds. I recall one day particularly when that wonderful wife of mine lost every bit of the admiration she had for this alleged charitable outfit. She had walked for two weeks about the city helping those folks make their drive among our home people to gather funds for this great charity.

Several women and two or three gentlemen had been eating thick beefsteaks at our hotel, while my wife and I were eating thin ones. We paid for ourselves, and these charity people paid for theirs with relief money contributed by my townspeople. The time came for those folks to go to the train. The station was but a block and a half away. My wife said to one of the ladies, "I will walk down to the depot with you." The lady replied, "No; we will call a cab; we can not walk." Then my wife said, "I have walked about 406 blocks here in town in the last two weeks urging my people to provide funds for the Near East drive, and now we discover that you people representing that institution want to take this money, the charity money that I helped to raise, and throw it away."

Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman withhold his objection, so that I can say a word on this matter?

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. I will withhold as a matter of courtesy to the gentleman from the city.

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Speaker, is the gentleman from Nebraska going to finally object?

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. I announced that as a matter of courtesy to my colleague from the city I would reserve my objection.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, none of my constituents are interested in this bill. But in answer to the statement of the gentleman from Nebraska, I sympathize with him in his viewpoint. There were lots of people collecting money in this country and some of them spend it in an extravagant way. But that issue is not involved in this bill.

I want to submit to the Members of the House the fact that the Americans who went out to the Near East were heroes; not heroes that went out and followed the band and the flag, but men who sacrificed their health and their lives at $50 a month. Many died from typhus and other dread diseases in the act of helping thousands of starving and helpless Christian refugees fleeing from Turkish brutality and massacre.

Mr. BOX. Does the gentleman think that the Army officers and other officers having charge of this property who had no authority to turn it over to the Near East Relief were heroes therein?

Mr. FISH. No. I agree with the gentleman. But the plea I wish to make to you is that the men who saved the Christian Armenians and Greeks did so at the sacrifice of their lives, and it is one of the most glorious records of humanitarian work that Americans have ever achieved, irrespective and regardless of the contemptible action of the people who raised the money and spent it in the way depicted by the gentleman from Nebraska. We all deplore that, but it should not divert us from the merits of the bill.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Simply laying aside everything else, it is merely a matter of correcting the books down in the War Department at the present time. That is all there is to it.

Mr. BOX. And saving time?

Mr. BULWINKLE. That is all there is to it.

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from New York has referred to the large and wonderful heart of the gentleman from Nebraska, and now the gentleman from Nebraska is going to put the crucial test: If the gentleman from New York, standing here upon his feet and in his own words to me will tell me that the passage of this bill will carry one dollar of relief to any of the widows or children of those magnificent fellows who went over there in the early days and sacrificed their lives, then there will be no objection from me. But unless the gentleman does that my objection will stand.

Mr. FISH. It does carry a lot of relief and satisfaction to the widows and children of those men who paid the supreme sacrifice and to the 15,000 orphans who are now being cared for by the Near East Relief to know that the sacrifice has not been in vain; and I can not think of any better kind of memorial to those heroic men or to their families than to provide for the completion of the work for which they gave up their lives.

Mr. BULWINKLE. If this had not been done at that time there is no question but that the Congress then in session would have authorized the taking of this property at that time for the relief of the Armenians.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. There is, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is heard. The Clerk will report the next bill.

JAMES A. DE LOACH

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 9902) for the relief of James A. De Loach.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. ROWBOTTOM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman explain to the committee why this young man picked up a dud when he had orders and instructions not to do so?

Mr. McDUFFIE. That is one of those unfortunate things that are sometimes hard to explain. The evidence, however, does not show conclusively, and beyond peradventure, that he had direct, positive, and personal notice that such an order was issued. But I will say to the gentleman that this bill is in line with the policy adopted by the Committee on Claims. The chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. UNDERHILL], made a very extended and splendid statement several days ago as to the policy of his committee in the treatment of cases of this character. It seems that the trainees in the naval schools get relief, in cases of this kind, but no provision has been made for those injured while in training at the citizens' military training camps. I will ask the gentleman from Massachusetts to state to my good friend, Mr. ROWBOTTOM, the gentleman who propounded the question, and for the benefit of the entire membership here, the policy of his committee in dealing with cases of this kind.

Surely, if the Congress appropriates money from the public Treasury to provide hostesses for these young men during their training, in order that they may not be homesick and may meet the nicest girls, and perhaps be taught how to dance the Charleston, we should not hesitate to provide relief for a personal injury suffered by picking up an unexploded shell, a very dangerous thing, left on the training field. I can not quite reconcile the position assumed by the War Department on this bill, with their request for money to hire hostesses for the training camps. I will be grateful to my friend, Mr. UNDERHILL, the chairman of the committee, if he will again kindly explain the policy of his committee in dealing with cases of this kind.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Speaker, when the House last considered the Private Calendar I personally called attention to the fact that we had established a new policy on the part of the committee. I asked for the indorsement of the House and at that time not a voice was raised in objection to it. It is the policy of taking care of the boys in the military training camps no matter from what source an injury may arise, no matter how careless, and no matter how reckless the boys may be. All of the safeguards which the War Department can possibly throw around these boys in the camps are not sufficient to entirely prevent accidents. We took the position that while they were in the military training camps they were under the tutelage and guardianship of Uncle Sam; that he had taken full authority over them, and consequently he should hold himself liable for them and hold them safe against accidents, and that in case of an accident he should reimburse them so far as he could for the injury.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. I can understand the gentleman's policy and I believe there is a great deal of sympathy for it, but does not the gentleman overstate the policy of the committee a little bit when he says the Government should be responsible no matter how reckless or how careless these boys may be? I think what the gentleman means are accidents which happen in the ordinary course of life at the camps, even if the injury is the result of lack of knowledge or prudence.

Mr. UNDERHILL. I feel this way about it; I hardly care to modify my language. You have a Federal Compensation Board, which covers every employee of the United States in every line of endeavor, and no matter how careless or reckless an employee may be in working around dangerous machinery if an injury occurs there is no defense on the part of the Government for negligence on his part. The only things which exempt him from the provisions of that act are drunkenness and the use of drugs. We have applied that principle as laid down with reference to the civilian employees of the Government to those who are voluntarily giving their services to the Government as trainees for future reserves of the Army and in making them better citizens in the community.

Mr. BOX. The gentleman from Texas sympathizes with the policy adopted by the committee, but he does not understand it to be quite as the chairman stated it. The chairman will remember that the gentleman from Texas reserved freedom as to particular cases when the facts showed that the injury was the result of the fault of a soldier. However, I think this case is meritorious, and I believe is in line with the policy adopted by the committee. I hope there will be no objection, because we have allowed two or three cases of a similar nature. We take these lads who are of immature age and turn them loose under Government supervision, and we ought to look after them as best we can. Unless we have a pretty liberal rule, there will not be an equality in the administration of this matter of policy.

Mr. BULWINKLE. We even provide hostesses for them.

Mr. BOX. This boy did not have a hostess.

Mr. ROWBOTTOM. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, from any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $5,000 to James A. DeLoach for injuries received by him while attending a citizens' military training camp at Camp McClellan, Ala.

With the following committee amendment:

In line 5, after the word "appropriated," insert "and in full settlement against the Government"; in line 6, strike out the sign and figures "$5,000" and insert the sign and figures "$2,500."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

THE "S–4" DISASTER

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the S–4 disaster.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Speaker, my esteemed colleague [Mr. OLIVER of Alabama] printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of Saturday, March 24, a letter from Admiral Charles F. Hughes, Chief of Naval Operations, in which was set forth the achievements of the Navy, with particular emphasis on inventions of Navy origin.

I am glad that this record of Navy ingenuity was put in the RECORD. It is only fair that against the array of shortcomings the more refreshing and encouraging picture of accomplishment should be presented. However, in presenting it, my esteemed colleague made the criticism that my speech of March 23 evinced a "lack of information as to the accomplishments of the American Navy and its efficient officer personnel." Thus the picture seems to have been painted for my benefit.

However, it is not apparent that my failure to praise could possibly justify the inference that I was ill-informed as to the good things done by the Navy. My task was the rather unpleasant one of pointing out certain shortcomings in the hope of bringing our Navy up to date. I respect its personnel and admire, as every American must, its splendid accomplishments. It was not my rôle to throw bouquets, as with my knowledge of its wonderful history I could very well have done.

ONLY ONE ISSUE

There is only one issue before the public at this time, and that is whether or not the American Navy has shown proper concern for the welfare of our sailors and has exercised proper diligence in adopting devices for the rescue of the crews of submarines and adequate facilities for the prompt salvage of vessels.

I have made a long and intensive study of the subject and have come to the deliberate conclusion that certain bureaucrats, who have held sway in our Navy for many years, have obstinately refused to give thought to the subject of safety devices for the submarine service and have thus sacrificed needlessly the lives of our men and blocked the wheels of progress in submarine development.

This was the thesis of my speech. Within its limitations, therefore, it should be apparent to anyone with an open mind that I was under no obligations to laud the Navy or apologize for its shortcomings. I will leave that rôle to others. There are good and bad in all things. A reference to the things bad implies neither ignorance of nor denial of the things good.

My solicitude was, and still is, to arouse the Navy bureaucrats from their blissful repose in their swivel chairs, around which the spiders have woven an impenetrable web, and spur them on to action. My attitude is somewhat like that of the patriarch in the old Greek play:

Though wise enough, yet one word more;
Let my advice add to thy wisdom's store.

The death of 40 brave American lads drowned like rats in a hole is too serious a matter to be flippantly dealt with, nor should this dreadful disaster be camouflaged by idle laudation of those at whom the shafts of criticism have never been aimed. Rushing in to the defense of those not attacked can not help those who are deserving of reprobation. Such misguided solicitude may seem like chivalry, but it is not. It is simply the old game of the barrister, who, in defending the accused, soft-pedals the charge and praises the prisoner's family. The true chivalry consists in a just resentment against the wicked obstinacy which persists in subjecting our brave men to perils that are absolutely needless.

During the course of my speech I said there is not a single invention that has originated in the head of a bureaucrat. I stick to that, notwithstanding the formidable array of Navy inventions cited. The men mentioned as inventors were far from being bureaucrats. If they had been, no original idea would ever have disturbed their calm serenity. I venture the thought that those exceptional men had their own trouble in getting the bureaucrats to recognize them; although, being in the Navy, they might fare better than an outsider. My references were to the treatment of outsiders only and that record can not be minimized or effaced.

SINKING OF THE "S–51"

Congress itself is not without its responsibility in such matters. The sinking of the S–51 on September 25, 1925, was fully as pathetic as that of the S–4 a few months ago, and indicated just as strongly the need of safety devices and salvage facilities. Shortly after the S–51 catastrophe I introduced a resolution calling for an investigation of the disaster and a study of safety devices. It was buried. The incident passed out of the public mind. The newspapers tired of it. It soon ceased to be news, except for a paragraph now and then when salvage operations were discontinued or renewed. Then there was a spurt of interest awakened when, after over nine months of heartbreaking work, the unfortunate vessel was raised, with her cargo of dead.

FALSE RESPECT FOR AUTHORITY FEEDS LETHARGY

It is difficult—yes, impossible—for any one man to impress the need of a legislative measure upon Congress. His very insistence will frequently affront the sensibilities of his colleagues, who are likely to resent the implication that they are deficient in human sympathy.

Hesitation to impeach a great department of the Government, indisposition to assail the intelligence or skill of its head or of its technical bureaus, all combine to block action and promote the disposition to supinely yield to the deadening spirit of procrastination.

We are prone to say to ourselves, "This is a technical matter for technical men—the Navy has them—the head of the department is a good fellow—which he is—and if anything ought to be done, they are the ones to do it." Thus false respect for authority feeds lethargy and blocks progress.

THE "S–4" DISASTER

When the S–4 sinking happened on December 17, 1927, I almost immediately introduced another House Resolution No. 65, calling for an investigation of the disaster and a study of safety devices and salvage facilities. I made an appeal to the House on January 5 and again on January 7, and made it clear, I think, that there were in existence approved devices and safeguards that would have rescued the crew and salvaged the vessel. The Committee on Rules of the House made no move in the matter until President Coolidge sent a special message to the House urging action. A resolution (H. J. Res. 131) was accordingly introduced by my colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER], the highly respected chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee, on January 7. Instead of a congressional investigation, as my resolution proposed, the Butler resolution provided for a technical commission composed of both civilians and Navy men. Although it was generally believed that the presence of the Navy men on such a commission might hamper the investigation, I waived my own sentiments and heartily supported the resolution. It was passed by the House unanimously on January 7. In the Senate, however, it did not have such smooth sailing. There it was contended that an impartial investigation could not be made by a commission tied up, directly or indirectly, with men whose own negligence is suspected of responsibility for the disaster—men who have steadfastly maintained that there is no possibility of improving the safety of the submarine service. It was suspected that their attitude might possibly be summarized in a paraphrase of Dean Swift's lines:

Rather far that men should die
Than their prediction prove a lie.

THE DIFFERENCES OF THE CONFEREES

The resolution was accordingly amended in the Senate so as to provide for a congressional investigation of the causes of the disaster, modifying the commission feature to guard against a biased report. It was passed on January 30. Since then the conferees have for 60 days been trying, so it is claimed, to agree.

Personally I do not think their differences are important. The American people, and the families of the martyrs to red tape, do not care what form the resolution takes, but are only concerned that some resolution shall be enacted that shall put an end to such sacrifices of American manhood.

THE INVESTIGATION SHOULD PROCEED

Precious days and weeks have drifted by since the conferees were appointed and the opportunities and facilities for an effective investigation are gradually fading into the distance.

The vessel has been raised, three months to a day since the catastrophe; the bodies have been removed, but the various scraps of evidence surrounding their death struggle will obviously not have the evidential value which they might have had if the investigating committee or commission had been appointed and had been there on the spot to inspect the vessel as it emerged with its pathetic cargo. These valuable days can never be recovered, and their evidentiary items can never be collated and arranged again in their true relative values. All of that is dead and buried.

However, it is not too late to do the best we can. The resolution should pass and there should be no quibbling about the form. If the Senate will not yield, let the House yield. We should have no false pride in a matter of such vital interest to the families of the dead and to the men who must man the submarines in the future.

NEGLECT OF THE LESSONS OF THE "S–51"

For over two years following the disaster to the S–51 the Navy authorities, upon whom the initiative rested, utterly ignored its lessons and placidly pigeonholed all suggestions for the installation of obviously feasible safeguards.

It took over nine months to salvage the S–51. Commander Ellsberg, who brought that undertaking to a successful conclusion under the most discouraging handicaps, made a report which included a number of practical suggestions. His report was printed but his suggestions were not. They were pigeonholed and were only resurrected through the zeal of my colleague, Mr. CELLER, of New York, who printed them in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January 25, 1928—page 2040.

COMMANDER ELLSBERG'S REPORT

A casual study of Commander Ellsberg's report shows why it was not printed; it ran counter to the theories of the swivel-chair brigade who instinctively bristle with hostility the moment a new idea is laid before them.

In forwarding the Ellsberg report to the Chief of the Bureau of Construction and Repair, at Washington, Admiral Plunkett, on October 5, 1926, said that the recommendations are—approved as being in the light of our experience and therefore worthy of most serious consideration.

Was Admiral Plunkett a bureaucrat? Not much! He was a practical man, not atrophied by swivel-chair service.

He also, in his indorsement, made this significant reference to Commander Ellsberg's report:

1. Particular attention is invited to paragraph 21, especially the last sentence.

ELLSBERG'S PROPHECY

Now, what was this paragraph which Admiral Plunkett thus calls particular attention to? It was nothing less than the following weird prophecy:

21. The exact date of sinking of the next submarine can not, of course, be foretold, but, based on past performances, it can be expected within the next three years. It is desirable that when it occurs there be available such means for quick salvage that no possible criticism can be made of the Navy on the ground of unpreparedness.

These were some of Ellsberg's suggestions:

First. Lifting eyelets or eye pads to permit rapid attachment of the pontoons to the sunken submarine.

[Note: I made this suggestion to the Navy Department as long ago as 1905, shortly after the sinking of the French submarine Farfadet. While I never received any acknowledgment for the suggestion, I know that our submarines were so equipped up to the time of the World War. The reasons given for their abandonment never appealed to me, and I am glad to see that Commander Elsberg agrees with me.]

Second. Enlargement of hatches to permit of ready access.

Third. Strengthening of the hatches and valves to resist the internal pressure of the air when the compartments are blown out preliminary to salvaging.

[Note: In connection with this he stated: "The locking gear on the S–51 valves and hatches was so weak that bad leakage started at an excess internal pressure of only 2 to 4 pounds, causing extreme difficulty in sealing up."]

Fourth. Installation of the long-arm door system in the bulkheads—"in the new boats, at any rate."

[Note: The crew of the S–51 had been unable to close any of the bulkhead doors owing to the rapid inrush of water, and Commander Elsberg says that if it had been equipped with long-arm doors the crew in the undamaged compartments might have been saved.]

Fifth. Maintaining the pontoons in readiness at the submarine base instead of scattering them afar.

Not one of these wise suggestions was adopted.

When the S–51 salvage was completed, Commander Ellsberg protested against the scattering of the pontoons. But he was overruled. When the S–4 was sunk on December 17, 1927, four of these pontoons were at New York and four at Norfolk.

Admiral Beuret told the Subcommittee on Appropriations that the pontoons from New York and those from Norfolk arrived practically at the same time—page 1000, hearings—whereas the Norfolk batch did not arrive until Wednesday, the 21st, four days after the accident, while those from New York arrived on Monday, the 19th, two days after the accident.

When asked—page 1013, hearings—why the pontoons were not in the vicinity of the scene of submarine practice, the answer was—there was no assurance that the next submarine accident would occur in the vicinity of New London.

IF FACILITIES WERE AT HAND THE "S–4" COULD HAVE BEEN RAISED

At the time of the collision, although it is said the controls were set for a descent, the S–4 was near the surface. The battery room was the only compartment flooded. The other compartments remained practically free of water. The vessel, consequently, had the advantage of the buoyancy of those compartments. Therefore the gross lift required immediately after the sinking was the loss of buoyancy due to the water in the battery room, which may be estimated at about 300 tons.

If the vessel had been fitted with lifting eyes or eye pads and the pontoons had been at hand, the vessel could have been raised and the crew rescued within a few hours instead of 90 days.

INCONSISTENCIES OF ALLEGED EXPERTS

I want to call attention to the discussion on the floor of the House during the course of my speech on March 23 wherein I discussed the contradictions and inconsistencies in the testimony of so-called Navy experts. As a sample, I need only refer to the lame excuse given for the abandonment of the telephone-signal buoys. It appears they released the buoy and that was the last seen of it. It had slipped away, even taking the cable with it, and was never seen again. Of course, it had not been properly attached, and yet that very neglect was the excuse given for abandoning this very valuable safety and communication device.

TARDINESS IN INSTALLING NEW DEVICES

Franklin Roosevelt, while Secretary of the Navy, ordered the installation on all submarines of a device for ejecting a signal bomb from the submarine before it rises to the surface. It took about 10 years to install the tubes, while the cartridges for the tubes were not shipped to the home yards of all submarines until January 1, 1928—two weeks after the S–4 disaster. This is admitted in the testimony of Admiral Beuret before the subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee of the House. (See Hearings, p. 1011.)

The S–4 was not provided with the signal-telephone buoy or the signal bombs. It was not provided with soda lime to purify the atmosphere; although the submarine commanders of the twelfth division at New London had requisitioned it as long ago as last July.

The S–4 still retained the single air-line salvage inlet that proved abortive in the disaster to the S–51, although time and time again emphasis was laid on its insufficiency.

In an article in the World's Work for March Commander Ellsberg has this pungent comment to make on the compartment salvage air line—page 498:

I can not recollect a case in the history of our submarine disasters where the compartment salvage air line has ever been of use. On the S–51 it was cut in half by the stem of the City of Rome; on the S–4 the survivors also reported it flooded Sunday night. The compartment salvage air line should be removed immediately from all submarines and replaced by either one or two valves attached directly to the hull in every room on the ship.

In the World's Work for April, Simon Lake, who built the S–51, says the Navy czars would not let him install this very system.

These are a few of the things which make the average man impatient with those hypersensitive idolators of bureaucracy who believe that "officialism" is always right.

When the public indignation had somewhat subsided after the tragedy these worshippers of officialism slipped furtively out of their holes and started to croak in chorus: "Such incidents are regrettable but unavoidable"; then they dwelt unctuously on the safeguards that never saved; then they praised the bureaucratic foresight that provided the crews with a fresh-air system that never worked. The only fresh thing the unfortunate men had, apparently, was fresh potatoes, carrots, and onions, which were found raw and half eaten in their clenched fists when their poor bodies were recovered.

And so the chorus of the apologists goes on:

Listen while we trill our song—
I am right and you are wrong,
Such accidents you can't prevent—
So long as men to sea are sent.
The bureaucrats who shun the sea,
Will never risk a new idea;
Because they know the harm that's hid
In trying things that can't be "did"!

ABRAM H. JOHNSON

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1627) for the relief of Abram H. Johnson.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers, Abram H. Johnson, who was a corporal of Company K, Third Regiment Michigan Volunteer Cavalry, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been discharged honorably from the military service of the United States as a member of said company and regiment March 18, 1864.

With the following committee amendment:

In line 9, after the figures "1864," insert a colon and the following: "Provided, That no bounty, back pay, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

CHARLES H. NIEHAUS

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 380) for the relief of Charles H. Niehaus.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the chairman of the committee if this is not a claim that could properly have been made in the Court of Claims, especially if the contention that the Government occupied the property and prevented his compliance with the original contract is true?

Mr. UNDERHILL. This hardly comes under the heading of claims of contract. The contract was eventually completed, but it was one of those cases arising out of the war which seems to have been unavoidable and in which Mr. Niehaus suffered a great loss. We have had this matter before Congress for the last three sessions. At one time it passed the House, I believe. At another time it passed the Senate, but the bill has not passed both branches during the same Congress. Mr. Niehaus is getting old and feeble, and unless Congress takes some action, relief for him personally will be of no value.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. On page 4 of the report I would like to ask the gentleman if all the items contained in that list are included in the $33,000?

Mr. UNDERHILL. No; some of them have been stricken out.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. For instance, legal services, $6,000?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes; we struck out about $23,000.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And the item of $6,000 is one of the items stricken out?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $33,121 to Charles H. Niehaus, of Grantwood, N. J., to compensate the said Niehaus for losses suffered by him in the designing and erection by the said Niehaus of the Francis Scott Key Memorial at Fort McHenry, Baltimore, Md., under his contract with the United States, dated October 19, 1916, said memorial having been completed by the said Niehaus and accepted by the United States June 14, 1922.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 5, after the word "appropriated," insert "and in full settlement against the Government."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ZACCHEUS P. BARBER

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 852) authorizing the issuance of a certain patent.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

FINCH R. ARCHER

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2658) for the relief of Finch R. Archer.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Attorney General be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to credit Finch R. Archer, as warden of the United States Penitentiary at McNeil Island, Washington, in the sum of $1,608.54, said sum being the amount and total value of money and personal effects stolen September 26, 1922, from the office of the said penitentiary by escaping prisoners Robert J. Turner and James W. Peronto.

With the following committee amendment:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That the Comptroller General is hereby authorized and directed to make settlement, upon the approval of the Attorney General, with Finch R. Archer, warden of the United States Penitentiary at McNeil Island, Wash., in an amount not exceeding $1,608.54, covering the total value of money and personal effects stolen September 26, 1922, from the office of the said penitentiary by escaping prisoners; payment to be made from the appropriation for the maintenance of the institution for the current fiscal year."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

JOHN M. SAVERY

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4925) for the relief of John M. Savery.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I notice there is an allowance of 16 weeks at $45 a week, and then his decreased earnings from October 12, 1922, to April 12, 1923, at $20 a week, although his total medical expense was only $70. Does not the gentleman believe this claim ought to be reduced to about $790?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Following the usual policy of the committee adopted and reported in respect of every bill, we followed the recommendations and report of the compensation board, and we have no real reason to change the recommendations of that board in any case.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. If the man was permanently injured——

Mr. UNDERHILL. He has a permanent injury.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. It is not indicated here, and under a most generous allowance he could not get more than $790.

Mr. UNDERHILL. He could get that for a temporary injury. He has a permanent injury which incapacitates him to a certain extent for his regular trade of carpenter. He was acting as a substitute in this position of mail clerk.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The chairman of the board, Miss Brueggeman, states that "if compensation was based on this rate of pay instead of that of $45 per week, as stated above, the amount of compensation payable for the period involved would have been $792.27 plus medical bill of $70, or a total of $868.27."

Mr. UNDERHILL. Then if the gentleman will read on he will see that if compensation was based on his earning capacity in his trade of $45 a week, and the extent of his permanent injury is taken into account, the amount which would be allowed is the amount reported of $1,500.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. If I read on, all I get is "very truly yours."

Mr. UNDERHILL. Then the gentleman has not the full report from Miss Brueggeman.

Mr. GIFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes.

Mr. GIFFORD. I want to say to the gentleman from New York that I am very familiar with this case. Where there is permanent injury there ought to have been much more than $1,500 asked for, and whether or not the amount for the time he was laid off has been carefully figured does not seem to me to have much merit. Here is a man who has to go around for the rest of his life with an injury, and it seems to me that $1,500 is a very small amount.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Neither is there anything in the bill or the report to show that this is a permanent injury.

Mr. GIFFORD. I have a full knowledge of this case, and I assure the gentleman that this is a permanent injury and that he need not bother further about the report.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Of course, I will accept the gentleman's statement and not bother further about the report. [Laughter.]

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to John M. Savery, of Wareham, Mass., the sum of $1,500 in full compensation for personal injuries sustained by him at the railroad station at Onset, Mass., as the result of an accident which he suffered on the 22d day of June, 1922, when he was struck by a United States mail bag negligently thrown from a train by an employee of United States Post Office Department.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

ZACCHEUS P. BARBER

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to go back to the Calendar No. 326, objected to by me a few minutes ago. I have talked with the gentleman from California, and I have no further objection.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to issue patent to Zaccheus P. The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 9319) for the relief of the Glens Falls Insurance Co., of Glens Falls, N. Y.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Reserving the right to object, the department puts upon the committee the burden of determining whether or not the insurance company had a right to acquire by subrogation these certificates.

Mr. UNDERHILL. That is the usual procedure in the Treasury Department in all cases of lost, stolen, or misplaced bonds. It is commonly called passing the buck. In other words, they do not assume any authority or responsibility in the matter.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The committee is satisfied that the insurance company did have the right to subrogate, and that the Government is fully protected against litigants' loss?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Fully protected.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to redeem in favor of the Glens Falls Insurance Co., of Glens Falls, N. Y., three United States certificates of indebtedness, series TJ–1922, issued June 15, 1921, and matured June 15, 1922, serially numbered 5860, 5861, and 2082, of the denomination of $1,000 each, with interest at the rate of 5½ per cent per annum from June 15, 1921, to June 15, 1922, without presentation of the said certificates or the coupons representing interest thereon from June 15, 1921, to June 15, 1922, the certificates having been stolen in a mail robbery: Provided, That the said certificates shall not have been previously presented for payment and that no payment shall be made hereunder for any coupons which shall have been previously presented and paid: Provided further, That the said Glens Falls Insurance Co. shall first file in the Treasury Department a bond in the penal sum of double the amount of the certificates and the interest payable thereon in such form and with such surety or sureties as may be acceptable to the Secretary of the Treasury, to indemnity and save harmless the United States from any loss on account of the stolen certificates of indebtedness herein described or the coupons belonging thereto.

The SPEAKER. The Chair calls the attention of the gentleman from Massachusetts to the word "indemnity," on page 2, line 11. Should not that be "indemnify"?

Mr. UNDERHILL. It should.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask the gentleman to withhold his objection long enough for something of an explanation.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, I would be glad to withhold my objection, but I intend to object to the bill. I intended to object to the bill before this, but I got rather confused in my list.

Mr. GIFFORD. Does the gentleman mean that he shall object finally to the bill, in any event?

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

Mr. GIFFORD. It is useless to argue the matter.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard.

CAPT. JOHN J. CAMPBELL

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7409) to authorize the appointment of Capt. John J. Campbell, resigned, to the grade of captain, retired, in the United States Army.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. FURLOW. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman withhold his objection?

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

Mr. FURLOW. I think this case is different from the other two cases. This is the case of a chaplain of the United States Army who was serving from 1919 on. In 1926 he developed a tubercular condition in his right foot. He appeared before our subcommittee and we had him appear before the full committee. We went into the case very thoroughly. The man could have undoubtedly appeared before a retiring board and have received the consideration that is given by the Government. But he was apprehensive of having Army officers take care of his foot; in fact, he was advised by his associates not to allow the Army officers to take care of this condition. He then resigned from the service and spent his own money and hired his own doctor to take care of him. He now finds himself in need of these funds. He has been in the service for eight years. This bill would simply provide that he appear before a retiring board and have opportunity to prove by his condition whether or not he was in such condition in 1926, at the time he retired, to be retired by that board and receive his three-fourths pay. I think the cause is unusual because of the man himself.

If you were to see the man and hear him talk, you would know that he is a man who was fearful of the treatment he would receive. I do not think he was justified in that fear, but I think the committee realized that it was an unusual case. The War Department objected, though not very strenuously, on the theory that would be a precedent. Our committee takes the stand that this is a precedent to be established by the House itself, and if relief is given, it will be given by this Congress. I hope the gentleman's objection will be withdrawn.

Mr. WARREN. I will say to the gentleman from Minnesota that the report shows that the officer declined to submit to an examination on his resignation, and the department thinks that to enact the proposed legislation would constitute a preferential treatment of an individual of a class to the prejudice of others of that class who may be equally deserving of such treatment. For that reason I am compelled to object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard.

LANDON RANDOLPH MASON

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Speaker, by reason of my absence on the last call of the Private Calendar, a bill, Calendar No. 290, H. R. 4605, was passed over. I ask unanimous consent that we may return to it.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Speaker, I gave notice that I would object to such a request.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will not the gentleman withhold it?

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard. The Clerk will report the next bill.

GEORGE W. SAMPSON

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3892) for the relief of George W. Sampson.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. ROWBOTTOM. Mr. Speaker, I understand that the gentleman from West Virginia has an amendment which he wishes to offer.

Mr. BACHMANN. No. The bill is correct. There was an error in the report.

Mr. ROWBOTTOM. Then I shall not object.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers, George W. Sampson, late of Company G, Fourth Regiment West Virginia Volunteer Infantry, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of said company: Provided, That no pay, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

On line 8 insert, after the word "company," the words "July 26, 1864," and in line 9 strike out the word "pay" and insert the words "bounty, back pay."

The SPEAKER. Does the Chair understand that the gentleman from West Virginia desires to offer an amendment?

Mr. ROWBOTTOM. The report is incorrect, but the bill is correct.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. ROWBOTTOM. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I notice the President has given this man the relief he asked for, and therefore I do not see why this bill should be passed. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard.

Richardson, who was a member of Company E, Second Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Heavy Artillery, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been discharged honorably from the military service of the United States as a private of that organization on the 1st day of May, 1865: Provided, That no bounty, back pay, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

WALTER D. LOVELL

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5944) for the relief of Walter D. Lovell.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WARREN. I object.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman reserve his objection for a few moments?

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, this is a bill that the War Department claims to have considered very carefully. I want to call the gentleman's attention particularly to the report from the War Department. The War Department in its objection to this bill bases its objection upon the fact that the claimant is at fault because he had not examined the work before he had undertaken to enter upon the work. The committee expressly disallowed that feature of the claim, and allowed only the damages that the War Claims Board had allowed this man. It was a war contract. The War Department submitted all matters of contract to the War Claims Board and that board allowed the claim, but when it was taken before the Court of Claims it was disallowed.

Mr. WARREN. On every phase of it.

Mr. WOODRUM. On every phase of it. I would like to give the gentleman one or two ideas of the way they treated the claim. This man was there constructing a building for the Government in the stress of war. Government engineers and inspectors were there, and they instructed him to make certain changes in partitions and to make certain additions to the building, which he went ahead and did, and then they went in and used it, but the War Department and the Court of Claims said that because there was a regulation requiring that he should have specific authority before such work was done they would not allow it. There is no dispute about the fact that the building was put up, that the Government went into it and had the use of it. Another feature was that the Government charged liquidated damages because the building had not been completed within the contract time, when, as a matter of fact, it was not only completed within the contract time but six months before the time required for its completion. Six months before this man was to deliver the building the Government was actually in it and using the building.

It appears to the committee to be a meritorious claim, and I hope the gentleman will allow it to go through to-day. The committee gave it very careful consideration, and I have no interest in it whatever except I think it is a just and meritorious claim.

Mr. WARREN. I hope the gentleman from Virginia will permit the bill to go over.

Mr. HUDSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. Yes.

Mr. HUDSON. The bill originally called for $10,000?

Mr. WOODRUM. Yes.

Mr. HUDSON. Has the gentleman explained in the RECORD the reason why this amount was cut so generously from $10,000 to $5,000?

Mr. WOODRUM. The amount was cut down in order to meet the objection of the War Department. The War Department objected to this bill on the ground that at least a portion of the damage was occasioned because the man had not inspected the site before he began his contract. Our committee felt that was a good point and cut that out of the bill. We only allowed him such items as were clearly proven to have been put upon this work.

Mr. HUDSON. That is why I wanted the gentleman to bring out that fact, because the gentleman from North Carolina might withdraw his objection and let the bill go through to-day.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Walter D. Lovell, of Minneapolis, Minn., out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated the sum of $10,000, in full settlement for extra work, for which the Government has received the benefit and for which no payment has been made, and for losses suffered by reason of action of governmental agencies, by reason of increased cost of labor and materials, and other causes brought about by the late war.

With the following committee amendment:

In line 6, strike out the sign and figures "$10,000" and insert in lieu thereof the sign and figures "$5,048.17."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

THE PAN AMERICAN HIGHWAY

Mr. McLEOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks on Senate Joint Resolution 30.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. McLEOD. Mr. Speaker, it is evident that the time is at hand and that the Congress of the United States has realized the importance of building a through highway to connect up all the countries on the continents of the Western Hemisphere, which will reach from Detroit, Mich., to the Mexican border and on to the capitals of the 17 Republics of Central and South America, in order that every foot of the way may be traveled by automobiles and autobusses. We took the first great step in bringing about the realization of my Pan American highway proposal when we passed my resolution, H. J. Res. 259, on April 4, and when the Senate passed this same House resolution this week, April 24.

THE M'LEOD PAN AMERICAN HIGHWAY

Our highway, which is the greatest highway proposal of all time, will follow a course through Mexico, Guatemala, Nicaragua, Salvador, Costa Rica, Panama, Colombia; thence down the west coast of South America through Ecuador, Peru, Bolivia, Chile; thence east to Buenos Aires; then back up through Argentina, Uruguay, Paraguay, Brazil, and Venezuela to join itself again in Colombia—10,000 miles of continuous highway—truly the greatest highway the world has ever known. When it is completed we will be able to tour by automobile from any point in the United States to the capitals of all the continental nations in the Western Hemisphere.

The route has already been surveyed by a famous engineer a quarter of a century ago under the direction of one of our most famous railroad magnates. That engineer has proclaimed this highway not only feasible but an early necessity. It is not premature, because there is already a demand for good roads in nearly every country that it will traverse. Railroads have been built over areas as great as this, and the cost of building railroads is greater per mile than the cost of highways.

In fact, a Pan American railroad was projected in the time of Secretary of State James G. Blaine, which was partially built and is now partially in operation. But the prevailing sentiment among the countries who were to be parties to its construction now seems to be that the demand for a highway of continental scope has superseded that for a Pan American railroad. Aside from the Pan American railroad idea, we have reached a stage of development in the Americas when a through highway connecting all countries is imminently necessary for the greater welfare of all American nations, individually and collectively.

My bill provides for a commission which would furnish the moral support, financial, technical, and diplomatic advice, where necessary, to make the Western Hemisphere highway a reality within 10 years.

This bill has received the indorsement of the recent Pan American Conference at Habana by the following resolution:

The Sixth International Conference of American States—

In consideration of the importance and usefulness of closer commercial relations between the peoples of America, and the prevailing opinion in the United States of America in favor of the construction of a great intercontinental highway:

Resolves, To give its full approval to the initial steps taken in building an inter-American highway, and to recommend to all the Governments members of the Pan American Union that they cooperate in every possible manner for the speedy realization of this project.

Adopted in plenary session the 15th of February, 1928.

Secretary Hoover has recommended this bill in the following words:

This bill represents a sound proposition, and the sooner it can be enacted into law the better. It is a good-will message to Central and South America.

The advantages in increased commerce that would accrue to all the countries to be traversed by this highway is obvious. As an example, however, I might mention that there are approximately 1,000,000 automobiles in Central and South America at the present time, and we are sending them more at the rate of $40,000,000 worth a year. If we can do this in a country where there are very few roads, we need only refer to our own history to estimate what will happen when all the countries of the Western Hemisphere have good roads. It is estimated that when this highway is completed there will be approximately 15,000,000 automobiles and trucks in use in Central and South America.

This highway will serve as the means of exportation from each of those countries of the valuable raw materials and natural resources, which in each instance will undoubtedly build great national wealth, but which are now inaccessible for lack of transportation.

The great importance of the highway will be of a social and historic nature. It will be a firm bond between the countries of America to symbolize the friendly spiritual bonds which we hope will always exist. Having such a great artery of trade and travel, the probability that such friendship will endure will be greatly enhanced, for with intercommunication comes mutual understanding.

It is of historical importance because it will be a monument to our social and political institutions long after those institutions themselves shall have disappeared.

Roads have always been a favored standard for measuring ancient civilizations.

The custom of following roads has come down to us from the earliest caravan routes, some of which are still being used in Asia and Asia Minor. The roads of the ancient civilized world were mere shifting trails through mountain passes, across streams at shallow places, through the forests, and along watercourses, wherever men found the line of least resistance.

Savage man did not build roads. He merely followed those that nature provided. But great cities and dense populations can not exist without roads. We know that wherever the ancients had large cities they also had roads, which they built with great skill and care. We know that the wonderful walls and hanging gardens of Babylon were made possible through the existence of paved roads, over which men hauled the massive building stones and materials.

Herodotus tells of road building in Egypt, relating that a "great king" built a magnificent road in order to transport the material for "the Great Pyramid," using 100,000 men and requiring 10 years. Fragments of this pavement may still be seen near the Great Pyramid, and from this road our modern engineers have learned much of the road-building methods of early times. For instance, we have learned that they built their roads 10 feet thick in some places. One historian speaks or a road between Babylon and Nineveh paved with bricks laid in mortar of asphaltum. So we are assured that road-building was a highly developed art even as early as 2000 B. C.

Persians, Assyrians, Carthaginians, Chinese, and Peruvians were all great road builders, according to the historians who have studied those civilizations.

Then came the Romans with their military efficiency. One of the most important elements in the Roman strategy was permanent good roads, over which troops could be moved with great rapidity.

The Appian Way, forerunner of this Roman system, undoubtedly has the distinction of being the most famous road in history up to the present time. It was started by Claudius Appius in 312 B. C., and traversed a distance of 142 miles. It was later extended to 360 miles and was probably completed by Julius Cæsar.

The second important road built by the Romans was the Flaminian Way, which was started in 220 B. C.

From this time on the Roman Empire expanded rapidly in size and strength and Roman road-building activities kept up a correspondingly fast pace. France, Spain, and Britain were covered with a network of military roads and were connected with each other and with the Italian Peninsula in most effective fashion. Authorities on the subject estimate that the Roman road system approximated 50,000 miles. The quality of these roads is attested by the fact that many of them, including the Appian Way, are in use to-day.

With the decline of the Roman Empire, road building stopped, and there was not even sufficient interest or energy in any country to maintain those already built. It was not until the seventeenth century that the reaction to this decadence became evident. The Kings of England and France began to rebuild and repair the old Roman roads. By the middle of the eighteenth century France had developed a country-wide policy of road maintenance and her system became the model for the restoration of roads in other parts of Europe. Some new roads were built, but for the most part European roads to-day are merely the embellishment of the old Roman system.

It is somewhat astonishing to think that practically 16 centuries of the Christian era have elapsed during which no road-building feats comparable to that of the engineering, political, and military genius of Rome have been seen upon the face of the earth. It is well to remember that in building these roads the Roman generals conquered the Alps, the forests, and the large rivers of Europe. They built the equivalent of several transcontinental highways, as we know them.

And now the United States of America comes into the historical picture. Just as we now measure the power of the Roman Empire by her military roads, so the people of the world 1,000 or 5,000 years hence will judge our civilization by the roads we leave.

George Washington, in his trips to the frontier, not only surveyed the courses later to be followed by roads but he actually cut his way through the forested hills and mountains to western Virginia and Pennsylvania.

In 1806 Congress authorized the construction of a free public highway at Government expense to extend from the headwaters of the Potomac to the Ohio frontier. This became the National Old Trails Road when it was completed from Cumberland to Wheeling in 1818. It constituted the first notable public development of roads in this country, nearly all other being the toll roads of the chartered turnpike companies. The National Old Trails Road was extended to Indianapolis in 1848 and then abandoned, due to the influence of railroads which were springing up through the East and Middle West. It was generally thought that railroads would supersede wagon roads except for very short local traffic.

In the late eighteen hundreds the advent of the bicycle revived interest in roads. The State aid act in New Jersey in 1891 marked the first centralized control of highways by the States. It was followed the next year by Massachusetts.

Then came the automobile from Detroit, and like magic America found herself embarked upon a period of road building which for the first time in the Christian era rivaled the Roman road builders of 1,900 years ago. The famous old roads, such as the National Old Trails, Lincoln, Dixie, Lee, Burlington, and Pikes Peak highways have become national transcontinental boulevards.

I believe we are ready to take the step in road building which will give us supremacy for all time, namely, the Pan American highway. Just as we opened up counties, then States, and then the continental territories of North America by means of roads and paved highways, so we are now on the verge of opening up the unrevealed splendor of the Western Hemisphere by an artery of trade and travel that will extend into every country of the three Americas.

Interest in good roads in Latin America has been manifested in many ways. Witness the Pan American Highway Conference which was held in the United States three years ago and again in Buenos Aires a year ago, to which every Pan American country sent prominent delegates. Witness the exceptional interest of the Pan American newspaper men in our highways during their tour of the United States three years ago. Guatemala has a good system of roads at the present time, which make it easy to cross that country from north to south. Incidentally, Guatemala is a country of 48,000 square miles and a population of 2,200,000, making a population per square mile of about 45, while the other Pan American countries, still almost entirely without roads, are fairly uniformly populated at 6 to 14 to the square mile.

A Federal highway program was inaugurated in Mexico in September, 1925, with funds provided by tobacco taxes and a gasoline tax, which in a few years will complete a highway from Laredo, Tex., to the Guatemala border.

You will note that the course to be taken by the Pan American highway takes it directly across all present avenues of commerce, and will make what may be termed an "inner belt line" for South America.

It is estimated that such a highway would open up an immediate market for 15,000,000 automobiles and trucks, owing to the following facts:

First. The highway will open to rapid transportation, local and for export, commercial products from over 200,000 farms and plantations now served with only cow trails.

Second. It will open vacant lands to millions of agriculturists, who will produce coffee, cocoa, fruits, grains, stock, and other commercial products.

Third. It will open up thousands of small rubber plantations and solve the problem of reaching the wild-rubber forests along the Amazon River and its tributaries, where hundreds of millions of matured wild Hevea brasiliensis rubber trees in full bearing now exist, only partly worked, thus opening up to our markets this source of rubber supply, reputed to be the greatest in the world.

Fourth. It will furnish transportation to 2,000 miles of country, watered by tributaries of the Amazon, and containing ancient channels of partly proven placer gold fields, deposits of precious stones, quartz ledges of amazing commercial values, all at present inaccessible.

Fifth. The vast mileage of commercial timbers along the route are all marketable. Competent timber cruisers report that approximately 5,000,000,000 long-life railroad crossties in standing timbers within the forests of one of the countries the highway will cross can be transported on a section of the highway to a port where it can be shipped to market. Commercial timbers for furniture, cabinet work, and interior house finishing are unequaled in the world in billions of board-feet measure, variety colors, fine grain, and finishing qualities.

Sixth. The highway will create a demand for equipments, mills, supplies, and so forth, where no demand exists to-day. In fact, trade experts estimate that the return to the United States in increased trade with either Brazil or Argentina alone, due directly to such a highway, would repay us many times over for the money and energy we would need to expend in accomplishing the whole project. While a considerable element in all South and Central America know the value of the highway and want such a connecting link as this, yet they lack the experience, the organization, and the punch to put it across. That is what we would supply.

Men of vision will make vast fortunes in South America, just as they did in the early years of our own country. This group of men will inevitably exert a vast influence upon the affairs of the world. It behooves us to keep this in mind.

Just another example of the quick material return that will be the direct results of this highway: Cement has long been one of the chief exports from the United States to most of the South American countries. Imagine the quantity of cement that will be required, first to build just this 10,000-mile highway, and then the many thousands of miles of road which will be sure to follow this pioneering example. The Pan American highway will act as leaven to the bread of Latin-American highway progress. It will serve as the backbone for many thousands of miles of side roads.

One thing we must remember is that if we do not lend a helping hand in the inevitable development of Latin-America, the efficient and aggressive merchants of Europe will quickly and effectively take our southern neighbors to themselves.

This highway will also be a stimulant to the use of airplanes. It is purposely being planned to serve as a continuous emergency landing, and will serve also as a guide to flyers over the now trackless jungle areas. We recently had occasion to observe the forbidding character of the country in the attempted flight of Paul Redfern, in a Detroit plane, from Brunswick, Ga., to Rio de Janeiro. Particular attention will be given to those features which will facilitate the use of aircraft, even to the point of establishing well-equipped landing fields at short intervals along the highway. This is to be a highway for the two most modern means of communication, the aircraft and the automobile.

We must not lose sight of the cultural development of American peoples that will be brought about by the resulting increase in trade, travel, and communication. The closer bonds of friendship and understanding will undoubtedly have a profound influence toward the future peace and security of the world. Two hundred and fifty million people in the Western Hemisphere in sympathetic accord, all under republican governments, and having valuable trade relations, will be an effective counterbalance to the antiquated political balance of Europe.

This highway will commemorate a different kind of civilization from any heretofore important in the affairs of mankind. It will stand, not for the engineering achievement of a military emperor but for the more advanced genius of mutual cooperation between friendly republics.

In other words, this highway is a challenge to the principle of cooperation rather than conquest, to the ability of self-governed peoples to concentrate on a great engineering feat of purely peace-time value. For the first time in the Christian era we have an opportunity to surpass the road-building feats of the Romans, and I am confident that the United States and the 17 friendly republics to our south are capable of meeting the challenge in true American fashion.

REREFERENCE OF A BILL

Mr. HOUSTON of Hawaii. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that H. R. 12136, a bill referred to the Committee on the Territories, be rereferred to the Committee on Military Affairs. It has to do with a National Guard company in the Hawaiian Islands.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Hawaii asks unanimous consent that House bill 12136 be rereferred from the Committee on the Territories to the Committee on Military Affairs. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADDITIONAL JUDGE FOR THE EASTERN DISTRICT OF NEW YORK

Mr. BACON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on H. R. 5774, introduced by myself.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. BACON. Mr. Speaker, I have introduced H. R. 5774, which provides for an additional judge on the Federal bench in the eastern district of New York.

As showing the imperative need for the appointment of an additional Federal judge in the eastern district of New York, and indeed there is, I believe, a real need for two, there is attached a detailed set of tables showing the history of the business of the court for the district of New York, prepared by the clerk of that court, together with a statement by him in support of the tables and detailing the work that the present three judges have to shoulder.

To give an index of the number of cases before this court from 1906 to 1927 attention is invited to the following tables:

	1906	1911	1921	1927
Admiralty	185	224	863	1,164
Law and equity	126	121	321	932
Bankruptcy	256	490	583	1,031
Criminal	74	129	1,328	2,349
Civil, United States	14	45	176	903
Total	655	1,009	3,271	6,379

Viewed in the form of percentages, these figures indicate a startling increase in the business of this court. From 1906 to 1921 the increase was 650 per cent; for the period from 1911 to 1921 the activities of the court more than trebled, and notwithstanding the appointment of an additional judge in 1923, the business from 1921 to 1927 has doubled.

A comparison of the business of the eastern district court, with its present three judges, with that of the Southern District Court of New York, with its present six judges, is persuasive as showing the tremendous amount of work shouldered by each of the three judges in the eastern district at this time.

That the judges in the eastern district are doing far more than their share, and are obliged to carry a much heavier burden than their brother judges in the adjoining southern district, can be readily seen from the table given below, covering the year 1927, and showing the number of all cases before both courts divided among the individual judges in the respective courts:

Division of total cases before court by number of judges

IN THE EASTERN DISTRICT	Per judge
Admiralty cases	386
Law and equity	310
Bankruptcy	343
Criminal	783
Trials	40
Civil	301

IN THE SOUTHERN DISTRICT
Admiralty cases	152
Law and equity	221
Bankruptcy	280
Criminal	343
Trials	26
Civil	330

It will be seen by the above table that in only one instance, that covering civil cases, is the division of the proceedings among the several judges on a par with that obtaining in the eastern district. In all other proceedings the judges of the eastern district, on a division of the total number of cases begun in that court, had to assume from over 50 to over 100 per cent more work than was required of the individual judges in the southern district. And in this connection it must be borne in mind that three additional judges are being asked for the southern district, while only one additional judge is being asked for the eastern district. The comparison of the work indicates strongly that at least two judges, in addition to the present three, are needed in the eastern district.

To take care of the steadily mounting business before their court the judges in the eastern district have shown a spirit of self-sacrifice and a devotion to duty that is inspiring. They are laboring under a terrific strain, which should not be required of them. The work of the court engages their attention from early morning until late in the evening, and from the information available it is known that it is the common rule for them to come back to their chambers at night or to bring work to their homes. This is at best an unfortunate condition which should not be tolerated.

The judges themselves in this district strongly feel the need for help. This is the comment by one of them:

> Not only do we need one, but two more judges.
> We have five calendars—(1) ex parte and motions, (2) criminal, (3) common law (civil jury), (4) equity, (5) admiralty—and as we are required to hold an ex parte and motion and a criminal term each month, we can give only one term each three months to common law, equity, and admiralty.

Another comments as follows:

> There is no question but that an additional judge is needed in this district. We are constantly compelled to ask for the services of judges from certain other districts to help us out, and there is no reason to think that the work in the eastern district is so much less than that in the southern district as to require nine judges in the latter district and only three in this district. On the contrary, I imagine that the work actually done in this district approximates fairly well the work of the southern district, although there is, of course, no such clamor made about our work.

The eastern judicial district, in terms of population, is to-day no doubt larger than the southern judicial district. And the percentage of growth in the former far outstrips that in the latter. The 1925 State census shows that in five years:

> Richmond County increased 18 per cent.
> Kings County increased 9 per cent.
> Queens County increased 52 per cent.
> Nassau County increased 64.5 per cent.
> Suffolk County increased 30 per cent.

The above counties comprise the eastern judicial district.

The total population of this district, according to the State census of 1925, and which must in 1928 be viewed as very conservative, is as follows:

Richmond County	138,277
Kings County	2,203,235
Queens County	714,647
Nassau County	207,640
Suffolk County	143,208
Total	3,407,007

For example, a comparison with the southern district of New York is pertinent. There are at present six Federal judges in the southern district of New York, and in the bill pending before Congress three additional judges are provided for, making a total of nine. The total population of the southern district of New York is 3,730,808, or a population of 621,801 for each judge, as compared to a population of 1,135,669 for each judge in the eastern district of New York. While the 1925 State census shows practically equal population for both judicial districts, the percentage of growth in the eastern district would indicate that in population the eastern district is to-day larger than the southern district.

The volume of business in the southern district is, of course, large, but it must be borne in mind that Brooklyn alone, of the eastern district, to-day ranks fourth in industrial production. To-day Brooklyn exceeds Philadelphia and Manhattan alike and is to-day the second largest city in the United States. Long Island itself, excluding Richmond County, which is also part of the eastern district, ranks with four of the great States of the Union, although its area is, of course, much smaller. Thirty per cent of the population of the entire State of New York is centered in Long Island, and the arrow of growth is ever pointing forward.

As indicating the importance of this eastern judicial district, the following figures will be of interest, especially when the county of Richmond, also a part of the eastern district, is not included in them:

	Population	Area, square miles
New Jersey	3,680,482	8,224
Missouri	3,498,143	69,420
Long Island	3,268,730	1,376
Georgia	3,138,962	59,265
Indiana	3,124,499	36,354

	Assessed value	Area, square miles
Texas	$3,602,000,000	265,896
Long Island	3,596,000,000	1,376
Kansas	3,481,000,000	82,158
California	3,181,000,000	158,297

The following data concerning the importance of Brooklyn alone—and it must be borne in mind that Brooklyn is only one part of the eastern judicial district—is impressive:

Brooklyn's population exceeds that of seven States of the Union.

Brooklyn's manufactured products amount to more than $1,000,000,000 annually.

Brooklyn ranks fourth in industry in the United States.

Brooklyn ranks sixth in industry in the world.

Brooklyn leads the world in the importation, distribution, and refining of sugar.

Brooklyn ranks first as a coffee importing and distributing center.

Brooklyn ships approximately 55 per cent of the freight from the combined ports of New York, Newark, Hoboken, and Jersey City, the sailings from Brooklyn visiting 119 foreign cities.

Brooklyn has 187 piers, accommodating more than 700 ocean liners.

Brooklyn has the second largest public-school enrollment in the United States, exceeded only by Chicago.

And there is also given the measure of Brooklyn's startling progress in the last 10 years:

	1916	1926
Population	1,870,000	2,240,000
Telephones	138,000	356,000
Building permits	$35,300,000	$280,000,000
Electric meters in service	87,000	684,454
Realty, assessed valuation	$1,750,000,000	$3,230,856,000

And this great city is taking greater strides every year in the march of progress.

This tremendous activity must of necessity result in increased litigation before the Federal courts in the eastern district.

The entire bar, regardless of politics, is strongly in favor of an additional judge in this district. As an example of this, the following resolution by the Brooklyn Bar Association, adopted on March 8, 1928, is indicative of this sentiment:

Whereas the amount of business in the United States district for the eastern district of New York has increased so largely that from 1911 until 1922 there was an increase of about 500 per cent in admiralty, 250 per cent in law and equity, 200 per cent in bankruptcy, and an increase of 500 per cent in criminal cases; and

Whereas the percentage of increases has continued from that period down to the fiscal year ending June 30, 1927; and

Whereas there are now only three district judges appointed from this district; and

Whereas under the present condition one judge is continually occupied with criminal cases, one judge is occupied with all the ex parte and litigated motions and naturalization, that only one judge is therefore available to try the litigated causes in equity, law, and admiralty, so that each class of causes has but three months of each year for the transaction of its business unless judges are brought from out of town; and

Whereas there has been increasing difficulty in obtaining judges from other districts to sit in the eastern district of New York and relieve the pressure: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Brooklyn Bar Association at a regular meeting thereof, held on the 8th day of March, 1928, places itself on record as being unanimously in favor of there being an increase in the number of judges for the eastern district of New York by at least one; and be it further

Resolved, That the Brooklyn Bar Association place itself on record as being in favor of the bill H. R. 5774, now pending before the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to each Congressman representing a congressional district within the eastern district of New York, and to each of the United States Senators from the State of New York; and be it further

Resolved, That the president of the Brooklyn Bar Association be empowered and directed to appoint a committee of 10, 2 members of which shall wait upon each Congressman representing a congressional district within the confines of the eastern district of New York, and each United States Senator from the State of New York, to obtain from such Congressmen and Senators a definite stand upon the following propositions and report the same back to the Brooklyn Bar Association at its next regular meeting, whether the said bill for the additional judge shall have been acted upon or not; and be it further

Resolved, That the questions to be asked by the committee of these Congressmen and Senators are as follows:

1. Are you persuaded that an additional United States district judge is necessary in the eastern district of New York at the present time?

2. Are you in favor of the present bill, H. R. 5774, providing for the appointment of an additional judge of the District Court of the United States for the Eastern District of New York?

3. If not, why?

The pressure of business before the Federal courts in this district has necessitated the assignment of judges from other States in the Union in order that the lawyers and the litigants might have even a fair opportunity of having their cases adjudicated. The situation is so serious that but three months of each year is available for trying litigated causes in equity, law, and admiralty. With the congestion so great and the calendar so far behind, a situation is created that is unjust to litigants as it is unjust to taxpayers. Conditions such as are described above result even in denial of justice. If this vital relief is not given at this session of Congress, it will probably mean that at least two Federal judges from outside the State of New York will be required to help relieve the situation until the Congress can finally take action. Whether two outside judges can be spared for this district is, however, problematical, and so in the event of failure of legislation the situation becomes most uncertain.

The proposal for this additional judge has the approval and recommendation of the Attorney General of the United States and also the approval and recommendation of Chief Justice Taft as head of the conference of senior circuit judges of the United States.

I believe it is imperative that the Congress should pass this bill at the earliest possible time, and certainly during this Congress.

EDMUND F. HUBBARD

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 10139) for the relief of Edmund F. Hubbard.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. ROWBOTTOM and Mr. WARREN objected.

Mr. WHITEHEAD and Mr. WOODRUM rose.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. Will the gentlemen withhold their objection?

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

Mr. ROWBOTTOM. I will withhold the objection, but I think on the report of the War Department I will feel constrained to object.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. I would like to say to the gentleman the report of the War Department states that in the opinion of the department, from the evidence which they have in their records, they do not see any justification for the passage of such a bill, but they did not have the evidence in their records that the Committee on Military Affairs had before it. The evidence before the Committee on Military Affairs consisted not only of the affidavit of Captain Hubbard but of an affidavit by a medical officer of the Army who examined Captain Hubbard in the early spring of 1924 and certifies to the committee in his affidavit that in his opinion Captain Hubbard, if he had been examined when he was discharged in December, 1922, would have been found to be suffering from diabetes mellitus, and this bill only gives Captain Hubbard the right to have the retiring board convened and appear before that board.

Mr. ROWBOTTOM. Does not the report state that he certified—that he was not suffering from the effects of a wound, injury, or disease, whether incurred in the military service of the United States or otherwise.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. Captain Hubbard certified to that when he was discharged, but he did not know what he was suffering from at the time of his discharge. He states in his affidavit that he had been sick in the Philippines and had been falling off, but he thought he would recover and soon regain his flesh and his health.

Captain Rutledge and the other captains who served with him not only at Camp Lee and Fort Myer, but who served with him in the Philippines, so certify. They state that he had been in bad health in the Philippines before he came home, in November, 1922, just a month before he was discharged, and one of these captains states that his uniform "hung on him like a sack." This is in the evidence before the committee.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROWBOTTOM. Yes.

Mr. SCHAFER. The gentleman thoroughly understands that following the late war a good many thousands of men were discharged without any disabilities being noted on their enlistment papers upon examination in the camp prior to their discharge, because they ran them through like cattle running through the stock pens, and the examinations were very incomplete.

Mr. WOODRUM. If the gentleman will permit, I would like to say there is direct precedent for this Hubbard bill in the Coffey bill that was passed at the last session of Congress. The situation is that the act of 1922, for the purpose of reducing the personnel of the Military Establishment, provided three methods of discharge of soldiers—one for length of service, the other for disability, and the third providing for a discharge or elimination from the service with one year's pay. Captain Hubbard was eliminated from the service with a year's pay and was not given a physical examination, although in the routine of his discharge he did certify that, so far as he knew, he was not suffering from any disease. As a matter of actual fact, and as shown in the report which the gentleman has in his hand, by the affidavits of reliable physicians, he was suffering then from diabetes.

This bill does not put him on the retired list and does not give him a penny of retired pay. It simply gives him a hearing before the retiring board of the War Department, where he can go before the board, and if he can convince the board that, in their own judgment and discretion, he should at that time have been retired for disability, then they have the right to pass upon the case.

Mr. HUDSON. If the gentleman will permit, why is he estopped from doing that without this legislation?

Mr. WOODRUM. Without this legislation the time for such action has passed.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. Yes; that is the situation now.

Mr. WOODRUM. And in the last Congress we passed similar legislation. This bill simply gives him a hearing before a board that has the right to pass on his case, and if they decide he has not proven his case, that is all there is to it.

Mr. ROWBOTTOM. I withdraw my objection, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to summon Edmund F. Hubbard, late captain of Infantry of the Regular Army of the United States, before a retiring board for the purpose of a hearing of his case and to inquire into and determine all the facts touching on the nature of his disabilities and to find and report the disabilities which in its judgment has produced his incapacity and whether his disabilities are an incident of service; that upon the findings of such a board the President is further authorized, in his discretion, either to confirm the order by which the said Edmund F. Hubbard was discharged or, in his discretion, to nominate and appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, the said Edmund F. Hubbard a captain of Infantry and place him immediately thereafter upon the retired list of the Army, with the same privileges and retired pay as are now or may hereafter be provided by law or regulation for the officers of the Regular Army: Provided, That the said Edmund F. Hubbard shall not be entitled to any back pay or allowances by the passage of this act.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

JOHN HEIZENBERGER

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2821) for the relief of John Heizenberger.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of the compensation laws and laws conferring rights and privileges upon honorably discharged soldiers, sailors, marines, etc., their widows and dependent relatives, John Heinzenberger shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from Company A, Eighth Regiment United States Infantry, November 8, 1901.

With the following committee amendment:

In line 9, after the figures "1901," insert a comma and the following: "Provided, That no bounty, back pay, pensions, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended to read: "A bill for the relief of John Heinzenberger."

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

CLIFFORD D. HAM

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5978) for the relief of Clifford D. Ham, collector general of customs, administrator of Corinto Wharf, Republic of Nicaragua.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. SPEARING. Mr. Speaker, an identical bill (S. 1899) has passed the Senate and contains the committee amendment. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate bill be substituted for the House bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Louisiana?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and in full settlement against the Government, the sum of $5,300 to Clifford D. Ham, collector general of customs, administrator of Corinto Wharf, Republic of Nicaragua, for damages to the wharf at Corinto, Nicaragua, caused by the United States ship Quail.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

EDWARD S. LATHROP

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Edward S. Lathrop, of Bunnell, Fla., the sum of $281.05. Such sum represents the amount paid by him for traveling and subsistence when he was forced to leave his duties as United States vice consul at Torreon, Mexico, in 1920, by reason of publication without his fault of confidential communication of his to the Department of State.

With the following committee amendment:

Line 6, strike out "$313.34" and insert in lieu "$281.05."

GREAT WESTERN POWER CO.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8185) for the relief of the Great Western Power Co., of San Francisco, Calif.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. HUDSON. Reserving the right to object, I wish the gentleman from California would make a statement for the purpose of the RECORD.

Mr. FREE. Mr. Speaker, in San Francisco Bay where the ferries cross the anchoring of vessels is prohibited. Despite that fact, the U. S. dredge Mackenzie anchored in the area and caught in the cable of the Great Western Power Co. It was thought under the public vessels act of 1925 that the company would have an opportunity to bring suit in the admiralty court, but the court has held that the admiralty court has no jurisdiction of such damages. Therefore this bill is to give the company the right to bring the suit as it was thought it had a right to bring it.

Mr. EDWARDS. What is the amount involved?

Mr. FREE. Seven thousand three hundred and eighty-three dollars and two cents.

Mr. EDWARDS. Is this recommended by the committee?

Mr. FREE. Yes.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the claim of the Great Western Power Co. of San Francisco, Calif., owner of a subaqueous power cable lying beneath the waters of the Bay of San Francisco against the United States for damages alleged to have been caused by collision between the said subaqueous cable and the U. S. steam dredge Mackenzie in San Francisco Harbor on or about April 15, 1927, and by the injuring and damaging of said subaqueous cable by the said steam dredge Mackenzie may be sued for by said Great Western Power Co. in the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of California sitting as a court of law and acting under the rules governing such court. And said court shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine such suit and to enter a judgment or decree for the amount of such damages and costs, if any, and interest at the legal rate upon any such damages, as shall be found to be due against the United States in favor of the Great Western Power Co. upon the same principles and measures of liability as in like cases between private parties, with the same rights of appeal, error, and certiorari: Provided, That such notice of suit shall be given to the Attorney General of the United States as may be provided by order of said court, and it shall be the duty of the Attorney General to cause the United States attorney in such district to appear and defend for the United States: Provided further, That said suit shall be brought and commenced within six months from the passage of this act.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 2, line 7, strike out "and interest at the legal rate upon any such damage."

Bass, collector of internal revenue, Austin, Tex., of the value of certain $1 and $2 documentary internal-revenue stamps amounting to $2,400, which were charged to him and which have through some unknown means disappeared from his office.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

JAMES O. WILLIAMS

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8807) for the relief of James O. Williams.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I object.

Mr. HALL of Illinois. Will the gentleman reserve his objection? I have a very great interest in it. This man lives in my town.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The gentleman says he is interested in this bill?

Mr. HALL of Illinois. Very much, indeed. The man lives in my home town and it is a very worthy case.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I want to be frank about this. I think I have just cause for complaint of the treatment I received when the gentleman from Massachusetts objected to returning to my meritorious bill.

Mr. HUDSON. Will the gentleman yield for a moment for me to make a statement? When the gentleman from Virginia was not on the floor at the beginning of the session the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. UNDERHILL] said that beginning with the Private Calendar he would object to a request to return to any bill behind the star. I suppose the gentleman from Massachusetts was trying to be fair to everybody.

Mr. MONTAGUE. But we did return back of the star by unanimous consent. I heard one bill considered back of the star.

Mr. UNDERHILL. That was the first one.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I understood the gentleman from Massachusetts to say that he objected to my request to return behind the star because the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SIMMONS] made the request that he do so.

Mr. UNDERHILL. I said I had made a statement on the floor of the House that any further request to return to matters behind the star would be objected to by me, and when the gentleman from Virginia made the request I said I had refused others and would therefore object. And furthermore, the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SIMMONS] asked me to protect his rights in the matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Comptroller General of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to relieve James O. Williams, special disbursing agent for the State of Washington and the Territory of Alaska during the fourteenth decennial census from accountability or responsibility for losses for which he was accountable or responsible, by crediting his account with the sum of $3,924, erroneously paid out by him in good faith, for subsistence, on the strength of certain travel authorizations during the period from August 14, 1919, to November 30, 1920.

LOUIE JUNE

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2473) for the relief of Louie June.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HUDSON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, the gentleman from California [Mr. CURRY], who introduced the bill, is not on the floor. Is there anyone here who can give us any information about the bill?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Speaker, this bill has been before previous sessions of Congress, but has failed of passage because it got caught in a jam. The fact of the matter is that this Chinaman, who was employed at the Mare Island Navy Yard, on a local road fell into an excavation which had been left there by the employees of the yard, which was unguarded and unlighted. He received a very bad injury. He was in the hospital for a long time. The only claim that the poor Chinaman makes is for the amount of money that it cost him while he was in the hospital.

Mr. HUDSON. Totaling what?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Two thousand five hundred dollars. As a matter of fact, that is less than the amount that the Chinaman spent.

Mr. HUDSON. Has not this bill been objected to in previous Congresses?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Not that I know of.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized, empowered, and directed to pay, out of any funds in the Treasury of the United States of America not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $2,500 to Louie June to reimburse him for money expended and compensate him for an injury received at the Mare Island Navy Yard, Calif., May 27, 1922.

With the following committee amendment:

Line 6, after the word "appropriated," insert "and in full settlement against the Government."

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will report the committee amendment.

There was no objection, and the Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That the Postmaster General is hereby authorized and directed to credit the accounts of Walter C. Burton, deceased, formerly postmaster at Brooklyn, N. Y., in the sum of $1,200, which is the amount of money-order funds lost by theft at Station A, Brooklyn, N. Y., July 29, 1922, and to release Harry Pincus, a clerk in that post office, from liability for said sum.

"SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Harry Pincus, a clerk in the post office at Brooklyn, N. Y., out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and in full settlement against the Government, the sum of $620 paid by Harry Pincus on account of the loss of money-order funds referred to in section 1 of this act, and such further sum as may be paid by said Harry Pincus on account of said loss, and deposited for the service of the Post Office Department after that date and prior to the approval of this act."

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $44, to E. C. Howze, of Union, S. C., who served as United States commissioner from November 30, 1924, to March 31, 1925.

With the following committee amendments:

Line 5, after the word "appropriated," insert the words "not to exceed"; and in line 6, after the word "Carolina," strike out "who served as United States commissioner from November 30, 1924, to March 31, 1925," and insert "such sum as may be required, on the basis of the fees allowed by law, for services as a de facto United States commissioner, from November 30, 1924, to March 31, 1925, inclusive, upon certification by the Comptroller General of the United States of the amount found due."

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. ROWBOTTOM. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman explain why this sum was cut from $15,000 to $5,000?

Mr. HARE. Mr. Speaker, the bill was introduced with the idea that interest should be allowed on the original amount, though I learned it was not the practice of the Government to allow interest on claims. For that reason it was reduced to $5,000.

Mr. HUDSON. What was the original amount?

Mr. HARE. Five thousand dollars.

Mr. HUDSON. The report shows here that they put in a claim to the War Department for $3,040.

Mr. HARE. I investigated that and found that that was a claim that came originally from Beaufort, N. C., and not from Beaufort, S. C. That is another claim.

Mr. HOOPER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDSON. Yes.

Mr. HOOPER. The War Claims Committee examined this matter with the utmost care. It was a peculiar situation. We went into it with greatest care and made up our minds that it was really an equitable claim under the extraordinary circumstances under which it arose.

Mr. HUDSON. I am glad to reply that I have such confidence in my colleague and his work on that committee that I shall make no objection.

Mr. ROWBOTTOM. I withdraw my objection, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to the officers or trustees of Carteret Street Methodist Episcopal Church South, of Beaufort, S. C., out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $15,000 for losses sustained by the use, occupation, alienation, and appropriation of the Wesley Methodist Church and grounds in the town of Beaufort, S. C., by the military forces of the United States during and following the War between the States.

With the following committee amendment:

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I object.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman reserve his objection for a moment?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I will.

Mr. SCHAFER. This is a department bill, introduced by the chairman of the Claims Committee at the request of the Department of Justice. It appears that the motor cycle in use in the Department of Justice was worn out, and they had no funds appropriated to purchase a new motor cycle. However, they had at their disposal some funds for the rental of machines, and they entered into a contract for the rental of a motor cycle. The Government received the motor cycle which was needed by the department and does not lose anything by the enactment of this bill. It is really a bill for the relief of a disbursing officer of the Department of Justice.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I have a similar bill, in which the department not only would not lose, but would gain. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard. The Clerk will report the next bill.

CHARLES L. DEWEY

Mr. ROWBOTTOM. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman who introduced the bill if the claimant expects to secure a pension after the passage of the bill?

Mr. ARNOLD. No. That will not be the effect of the bill.

Mr. ROWBOTTOM. I withdraw my reservation.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers, Charles L. Dewey, who was a member of Company F, Fourth Regiment Illinois Volunteer Infantry, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a private of that organization on the 5th day of September, 1898, for gastric catarrh and rheumatism: Provided, That no bounty, back pay, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

HOMESTEAD SETTLERS ON THE DRAINED MUD LAKE BOTTOM, IN THE STATE OF MINNESOTA

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8487) to adjudicate the claims of homestead settlers on the drained Mud Lake bottom, in the State of Minnesota.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, the only objection I have to this bill is that it does not contain appropriations for the relief of all the settlers. I find the gentleman from Minnesota has introduced House bill 12375, which has for its purpose the settlement of one of the other claims. Therefore I shall not object to the present consideration of this bill.

Mr. HUDSON. Mr. Speaker, I object for to-day.

Mr. LEAVITT. Will the gentleman reserve his objection?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Why does the gentleman from Michigan object?

Mr. HUDSON. It seems to me this bill ought not to be passed at this late hour with all of these claims in it.

Mr. LEAVITT. It is one of the most meritorious bills on the calendar.

Mr. HUDSON. I objected because I did not see the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. SELVIG] on the floor, but I see he is present.

Mr. UNDERHILL. The committee gave this bill the most careful attention. It went into it to the last degree, even to the changing of the spelling of a name and striking out various amounts. No bill could have had more consideration by a committee than this bill has had.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. And it has the recommendation of the department?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes.

Mr. HUDSON. It is a bill carrying over $34,000, and I wanted the gentleman from Minnesota to be on the floor.

Mr. LEAVITT. The gentleman is here.

Mr. HUDSON. I see the gentleman is present.

Mr. SCHAFER. It is a good bill, but it does not go far enough.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the following several sums of money to the respective claimants, their heirs, assigns, or legal representatives; the amount to be paid to each settler, his heirs, assigns, or legal representatives: To Grant I. C., from November 1, 1924, to May 22, 1925.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 5, after the word "appropriated," insert the words "and in full settlement against the Government."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

MUSCLE SHOALS

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD upon efforts to negotiate a contract for the private operation of Muscle Shoals.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, I was so anxious to get what is called the Madden bill, which incorporates a proposal by the American Cyanamid Co., whose president is Mr. W. B. Bell, in such shape as to be able to vote for it myself and to enable other Members of the committee and of the Congress to support it that I worked very hard in preparing and proposing benefiting amendments to same. I must have offered 100 or more amendments in all, and nearly all of them were finally accepted by the American Cyanamid Co. through its agent and officer, Mr. Bell, and are now incorporated in the present draft of the Madden bill. Just to show some of the situations that presented themselves before the committee, and especially before the subcommittee of five, of which I was a member, I have extracted a few typical pages from the hearings.

For instance, on February 3, 1927, while Mr. Bell was testifying and had expressed great fear that German competition might destroy the American fertilizer industry and gave this as a reason for his declining to make certain additional guaranties, the following took place:

Mr. McSWAIN. Well, I am a Democrat, but I'll be blamed if I would not vote to protect my own governmental industry from destruction by German competition, because I would be protecting the very agency of national defense. Because if they can put you at Muscle Shoals out of business, they will put every other private manufacturer out of business, and therefore there will be no peace-time industry making any amount of ammonia or nitrate, so that in war time we will be at the mercy of both Germany and Chile for our nitrates.

Mr. WURZBACH. That was exactly the argument Andrew Johnson made, you remember——

Mr. McSWAIN. Although I would not promise to protect the textile manufacturers of New England nor the bootmakers of Boston, I'll be hanged if I won't protect our own nitrate industry down at Muscle Shoals.

Again, on February 4, 1927, in commenting upon an amendment by myself to insure impartial and thorough and even critical audit of the books, the following took place:

Mr. BELL. We are trying to get all of our difficulties over before we start instead of having them afterwards.

Mr. McSWAIN. Exactly—that under these numerous items of cost the books, in the best of good faith, would probably be kept and the business so conducted that absolutely cheap fertilizers would probably never come about; that fertilizers will be produced, but even if they move and sell them, they will just be skimmed along slightly underneath the existing scale of prices and not enough really to do the Fertilizer Trust and the financial interest backing them very much damage; whereas if you, in a private enterprise, without any Government subsidy, now are making plant food for 43 per cent less than the private interests are making it, and if you were to get down yonder producing it in enormous masses under a Government subsidy as to power, you ought to cut the cost of this plant food in half, at least, in a few years. And it is very forcibly borne in on my mind that this matter of the audit of the books, as well as an inspection of the plant and supervision of the plant, under the direction of the farmers' bureau, is the key to the situation for the purpose of insuring and guaranteeing that the greatest economies will be practiced in the matter of manufacturing this fertilizer.

Again, on February 4, 1927, the following remarks were made by me:

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Bell, I respectfully submit there are various items in these cost factors that call for the exercise of discretion, that call for decisions on points of judgment, as to what is and what is not to be included in the items of cost. The very first one is (B) "All indirect expenses." And what indirect expenses are properly chargeable to the cost of fertilizer? That is a matter of decision that he must render judgment upon on the very threshold of his audit, in the first place.

Well, I do not question in either event the audit will be made honestly, but my idea is to try to insure some of the diligence and some of the initiative that would originate from what has been characterized as a partisan audit. It would please me very especially if the farmer board auditor and the Cyanamid Co.'s auditor would disagree very substantially and get into right much of a racket, so that a third man would get the benefit of the different points of view in deciding upon questions of that sort, which, if he were to make an interrupted and uninterfered with audit, would never occur to him, never come to his attention except it was aroused by them to a point of consciousness.

I want to be perfectly frank and not seem to be ugly and seem to suspect everybody and think everybody is a crook, and if you will read the debates in the Constitutional Convention of 1787 you will find this thing repeatedly coming before them—the question of who they would trust, what power and discretion would be given—and this observation was made one hundred times, I reckon, that "To confer this power, wide open, without any checks and balances we are seeking to throw around its exercise, would be to confer power no good man ought to want to exercise and no bad man ought to be permitted to exercise." So we have these great constitutional checks and balances, one against the other, not on the assumption that the President of the United States would not make good treaties with foreign nations, but on the ground he ought to have the advice and consent of two-thirds of the Senators before he committed this Nation as to its foreign policy, etc. Now I submit that——

Mr. WRIGHT. Without argument.

Mr. McSWAIN. Without further argument, at least.

Again, on February 4, 1927, in considering a proposition offered by many to give the farmer board power to determine the kinds and forms of fertilizer to be made by the American Cyanamid Co., the following took place:

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Bell, you have given them all the power and a darn sight more than you would be willing to give the Government under the present plan, and it has more to lose.

Mr. BELL. Yes; because we are putting up $35,000,000.

Mr. McSWAIN. This is a partnership where the United States Government is going to put in over $225,000,000 before it is through, and you may have in, ultimately, $35,000,000; but a part of that will be depreciation and profits you have already made, and it does look to me like some agency of the United States ought to have a look-in, somehow. Now, the suggestion was made yesterday to let representatives of the farmer board go there and just look around—to look inside. Under your construction of this contract no Member of Congress, nor the Secretary of War, nor President of the United States would ever have the right to put his foot inside or upon that 2,500 acres. Now, this being to a very substantial effect a partnership business, being financed by the United States Government under a proposition by which you can not lose and by which you may make enormous profits——

Mr. BELL. No, we won't; you can not figure any way by which we can make enormous profits on this proposition. It just can not be done.

Mr. MCSWAIN. Suppose you decide, in a very few years, to resort to the synthetic process and thereby save to yourselves some 65 to 75 per cent of the power you have to use under the present process and devote that power to industry rather than the manufacture of fertilizer, then you will have not exceeding 100,000 horsepower in the fertilizer business out of a maximum of 280,000, and all the rest, and all the surplus, and all the secondary (and at times that secondary power may amount to half a million horsepower) will be devoted to industry and highly profitable, no doubt.

Again, on February 4, 1927, discussing the lack of power in the so-called "farmers' board" to protect the farmers as against the selfish interests of the American Cyanamid Co., the following took place:

Mr. MCSWAIN. They would stop that and would not let you sell it, and then all that power would go to a power proposition, because this farmer board has no more power than a headless, armless, eyeless, legless, brainless man.

Mr. BELL. I am sorry you feel that way, but that is not my conception of what we offer the Government.

Mr. MCSWAIN. I am only one, and I am willing to let the others pass on it; but if it is not changed in that respect, I am going to tell the House what I think about it; and if they want to vote on it, it is their responsibility. But I will certainly shed my responsibility for voting on this kind of proposition. That is all I have to say; I am through, now.

Mr. FISHER. Would not that be subject to the farmer board, as to the composition of the fertilizer?

Mr. MCSWAIN. You tell it; you are a lawyer and have been in Congress longer than I have, and you tell me whether it would or not. I ask you that question.

And again in the same connection observe the following colloquy:

Mr. MCSWAIN. You have not misled us on anything; you have been perfectly frank with us; I will say that for you.

Mr. BELL. Thank you.

Mr. MCSWAIN. Now let me withdraw any excessive heat, and let us keep the flush out of our cheeks, but it is apparent to my mind you do not have confidence in your ability to make fertilizer, even with a Government subsidy, that will undersell the other manufacturers.

Mr. BELL. Oh, Mr. MCSWAIN, I would not put my money and other people's money in this thing if I did not have confidence.

Mr. MCSWAIN. But they have already put it in; you have gotten them into a speculative venture to build this plant at Warners, and you have gone into Canada, even, and it seems to me you ought to have confidence in your ability to make fertilizer here in the United States, with a Government subsidy in back of you, that would sell. I have said all along that ammo-phos would sell; I am satisfied ammo-phos will sell.

Again, in connection with the point that the American Cyanamid Co. would produce only nitrogen, and that perhaps in the form that the farmers would not buy and use, I made the following comment:

Mr. MCSWAIN. And you will recall that several times, when other members of the committee were disposed to doubt whether ammo-phos would sell to the American farmer, I said I am satisfied it will sell, if it sells for 43 per cent below the present market value of plant food of that equivalent, and it was my hope and belief that, with cheap power and mass production, under virtually a Government subsidy, we would cut the cost of that plant food to 50 per cent—and I am willing to take the responsibility of saying that it will certainly not be less than 43 per cent—and, if it could go out in the form of ammo-phos, where our farmers could use it, I was willing to yield on a great many things in the bill that I did not agree to, in order to get ammo-phos for at least 43 per cent below the present cost of nitrogen and phosphoric acid as a plant food in the present form. But, as I see it now, under the interpretation of the bill as a nitrogen content alone, it won't meet the situation of the farmers and the nitrogen will go into the fertilizer factories, which are virtually mixing institutions, and the American farmer will be left in the lurch one more time.

Again while examining Mr. Phillips, who proposed to finance in part the Farmers' Federated Fertilizer Co., the following took place:

Mr. MCSWAIN. Now, Mr. Phillips, you have had a far vaster experience in the handling of millions of money than any of the rest of us; I guess I can safely say that—certainly I am not in the 10-cent class as compared with you.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I do not think that ought to be in the record.

Mr. MCSWAIN. I want to ask you this: Do you think, as a business proposition, you or anybody else would have any serious difficulty in raising sufficient money to recondition and to operate, by way of working capital, and build whatever additional plant might be necessary—not including any dam, of course—to make fertilizer there, if you were to get 6 per cent on your investment, have the privilege of amortizing that investment within 10 years and receive 8 per cent on the manufacturing cost of the fertilizer and then, if after a period of 10 or 15 years the manufacture of fertilizer would be an economic impossibility, because of competition from either domestic manufacturers or foreign manufacturers and, therefore, could be manufactured only at a loss, so that out of its manufacture, you could not receive your 6 per cent and your 8 per cent profit, and, therefore, could not amortize the investments—if you had a guaranty from your Government that in the event of such complete failure you could, by arbitration or by court action, have the value of your remaining investment ascertained and refunded to you in toto, do you think, under such a proposition as that you would have any serious difficulty in raising money to conduct the business?

Mr. PHILLIPS. I do not.

Mr. MCSWAIN. Does not that strike you as a proposition like a poor man going into business with a rich man whereby the rich man says, "You take this money and go into business; if you succeed you get at least half of the profit; if you fail I take the business off of your hands and pay back what little you put in it"—is not that about the analysis of it?

Mr. PHILLIPS. Well, I think you can make a better deal than that.

Mr. MCSWAIN. I am asking you, if you could make as good a deal as that, from your point of view—not from our point of view—would not you jump at it?

Mr. PHILLIPS. I think that would be a satisfactory deal.

Mr. MCSWAIN. I know if some rich man would take me in business in that way I would certainly jump at it. That is all, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. R. F. Bower associated in some way with the American Farm Bureau Federation, appeared before the committee, and among other things the following colloquy took place:

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Mr. MCSWAIN, just state to him, if power faded out of the picture, then the two alternatives you put up.

Mr. MCSWAIN. I am sure Mr. Bower already understands it. Of course, Mr. Bower, you gentlemen are to be commended for the efforts you have put forth to try to put this into fertilizer proposition, and for the service you have rendered personally, and all of us thank you, but you men very well understand that you could not expect us just to vote for and approve and pass out a bill without amendment or modification——

Mr. BOWER. No, sir.

Mr. MCSWAIN (continuing). That had been drawn by Charles Evans Hughes, and his charge for giving advice was more than $100,000——

Mr. BOWER. That would not affect me one way or the other; I would not expect you to report it out if it had been drawn by Chief Justice Taft, or anyone else.

Mr. MCSWAIN. Now then, you admit it is a matter for our judgment if it has to be modified?

Mr. BOWER. Surely.

Mr. MCSWAIN. And, of course, just how far we would modify is a matter of judgment.

Mr. BOWER. To a certain extent, Mr. MCSWAIN; but when you modify to the point where you destroy your proposal then I begin to wonder if you have not gone too far.

Mr. MCSWAIN. I will tell you what I believe; I believe if you gentlemen had just backed us up here—because I submit I am just as good friend to the farmer as you, Mr. Gray——

Mr. BOWER. We believe that.

Mr. MCSWAIN. And my effort here has been to get fertilizer and to get the kind of fertilizer that would mean a fertilizer that the farmers would buy, and not merely the ingredients that the fertilizer companies would buy—my desire has been to free the farmer of the grip that the fertilizer manufacturers have had over him ever since I was a little boy, you see. Now, then, I went into this thing and I found this little pamphlet, this catechism you gentlemen put out was misleading——

Mr. BOWER. If it is we would like to know it.

Mr. MCSWAIN. Because I found the answer to this question here on page 3 [indicating] is not correct. Mr. Bell admits that is not correct. Just read this: "Does the Cyanamid Co. agree under the terms of the Madden bill to furnish phosphoric acid also?" That was the question.

Again, while Mr. Chester H. Gray was before the committee advocating the adoption of the Madden bill, I pointed out to him the legal situation and the business probability that fertilizer companies and the power companies would be able to make very attractive offers to obtain a controlling interest in the stock of the American Cyanamid Co., and then the lease would be in unfriendly hands, and then they could so manipulate it so as to keep the letter, but violate the spirit and purpose, and thus defeat our great aim for fertilizers.

Mr. MCSWAIN. Now, then, my idea was this: It would be possible for the Cyanamid Co. to sell out—it could just sell out and assign the stock, could it not?

Mr. GRAY. I presume so.

Mr. MCSWAIN. It could sell to the power companies or anybody else. Now, then, you must always construe a contract when you are making it for a long time, just like a lawyer drawing a will; you must take the most adverse and contrary view possible as to what could take place in the remote future. Now, what I apprehend could be done would be for this concern to get into the hands of people unfriendly to the fertilizer interests, who merely wanted to keep the bare letter and not the spirit, and they could manufacture a concentrated form of fertilizer of one single ingredient (of nitrogen, say) in such form that it would not sell, and they could keep 25 per cent of the production in storage and go on and use the power indefinitely for the remainder of the term, and during that last 40 years, Mr. Gray, they would sit on the pot, the fertilizer pot, and keep everybody else off of it, and not let anybody else at all in to make a fertilizer that would sell to the farmers that they would use at all. Now, what we wanted to do, if they failed in fertilizer, was to be able to try somebody else, don't you see?

Mr. GRAY. Yes.

Mr. MCSWAIN. Because surely the cyanamide people are not the last word in all the world in the manufacture of fertilizer; surely there will be somebody else who should at least have an even break if they, after 10 years of experimentation on their part in the manufacture of fertilizer, should fail. So the proposition was that we would recommend to Congress, if they failed in the manufacture of fertilizer and had to give it up because it would not move, that then the Congress of the United States would pay them back every dollar they had put in the fertilizer business and take the plant over and let somebody else try it for a period. That was our proposition, and it seems to be just as fair as can be.

As evidence of my earnest desire to negotiate a contract with the American Cyanamid Co. so as to insure private operation, I submit the following extracts of statements and colloquies by me:

Mr. MCSWAIN. I do not think there is any doubt about the fact that the Government is going to try the fertilizer business there somehow, either indirectly through lessees or directly through its own agencies. Now, my belief is, rather than have the Government directly go into the manufacture of fertilizer and put up many millions of dollars of its own in improvements and permanent investments, it would agree to give it to a private concern that has a selfish interest in trying to succeed and, if they should make an honest effort and fail, that the Government would then recoup it for the investment in the fertilizer plant.

And, again, it is observed how I was urging Mr. Bell to look at the problem from our broad point of view—

Mr. BELL. Our plants on the books have been written down. I believe the appraised value of our plants would run substantially over $20,000,000.

Mr. MCSWAIN. So you have about $16,000,000 or $17,000,000 in the fertilizer business?

Mr. BELL. All of that; yes.

Mr. MCSWAIN. Now, then, when you put that money into the plants, you met the same contingency that you would meet when you would go into the fertilizer business at Muscle Shoals, did you not, to wit, that some cheap process might come along and destroy the value of your equipment?

Mr. BELL. Yes.

Mr. MCSWAIN. Or foreign competition might destroy it?

Mr. BELL. Yes.

Mr. MCSWAIN. Exactly. Then what objection do you have to the proposition we have suggested that, if some cheaper process does destroy your future investment at Muscle Shoals, or foreign competition destroys it—what objection do you have to an agreement by the Government to refund what you have lost rather than take your chances were that to happen, like you did when you put $17,000,000 in the present business? You took your chances with that, did you not, without anybody agreeing to indemnify you?

Under the bill as now written it is true, but suppose we assume now that Cove Creek would not be built, would you be willing to take this power from Dam No. 2 and Dam No. 3 and the steam plant and devote it all, cutting out the Union Carbide Co. or anybody else, devoting that all to the manufacture of concentrated fertilizer so that if in the future a more economical process might be discovered whereby it would take half the amount of power it now takes that the product of fertilizer would be double in volume from that which could now be turned out?

Mr. BELL. No.

Mr. W. B. Bell, president of the American Cyanamid Co. is a gentleman of great intelligence, of high character, and is perfectly fair and candid. I feel that the committee would have been willing to have executed the lease with him personally, or even with the American Cyanamid Co. if there could have been legal assurance that Mr. Bell would live 50 years and during that time would continue as president and controlling officer of the corporation. Of course that was impossible. But it is stated here to show the esteem in which Mr. Bell was held by the committee:

On the basic principle of whether you want private operation or whether you want Government operation, I see there is some difference in the opinion of the committee, and that is a difference that we can not very well reconcile. But in our mutual efforts to try to get together I know that the committee has gone very far, and I want to express my appreciation of it, and I hope that they feel the same way toward me.

Mr. MCSWAIN. Yes; I understand that we all feel very kindly and appreciate the great candor Mr. Bell has shown. I want the record to show that emphasis was laid upon the fact that Mr. Bell has said that these amendments that have been suggested by various members of the committee were of a constructive nature; because I did not know of some very ardent and enthusiastic proponents and supporters of this bill who wanted us to swallow just like it was handed in here, without the change of a single word, because according to their very fluent and verbose arguments the bill was perfect as it stood.

I think that a great deal more can be done to perfect it, and I want everything I say to go on the record, so far as that is concerned; it is my belief, after we have discussed the matter with Mr. Bell, that we shall have to go into an executive session ourselves and see if there is anybody who has any amendments, and vote them up or down, and when we are through with the measure let the House say what it wants to do with it, and after the House has passed on it let the Senate say what it wants to do with it, and then we will see what it looks like. Then, if Mr. Bell recognizes his child and is still willing to take him into his family, that is his privilege. And if he wants to disown him, that will be his privilege. But I think that we ought to go ahead and do something, somehow—I think that we ought to go ahead and act.

Mr. BELL. We believe that this price will be attractive. That is about all we can say. I imagine that what Mr. MCSWAIN means is cost plus 8 per cent. If that price is not attractive, we are out of luck to a very considerable extent.

Mr. MCSWAIN. That is not what I mean. I thought that I made plain yesterday what I meant, and in order to make it perfectly plain again, I will state it for the record. I apprehend that this contract will be attacked as a pure war-time cost-plus proposition; that you—that is, the lessee—will be the sole judge of what the cost is, will be the sole judge of the kind to make, and you say you insist on that, of course. And that it would be possible under that proposition with the great subsidy being offered there to barely skim under the price of the private manufacturers who have to pay for every dollar that they use, and barely sell the minimum production required to be made, and thereby make enormous profits out of the American farmer.

All of that margin between the actual cost and that price that shall be fixed just enough below the price fixed by a private manufacturer to make a go of the minimum amount required to be manufactured under the contract. That is just exactly what is in my mind. I thought that I made that plain yesterday.

At any rate, Mr. Chairman, I think this is all aside from the mark. However serious Senator NORRIS might have been, of course he could only speak for himself, and even if he could control the Senate Committee on Agriculture, and even if he could control the Senate, he certainly could not control the House as to what action it should take on the bill when it got back. We can not control the Senate and we can not control the House. It seems to me we have about gotten to the point now where it is time for us to do something. We can not agree with Mr. Bell any further, and the thing for us to do is to consider what action we shall take. It is not Mr. Bell's bill; it is not our bill. Mr. MADDEN introduced this as a Representative of the United States, and not as the agent of the American Cyanamid Co., and therefore I suggest that we take this bill up and see if we want to amend it, and my idea about the way to amend it, in addition to some verbal changes in the text, is, right down at the end here, to add a few more sections, in substance as follows:

"SEC. 8. That if the lessee, the American Cyanamid Co. and Air Nitrates Corporation, shall not within 90 days after the approval by the President of this act execute the lease herein proposed, then the Secretary of War is authorized to negotiate with any other firm or corporation a lease upon the same terms, changing the names, date, and numbers to correspond with the changed facts; and if the Secretary of War fails for a period of 90 days to negotiate any such lease."

Then section 9. Some such bill as was proposed by the Mackenzie committee, or as a basis for operation the Lowrey bill.

So that it will have three or four aspects to it when it comes before the House, so that nobody can finally say we have not done something. We have put it right up to them to do something, and we will have it out of our way for a while, at least.

As evidence of the reasoning by which we were forced to the position that there must be a recapture clause to protect the Government as a national-defense proposition, I submit the following:

Mr. McSWAIN. Supposing the United States Government wanted a plant in the nature of an arsenal where it might provide according to modern, up-to-date methods, the munitions necessary for war, it would have to go to some other place and put up another plant and buy some more land and have some more trouble, would it not? If that work there becomes antiquated, and Congress feels that it has become antiquated, and yet warfare necessitates explosives, and we do not want to run the risk of having our transports very largely cut off by a foreign fleet, and do not want to run the risk of having the Panama Canal blocked by enemy airplanes, then for the munitions that are necessary for our defense we would have to go somewhere else and put up a modern plant, would we not?

Mr. BELL. Yes. I presume you are not considering this clause by which the United States can take over this plant in time of war?

Mr. McSWAIN. It would be too late, when war came, to put up a modern plant. That was our trouble this last time. We want to be able to fight when the fight starts.

Again, in the effort to arrive at a basis of agreement, I submit the following:

Mr. McSWAIN. But at the same time it would not be enforceable in any way; consequently that is a contingency we ought to take into consideration. And I offer this suggestion, Mr. Bell, that if it ever gets to the place where the farmers' board shall file a certificate contemplated by this amendment, then it seems to me it will be so desperate that the possibility of resumption, contemplated by this proposed amendment, will practically fade out of the picture. And it seems to me, when that happens, it amounts virtually to a concession on the part of the lessee that it can not make a fertilizer proposition go; therefore it ought to surrender possession of the plant.

To the same effect, and showing the reasonableness and fairness of the proposition made by the committee to induce the American Cyanamid Co. to execute a lease, I offer the following:

Mr. McSWAIN. Now, Mr. Bell, if you will refer to page 43 of this lease, paragraph H, section 1, you will find there that if this lease is terminated for any reason, even your own fault, through any default, conscious or purposeful, or unavoidable, then any additions you may have made to the steam plant or hydroelectric plant, or any power transmission devices, things of that sort that you yourselves may have put there in the prosecution of this business, the United States is obligated to take off of your hands and pay for.

Mr. BELL. Yes.

Mr. McSWAIN. In addition, if for any reason under paragraph 2 the lease is terminated, then whatever you may have built in the way of equipment or whatever you have installed in the way of machinery to manufacture concentrated fertilizer, independent of what is described in paragraph 1 and of course not including what is described in paragraph 2 of section H, vests in the Government alone.

Mr. BELL. Yes.

Mr. McSWAIN. Now, here is the thing that keeps running through my mind: When that Niagara Falls and Warners, New Jersey, business was started, whoever put the money in then, although it was then an entirely experimental proposition 10 or 15 years ago—it was wholly experimental—whoever put the money in had confidence that it would succeed, and they knew if it did not they would lose the money, did they not?

Mr. BELL. Yes; and, if they won, they would make more than 8 per cent.

Mr. McSWAIN. Yes. Now, after the lapse of all these years, we have every assurance it is not experimental, we have a greater assurance it will succeed; yet you are unwilling, you have not enough faith in the success of the fertilizer feature to say "if it does fail, I will get out of the way and let somebody else try their hand," and you won't even accept a proposition to be reimbursed for the particular investment you may have made in plants 1 and 2 for the manufacture of concentrated fertilizer. Does that not indicate you have not as much faith now in the power of your company to succeed in the manufacture of commercial fertilizer as the promoters had 20 years ago when they started that business at Niagara Falls, because they certainly did put in about $20,000,000 of new money on an experimental venture and, if it had failed, the money would be gone.

Mr. FISHER. Was not that all brought about by the insistence of the committee to have a forfeiture clause put in, in the event it failed; was not that brought about by the discussion and insistence of the committee upon a forfeiture clause?

Mr. McSWAIN. We are still discussing that same thing.

Mr. HOFFMAN. But in the original investment you have to take into consideration there was no limitation established upon the profit.

Mr. McSWAIN. I understand that is true.

Mr. HOFFMAN. It was a speculative enterprise; but, while it did offer the possibility of loss, it also offered the possibility of great profit.

Mr. McSWAIN. It occurred to me all the while that the fact there would be a possibility of profit here would justify a recapture with reimbursement. Now, Mr. Bell's original objection to that was dual; first of all, he said he did not believe Congress would pass it. Well, his proposition involves that same principle; we are promising him here to repay for the steam plants, the electric installations, power lines, and so on, under the original proposition. So the objection Congress would not agree to refund for any installation seems to me is at least inconsistent with other parts of the bill. In the next place, he said he did not want a claim against the Government hanging open in the future anyway. There are plenty of places in the bill contemplating claims upon the Government and, as the United States court would have the liquidation of the amounts, my observation here is that whenever any judgment has come in from a court, from the Court of Claims or any other court, there has been no trouble through the Appropriations Committee of getting the money. I am speaking with great frankness. I am telling everything that is in my heart and mind.

To show that the Committee on Military Affairs was justified in refusing to follow the Senate in turning over to the Secretary of Agriculture all fertilizer activities at Muscle Shoals, I extract the following as a sample of the views of the department, as expressed by Dr. F. G. Cottrell, head of the bureau for the fixation of atmospheric nitrogen:

Mr. McSWAIN. But, Doctor, sections 3 and 4, which are the fertilizer provisions of the Norris bill, contemplate a mere experimentation; and if any farmers anywhere in the United States are expecting fertilizer by the hundreds of thousands of tons to come from Muscle Shoals under this bill, are they not doomed to disappointment; because all that will come from Muscle Shoals under the operation of this bill will be bulletins telling fertilizer manufacturers how they can produce a fertilizer cheaper; and, therefore, how they can make a bigger margin of profit between the cost of production and the price of sale to the farmer? That is the real truth of this bill, when stripped of all other significance, is it not?

Doctor COTTRELL. No; I should not say so. While I am not enthusiastic, and never have been enthusiastic, on attempting to carry the Government into large-scale production, if our success with the experiments that we shall carry out there is large enough to justify our going forward with larger construction, or even operating the plant to its full capacity, we will say, on the cyanamide, and producing these newer types of fertilizers, particularly if we can find an outlet for them so that they will move, and they do cut the cost, and private industry does not come in and beat us to it, which we rather hope they will—that is to say if we can set a lower cost, I should hope that our success would lead private industry to come in and compete with us, and gradually undersell us to the point where we could stop, eventually; and that is what I meant by saying that I hoped any provision of this kind would not commit the Government to a definite program of manufacture itself.

Mr. McSWAIN. That is very candid. So that just as soon as these experiments, paid for out of the Public Treasury, show private manufacturers of fertilizer how they can make it cheaper and they commence to make it cheaper the Government will quit; and then the Government being out of the business the private manufacturer, having no longer a competitor, will put his prices back to the original figures, and the farmer will be just where he has been all the time; and his vaunted friends, north, south, east, and west, will see that they have walked into a trap, it seems to me. We have been thinking he would get actual mass production of fertilizer down there. He may be disappointed, but I am certainly not going in when the promise is so obviously delusive as it is here. That is all.

The final impasse between Mr. Bell, president of the American Cyanamid Co., and the committee, I extract the following from the hearings had before the committee on Monday, March 19, 1928:

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Bell, you recognize, of course, that before you can do all these very desirable things that in your heart and mind you believe you can do and wish to do, this bill would have to go through the House of Representatives and receive a majority of the votes; it would have to go through the Senate and receive a majority of the votes there; and it would have to be approved by the President.

Mr. BELL. Yes.

Mr. McSWAIN. We have got a practical situation before us.

Mr. BELL. I know.

Mr. McSWAIN. And not a theoretical one to meet. We have got to face the fact the Senate has already voted, and the argument could be made and would be made that whether the Senate bill was wise or foolish, yet under that bill Congress retains the control of the property, whereas, under this bill, if this bill were reported unamended, without something in it in the way of a recapture clause, Congress would lose control of the property. And as between those alternatives it seems to me that a majority of the House and a majority of the Senate would find great difficulty in ever coming to the proposal of the lessee here.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. We are faced with the contingency of complete failure on your part. You have got entire confidence in your successful operation, based upon your experience. Let us assume that we have entire confidence in you; and I think that the consideration that we have given to your measure would rather imply that we had a great deal of confidence in you.

Mr. BELL. I appreciate that very much.

GEORGE W. BOYER

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 2657) for the relief of George W. Boyer.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the claim of George W. Boyer, of Pine Grove, Pa., owner of the barge Pine Grove, against the United States of America for damages alleged to have been caused by collision on December 7, 1925, between said barge and the highway bridge at Coinjock, N. DEATH OF SENATOR FRANK BARTLETT WILLIS

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, it is my sad duty to announce the death of my colleague, Hon. FRANK BARTLETT WILLIS, which took place last night in his home town of Delaware, Ohio. At some future time I shall ask the Senate to set apart a day on which fitting tribute may be paid to his life, character, and public services. At present I send to the desk resolutions for which I ask immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolutions will be read by the Chief Clerk.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

SATURDAY, March 31, 1928

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou in whose mercy we behold the light of another day, be our safeguard and give us convincing proofs that Thou dost govern in the affairs of men. May we keep true to the tasks that await us and true to our God who has intrusted us with them. "Hosanna! Blessed is he who cometh in the name of the Lord!" O Conqueror, take possession of Thy kingdom. The royal road which Thou hast traveled will be traced by Thy children for ages to come. Lead on, O King Eternal. Thou art the corner stone of our faith; the clouds can only mantle at Thy feet. To erase Thy name from the memory of men would be to rend the moral foundations of the world. Beneath Thy footfall the old earth is destined to move sunward, and Thy cross shall be the standard for the fondest hopes that ever beat in the human breast. O the voices of unnumbered generations shall tell of Thee as they pour their incense of praise at Thy feet. Holy, holy, holy is our Lord! Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Tuesday, after the reading of the Journal, the disposition of matters on the Speaker's table, and following the special orders, I may be permitted to address the House for 15 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that on Tuesday, after the reading of the Journal, the disposition of matters on the Speaker's table, and the special orders, he may be permitted to address the House for 15 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. SNELL. We already have one hour of special orders for Tuesday.

Mr. TILSON. It will be impossible to finish the bill on Tuesday, anyway.

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. How much time is the gentleman asking for?

Mr. TILSON. I think the gentleman might as well be accommodated on Tuesday as on any other day.

SENATE

MONDAY, April 2, 1928

The Chaplain, Rev. ZeBarney T. Phillips, D. D., offered the following prayer:

"One sweetly solemn thought
Comes to me o'er and o'er;
I am nearer home to-day
Than I've ever been before.

Nearer my Father's house,
Where the many mansions be;
Nearer the great white throne,
Nearer the crystal sea.

Nearer the bound of life,
Where we lay our burdens down;
Nearer leaving the cross,
Nearer gaining the crown.

But lying darkly between,
Winding adown through the night,
Is the silent unknown stream
That leads at last to the light.

Father, be near when my feet
Are slipping over the brink;
For it may be I am nearer home,
Nearer now than I think."

Let us pray. O Almighty God, who art found of those who seek Thee in loneliness, and whose portion is sufficient for the sorrowing souls of Thy children, remember in tender mercy the family and loved ones of him who has now fallen on sleep in the full strength of his glorious manhood. Thou only canst keep our feet from falling and our eyes from tears. Make us, therefore, ever mindful of the time when we shall lie down in the dust; and grant us grace always to live in such a state that we may never be afraid to die; so that, living and dying, we may be Thine, through the merits and satisfaction of Thy Son Christ Jesus, in whose name we offer up this our imperfect prayer. Amen.

COL. CARL L. ESTES—OUACHITA NATIONAL PARK

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, I send to the desk a letter addressed to me by Secretary of the Interior Work, which I desire to have read. I ask the attention of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY] to the letter.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, I wish to have the letter read, because I want to make a response to it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read, as requested.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

THE SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, March 30, 1928.

Hon. LAWRENCE C. PHIPPS,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: My attention has been called to charges made on the floor of the Senate that my conduct toward a caller was unbecoming a Government official. Am sorry that Senator CARAWAY made his statements from hearsay. I was present. These are the facts:

I recall that a few days ago a young man referred to my office did call, giving the name of Colonel Estes, of Texas, to discuss the proposed Ouachita National Park, to be located in that State. He appeared to be laboring under great excitement, came directly to my desk, and seated himself, as any caller may do. He announced that he wished to talk on the bill for this proposed park, to which I replied that "I believe I had already reported against it; that some of our officials had been down to look it over and reported that it was not of national-park proportions."

He replied with heat that Cammerer had been there and looked it over for a half a day, that he had lost his glasses, and the weather was foggy, and that he had lied. This I promptly met with the protest that "no one could charge an employee of this department with lying unless he was prepared to support it." I then called for the park official referred to, Mr. Cammerer, Assistant Director of the Park Service, to come to my office to make to us a report, a usual procedure when employees' actions are questioned.

Nothing of importance was said between us until Mr. Cammerer arrived, when I asked him about his inspection and to recite the important features of his findings. It seems that his visit at that time in the community with Colonel Greeley, of the Forest Service, was spent in conferring with those interested and adding to the knowledge he already had of the dimensions, boundary, and scenic features of the park. I then asked him to take Colonel Estes, who by that time had composed himself, to the bureau and go into the matter fully with him; again daily routine procedure in this department. We all arose and the colonel made profuse apologies for his manner of speech, which, of course, we accepted with the assurance that "this is not a personal controversy with me, and I have no personal feelings in the matter; but that door you see stands open all day, and anyone can come to my desk on any business, but I will not allow anyone to come in here and call the employees of this department liars without resenting it and demanding proof." The colonel then repeated his apologies, to which I replied, "Nothing personal with me; we will wipe the slate and start again from here."

The charge of substituting one report to the committee for another I know nothing at all about myself.

I specifically deny calling Colonel Estes a liar or using other offensive language, and that anyone should so charge astounds me. The Senator was misinformed.

Very truly yours,

HUBERT WORK.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, in the first place, my information was not hearsay. I had it direct from Colonel Estes himself, in the presence of a number of other gentlemen. In addition to that, I have from Colonel Estes a telegram, which I ask to have read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read, as requested.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

[Telegram]

HARRISBURG, PA., March 31, 1928.

T. H. CARAWAY, of Arkansas,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Appreciate fact South has one Senator with nerve enough defend her citizens from insults. Everything you said was true and I stand ready to come to Washington at any time you might need me to back up every statement you made relative to the interview between myself and the Secretary. One point should be made clear to you. Am disabled war veteran not wounded, cut all to pieces, not shot; tell you these things to keep record straight. On way to Texas but will return to Washington to back up your statement any time. Answer collect if you receive this.

CARL L. ESTES, Tyler, Tex.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, I send another telegram to the desk, and desire that it may be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read, as requested.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

[Telegram]

DALLAS, TEX., March 31, 1928.

Hon. THADDEUS H. CARAWAY,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.:

Have just read a press dispatch of your denunciation of Secretary Works's treatment of Colonel Estes, a World War veteran, and hasten to congratulate you upon the stand you have taken. The Senate needs more red-blooded Americans like yourself. Hope you will go to the bottom of the affair and bring about full investigation of such disgraceful conduct and disregard for the rights of a private citizen by one so high in our Government. Sincere regards and best wishes.

Col. W. E. EASTERWOOD, Jr.,
President Ex-Service Men's Club.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arkansas yield to me?

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes.

Mr. PHIPPS. I desire to send to the desk a copy of a letter from a Mr. Grier, who was in the Secretary's office during the time of the occurrence of this episode.

Mr. CARAWAY. The Senator may put that into the RECORD when I am through.

Mr. PHIPPS. Certainly I shall do so when the Senator is through; but I had supposed the Senator had no other communication to present and was going to speak on the topic.

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes; I have quite a good deal yet to present. Mr. President, there seems to have been no doubt about what the subject of the conversation was when the incident occurred.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, would the Senator from Arkansas yield? I think, really, I would prefer to have the communication to which I have referred read now, as it is a statement of a gentleman who was present at the time of the interview, and it might affect the Senator's remarks, I thought.

Mr. CARAWAY. Not a bit. I know Colonel Estes and I know the Secretary of the Interior, and I believe Colonel Estes, so it would not be worth while now to have the statement referred to by the Senator from Colorado read.

Mr. PHIPPS. Does the Senator from Arkansas object to having this communication now read?

Mr. CARAWAY. The Senator from Colorado may read it in his own time if he pleases to do so. I desire to proceed until I shall have concluded with this matter.

Mr. PHIPPS. Certainly.

Mr. CARAWAY. The Senator is impatient to come to the Secretary's defense.

Mr. PHIPPS. Not at all.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, the subject of the controversy was evident, as both agree with reference to a report made by Mr. Cammerer. The facts are these about that particular report: The national-park area contains 131,000 acres of land, in round numbers. In one direction it is 45 miles across; the other way the distance is not so great. Mr. Cammerer went on that area and was there less than half a day, on a rainy, cloudy day. In addition to that, he lost his glasses. That was his inspection of this area, from which he made an elaborate report.

I know the route over which he is presumed to have gone. In the time he had he could not have crossed it one way. To show Senators that he did not, we have the statement of a gentleman who was with him. Here is Mr. St. John's statement:

It is unfortunate that a man of Mr. Cammerer's capacity for observation and knowledge of scenic beauty and of scenery in general had but half a day in which to see this area, and this was accentuated by the fact that the weather was thick, the clouds were hanging low on the mountains, and the visibility was very poor. After this short inspection, Mr. Cammerer stated that a second trip would be absolutely necessary before he would be able to report his findings, but he expressed much admiration for what he had seen. Mr. Cammerer did not return, and on June 7, 1926, signed with Colonel Greeley, who had never been there at all, an adverse report.

The ludicrous thing about it is that Mr. Cammerer said that the headwaters of the Arkansas River were in this area in Arkansas, while the river had no more tact than to rise in Colorado. He talked about what the weather reports showed, and he missed that more than 20 per cent; he talked about the rainfall, and he missed that entirely; but, when asked about it, he said it did not make any difference whether it rained or did not rain, or words to that effect. I have his own statement here and will quote from it.

Mr. WINGO asked him this question:

Can you point out anywhere in the United States a more distinctive flora and fauna than is in this particular area?

Mr. CAMMERER. Since you ask me, I think so. I think in the Yellowstone National Park.

Mr. WINGO. When you saw this area you spent half a day inspecting it on a foggy, rainy day. Do you say you have seen the flora and fauna and seen the scenery and falls and other things?

Mr. CAMMERER. Yes, sir.

When a man is willing to say that he examined 131,000 acres of land in a part of a half a day, and during a rainstorm, and when he had lost his glasses on the trip, I think the colonel had some right to treat with a little levity the statement which had been made.

Again he was asked this question:

Mr. WINGO. How many miles did you go on that half-day trip?

Mr. CAMMERER. The gentlemen in your home town were with me.

Mr. WINGO. I am asking you. How far did it seem to you?

Mr. CAMMERER. I do not know how many miles.

Mr. WINGO. Let us be candid about it. It was a foggy, rainy day, was it not?

Mr. CAMMERER. Part of the time.

Mr. WINGO. You were treated very courteously, and the local chamber of commerce sent representatives with you. They banqueted you and treated you nicely, and you did not want to hurt their feelings. You told them you would come back later, and then, without coming back, you made that report, and you did not know where the Arkansas River was on that foggy day. I simply want to test your credibility as a witness, without reflecting in any way upon your veracity. These gentlemen inform me that you traveled about 30 miles in a half a day's trip in the fog and rain.

Mr. MORROW. Will you answer a question?

Mr. CAMMERER. I would like to answer this question.

Mr. MORROW. Go on.

Mr. CAMMERER. The gentlemen were very fine; they were very delightful, warm-hearted people, and I respect them very highly. They were very enthusiastic over their scenic offerings in that area. But I went to every place that was shown to me as the best they had, particularly the Little Missouri River. By the way, in the report which was signed by Colonel Greeley and myself jointly, we took the Forest Service records as to rainfall, etc., naturally.

Mr. WINGO. Why did you not go to the official records?

Mr. CAMMERER. We did.

Mr. WINGO. I mean the official records of temperature and rainfall. The Forest Bureau does not keep such records, does it?

Mr. CAMMERER. I was not particularly concerned about how much or how little rain fell. I was concerned with the scenic values.

Mr. WINGO. Why did you put it in your report if you did not think it was worth while?

Mr. CAMMERER. Because it was a joint report, and Colonel Greeley thought that was important, and I stand by that report just as he does.

I will read a little more, Mr. President, because it is very interesting:

Mr. WINGO. You went down there and were in that area about half a day?

Mr. CAMMERER. Yes, sir.

Mr. WINGO. A foggy day, in the rainy season of the spring?

Mr. CAMMERER. I remember that it rained.

Mr. WINGO. You spent half a day there on that rainy, foggy day, and from the information you gained there within that time you signed this report with Colonel Greeley?

Mr. CAMMERER. I saw the best your people had to offer.

Mr. WINGO. Is not that what you signed the report on?

Mr. CAMMERER. I signed the report on what I saw and what my judgment was.

Mr. WINGO. The inspection you made is what you have stated here, and you signed the report on that inspection?

Mr. CAMMERER. I traveled through a portion of it in an automobile on our way from Hot Springs before I met these gentlemen.

Mr. WINGO. How near did you go to the Little Missouri Falls on the highway coming from Hot Springs to Mena?

Mr. CAMMERER. It was not so foggy and rainy but what we had a wonderful chicken dinner in the open.

I think that is interesting.

Mr. Cammerer later said:

We do not make adverse reports unless we see the areas concerned. This committee's records prove that.

I have called the attention of the Senate to the length of time he had to see it.

Here is what Mr. Cammerer said about what he did himself:

That night a heavy thunder storm made it seem as if no inspection could be made the following day, but in the morning it was, nevertheless, decided that the attempt should be made. Besides the Forest Service representatives mentioned above, Messrs. Peter McWilliams, R. R. St. John, and W. R. Sossamon, of Mena, guided the party. We followed the road from Mena through the portion marked in blue on Exhibit B, climbing Eagle Peak, about 1,800 feet in height, on horseback in order to get a glimpse of the surrounding country. Unfortunately, when we got to the top we were over a bank of clouds.

Then he said he had to hurry back to get his train.

I have a letter here from Representative SANDERS of Texas inclosing a telegram from Colonel Estes to him in which the colonel says—I will read it myself—

In view of Secretary Work's statement carried in to-day's papers that I misinformed Senator CARAWAY, of Arkansas, relative to the near fight we had when he cast a slur against Texas and Texans, I urge you to hasten to Senator CARAWAY and tell him that you know I told him the truth about the affair and what my reputation for truth and veracity is. Secretary Work should not be permitted to brand me as a liar in the eyes of the Nation. For your own information, I refer you to any banker, the chamber of commerce, or any clergyman in Tyler, concerning my truthfulness. I am on my way to Austin. Please wire me your action there in care of Governor Moody.

CARL L. ESTES.

Mr. SANDERS in his letter to me, dated April 2, 1928, says:

Pursuant to our telephone conversation just a few minutes ago, I am handing you herewith a telegram which I received from Col. Carl Estes. I know Carl Estes very well, and what he says may be relied upon. I would believe any statement that he would make. Mr. Estes lives in Tyler, Tex., and has the confidence and esteem of the people who know him.

The Governor of Texas, incidentally, had so much confidence in Colonel Estes that he made him a colonel on his staff and sent him here to represent the great State of Texas before a committee. He brought, as I put in the RECORD the other day, a letter of introduction to Secretary Hoover from one of the able citizens of Texas, a gentleman who is Mr. Hoover's campaign manager in Texas, extolling this young man very highly indeed. Mr. Hoover, through his secretary, made the appointment with Mr. Work. I will state again because, perhaps, there are Senators here who did not hear the previous statement, that Colonel Estes says this is what happened: When he walked in the Secretary said "Come in"; and he walked in and said "Good morning" or "Good afternoon," I do not remember which, but he greeted him. The Secretary said, "I know what you are here for, and I know all about Arkansas and Texas that I want to know." Colonel Estes then started to speak about the report and said he did not think it contained all the facts. Secretary Work said, "You are a liar; get out of my office." He now says he told him the door was open for him to come in, instead of to get out.

I am perfectly willing for the world to determine between Colonel Estes, who offered to die for his country when men were needed, and Doctor Work, who stayed in a place of safety and drew a salary from the Government during those times.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, I ask that the letter which I have sent to the desk may be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the letter will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 31, 1928.

Memorandum to the Secretary of the Interior.

On Wednesday, the 28th of March, I was in the office of the Secretary of the Interior, Doctor Work, and while waiting for my turn to talk to the Secretary I met Colonel Estes, of Texas, who was also waiting and was just ahead of me. The colonel appeared to be excited and very much disturbed over the way he alleged that he and his State had been treated by the Department of the Interior in the past and by an official of the department recently who had been to Texas to inspect a proposed site for a public park of some kind, stating that he had never met the present Secretary.

Colonel Estes was called to the desk of the Secretary, Doctor Work, and there engaged the doctor in a heated controversy regarding this official, and I heard him distinctly say that the official had lied in making a report. The abuse of this official was the subject that made me take notice of what he said.

Doctor Work told the gentleman that the particular official mentioned was "a man of high character and a trusted employee of the department, and he would not permit any accusation against him, and that he would have to be shown that he was a liar before he would believe it." Whereupon Colonel Estes began to retract the statements that he had made, and Doctor Work called the official in question to go into the matter thoroughly with Colonel Estes.

As Estes left Doctor Work's desk he repeatedly begged the doctor's pardon and apologized for the language he had used regarding the official who had made, as he said, the false report. Doctor Work accepted his apology; then called the writer over to talk to him. The Secretary used no disrespectful or improper language to the colonel at any time.

I was not asked to make this statement, but offered to do so in the interests of fair play.

(Signed) CLARK GRIER.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, just a minute. I presume that is the same man who signed this report on the Ouachita National Park.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, I think I can inform the Senator that it is not. The man who signed the report on the national park was Mr. Cammerer.

Mr. CARAWAY. No; Greeley signed it, too.

Mr. PHIPPS. This is Grier. This is a stranger, not connected with the department in any way.

Mr. CARAWAY. What is odd about it is that there was nobody in the office but Colonel Estes and Doctor Work when this conversation took place. Now, this alleged bystander pretends that he was present. Anybody who knows Colonel Estes, and says that Work would have called him a liar and then that Estes apologized for it, does not know Estes; and anybody that said that happened did not tell the truth; I do not care what his name is.

Mr. MAYFIELD. Mr. President, in my judgment an examination of the interviews and the telegrams in this unpleasant controversy will reveal that the statement of Secretary Work is untrue.

In the first place, as the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY] has said, no man living could denounce Col. Carl Estes, of Tyler, Tex., as a liar, and get away with it.

In the next place, Mr. Cammerer, whom Colonel Estes is supposed to have said lied in his report on the Ouachita Park matter, came in just a few moments after the controversy, escorted Colonel Estes to his office, and the two had a most pleasant conversation. Colonel Estes had been selected as the representative of eight Southern States to come to Washington and to review with the Secretary of the Interior the report that Mr. Cammerer had made on the Ouachita Park project. Colonel Estes said that he went into the Secretary's office, and the Secretary immediately said, "I know what you have come here to discuss. I know now all about the States of Texas and Arkansas that I care to know"; whereupon Colonel Estes said, "The report that Mr. Cammerer made on the Ouachita Park matter is untrue"; and then was interrupted by the Secretary before he could finish the statement and was invited out of his office.

I have known Colonel Estes for many years, Mr. President. He comes from one of the old-established families of Texas, a family that stands high in the esteem and affections of our people. The truth of Colonel Estes's statement in this matter can not be questioned for one moment.

The treatment accorded Colonel Estes by Secretary Work was unjustified, uncalled-for, shameful, and unworthy of one holding the high position of Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, when that statement was introduced by the Senator from Colorado I did not catch just who the affiant or the writer is. Who is he? Who is this bystander?

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. Clark Grier, who was waiting in the office.

Mr. BRUCE. Who is he?

Mr. PHIPPS. I am not acquainted with the gentleman.

Mr. BRUCE. Exactly. Who vouches for him?

Mr. PHIPPS. I presume the Secretary of the Interior will vouch for him if he is asked to do so.

Mr. BRUCE. Apparently he does not do so. Apparently he was a stranger to the Secretary.

Mr. CARAWAY. He was not there, Mr. President.

Mr. BRUCE. We certainly ought to be put in a position to judge of the measure of his credibility.

Mr. PHIPPS. I do not see why we should indulge in surmises. I shall be pleased to ask the Secretary to furnish the Senator and the Senate with the desired information; but the Secretary of the Interior would not send a letter like this, which came to him voluntarily, without having faith in the man who sent it, it seems to me.

Mr. BRUCE. If the Senator intends to give any probative force to the statement, he certainly ought to bring forward somebody who can vouch for the credibility of the writer.

Mr. CARAWAY. And, if the Senator will yield to me, it will be observed that in the Secretary's letter he makes no mention of anybody being present. If anybody had been present and heard what was said, the Secretary would have mentioned it. The Secretary knows there was nobody else there. I think the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] can tell the Senate who Mr. Clark Grier is.

SENATOR BURTON K. WHEELER, OF MONTANA

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD two letters entitled "What national labor leaders think of Senator Wheeler."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letters are as follows:

INTERNATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF MACHINISTS,
OFFICE OF PRESIDENT,
Washington, D. C., March 19, 1928.

Subject: Senatorial-campaign information.

Officers and Members of International Association of Machinists, Lodges in States of Montana, Minnesota, Wisconsin, and North Dakota.

DEAR SIRS AND BROTHERS: I am herewith transmitting information which I deem of sufficient importance to place in the hands of our members throughout the above-named States.

I am sure that Brother Keating, manager of Labor, has furnished information which he believes to be absolutely reliable regarding the activities of the men connected with The Producers' News, of Plentywood, Mont. The Senators named in this memorandum stand among those who are foremost in their efforts to support labor's legislative program, and I trust that the statements which may be made through irresponsible agencies, attacking these well-known progressives, will fall on deaf ears. If our members can not afford to get out and go to the front for men like WHEELER, SHIPSTEAD, FRAZIER, and young ROB LA FOLLETTE, I am really in doubt as to the character of men that we could support. Every one of these men are outstanding characters and always in the front ranks, contending for the rights of the people, as against monopoly and the type of men who are connected with interests generally recognized as being inimical to the best interests of the people as a whole.

With best wishes, I am,
Fraternally yours,

A. O. WHARTON,
International President.

MARCH 13, 1928.

(Memorandum for Mr. Lovell)

In order to understand the telegram from the Producer's News, it is necessary to recite a little history.

The paper was established some years ago by a group of farmers and others, and finally drifted into the hands of Charles Taylor, who has pronounced radical leanings.

You will remember that early in 1924 Mahoney, of St. Paul, called a Farm-Labor conference, with the idea of forming a new party and nominating La Follette. It soon became apparent that the communists were in control of the proposition and La Follette issued a public statement repudiating the gathering. Nevertheless, it was held and attempted to do business. Taylor was chairman of that convention. I think it is quite fair to say that he is a communist or so close to the "reds" that he can not be distinguished from them.

The Progressives were so convinced that Mahoney was hooked up with the "reds" that when he came to our convention on July 4, 1924, we refused him a seat.

The whole bunch did what they could to injure La Follette and WHEELER during the 1924 campaign.

Two or three years ago "Paddy" Wallace joined Taylor in editing the Producers' News and for the last year or so he has devoted his energies to attacks on Senator WHEELER.

Wallace came to Washington about two months ago. We have evidence that he was in touch with Republican leaders and tried to get money to fight WHEELER. We are also told that he talked with Blair Coen, the man who was sent to Montana to "get" WHEELER and to Iowa to "get" BROOKHART.

Wallace also visited various Progressives, including myself. I tried to get him to be specific in his charges against WHEELER, but soon found that he had nothing except this proposition about leasing a power site on the Flathead Indian Reservation. That legislation was put through the Senate a few weeks ago, with Senator WALSH as its principal supporter.

At that time WHEELER said he would vote for the bill because he had been assured the Indians were anxious to have the site developed in order that they might get the revenue. La Follette led the opposition. He did not object to leasing the site, but he thought the Government was treating the Indians unfairly because it was taking 15,000 horsepower for the settlers on a reclamation project without adequate compensation to the Indians.

An examination of the debate will show that there was absolutely nothing to reflect on the integrity of either WHEELER or WALSH. No Senator even suggested such a thing, and the bill was passed with only a few Senators in opposition.

There is evidence indicating that Wallace endeavored to get in touch with Doheny for the purpose of securing money to fight WHEELER. A prominent citizen of Montana stated recently that he had been approached by Wallace and asked to introduce him to Doheny. When asked the object of the conference, he said Wallace declared that he thought Doheny should be interested in the campaign against WHEELER.

I am convinced, first, that the men who are running the Producers' News are a bunch of make-believe radicals who are in politics for the money they can make; and second, that the object of the campaign is to divert a sufficient number of Progressive votes from WHEELER to defeat him in November.

I am afraid this movement is not confined to Montana. I notice that Mahoney has called a conference for St. Paul on March 28 for the purpose of formulating policies for the Progressives in the Northwestern States. I think you will find that Taylor and "Paddy" Wallace will be at that conference and that an effort will be made to "frame" things so as to make it difficult to elect SHIPSTEAD, of Minnesota; FRAZIER, of North Dakota; LA FOLLETTE, of Wisconsin; and WHEELER, of Montana.

I have suggested how they will proceed in Montana. In Minnesota Mahoney has been fighting SHIPSTEAD for years, claiming that he was not sufficiently "radical." I think you will find that Mahoney will insist on SHIPSTEAD running on the Farm-Labor ticket on a very radical program, and probably with some candidate for governor who is "red" or at least "pink."

In North Dakota the effort will be to convince the old Non-Partisan League crowd that FRAZIER is "slowing up" and that he has made his peace with the "interests." Similar tactics will be pursued in Wisconsin. I am not afraid of that State and I believe North Dakota is pretty safe.

EDWARD KEATING.

FLOOD CONTROL

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I hold in my hand a telegram from some of my very best friends in northeast Louisiana, near my home, concerning the recent action of the Senate in passing the flood control bill; and I am permitted to read this telegram, I will say, by your courtesy. It is as follows:

ST. JOSEPH, LA., March 30, 1928.

SECRETARY OF THE UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, D. C.:

Kindly read the following at the opening of the Senate to-morrow:

Be it resolved by the citizens of the parish of Tensas and State of Louisiana in mass meeting assembled, That the unanimous passage of the Jones flood relief bill through the Senate of the United States Congress has brought to the people of this parish, this State, and of the Mississippi Valley renewed hope and courage, and has stimulated them to greater and more earnest efforts in the future, believing that the enactment of this bill into a law by the House of Representatives of the United States Government, and its signature by our President will build up our country into one of the finest, most productive, most prosperous, and most beautiful sections of this Union; be it further

Resolved, That we feel a deep sense of gratitude to our Senators and to our Representatives in Congress and to each of them individually for their efforts in behalf of flood relief and do now in mass meeting assembled recognize our obligations to them and tender to them our deepest gratitude; be it further

Resolved, That without in any way lessening our gratitude and appreciation of the services rendered by all of our friends in Congress, we feel particularly grateful and under peculiar obligations to Senator JONES, Congressman REID, and to Mayor William Thompson, of Chicago. All of these gentlemen are far removed from this section, have no interest in it, and have shown a broad-minded spirit of justice in their handling of this question, and we desire to tender to them our special thanks and appreciation for their great services to us. We further desire to recognize the services rendered in behalf of flood relief by Mr. Schoeneberger and by Mr. Adams, of the State board of engineers, and by Mr. F. H. Schneider, the president of the board of commissioners of the fifth Louisiana levee district. These gentlemen have devoted their time, their ability, and their untiring efforts in our behalf, and we owe to them a debt of gratitude which we will long cherish; be it finally

Resolved, That the fair, just, nonpartisan, and broad-minded manner in which this question has been considered by the Senators of the Congress is indicative of the ability, generosity of heart, and bigness of mind which has tended to make our country the admiration and envy of the world.

W. D. NOBLE, Chairman.
JOSEPH T. CURRY, Secretary.

I wish to add that I indorse every word of that splendid memorial.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, in view of the statements contained in the telegram just read, and the misapprehension under which the writers apparently labor that there was a unanimous vote in favor of this measure which has evoked such eulogies and which has brought upon those who supported it such panegyrics, I feel that it is only fair that I should state that I was opposed to the bill; that if I had had an opportunity to vote, I should have voted against it; and that, having had an opportunity to examine the measure more carefully since, my opposition to the bill still remains unchanged.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The telegram will lie on the table.

BLACK-LIST EXPOSÉ

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, I am opposed to the unreasonable naval building program that has been announced in this country. We have some self-appointed patriots who blacklist those of us who have an idea on this question, and to some extent that situation has been exposed recently in Boston. I therefore ask unanimous consent that the article from the Washington Times, which I send to the desk, be read by the clerk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? Without objection, the clerk will read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

D. A. R. ACCUSED IN BLACKLIST EXPOSÉ

BOSTON, April 2.—A bitter controversy, started by charges that the Daughters of the American Revolution are "blacklisting" various individuals and organizations because of allegedly communistic or pacifistic leanings, to-day split Massachusetts members of the D. A. R. into two rival camps.

Mrs. Helen T. Bailie, of Cambridge, a leader of the faction which opposes the alleged "blacklisting," caused a sensation at a meeting of the Boston Ethical Society by declaring that two "extremely virulent" groups in Boston have made the D. A. R. and the American Legion "catspaw of a tremendous conspiracy to crush free thought, free speech, and even liberty itself."

"Blacklist factories," Mrs. Bailie charged, are unjustly stamping clergymen, welfare workers, and prominent educators as "undesirable, doubtful, and unfit to address patriotic gatherings."

HITS GOVERNOR'S WIFE

"The movement is being carried to absurd lengths," Mrs. Bailie said. "Even Mrs. Alvin T. Fuller, wife of the governor, could not speak at a D. A. R. meeting simply because she accepted an honorary membership in the International Garment Workers' Union, which has been blacklisted by the D. A. R."

SPREAD OVER COUNTRY

Prominent persons who have been "blacklisted," the speaker charged, included Bishop William F. Anderson, President Mary E. Woolley, of Mount Holyoke College, United States Senator BROOKHART, and Miss Maude Royden.

"These scurrilous and slanderous attacks upon honest citizens also have been made by black-list factories in Illinois, California, and other States," Mrs. Bailie charged. "Two such virulent groups in Boston are the Industrial Defense Association (Inc.) and the Massachusetts Public Interests League."

Others included in the list are the Rev. E. Talmadge Root, executive secretary of the Federation of Churches of Massachusetts; Dean Roscoe Pound, of Harvard Law School; Miss Anna Louise Strong, writer; Clarence Darrow, criminal lawyer; Rabbi Harry Levi, William Allen White, Rabbi Stephen S. Wise, David Starr Jordan, Felix Frankfurter, of the Harvard Law School; W. E. Du Bois, negro writer; Alfred Baker Lewis; the Rev. George Lyman Paine; Judge George W. Anderson; Norman Angell, political writer; Norman Hapgood; Frank P. Walsh; and others.

SOME ORGANIZATIONS

Organizations on the alleged "blacklist" submitted by Mrs. Bailie included the Young Men's Christian Association, the Young Women's Christian Association, the National Catholic Welfare Council, the National Child Labor Committee, the Wellesley College Forum, the Yale Liberal Club, the Radcliffe Liberal Club, the International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union, Council of Jewish Women, and more than a hundred others.

The factional fight in the D. A. R. here has centered around the big-Navy bill, with a minority claiming that all D. A. R bodies in the country were being lined up for a big Navy.

INTERMEDIATE CREDIT BANK, COLUMBIA, S. C.

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, I was notified by my secretary on Friday last, just the day before the Committee on Banking and Currency was to meet, to appear for a hearing, which I thought was for the purpose of seeing whether or not an investigation should be made of the Intermediate Credit Bank of Columbia, S. C. I presumed it was for the purpose of seeing whether or not an investigation was necessary. When I arrived at the meeting I presented the original matters which I had previously published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and I made a short statement. Congressman HARE, of South Carolina, made a short statement in reference to the matter, and then Eugene Meyer was presented to represent the administration. He stated that he had with him representatives from the Treasury Department and representatives from the Attorney General's department, the departments which I claimed, and yet claim, are shielding the people who are committing this wrong in the Columbia bank. Immediately it seemed to me that the hearing was for the purpose of giving the administration an opportunity to present in full its justification for the stealing, if there be stealing, that was going on in the Columbia bank; and that that committee was not going to do what I was asking that a special committee be appointed to do, to go into the merits of the matter and have witnesses before them from both sides.

During Meyer's statement I asked them to produce the records to substantiate his statement, and he replied that he had none. Therefore, when requested to leave my evidence with the committee, I refused to do so for obvious reasons.

I did not propose to be a party to a one-sided hearing, and I picked up my papers and said to the committee that all I wanted was a report; that I did not care whether it was favorable or unfavorable; that I would take care of the situation on the floor of the Senate; and I walked out of the room.

Mr. President, I held, and I still hold, that the Treasury Department is in full possession of evidence of the rascality that is going on in the intermediate credit bank at Columbia, S. C. I held, and I still hold, that Attorney General Sargent has in his hands to-day reports which will prove beyond a shadow of a doubt that there has been crookedness, if not straight-out stealing, going on in the intermediate credit bank in the city of Columbia.

When his men were down there investigating this matter, people who knew of this crookedness and knew of this rottenness at Beaufort, S. C., endeavored to get to them to make a statement and present the people's side of the matter. The investigators refused to hear them, I am informed. They investigated only what they wanted to investigate. They looked into only what would substantiate and uphold the rascality that was going on; and now a Republican committee, or at least a majority of that committee, is endeavoring to shield the people in this bank and to further conceal the actions of the Treasury Department and of the Attorney General's department in not making known even that which they have in their possession, and upon which they refuse to act.

I do not propose to go into any committee room, or any other kind of a room, and place all of the facts that I have in my possession in the hands of a committee which I believe is already inclined to shield these people on account of the Republican administration, when they refuse to give me any of their records or even to produce any of their records at the hearings, in order that I might have the opportunity to reply to them.

I have here the records which have been presented and published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I propose to file these records and take the receipt of the clerk of the Senate for them. I have other records which I do not propose to put in the RECORD until this committee, or a subcommittee, wants to hear the entire transaction. Then we will present the balance. But I do not propose to present it to Eugene Meyer, of whose conduct I can not in parliamentary language express my opinion. I would have to present it in pure, old South Carolina English, and it would not do to print in the RECORD my opinion of Eugene Meyer and those who are backing him up in this rascality. But the original letters which I have and the original proofs which I have that have been printed in the RECORD I propose to file with the clerk of the Senate to-day, and the chairman of the committee or anybody else can get them whenever they want them.

I ask permission to have printed, along with my remarks, an article from this morning's Charleston News and Courier.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). Is there objection?

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the News and Courier, Sunday morning, April 1, 1928]

SENATOR BLEASE, DISGUSTED, QUITS COMMITTEE ROOM—BANKING AND CURRENCY GROUP MEET TO CONSIDER CREDIT RESOLUTIONS—HARE LENDS HIS SUPPORT—JUSTICE DEPARTMENT'S REFUSAL TO SUBMIT REPORTS ANGERS SOUTH CAROLINIANS

WASHINGTON, March 31.—Senator COLE L. BLEASE to-day walked out of a meeting of the Banking and Currency Committee of the Senate which had been called to hold a hearing on his resolution to investigate the Intermediate Credit Bank of Columbia.

Because the Department of Justice did not submit the reports of its special agents on the investigation which preceded the Beaufort bank trial the Senator refused to leave his own papers in directing the demand for an investigation by the Senate.

HARE SUPPORTS RESOLUTION

The Senator appeared in support of his resolution, as did Representative BUTLER HARE, and there were present also Chairman Meyer, of the Farm Loan Board, and a Mr. Donelson, of the Department of Justice. Congressman HARE supported the Blease resolution on the ground that it would establish the soundness of his own bill to credit the farmers of the Beaufort section with the money which was ultimately to have gone to the Columbia bank to their credit, but was allowed to lie on deposit with the Beaufort bank by agencies with which the farmers had to deal in order to secure credit from the Columbia bank.

Chairman Meyer, of the Farm Loan Board, said that the Department of Justice had investigated the situation and had found nothing to indicate that the Columbia bank or its officers were involved in any irregularities.

"PREVENT INVESTIGATION"

Senator BLEASE asserted that the Department of Justice had refused to furnish him the reports of its agents on this investigation. He declared that the Treasury Department and the Department of Justice were both trying to prevent the investigation for which his resolution provided. The Senator told the committee that he wanted a report to the Senate, whether for or against his resolution or without any recommendation at all he did not care, and that he (the Senator) would look after the matter on the floor of the Senate. Declaring that he had nothing more to say, the Senator picked up the papers which he had brought with him and departed. When Chairman NORBECK suggested that he leave the papers he emphatically refused to do so.

K. F. M.

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the RECORD an article relating to the Federal farm-loan system and extracts from the Breeders' Gazette, of Chicago, Ill., and the Farm Leader, of Minneapolis, Minn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the matter referred to is printed, as follows:

HAS THE FEDERAL FARM-LOAN SYSTEM MADE GOOD?—COMMITTEE OF CANADIAN BANKERS, AFTER COMPREHENSIVE NATION-WIDE INVESTIGATION, REPORTS THE SYSTEM HAS MANY SHORTCOMINGS REQUIRING REMEDY

The Federal farm-loan system was put to the acid test as to its value to farmers, and the worthiness of the present method of administration, by a committee representing Canadian bankers, and after being weighed in the scales of justice and economy, condemned, much to the chagrin of those who write and speak biased propaganda in behalf of the system and its present staff of political bankers.

The committee representing the Dominion Mortgage and Investment Association not only found the present system wanting in several respects but returned home to appeal to their people not to duplicate north of the international boundary line the many errors which have characterized the 12-year trial at boosting farmers into prosperity via the political route.

The committee assumed that the system, inaugurated in 1916 and having functioned nearly 12 years, had been in existence sufficiently long and had had many opportunities to serve American agriculture through peace and war and afterwar crises to provide material for an unbiased test of its worthiness. Extracts from the report filed with the organization's head offices in Toronto provide some thoughts worth considering at this time, particularly in view of the fact that many of the Federal land banks, not to mention the heads of the Farm Loan Bureau, are now under fire:

"The operation of the Federal farm-loan system has been on a very large scale. At the end of 1920 (the first six years of its operation) the amount of loans outstanding was $427,637,629, despite which the agriculturist of the United States found himself in a deplorable condition. Two and a half years later—June 30, 1923—the advances by the system had reached $1,097,309,995. Meanwhile the condition of the farmer had not improved. The present loans outstanding are enormous compared with the sums the farmers have been enabled to repay under the blessings of this type of loan.

"From the addition to his financial obligations in the form of long-term mortgages, it would be, according to the authors of the system, reasonable to expect a decided improvement in the position of the farmer. When the rural-credit propagandists created public opinion which resulted in the decision of the United States Government to accede to their requests it was alleged that progress in agriculture was arrested by lack of and cost of credit facilities. That lack has been replaced by elaborate machinery and with a measure of state aid to which no parallel in history exists.

"The data indicate beyond doubt that the provision of credit in unprecedented measure and the extension of elaborate machinery has not brought about improvement in agricultural conditions in the United States. In addition to credit machinery, tariff adjustments, so as to exclude or hamper the marketing of agricultural products of Canada in the United States, were designed to assist in enabling the farmers of the larger country in meeting their obligations.

"J. B. Morman, economist of the Farm Loan Board, has told us, 'The purposes of credit are precisely the same in agriculture as in any other business or industry. By enlarging his credit a farmer expects to increase crop and livestock production and thereby improve his financial position.' Mr. M. B. Herrick, another authoritative spokesman for the extension of rural credit in the United States, says, 'Productive credit is that which is employed to stop a loss, effect an economy, or create something materially valuable.'

"Measuring results by these standards, what do we find?

"As to the increase in crop and livestock production, the latter is very largely contingent on the former. In Iowa, one of the foremost agricultural States, the volume of production in four years varied from 14.13 per cent to 28.58 per cent more than the decade before. But the mortgage debt increased by 187.5 per cent in the same 10 years. If we take all the States the result is largely increased debt, and, relatively speaking, a very slight increase in the value of farm products. It is all too obvious that the credit supplied has not been utilized for agricultural development but rather to replace existing debt and to provide for loss or improvident expenditures.

"The debt created, without corresponding increased volume of marketable production, now constitutes a serious problem in the United States. Of its seriousness Mr. Morman says: 'The amount of farm mortgage debt and its relation to the present and future profitableness of farming have become great national problems. During the decade 1910 to 1920, farm mortgage debt increased by $2,227,594,341, or 132 per cent. While this increase in debt from farm production is still more alarming, for usually a farmer has no other source of income except what his farm yields him. If the mortgage debt on a farm is large, the amount paid as interest will be correspondingly large. This is a drain on income. The question is whether farmers can redeem themselves from debt out of the net earnings from their farms. This is unquestionably the foremost rural credit problem now confronting the United States.'

"Mr. Morman has linked Canada with the United States as suffering in like degree from depressed agricultural conditions. While lower prices for products has been the cause of unprofitable agriculture in Canada, as in the United States, the increase in mortgage debt in the Dominion has been normal, while the increase in volume of production has been far greater, relatively, than that of mortgage debt.

"It may be observed here that in the active farm loaning fields of Canada—the Prairie Provinces—the lands taken over by lending agencies for nonpayment of principal or interest do not represent a debt of more than $10 per acre. The Federal Farm Loan Board has authorized loans in North Dakota that average $22.70 per acre. In volume or value of field production per acre, the Canadian provinces (just north of North Dakota), have some advantage as compared with that State, but in mortgage interest and tax liability they are relatively in a much more favorable position. In respect to other States the difference in volume of mortgage debt as compared with Canadian provinces becomes impressive as its significance is revealed by data of an official character which is available.

"As no experiment in farm finance like unto the politically operated Federal farm-loan system has been carried on along nation-wide scope in Canada, that would seem to be the reason why the debts of our farmers are comparatively light. The volume of production, the acreage under crop, and the value of the crop have increased more rapidly than the mortgage debt.

"A Government subsidy: The act under which the Federal farm loan was established in 1916 was, from the outset of this venture, a political experiment. At the outset the United States investor, generally speaking, looked upon the entire plan with disfavor, and even declined to buy farm-loan bonds in sufficient volume to make the system operative. On January 18, 1918, the Secretary of the Treasury hurriedly secured an amendment to the act, authorizing him to use $200,000,000 of Government funds with which to buy farm-loan bonds.

"This action marks the departure from the basic principle upon which the act was intended to operate—that is, cooperative. The American commission (1913) reported: 'It is the opinion of the commission that our American problem in rural credit should be worked out without Government aid. One of the great lessons learned in Europe is that in the long run the farmers succeed best where they help themselves. Whenever they become dependent on the Government, they keep looking to the Government for more aid. It is believed to be a correct general statement that rural credit is on the strongest basis in those countries where it has been developed most completely without Government aid. Even granting the great importance of agriculture, it is improper for all the people to be taxed in order to assist the prosperity of even a great class like the farming class.'

"On that subject President Wilson, in his first annual message, said: 'The farmers, of course, ask and should be given no special privileges, such as extending to them the credit of the Government itself. What they need and should obtain is legislation which will make their own abundant and substantial credit resources available as a foundation for joint, concerted, local action in their own behalf in getting the capital they must use.'

"The Secretary of the Treasury, W. G. McAdoo, said with respect to a proposition to lend money for another private industry: 'Gentlemen, you ask us to stand for a proposition to lend money to private corporations or individuals upon the security of mortgages. Never on the face of the earth. Bills are referred to me asking * * * for raids upon the United States Treasury in the form of actual loans to be made by the Treasury, on this thing and that thing, farm loans, loans upon houses built by workingmen, etc. If we go into the money-lending business we will have to lend it to everybody; you can not discriminate under our system of government. Everybody must tap the Treasury till if you attempt any such resolution as this.'

"But the Federal Government did step in with liberal allowances when ordinary methods of financing seemed to lag. Some of the advantages have been repaid out of proceeds of bond sales made. The literature of the Federal Farm Loan Board would indicate that it does not yet realize that in the case of mortgage lending, especially on the long-term plan, the extent of the losses can not be gauged with reasonable accuracy until after a long period of experience.

GOVERNMENT SUBSIDY AND LAND CREDIT

"Reasons for tax exemption: It was urged by those responsible for the act that the feature of tax exemption of the bonds and securities issued was essential to the system in order that the bonds could be more readily sold, and therefore the farmer could be assisted quicker and more generously, and that helping the farmer was helping the community at large. But the cost to the Government of this feature was obviously not considered or emphasized, yet experience has demonstrated that the saving to the borrower is far less than the total in taxes that exemption costs the State, or transfers the debt to other taxpayers.

"From the investor's point of view, tax exemption only appeals to the very wealthy, since a taxable security bearing 6 or 7 per cent shows more real profit to a man with a small income than a tax-exempt bond bearing 4½ or 5 per cent; therefore, the advantage offered enables the wealthy to invest their money in a safe security showing a heavy net return equivalent to a taxable bond bearing 15 per cent. The ownership of these securities concentrates in the hands of those who otherwise would be liable for the heaviest taxes.

"To illustrate this point of the cost to the Government, a concrete example may be quoted from a speech by Hon. LOUIS T. MCFADDEN, chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency of the House of Representatives:

"'To show the small benefit of these loans to the borrower and the great benefit to the bondholder, assume that Peter Smith borrows $10,000. He gives a mortgage for $10,000. He receives $9,500 in cash, and $500 in bank stock, on which he assumes a double liability, making his entire liability $10,500. He pays $550 a year interest, or 5½ per cent, on $10,000. He only has the use of $9,500, but he hopes that when the loan is paid off in 34½ years that the settlement will show a profit on the bank stock. Smith could have borrowed that $10,000 at 6 per cent from a private investor and had the use of the entire $10,000, and assumed no liabilities, by paying $600 a year. He would not have run the risk of losing on the liability of $500 on his bank stock, either. But if everything turns out all right and the bank pays dividends for 34½ years, Smith will save $50 the first year!

"'Now, take the other side of the case and see what the American taxpayers lose through the deficit in the National Treasury because of the tax-exemption of this $10,000 worth of bonds that were sold to furnish the money for Smith's loan. Over 200 individuals and corporations receiving incomes of more than $1,000,000 a year are subject to an income tax of 77 per cent on the excess above a million income. On $10,000 of 5 per cent farm-loan bonds, the income is $500 a year. The income tax of 77 per cent on $500 is $385. This owner of tax-exempt bonds makes $385 a year because he is not required to pay that amount into the National Treasury. To offset this loss to the National Treasury, Peter Smith hopes to make $50. Here is a net loss of $335 a year that Smith's neighbors and other citizens of the country must pay to make up the deficit in the National Treasury caused by this tax exemption on the Smith bonds.

"'It would save $335 to the taxpayers annually if the bondholders were required to pay legal taxes and Smith was given a donation of $50 from the National Treasury. But these bonds may run for 20 years, so you may multiply this sum by 20, which makes a staggering sum lost by the National Treasury because Peter Smith and all the other farmers were allowed to dip into the tax-exemption feature.

"'The unexpected effect of this law increasing taxes has been to automatically reverse the action of the tax-exemption section of the farm loan act. Instead of benefiting the poor farmer it most benefits the very rich bondholder at a ratio of more than 7 to 1.'

"Free use of mails: The Federal farm-loan system and other systems enjoy free use of the United States mails. From the inauguration of the system in 1916, the entire country has been flooded with literature for propaganda purposes. The advantage of the farm loan system as compared with that of private institutions has been persistently urged in this literature, and some very fantastic claims have been made as to the advantages of the system. A great deal of matter which appears in these publications has a political flavor and is obviously intended to create a favorable impression with respect to the particular party in power at the time the publications are issued and distributed.

"Land inflation: That the operations of the Federal farm-loan system would result in inflation of land values, or, at any rate, made it possible for land speculators to profit by inducing land transactions, is apparent. Farm owners in many cases sold out at abnormal prices and retired on the proceeds, while others sold what they had and bought larger areas in the expectation of values continuing to rise, both in respect to land itself and to the commodities produced from it. These operations were facilitated by the generous loans made by the Federal land banks. At the time the belief that land values and prices of farm produce would remain high was encouraged by the propaganda of the Federal farm-loan system.

"Congressman Fordney, of Michigan, was amongst a number who viewed the situation differently. In the House of Representatives, he said: 'Thoughtful and careful people everywhere counsel economy in living and caution about investment in this time (1919) of high taxes and inflated prices. The Treasury Department urges us all to save money to buy thrift stamps and help pay the war debt. The Federal Farm Loan Board takes exactly the opposite view. They urge people to borrow money to place mortgages on their farms. With the aid of traveling lecturers, Chautauqua speakers, special newspaper writers, and others, farmers are told that Federal farm-loan mortgages never have to be paid off, or that they pay themselves off! Many are led into borrowing money for land speculation or to invest in automobiles and nonproductive improvements.

"'One of the popular phrases of these mortgage promoters is: "The farmer is learning that the dollar is a thing to be spent and not something to be hoarded." I know that they have loaned money on farms in the country at much above the value of the property, and that the Government will never get the money back. It is a fraud. I know a piece of land that sold for $3 an acre, and the Federal land bank loaned $15 an acre on it, and it would not sell to-day for $5 an acre; and that is the kind of loans they are getting sometimes. The loans made by the Federal land banks are such loans that prudent bankers and experienced money lenders will not make. Those responsible for the system encouraged the farmer to borrow extensively, being desirous of proving its value by the number of loans and the amount loaned. In some cases where the borrower was a thrifty farmer, benefit was derived, but in the majority of cases the money so obtained was used for unproductive purposes.'

"Pyramiding of debt.—The correctness of these forecasts was well founded, as is evidenced by a study of the conditions that have existed in recent years. In the United States the volume and value of the production show increases in 1920 over 1910 of 20.89 per cent, and 63.07 per cent, respectively, whereas land values increased 117.61 per cent. While volume and value of production remained about stationary, or practically so, during the four years, 1920–1924 inclusive, mortgage debt increased rapidly. On owner farms it amounted to $4,003,767,192 in 1920, and $6,214,222,263 in 1923. In the latter year it was 260 per cent greater than in 1910, as compared with an increase in production of only 17.07 as to volume and 54.14 as to value. Debt has increased enormously while value of and volume of production have shown but a nominal change.

"The State of Iowa, which ranks high from an agricultural standpoint, is shown as having a mortgage debt on owner-operated farms at the end of 1910 of $204,242,722, and this had risen by 1920 to $489,816,739. The increase in the 1920 debt as compared with that of 1910 is 139.82 per cent. Similarly, in the case of Nebraska, another important agricultural State, the debt increased in the 10-year period, according to census figures, from $62,373,472 to $168,507,859 in 1920.

"In the State of Iowa the volume of production in 1923 was 21.27 per cent greater than in 1910, but the mortgage debt had increased 187.82 per cent. While the volume of production has remained practically stationary in recent years—approximately a 25 per cent increase, as compared with 1910—the value of farm products was approximately 75 per cent greater. The mortgage debt, however, increased at a much more rapid rate than either the reputed value of the land, the value of the product, or the volume of production.

"In the United States agricultural production represented, in volume, an increase of only 17.07 per cent of 1910. In comparison with this, the debt of farmers increased 260 per cent. Now compare this with the experience in Canada where the mortgage debt increased, according to mortgages outstanding of the chief lending agencies, about 25 per cent, and production increased 104 per cent. Obviously, under the credit facilities provided farmers of Canada (private interests), production has increased more rapidly than in the United States (under political banking), and the farmers' debt in Canada has not increased nearly so rapidly as it has in the United States.

"Promotes landlordism: We have given attention to the effects of the Federal farm-loan system upon agriculture and production since the operation of the system. It is apparent that this great increase in farm debt was largely the result of lending by the system under the auspices of the Federal Government. It was based upon the German plan. That plan was not intended to be of benefit to the operating farmers but rather to the land owners of that country. It has its origin in a general effort to rehabilitate the fortunes of landlords. It was successful in this respect, but it can not be said that the German farmer, rack-rented as he is, is in a position at all comparable with that of the agriculturists of the North American Continent.

"It is to be hoped that the landlord system, as it exists in Europe, will not take root here in Canada, as it is now liable to do if lending of the kind that is taking place in the United States continues. The tenant class, it is regrettable to observe, is steadily increasing, and that tendency is being accentuated by the farm-loan system of lending which has been adopted nationally. The cause appears to be the granting of large loans to landowners rather than to those who actually live on and produce from the land."

THE GOVERNMENT IN BUSINESS—VIEWS OF A FARMER STOCKHOLDER IN THE FARM-LOAN SYSTEM

When Congress took the round-about-face position of removing the farm-loan system from the control of the rightful owners and turned the enormous assets represented by the capital stock of the 12 Federal land banks into the control of the political appointees on the governing and supervising board, who work through their appointees in the banks, the United States Government then and there set forth upon a banking business without parallel in the experience of nations. Nowhere else in history has a government first enacted a system of finance for a particular class of people upon the promise that when they have subscribed to the capital stock a sum equal to that first advanced by the Government to capitalize the system that it would be turned over to them, the farmer owners, and then turned around and by an amendment to the fundamental act withdrawing from those property owners their property rights, vesting this in the hands of political appointees. It is not strange that the Federal farm-loan system to-day stands as the one outstanding failure of government in business.

Surely this has not been progressing to the present stage without recognition on the part of those in authority that it is not in keeping with American principles, as established 150 years ago by the First Congress, and to-day part and parcel of the fundamental laws of the country.

As recent as November 17, 1927, President Coolidge, in his Union League address at Philadelphia, said:

"We have always held very strongly to the theory that in our country at least more could be accomplished for human welfare through the encouragement of private initiative than through Government action. We have sought to establish a system under which the people would control the Government and not the Government control the people. If economic freedom vanishes, political freedom becomes nothing but a shadow.

"It has theretofore been our wish that the people of the country should own and conduct all gainful occupations not directly connected with Government service. When the Government once enters a business it must occupy the field alone. No one can compete with it. The result is a paralyzing monopoly."

It is very evident that those in authority of the Federal farm-loan system have neglected to advise the President of the current method of management of this politically administered farm-loan system, though many farmers did, upon the recent appointment of members to the Farm Loan Board, very emphatically advise the Chief Executive of their dislike of those same appointees, and of the shunting aside of property rights.

However, the promises of Government operation made early in the above-quoted paragraphs of the President's remarks have been very fully realized in the language which he later used. Who can doubt that "economic freedom vanishes, political freedom becomes nothing but a shadow," is true of the great farm credit system which politicians have endeavored to build? More than 1,000,000 American farmers who have gone into debt under this plan now find themselves possessed of stock in banks in which they are unable to vote, because politicians operate those same banks; the same farmers are now assuming liabilities to the extent of 10 per cent of their loans to safeguard a system operated by politicians who are—many of them—still experimenting in the art of banking.

Wholesale foreclosures, with most unfortunate results to the farmers, are now in progress throughout the United States. An official of the United States Department of Agriculture recently estimated that these have become greater than $5,000,000, and that three times as many loans should now be foreclosed, probably will be forclosed during 1928. Is this the hopeful, the helpful child Congress created only 12 years ago—is this the blessing in disguise which political banking promises those who are determined that politicians shall operate the land banks?

There is another side of the Government operation of land banks to be considered which promises in the near future to become a national scandal in keeping with many unholy unearthings which have so recently characterized the present and former administrations at Washington.

The crux of this problem is the method by which political bankers hope and expect to repay to bondholders the money which the investors loaned to the politicians to, in turn, loan to farmers, when the farms upon which the money was loaned have been foreclosed, are abandoned, and are not even returning sufficient funds to pay the annual taxes, not to mention interest on investment or principal sum. In solving this problem, the political bankers are sure to point a new way to private bankers, namely, how to make money grow where there is no activity or income.

The failures of the Federal farm-loan system, nor the criticism of its administration, could not have been more emphatic or glaring had the most foolish among farmers been responsible for its administration in the past 10 years. It is doubted if there exist anywhere farmers who would have gone ahead in so foolhardy a manner as have many of the politicians who have, from time to time, been placed in charge. Surely, the farmer-owners as managers of their own banks, could have devised a method of operation of farms which have loans upon them upon which farmer-operators can not meet the obligations, that would have been a great improvement over the system adopted by the Washington administrators of shoving the helpless farmer off his land.

The principle of the Federal farm-loan system may be right, but its policy of Government operation of that which belongs to some one else is a glaring indictment of every one who has been connected with it. It is to be hoped that Russia, India, Egypt, or Canada will never adopt a plan of banking which extends to farmers the promise of golden days, and after they have entered its portals, paid for their stock with money which they have borrowed and upon which they pay interest annually, will then take away from them their banks and place them in the hands of "changing" politicians.

No one wishes to deny the entire propriety of a high degree of public regulation and supervision. When, however, this regulation and supervision ceases to be merely regulatory and supervisory and undertakes, as have the political appointees of the Federal farm-loan system, to conduct the business which the farmer really owns and has paid for—the land banks—that is a grave and dangerous principle upon which to operate, and can lead only to ultimate dissatisfaction, and, unless corrected in time, to destruction and national scandal.

Continuity of policy and familiarity with the background of any business enterprise are essentials to success. The names of the men who have acted during the past 12 years as members of the Farm Loan Board comprise a list so long as to read like the roll of the Legion of Honor. Yet, had these political appointees served only their stated time, but a few would have served in this capacity in the same length of time. Officials who come and go with the shifting winds of popular favor, having neither long experience (if any experience), nor fundamental knowledge of the banking business, can not be expected to furnish the same type of management as that which has been and is so notably successful in the interest of private enterprise. Very few of the men who have served in the past 12 years on the Farm Loan Board, and as few in the 12 Federal land banks, have had even a "speaking acquaintance" with either agriculture or banking. Almost without exception their only qualification has been a strong political "pull." What sane financier would endeavor to successfully operate a banking institution, no matter how small its field of endeavor, with executives of that type? Yet, this is a great nation-wide system, operating in 48 States and Territories beyond the sea, by men of little or no actual knowledge of the demands of agriculture, or how to best meet them. Too often the truth has been that the only interest of the officials has been, "When is pay day?"

Such is the fruit of Government operation of a great banking system. Losses are being made which are enormous, and little is being done to stop the leak in the dike. It seems now to be a matter of "letting the Government or the farmer pay the bill," but later on, when the big pay day really comes round, it will be a most surprising financial transaction, which threatens to overshadow any recent investigation held in Washington.

[Extract from the Breeders' Gazette, Chicago, Ill.]

IS THE FARM LOAN ACT SATISFACTORY?—FEDERAL SYSTEM OF RURAL CREDITS CREATED BY THE LAW HAS FAILED OF ITS BEST RESULTS BECAUSE FARMERS HAVE NOT HAD ENOUGH TO DO WITH ITS ADMINISTRATION

The recent difficulties under which the Federal farm-loan system has been laboring, in its presently organized paternal branch of our Government, instead of the system the fathers of the system dreamed of perfecting, and farmers for 40 years have striven to secure, demonstrates that we have had more than a sufficient amount of this type of organization. It illustrates well the fact that Government control in farm finance is no more satisfactory than Government control of other branches. Had the Federal farm-loan system been originally organized as the fathers of the system planned, instead of as politicians desired, a far different story could be written of it to-day. The patriots have ever cried: "God give us men," but the politicians, not content with that, worship at the shrine of "Give us offices to fill." Thus we note that men who could not speak as representatives of our farmers have been holding a dominant position in the Federal farm-loan field, and have spoken their own personal opinions as representing farmers, whereas farmers knew nothing about their plans. The present situation is an illustration of the consequences of outside domination.

The Federal board was headed for its first two and a half years by a private banker. He selected private bankers as his aides. The various district land banks are manned by essentially private bankers or else mild agriculturists. In a few instances actual farmers do hold sway, but these are so few as to be marked. The Federal farm loan act specifies clearly that none save actual farmers may borrow through the district Federal land bank; had patriotism instead of politics dictated the same act's wording, actual farmers rather than private bankers would officer it.

The Federal farm loan system was planned along modern American political lines, under the dictation of private farm-mortgage banking leaders, and not along the perfected and successful rural credit lines of Europe. Here the politicians hold the balance of power and dictate, while over there the men who advance the collateral security, purchase the capital stock and make possible the system, manage it. In order to be a democratic institution, our Federal farm-loan system must be placed in the hands of American farmers and removed from the dictation of politicians and private bankers.

Congress, without any "ifs" or "ands," enacted a bill advancing $300,000,000 to the railroads, and permitted the railroad operators and managers to purchase such rolling stock as they might desire, without red-tape dictation and inefficient leadership. Are the railroads more vital than food-producing farms? Both are essential, and both have men in the ranks capable of managing their own business without outside aid. Neither requires paternalism, but both are in their present plight because of an overabundance of it. Had the politicians left agriculture and transportation alone, and permitted those in each field to attend to their own affairs, both would be in a more stable position now.

Government supervision is one thing, but Government dictation and domination are quite another. The land banks should be placed upon the same basis of supervision as national and State banks.

The decision farmers should make right now is that they themselves should have the entire control of the operation of these various cooperative financial systems, without governmental dictation or more of the "kind uncle" advice which characterizes the administration of a Federal bureau. American farmers have themselves supplied the unquestionable credit facilities warranting the millions of farm loans; farmers have themselves subscribed to the capital stock of the 12 land banks, and it naturally follows that, being actual owners, they should themselves operate these banks. There is no sound logic for further clogging of this farmers' cooperative machine with red tape.

Time and experience have demonstrated fully in the 12 districts that each has one or more localized problems quite different from any other. To illustrate: While the Middle West was experiencing the so-called land boom other districts were not, yet the Farm Loan Board put into immediate force certain rules which limited the same districts from adequately financing farmers' needs, in comparison with what the fundamental farm loan act promised farmers or the security offered by farmer applicants.

Again, early in the operation of the system it was discovered that California citrus growers were holding their land values as high as $1,500 to $3,000 per acre. The board put into force rules governing the operation of all banks which have resulted in great hardship to fruit growers of other sections whose land values are but a fraction of those of the Golden State. In other words, to safeguard the system in a dozen Pacific coast counties, the fruit growers of 48 States were made to suffer.

The point I desire to impress is that in a farmer owned and controlled land-bank system each of the dozen land banks would be able to remove the present cumbersome conditions and at once have a more elastic and pliable system. Each of the land banks could formulate rules and regulations adapted to the individual and local conditions existing in their districts, rather than be forced to adopt and enforce cut-and-dried, ready-made rules placing hardships upon the multitude in order to keep the minority within bounds.

The appreciation of the officials of 4,000 national farm-loan associations of the country runs high for the urgent need of some immediate remedy for present conditions, if the system is really to serve farmers as it should and as it was originally intended that it should. It is obviously impossible to secure any set of members of a Federal board who would make rules and regulations in Washington that would meet the requirements of the great body of farmers. Can we not determine a superior way of permitting the men who are actually on the land and in the farm-loan field to work out their own salvation along sound banking lines, in no way lessening the value of the farm-loan mortgages, but by several degrees advancing the service of the system?

Senator CHARLES CURTIS, of Kansas, has presented a plan which possesses considerable merit. Describing it, he recently said:

"Under the syndicate arrangement adopted for selling farm-loan bonds it looks as if brokers get the premiums and that the land banks are getting no particular advantage from the tax exemptions of their securities. Would it not, therefore, be better to let the farmers themselves manage these banks exactly as the law intends? The only change necessary for this would be to give the farmers the entire responsibility for the system and oblige them to operate on their own unquestionably good credit.

"This is the secret of the soundness and success of innumerable borrowers' banks of various kinds, among which failures are rarer than among ordinary banks. The 65,000 cooperative credit societies, with 15,000,000 members and a $7,000,000,000 annual business, are based on this idea of using their own credit and of imposing upon members a liability that is either unlimited or else severe enough to be felt. The cooperative bank with unlimited or limited liability has proved its worth wherever tried, in country, town, or city, for encouraging thrift and extending credit in large and small amounts.

"The same idea prevails in all true building and loan associations among the 7,269 with 3,853,612 members and $1,769,142,175 assets in the United States. Any member getting a loan must subscribe for shares up to its full amount. His payments are made not on the mortgage but on the shares. When the shares mature he may turn them in and have his debt canceled. The maturing of the shares depends upon his payments and also upon the association's profit and loss. All his credits could be wiped out by a loss; consequently he is liable to the full amount of his mortgage. Profits would hasten the extinction of his debt, and he is as deeply interested as are nonborrowing members. As a result, these associations can operate even on savings with safety, although borrowers share in the management.

"The Landschafts, founded 150 years ago, are composed entirely of borrowers. They now number 23 with some $1,000,000,000 worth of bonds, and none of them ever defaulted an obligation. The borrowers elect all the officers and appraisers, every one of whom must be a borrower. The borrowers' payments go into a sinking fund, in which the cash on hand, together with the unpaid principal of the loans, must equal outstanding bonds. If this fund becomes impaired in the old Landschafts any member may be assessed without limit for the deficiency. In some of the newer Landschafts the liability is limited to the mortgage or some portion of it. But the basic idea is that all the borrowers have the direct management, use their own credit, and assume liability large enough to be felt."

Under the Federal farm loan act, as it is now administered, appointments of appraisers are made by the Farm Loan Board, upon the recommendation of the district land bank. The farmers who have subscribed to the capital stock of these land banks have not been taken into consideration, with the natural result that many appraisers are not adapted to their work, and farmer-borrowers have been forced to endure hardships because of this shortsighted policy. In one or more instances appraisers who are identified actively with private banking interests making farm mortgages have been employed in the farm-loan service. Their reports have been responsible for rejecting a large percentage of farmer-applicants from the system's service. This has been continued despite the fact that section 3 of the act provides that no appraiser shall be employed thus engaged in private banking. Here lies an important reason why farmer-owners, who guarantee the system against liability to the extent of 10 per cent of their loans, should themsleves select the men who make the reports on the loans, and not outside men, who have not one cent involved in the system.

Myron T. Herrick, who probably is the real father of the present rural-credit system, is much in favor of the farmers themselves operating their banking system. "If the farmers had a bank of their own," advises Mr. Herrick, "they could exchange its notes secured by their agricultural or livestock paper running for six months or less for Federal reserve bank notes, and thus they could convert such paper into Government obligations which can be used in transactions with individuals in this country the same as money. The great majority of farmers have the best of characters, with property and wealth-producing power out of which the soundest credit and the highest financial standing could be created.

"The banks know all this. Indeed, most of the funds which they own and are using for other industries came from agriculture. Their total resources are approximately $34,600,000,000. The farmers produce an annual crop worth more than $20,000,000,000, or more than 55 per cent of the total bank resources. These figures indicate a moral duty of the banks to render more service than they now give to farmers. For what would become of the banks if they should be deprived of the annual agricultural production which is represented by paper passing through them, or which has been transferred permanently to them? The farmers in the aggregate have accumulated $60,000,000,000 of wealth, or one-fourth of the Nation's wealth. This and their annual income are more than enough to supply their own banking and financial needs, if they should mobilize the credit value of these stupendous resources. But this mobilization can be accomplished only by forming banks of their own.

"With such banks the farmers would have first the use of the wealth they create, and avoid much of the necessity of mortgaging farms and all the losses coming from forced sales of their crops. Moreover, they would add strength to their already existing associations and save the interest they now pay in borrowing from outside sources. They would also help all other industries, because the farmers' needs would be for short terms, in most cases extending no longer than from harvest to harvest, when their returns, increased by the resulting improvement, would mingle again with the general banking power and swell its volume. Perhaps $10,000,000,000 would have been added to this power if farmers in their organizations, splendid though some of them are, had not done the very reverse of what the best cooperative farmers in other countries did, who began by forming banks."

[Extract from Farm Leader, Minneapolis, Minn.]

WRECKING A COOPERATIVE LOAN SYSTEM—HOW THE FARM LOAN BOARD WIPED OUT ORIGINAL SPLENDID PROVISIONS OF THE FEDERAL FARM LOAN ACT

In the last issue the Leader told the story of how the farmers have been prevented to date from controlling and managing the Federal land banks, although the original law provided for such control. Congress, the political boards of directors of the land banks and the Federal Farm Loan Board, through a trick, have prevented the original cooperative plan of organization of the banks from being carried out. It should have been carried out long ago. Under the permanent plan of organization for the banks, provided for in the law and constituting a pledge to and contract with the farmers, the farmer borrowers of the banks long before this should be in control through their electing six of nine permanent directors for each bank.

But the Federal board to date has been able to keep its dictatorship of the banks, to the exclusion of farmer management, only because of the trick put over on the farmers.

Have the farmers failed to apply for land-bank loans? No; the land banks have rejected and are rejecting applications for hundreds of millions of dollars in loans.

Each land bank is supposed to have the right to issue as many bonds as necessary to take care of its applications for loans, without dictation of the Federal board or without regard to the other land banks. But the policy of the Federal Farm Loan Board has apparently been to put on the brakes and keep the Government rural credit system from developing as rapidly as it should or as it could. This has played into the hands of private money lenders. And now they want to prevent the management of the banks from being put in the hands of the farmers themselves, so that the farmers can not develop the system where the political management so miserably failed!

INTERMEDIATE CREDIT BANK, COLUMBIA, S. C.

Mr. NORBECK. Mr. President, I desire to make a brief reply to the remarks of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BLEASE]. Some time ago the Senator introduced a resolution calling for an investigation of the Federal land bank located in his State, or, more particularly, the intermediate credit department of this bank. About the same time there was introduced in the House by Congressman HARE, of South Carolina, a bill, the effect of which would be to have the Government reimburse the customers of a certain defunct State bank in the amount of $600,000 or $700,000, which said customers lost on account of the failure of this bank, located at Beaufort, S. C. It seems that a large number of loans had been made by the intermediate credit bank to farmers and planters in the vicinity of Beaufort and that repayment of some of these loans had been made through this bank, which is now closed, and that said bank had not remitted to the intermediate credit bank at Columbia, S. C.

Charges of gross irregularities have been made as to the management of this failed bank. Criminal prosecutions have been conducted by the Department of Justice, and I think some of the parties connected with the failure have been convicted.

Some of those who suffered losses claim that the intermediate credit bank was more or less responsible for the conditions existing in said State bank. But the statements made before the Committee on Banking and Currency were so indefinite, and even conflicting, that the committee was unable to pass judgment on the matter.

This meeting of the committee had been called especially for the purpose of considering this resolution. The author of same was given the opportunity to make the opening statement, which he did. He laid upon the desk a large number of papers and said, "Here is my proof." Before we got very far along with the hearing the Senator from South Carolina did just what he has told you he did—he picked up his papers and left the room, leaving the committee without any of the evidence.

Congressman HARE, the author of the House bill above referred to, for the relief of the customers of said bank, was next heard by the committee. He impressed me as a sincere man trying to be helpful, but he was not in complete possession of all the necessary facts.

The only action so far taken by the committee on the Blease resolution is a request to the Federal Farm Loan Board to make a report on this whole matter, in order that the undisputed facts may be known to the committee.

I want to say to the Senator from South Carolina that I am delighted now to know that the evidence he has will be made available to the committee. I can assure him that it will be read carefully and that action by the committee will not be delayed.

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, I wish to say to the Senator from South Dakota that I have filed with the Secretary of the Senate all the records of which he has spoken. They are now in the hands of the Secretary of the Senate.

TREATMENT OF MILITARY PRISONERS DURING THE CIVIL WAR

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, my attention has been called to an article appearing in the Boston Evening Transcript, of Wednesday, March 21, in which there is discussed a subject around which has raged considerable historical controversy. The Boston newspaper prints a statement with reference to the controversy by Capt. Samuel A. Ashe, a Confederate officer and eminent historian, lawyer, and newspaper editor of Raleigh, N. C., who, although more than 80 years of age, is still vigorous and active, both in body and mind. The Transcript refers to Captain Ashe's statement as being "a plain and temperate statement from a southern man." I think the information given in this newspaper article should be preserved in some permanent way, and I therefore request unanimous consent that this article from the Boston Evening Transcript may be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE NOMAD

This is not in any sense a controversial column, and the little story here given about the inscription on a Civil War soldier's gravestone at St. Albans, Vt., was not admitted with any controversial intention. But it has called out the following plain and temperate statement from a southern man, and under all the circumstances it is entirely fair that this statement shall be respectfully presented and the matter dropped there. It is Mr. S. A. Ashe, a Confederate officer and a well-known lawyer, business man, former newspaper editor, and historical writer, of Raleigh, N. C., who writes to the Nomad:

"The northern people," he says, "have been led astray by misstatements about the South. Certainly there may have been excesses on either side, but the South has been unjustly stigmatized for alleged improper treatment of prisoners who had surrendered to the honor of their captors. That is an error. As to the death of prisoners, if we institute a comparison we will find that relatively more died at the North than at the South. On July 19, 1866, Secretary Stanton reported that 26,246 southern boys had died in northern prisons and 22,246 northern boys had died in southern prisons, while there were 270,000 of the latter and 220,000 southern soldiers taken prisoners. And this disparity is greatly increased when we consider the varying circumstances. At the North there was no want of provisions or medicines. At the South there was a want that could not be filled. It was with this knowledge the North ceased exchanging prisoners—as a war measure—to burden the South with the care of its many prisoners. There might have been a mutual parole, without exchange. Grant paroled 30,000 Confederates at Vicksburg who were never exchanged. That might have been continued.

"When the summer of 1864 was coming on, Mr. Ould, the Confederate commissioner of prisoners, sought to make purchases from the United States authorities of needed medicines. He offered gold, cotton, tobacco, any price, for the medicine, and the medicine to be dispensed by United States surgeons. It was to be for the use of United States prisoners alone. That offer was refused. Then in the summer disease broke out at the principal stockade at Andersonville. It was ascribed to the German prisoners not being accustomed to corn bread. The disease became a pestilence. Steps were hurriedly taken to remove all the well men, but that took time. On July 10 the prisoners held a great meeting and appointed a committee of five to proceed to Washington and to represent conditions and beg for an exchange of prisoners. This committee met with no favor at Washington. Deaths multiplied. In August, Mr. Davis made an offer to President Lincoln that if the United States would send transportation to Savannah he would send to their homes 10,000 or 15,000 Union boys. There was at first no answer.

"The pestilence was like a visitation of the yellow fever. September and October passed. No transportation. At length, on November 19, the United States vessels began to arrive. In the meantime there died, on September 11, among thousands of others, James Partridge Brainerd, of St. Albans, Vt. On this monument it is recorded that he died 'entirely and wholly neglected by President Lincoln, and murdered with impunity by the rebels, with thousands of our loyal soldiers by starvation, privation, exposure, and abuse.' The misconduct here ascribed to the rebels, by his friends at home is an erroneous statement; he died, doubtless, for the want of medicines.

"Had the vessels been promptly sent, this young soldier would probably have been sent home. But the delay was fatal to him and others. Mr. Davis filled the United States ships with Federal prisoners—5,000 sick men and 8,000 well men—and they were sent to their homes. Certainly, it was terrible at Andersonville, but as deplorable as it was, there was nothing to bring to a southern Christian a blush of shame. 'The True Story of Andersonville' has been told by a Michigan officer, who was there, Lieut. James Madison Page, Company A, Sixth Michigan Cavalry, who gives his testimony as to the facts. He says: 'The reader may expect in this account only the plain, unvarnished tale of a soldier. He hopes that it will satisfy the lovers of truth and justice.' While his account is a woeful experience, yet it appears that the southerners did everything they could do mitigate the situation and conditions. It was a calamity, a visitation of a pestilence."

CONDITIONS OF UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, on March 6 the Senate passed a resolution asking for a report on the problem of unemployment and 17 days later the Secretary of Labor presented a report to the Senate, which has been debated in the Senate, has been commented on in the press and, because of certain statements relative to that report having been made which are erroneous, no one else having called the attention of the erroneous statements made and based upon that report, I shall take a few minutes to call the attention of the Senate to the same.

Estimates of unemployed in the United States have been made in the Senate all the way from 1,000,000 to 5,000,000. The newspapers seem to take for granted the report of the Secretary of Labor, showing an increase of unemployment since 1925 amounting to 1,800,000 persons, in round numbers, and that part of the report of the Secretary of Labor seems to have been accepted as the total number of unemployed persons in the United States at the present time.

In order to understand the error of this conclusion listen to this paragraph in the report:

That the shrinkage in the volume of wage earners, including manufacturing, transportation, mining, agricultural, trade, clerical, and domestic groups, figured on the basis of those employed in 1925, is revealed to be 7.43 per cent. Applying this percentage to the total number of employees of 1925 gives a shrinkage between the average of 1925 and January, 1928, of 1,874,050 persons.

In the next paragraph the Secretary of Labor states:

In making 1925 the base of 100, it is understood that whatever there may have been of unemployment in that year is ignored.

I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the figure or number 1,870,000 does not represent, on the basis of the report of the Secretary of Labor, the true number of unemployed persons in the United States at the present time. The figure merely represents the increase in unemployment or the decrease in employment since the year 1925.

Because there has been so much speculation and debate upon what might be estimated to be the present number of unemployed persons in the United States, I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the Department of Labor has compiled from year to year the unemployment statistics. We have them compiled by the same statistician, Mr. Stewart, who is well known and has been well known for very many years as a very reliable statistician. For instance, we find that the peak of employment was in the first half of 1920. In his Monthly Labor Review for the month of March, 1926, on page 113, we find, taking monthly average 1923, 100 as par, that employment stood at 116 in the first half of 1920. There was a constant decrease, always figured on 1923, 100 as the base. There was a decrease for 1923, a decrease for 1925, and a decrease for 1928. On page 146 of the Monthly Labor Review for 1928 we find that on the same number as par, 100, employment stood at 84.2, a shrinkage in employment or an increase in unemployment from 1920 to 1928 of more than 32 per cent. We find in the same report that employment in 1925 was 8.8 per cent below 1923; that is to say, the employment shrinkage from 1923 to 1925 was greater even than the shrinkage from 1925 to 1928.

A little computation will show how many wage earners are included in the 8.8 per cent employment shrinkage between 1923 and 1925. Commissioner Stewart said in his report, issued by the Secretary of Commerce, that the shrinkage between 1925 and 1928 was 7.43 per cent, and that that shrinkage meant a decrease of employment of 1,874,000 persons. Assuming this basis to be correct, and I think it is correct, because I do not question the Department of Labor's own statistician, the shrinkage of 8.8 per cent would mean a two years' decrease of 2,219,690 for the period from 1923 to 1925.

Thus we have the official data of the Department of Labor that the decrease in the number of wage earners employed amounts to 1,874,050 as compared with 1925, which, in turn, was 2,219,600 below 1923. Therefore, comparing 1928 with 1923 as the semipeak of employment, the total shrinkage for the five-year period is 4,093,650.

But in order to arrive at a full estimate of unemployment we have got to go back to the peak of employment when approximately all wage earners were presumed to hold jobs, and that, according to the Secretary of Commerce and the statistician of the Department of Labor, was in the first half of 1920.

The Monthly Labor Review for March, 1926, which carries Table 7 back to the employment peak in 1920, shows the general index of employment and finally the total in manufacturing industries on page 113, and now we find that on the basis of 1923 as par 100, employment in the first six months of 1920 ran as follows: January, 116.1; February, 115.6; March, 116.9; April, 117.1; May, 117.4; June, 117.9; an average of 116.8 as the 1920 peak. Thus the United States Department of Labor reports that unemployment between first half of 1920 and 1923 suffered a shrinkage of approximately 16.8 per cent.

Commissioner Stewart tells us that he applies the shrinkage percentage in the manufacturing industries as the approximate percentage of employment shrinkage in all wage-earning industries. So let us do the same. If a shrinkage of 7.43 per cent means a decrease of 1,874,050 wage earners, a shrinkage of 16.8 per cent, as Senators may readily compute, means a decrease of 4,237,420 wage earners.

So here we have the complete record, based on the official employment tables of the Labor Department, showing the progressive shrinkage in volume of wage-earning employment from the high peak of employment in the first half of 1920 down to 1928, as follows:

From the peak in 1920 down to 1923, a shrinkage of 16.8 per cent, or 4,237,420 wage earners.

From 1923 down to 1925, a shrinkage of 8.8 per cent, or 2,219,600 wage earners.

From 1925 down to January, 1928, a shrinkage of 7.43, or 1,874,050 wage earners.

So the total shrinkage from the 1920 peak down to 1928, as officially reported by the Labor Department, is approximately 32.6 per cent, or 8,331,000 wage earners.

Now, some of the wage earners of 1920 have died, but others have been born and the native-born workers have yearly increased. Their ranks have been increased by immigration at the rate of about 250,000 a year, so Secretary of Labor Davis tells us. On the other hand, some of the wage earners have set up in business for themselves or become employing capitalists.

But before we leave this chapter of the report, let us recapitulate the index data officially reported in statistical Table 7 of the Bureau of Labor Statistics.

Bear in mind that all the data I have here quoted from Table 7 uses the same par base 100 for 1923. In the report to the Senate the department used 1925 as the base 100, but in its official monthly report to the public the Bureau of Labor Statistics, of which Commissioner Stewart is chief, has used for three years 1923 as the base 100. It makes no difference in the result, for one basis is readily converted into another, but for the sake of clearness and uniformity it is safer to use a common denominator, and so 1923 as reported in the official monthly bulletin is employed as the base 100 for all the data here cited.

And here is the index record running back from January, 1928, to the employment peak in 1920, using for all dates 1923 as 100:

Employment index for—
January, 1928	84.2
1925 average	91.2
1923 average	100.0
First half 1920	116.8
Total employment shrinkage, 1920–1928	32.6

And this means, according to the computations of the United States Labor Department, a shrinkage in number of employed wage earners of over 8,000,000.

I said, Mr. President, in the beginning that I used the report of the Secretary of Labor and the reports of his department back to 1920 to carry out his report to its ultimate conclusion, in order that we might have something upon which to base an estimate of the unemployment in the United States at the present time. I am not this afternoon going to take up the time of the Senate by going into any of the causes or the reasons for this vast amount of unemployment of people in the United States as revealed by the statistics and reports of the Department of Labor itself; undoubtedly there are many reasons; but I want to call one reason to the attention of the Senate, so that those who have time and are interested may investigate. That reason is the tremendous exportation of capital from the United States during the last six or seven years to build up the industries of Europe. Of course, labor-saving machinery has had something to do with it.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McNARY in the chair). Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not know that I understood the Senator's final estimate of the unemployed existing at this particular time. Did he make any estimate?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I did not make an estimate. I have only taken the reports of the Department of Labor from 1920 down to the present time, showing the gradual progressive decrease in the number of persons employed in the United States from year to year.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator from Minnesota, then, has expressed no opinion as to what is the present number of the unemployed in this country?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. On the face of facts presented by the Department of Labor the result of this computation leads to the belief that there are in the neighborhood of about 8,000,000 persons unemployed in the United States at the present time.

Mr. SIMMONS. At this time?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. At this time, if the figures, statistics, and reports of the Department of Labor are worth anything, and I have no reason to doubt their accuracy.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator is aware of the fact that the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], quoting, I believe, from the Department of Labor a few days ago, estimated that there are only about 1,800,000 unemployed at that time, while I estimated that at least 4,000,000 were unemployed. The other day a gentleman read to me—for I myself do not read much—from a magazine, the name of which I do not quite remember, but I think it was the Nation, issued one day last week, in which an estimate of something over 6,000,000 was made as the number of unemployed at the present time. I will see if I can find that article. I have had a telephone message sent to the gentleman who presented it to me with a view of finding the article.

Mr. WAGNER. The name of the magazine to which the Senator from North Carolina refers is, I think, the New Republic.

Mr. SIMMONS. Probably it was the New Republic; I do not remember exactly what publication it was; but it was some publication brought to my office by a gentleman who read to me a statement from it with reference to unemployment, estimating the number of unemployed to be something over 6,000,000.

Mr. SMOOT. Let me read to the Senator from North Carolina just what the Secretary of Labor stated in his report.

Mr. SIMMONS. Is the Senator from Utah referring to a statement different from the one that he read the other day?

Mr. SMOOT. The figures in the report I put in the RECORD the other day.

Mr. SIMMONS. Is this something additional?

Mr. SMOOT. The statement I made was based upon report of the Department of Labor. This is what the Secretary stated in his letter of transmittal.

Mr. SIMMONS. Pardon me. Before the Senator reads that statement I wish to ask, does the Secretary of Labor state something different from what he stated in his report?

Mr. SMOOT. No; I do not think so. This is from the letter transmitting the report:

> The census of 1920 showed 42,000,000 of our people are wage earners or otherwise gainfully employed. Of these, 23,348,692 have been found to be at present employed on either a wage or a salary basis. By the most careful computation methods available, Commissioner Stewart finds that the actual number now out of work is 1,874,050.

That is what the Secretary of Labor said.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I do not want to interrupt the debate, but to-day is Calendar Monday, and we have not as yet concluded the order of petitions and memorials. I hope Senators will let us finish the morning business.

Mr. SIMMONS. But this is a very important matter that we are talking about right now.

Mr. CURTIS. I said I would not interrupt the discussion, but I do not want it to extend any longer than necessary.

Mr. WAGNER. There is nothing more important.

Mr. SIMMONS. As the Senator from New York suggests there is absolutely nothing more important than to ascertain what is the extent of unemployment in this country.

Mr. CURTIS. We could talk here a week and not settle that question.

Mr. SIMMONS. But we can discuss it, Mr. President. We could not discuss anything more vital.

Mr. CURTIS. I demand the regular order.

Mr. SIMMONS. What is the regular order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The regular order is the presentation of petitions and memorials.

Mr. SIMMONS. I supposed that we had concluded that order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. We have not as yet concluded the morning business. The presentation of petitions and memorials is in order.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

He also presented letters and papers in the nature of petitions from the Connecticut Chautauqua (Inc.), of Bristol, and the Woman's Christian Temperance Unions of Waterbury and Danielson, in the State of Connecticut, praying for the passage of the so-called Burton resolution, being House Joint Resolution 183, prohibiting the exportation of arms, ammunitions, and other implements of war to any nation engaged in war, etc., which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented letters and papers in the nature of petitions from the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of New Milford; the Young Men's Christian Association of Hartford; the American Association of University Women of New Haven; the Connecticut Chautauqua (Inc.), of Bristol; the Society of New Thought and the Seminary Foundation, both of Hartford; the Travelers' Club, of Danbury; the School Committee of Westport; the National Council of Jewish Women of Hartford; the Quinnatissette Grange, of Thompson, and sundry citizens of Bridgeport, Cromwell, and Milford, all in the State of Connecticut, praying for the passage of the so-called Gillett resolution, requesting the President to consider further exchange of views with the signatory nations regarding reservations of the United States relative to its adherence to the Permanent Court of International Justice, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

SALARY OF MARSHAL OF SUPREME COURT

Mr. BLAINE submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8725) entitled "An act to amend section 224 of the Judicial Code," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 2, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 1: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the amount proposed to be inserted by said amendment, insert "$5,500"; and the Senate agree to the same.

JOHN J. BLAINE,
CHARLES W. WATERMAN,
H. D. STEPHENS,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

GEO. S. GRAHAM,
L. C. DYER,
HATTON W. SUMNERS,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. BLAINE. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the report?

Mr. CURTIS. Let me ask, will it lead to debate?

Mr. BLAINE. I presume it will not.

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator explain what the effect of the adoption of the conference report will be?

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, the bill which has been in conference has reference to the salary of the marshal of the United States Supreme Court. His salary at present is $4,500, having been fixed at that rate, as I recall, in 1912 or 1914. The House bill proposed to amend the law by providing for a salary of $6,000 per annum. The Senate amended the House bill by striking out $6,000 and inserting $5,000, and also by striking out the last clause in the House bill relating to the power of the Chief Justice to fix the salaries of subordinates of the marshal in accordance with salaries paid to employees occupying similar positions in the House of Representatives. As I have said, the Senate struck out that provision in the House bill for the reason that it would be utterly impossible to classify the subordinates in the office of the marshal of the United States Supreme Court on the same basis as employees of the House of Representatives. The Chief Justice could make an attempt to comply with the law as nearly as he could, but the Senate Committee on the Judiciary felt that the Chief Justice ought not to be placed in a position where he must, in fixing those salaries, in the very nature of things, disregard such a provision. So the Senate struck that provision out. The House conferees concurred in that action; and on the salary proposition the conferees fixed the salary at $5,500 per annum instead of $4,500 per annum, which is the present salary.

Mr. SMOOT. All the bill will do, then, if it shall become a law, will be to increase the salary of the marshal of the United States Supreme Court from $4,500 to $5,500?

Mr. BLAINE. That is correct.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the report.

The report was agreed to.

EXPENSES OF COMMITTEE VISITING STONE MOUNTAIN UNVEILING

Mr. FESS. From the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate I report back favorably, without amendment, Senate Concurrent Resolution 13 and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration. I call the attention of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] to the concurrent resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES in the chair). Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the resolution?

The concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 13) submitted by Mr. SMOOT March 20, 1928, was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That all necessary expenses incurred by the committee of Congress consisting of 5 Senators and 10 Members of the House appointed by the Vice President and the Speaker to represent the Congress of the United States at the exercises at Atlanta, Ga., on April 9, 1928, incident to the unveiling of a portion of Stone Mountain by the Stone Mountain Confederate Monumental Association, be, and they are hereby, authorized to be paid one half out of the contingent fund of the House of Representatives and the remaining half out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

IRON GATES IN WEST EXECUTIVE AVENUE, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I ask the attention of the Senate for just a moment to a request which I desire to submit. Our late lamented colleague, Senator Willis, had a bill on the calendar in which he was very much interested. I call the attention of the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] to it. I should like to have that bill, being House bill 359, considered at this time. I am sure it will lead to no debate.

Mr. KING. Let the bill be reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCNARY in the chair). The Senator from Ohio asks unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of a bill, the title of which will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A bill (H. R. 359) authorizing the presentation of the iron gates in West Executive Avenue between the grounds of the State, War, and Navy Building and the White House to the Ohio State Archeological and Historical Society for the memorial gateways into the Spiegel Grove State Park, which was reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with an amendment.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, as I understand the Senator, the bill simply disposes of the gates themselves without interfering with the piers.

Mr. FESS. That is correct.

Mr. JONES. I have no objection.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator from Washington whether the District Committee—who have had that matter before them for a number of years, as I recall—have concurred in the proposition that those gates might be removed?

Mr. JONES. I do not remember that the matter has ever come before the District of Columbia Committee.

Mr. KING. It has been before the Senate, and my recollection is that it was under measures that were reported by the District Committee.

Mr. JONES. I do not think this bill has ever gone before the District Committee; at least, I do not remember it. I know that it has been before the Senate, and the bill was amended during the last Congress upon my objection. I insisted that whatever action was taken should be confined simply to the iron gates themselves without interfering with the pillars. I have no objection to this bill, because I understand that that is what this bill does.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, has it been found that there is no need at all for the gates?

Mr. FESS. At the last session Congress passed an authorization to take down the gates. That was authorized. No provision was made for the disposition of the gates. It was just a matter of junking them. It was the request of President Harding in his lifetime that these gates be sent to Spiegel Grove, the home of General Hayes, who was president of the Archeological and Historical Association at the time of his death. This home has been gived to the State, or to the Archeological Association, and these gates are to be placed at one of the entrances of the park. All that this bill is for is not to take down the gates—that has been authorized—but to assign them to the Spiegel State Park, without expense to the Government.

Mr. FLETCHER. They really are not used now?

Mr. FESS. No; not at all.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I was not aware of the fact that the removal of the gates had been authorized.

Mr. FESS. Yes; it has been authorized.

Mr. KING. I took a position heretofore in opposition to it. I think those gates ought to be preserved there. Aside from any historic value they may have, I think the gates are necessary.

Mr. FESS. Taking them down has already been authorized in a former Congress, but no disposition was made of them. This bill simply authorizes the superintendent of Public Buildings and Public Parks to assign them to the Spiegel Grove State Park, without expense, of course, to the Government. There is an amendment to that effect.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I shall not object to the consideration of the bill; but if this were a proposition de novo for the purpose of taking down the gates, I should oppose it, because I think it is a mistake, and I think some persons will live to regret their action in permitting those gates to be taken down and removed from the city.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with an amendment, on page 2, line 1, after the words "White House," to insert "Provided, That no expense shall be incurred by the United States," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc, That the Director of Public Buildings and Public Parks of the National Capital is hereby authorized and directed to deliver to the Spiegel Grove State Park, Fremont, Ohio, the iron gates now hanging in West Executive Avenue between the grounds of the State, War, and Navy Building and the White House: Provided, That no expense shall be incurred by the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

AMENDMENT OF COTTON FUTURES ACT

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I introduce a bill in the nature of an amendment to the cotton futures act, which will define and prohibit manipulation, prevent bucket shops, and also place the supervision of all contract markets under a joint commission composed of the Secretary of Agriculture, the Secretary of Commerce, and the Attorney General of the United States.

The cotton futures act, popularly known as the Smith-Lever Act, was passed during the first administration of President Wilson, and corrected the more flagrant abuses from which the American cotton industry suffered up to that time. Several minor changes, principally affecting grades, have been made in the text from time to time, but to all intents and purposes the law is the same as when originally enacted, and it does not meet some of the abuses that have developed in the trade since that date.

The grain futures law, enacted by Congress about eight years after the passage of the Smith-Lever Act, was a decided step in the direction of Federal supervision and control of exchanges dealing in futures, and the amendment which I now propose would enlarge the scope of the cotton futures act by incorporating those regulatory features of the grain law which have met the general approval of the farmers and country merchants.

The prevention of corners and manipulation of prices of cotton is the principal thing aimed at in this amendment, and the hearings conducted by the Senate Committee on Agriculture in recent years have clearly shown that there is a genuine demand among all branches of the cotton trade for legislation along this line, and that the better element of the exchanges favor it.

I have been careful in framing this amendment to preserve the identity of the existing cotton futures law, the Smith-Lever Act, and believe that if it is enacted this bill will correct the abuses that have developed in recent years in trading on cotton-futures exchanges, and meet the wishes of those members of the cotton industry, including the farmers, who are demanding additional legislation of a constructive character along these lines.

The bill (S. 3871) to amend the act of August 11, 1916, known as the United States cotton futures act, as amended, by investing transactions in cotton for future delivery with a public interest, providing a commission to supervise cotton-futures exchanges, defining and prohibiting manipulation, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title.

Mr. RANSDELL. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

The motion was agreed to.

WORLD WAR VETERANS' RELIEF ACT

Mr. WALSH of Montana introduced a bill (S. 3873) to amend chapter 10, title 38, of the Code of Laws of the United States of America, entitled "World War veterans' relief act," which was read twice by its title.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I am a little uncertain whether the bill ought to go to the Committee on the Judiciary or the Committee on Finance. I ask the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Finance. It relates to proceedings to enforce the claims of veterans under the veterans' relief act.

Section 445 of chapter 10, title 38, the United States Code provides:

> In the event of disagreement as to claim under a contract of insurance between the bureau and any person or persons claiming thereunder an action on the claim may be brought against the United States either in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia or in the District Court of the United States in and for the district in which such persons, or any one of them resides, and jurisdiction is conferred upon such courts to hear and determine all such controversies.

A claim was presented and held before the bureau for some considerable time, and eventually was rejected; and suit was brought under the provisions of this section. The Government of the United States pleaded the statute of limitations of the State of Arizona against the claim. The plea was overruled by the district court. The cause went to the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit, by which court the judgment was reversed, and it was held that the statute of limitations of the State of Arizona was applicable and would prevent any recovery under the act. Worse than that, it was held that the statute of limitations began to run not from the time when the claim was rejected by the bureau but from the time when the claim accrued, and that period had elapsed.

The bill provides that no statute of limitations of any State shall apply to actions brought under this act, but that the statute of limitations throughout the Union shall be six years from the time of the disagreement by the bureau. It seems to me quite appropriate that the bill should go to the Committee on the Judiciary; but all of these measures have been treated by the Committee on Finance, and I am perfectly willing to defer to the judgment of the chairman of that committee.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, there is a special subcommittee of the Finance Committee to handle all legislation affecting the Veterans' Bureau, but it seems to me the proposed amendment might just as well go to the Judiciary Committee as to the Finance Committee. If the Senator desires the bill to go to the Judiciary Committee, I shall not object at all, and if it goes to the Finance Committee we will give it consideration.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I did not know there was a special subcommittee dealing with that particular matter, but if that is the case I will ask that the bill be referred to the Finance Committee.

Mr. SMOOT. Just as the Senator prefers.

Mr. JONES. I will say to the Senator that I introduced a bill along the same lines a few days ago, and that bill went to the Finance Committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I ask that the opinion of the circuit court of appeals to which I have made reference be incorporated in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit

United States of America, plaintiff in error, v. Sidney B. Sligh, defendant in error. No. 5260

Upon writ of error to the United States District Court of the District of Arizona

Before Gilbert, Rudkin, and Dietrich, circuit judges

Rudkin, circuit judge: This was an action on a war-risk insurance policy in the sum of $10,000, payable in case of death or total permanent disability in monthly installments of $57.50 each. The monthly installments accruing on and after April 26, 1920, have already been paid, so that the recovery here sought is for the monthly installments accruing between December 4, 1918, the date of alleged total permanent disability, and April 26, 1920. One of the defenses interposed was the statute of limitations of the State of Arizona, which provides that there shall be commenced and prosecuted within four years after the cause of action shall have accrued, and not thereafter, actions upon a judgment or decree of any court rendered without the State or upon an instrument in writing executed without the State. (Ariz. Rev. Stat. par. 713.) The court below found specially that the policy was not made or executed in the State of Arizona; that the present action was not commenced until March 9, 1925; that the defendant had pleaded the statute of limitations of the State; and that more than four years had elapsed after the accrual of the cause of action set forth in the complaint and before the commencement of the action. Notwithstanding this finding, judgment was given for the plaintiff. On this record two questions are presented for consideration: First, is the statute of limitations of the State of Arizona applicable? and second, if applicable, is the cause of action barred?

The parties concede that there is no Federal statute of limitations applicable to this class of cases, and if there is any limitation at all it must be therefore found in the laws of the forum. The rule, of course, is well settled that statutes of limitations do not run against the Government unless expressly named therein, but it seems to be equally well settled that the Government, when sued with its consent, may claim the benefit of such statutes, whether expressly named therein or not. "Statutes of limitations may, according to the general rule, be pleaded for the benefit of the State or Government, when sued with its consent in its own courts, although it is not expressly named in the statutes, and although, where it is a plaintiff, its prerogative of sovereignty protects it from the use of such a plea against it." (37 C. J. 714; Stanley v. Schwalby, 147 U. S. 508; State v. Ralston, 105 N. E. 54; McRae v. Auditor Gen., 109, N. W. 1122; Cowles v. State, 20 S. E. 384; Baxter v. State Wis. 454.)

In the Schwalby case (19 S. W. 264) the Supreme Court of Texas denied the benefit of the State statute of limitations to the United States, but in Stanley v. Schwalby, supra, the judgment was reversed on writ of error, the court saying:

"It is obvious that the ground of exemption of governments from statutory bars or the consequences of laches has no existence in the instance of individuals, and we think the proposition can not be maintained that because a government is not bound by statutes of limitation, therefore the citizen can not be bound as between himself and the Government." (See also Porto Rico v. Emanuel, 235 U. S. 251.)

The statute of limitations has long since ceased to be looked upon as an unconscionable defense. A century ago Mr. Justice Story, said:

"It has often been matter of regret in modern times that, in the construction of the statute of limitations, the decisions had not proceeded upon principles better adapted to carry into effect the real objects of the statute; that instead of being viewed in an unfavorable light as an unjust and discreditable defense it had received such support as would have made it, what it was intended to be, emphatically a statute of repose. It is a wise and beneficial law, not designed merely to raise a presumption of payment of a just debt from lapse of time but to afford security against stale demands after the true state of the transaction may have been forgotten, or be incapable of explanation by reason of the death or removal of witnesses. It was a manifest tendency to produce speedy settlements of accounts and to suppress those perjuries which may rise up at a distance of time and baffle every honest effort to counteract or overcome them." (Bell v. Morrison, 1 Pet. 350–358.)

By the legislation under which the policy in question was issued the Government authorized insurance running into untold millions, and we find nothing in that legislation to justify the conclusion that in all litigation arising out of the insurance thus authorized Congress intended to deny to the Government a defense open to every other debtor and to every wrongdoer. We are of the opinion, therefore, that the statute of limitations of the State of Arizona is applicable in the absence of some controlling Federal statute.

The next question is, Is the cause of action barred by that statute? The act authorizing the insurance, and its several amendments, provides that in the event of disagreement as to a claim under the contract of insurance between the bureau and any beneficiary or beneficiaries thereunder, an action on the claim may be brought against the United States either in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia or a district court of the United States in and for the district in which such beneficiaries, or any of them, reside. (40 Stat. 410; 43 Stat. 612.) The defendant in error contends that the cause of action did not accrue because of this provision until there was a disagreement between the bureau and the beneficiary, while the plaintiff in error contends that it was the duty of the beneficiary to present his claim in order that a disagreement might be brought about, and that if he failed to do so within the period of the statute of limitations his right of action is barred. This latter contention, we think, must be sustained. The cause of action arises out of the contract of insurance and not out of the disagreement.

"Where plaintiff's right of action depends upon some act to be performed by him preliminary to commencing suit, and he is under no restraint or disability in the performance of such act, he can not suspend indefinitely the running of the statute of limitations by delaying the performance of the preliminary act; for it is not a policy of law to put it within the power of a party to toll the statute of limitations. (37 C. J. 953.)

"But when some preliminary action is an essential prerequisite to the bringing of a suit, and such action rests with the claimant, he can not defeat the operation of the statute of limitations by failure to act or by long and unnecessary delay in taking the antecedent step. It is not the policy of the law to permit a party against whom the statute runs to defeat its operation by neglecting to do an act which devolves upon him in order to perfect his remedy against another. If this were so, a party would have it in his own power to defeat the purpose of the statute in all cases of this character." (17 R. C. L. 756.)

The rule thus stated is supported by the great weight of authority, and we find nothing to the contrary in Ainsworth v. Lipshon (196 Pac. 1028), decided by the Supreme Court of Arizona. The rule has also the approval of the Supreme Court. This was the basis of the decision of the Supreme Court of Kansas in Bauserman v. Charlotte (26 Pac. 1051), and in referring to that decision in Bauserman v. Blunt (147 U. S. 647) the court said: "That decision was evidently deliberately considered and carefully stated, with the purpose of finally putting at rest a question on which some doubt had existed; it is supported by satisfactory reasons, and it is in accord with well-settled principles; and there is no previous adjudication of that court to the contrary." In the same case the Supreme Court further said: "In the absence of express statute or controlling adjudication to the contrary, two general rules are well settled. First, when the statute of limitations has once begun to run, its operation is not suspended by a subsequent disability to sue. Second, the bar of the statute can not be postponed by the failure of the creditor to avail himself of any means within his power to prosecute or to preserve his claim."

In the present case there could, in the nature of things, be no disagreement until the beneficiary prosecuted his claim to the bureau, and if he can withhold his claim indefinitely and at pleasure he can thus deprive the Government of the benefit of the statute of limitations.

There is much force in the contention that the defendant in error was not totally and permanently disabled during the period for which a recovery is sought, but that question we need not consider.

The judgment of the court below is reversed and the cause is remanded for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

COLORADO RIVER BASIN

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I introduce a bill asking for the appointment by the President of a commission to make a complete survey and investigation of the potentialities of the Colorado River. I think we ought to have a dispassionate and an exhaustive report about the Colorado River before we seek to appropriate $125,000,000, or any other amount. I therefore introduce this bill, authorizing the President to name a commission of he character indicated. I shall not ask for its consideration now, and I shall not ask that it be referred, but ask to have it lie on the table.

The bill (S. 3876) to authorize the President to investigate the potential utilization of the water resources of the Colorado River Basin was read twice by its title and ordered to lie on the table.

FORTY-FOUR-HOUR WEEK FOR GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE EMPLOYEES

On motion of Mr. SHIPSTEAD, the Committee on Education and Labor was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 2440) to provide that four hours shall constitute a day's work on Saturdays throughout the year for all employees in the Government Printing Office, and it was referred to the Committee on Civil Service.

OKFUSKEE COUNTY, OKLA.

Mr. PINE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 7011) to detach Okfuskee County from the northern judicial district of the State of Oklahoma and attach the same to the eastern judicial district of the said State, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

CLAIM OF MARY S. HOWARD ET AL.

Mr. BRUCE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 3331) for the relief of Mary S. Howard, Gertrude M. Caton, Nellie B. Reed, Gertrude Pierce, Katie Pensel, Josephine Pryor, Mary L. McCormick, Mrs. James Blanchfield, Sadie T. Nicoll, Katie Lloyd, Mrs. Benjamin Warner, Eva K. Pensel, Margaret Y. Kirk, C. Albert George, Earl Wroldsen, Benjamin Carpenter, Nathan Benson, Paul Kirk, Townsend Walters, George Freet, James B. Jefferson, Frank Ellison, and the Bethel Cemetery Co., which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Claims and ordered to be printed.

FLOOD CONTROL

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, last week, in the consideration of the flood control bill, I made some suggestions to the effect that the bill did not offer very much hope for the tributary States. I desire at this time to submit an editorial from the Daily Oklahoman, printed in my State, upon the subject matter, and ask that it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). Without objection, the editorial will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

NOTHING BUT A PROMISE

In the Mississippi flood control bill passed by the Senate Wednesday there is nothing in the world for Oklahoma but future promises and high taxation. The State will help pay the cost of lower Mississippi flood prevention. It gets nothing in the way of flood control and flood prevention for itself. It gets a mere paper promise that at some uncertain day of the uncertain future some Washington bureau will make a survey of the flood-imperiled lands of this State.

The lower Mississippi will gain protection in the immediate future. The Senate bill appropriates money to curb the mighty river from Cairo to the sea. And unquestionably that protection is fully deserved and sorely needed. There is no question at all about that. But two dozen valley States that sorely need protective measures are left entirely out of consideration and dismissed with the promise that at some indefinite time a survey of their needs will be undertaken.

The Senate vote in favor of the bill passed Wednesday was unanimous. Not a vote was lifted against the bill's inequities; not a vote was cast against it. Senators who have fought for a more equitable and effective measure were strangely quiescent when the roll finally was called. All joined in supporting a measure burdensome to all the States and beneficial to exceedingly few.

DUTY ON CARILLONS

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, some time ago I introduced a bill providing for the repeal of the duty of 50 per cent on carillons. At that time I made some comment to the effect that these bells could be heard some 20 miles. It seems that I was in error about that; and one of the manufacturers of bells in this country, the Meneely Bell Co., which has a foundry at Troy, N. Y., rather took me to task about some things I said at that time, and insists that I ought to correct the RECORD.

I do no want to do anybody any injustice, or misrepresent the situation at all, and would not do it knowingly. I find that my information about the carrying power of these bells was in error; that probably 3 or 4 miles is as far as they can be heard. I do not see that it is very material; but I also made some comment, based upon the information I had, about bells of the kind I was commenting on not being manufactured in this country. Mr. Edward Bok proposes to erect in Florida some 62 bells to go in this carillon—a magnificent thing, a beautiful thing, all in the public interest—and I felt that it was not right to call on him to pay a duty of 50 per cent on such bells that he was going to present to the public.

Mr. SMOOT. Forty per cent.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think it is 50 per cent. I think the Senator will find that that is the case. At any rate, we insist that bells of that character are not manufactured in this country. The Meneely Bell Co. claim that they can make bells perhaps of the same kind, but I doubt very much if they can make them of the proper tone. However, in justice to them, I ask to have inserted in the RECORD the letter which they wrote me, dated January 30, and also a copy of the reply. I referred the letter to Mr. Bok, and I ask to have inserted in the RECORD his reply of February 25, hoping that may straighten matters out as far as it can be done at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the letters will be printed in the RECORD.

The letters are as follows:

TROY, N. Y., January 30, 1928.

Hon. DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR FLETCHER: When some months ago you introduced a bill for the remission of duty on a set of bells to be imported for an estate in Florida, I thought you might have done so "by request," thus passing no opinion on its merits. But upon reading in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of the 16th instant your recent reference on the floor of the Senate to that measure, I realized that you believed in it and the supporting document that you presented at the time of its introduction.

The RECORD quotes you as having said that such combinations of bells are not made in this country and can be heard some 20 miles.

I must challenge the accuracy of your information on those two features. The supporting document accompanying your measure states that a carillon "possesses substantially all the tones and half notes through a range of two to four octaves," and elsewhere in the same document a carillon is described as "containing all the semitones of the chromatic scale." I hand you herewith an illustration of a set of 20 chromatically attuned bells of American manufacture that was installed in a church two years ago, and if you will visit our foundry we shall be glad to show you our stock patterns, from which you might choose a set of 50 or 60 bells or more.

Reference to your dictionaries will make plain to you that "carillons" and "chimes" are identical. "Carillon" is merely the French word for "chime." The difference is the same as that between "chapeau" and "hat"—in name only.

As to the carrying power of foreign-made sets of attuned bells, let me again refer you to the document supporting your measure, in which you will find the statement that a carillon imparts its sound "within a radius of at least a quarter of a mile," and that it is "heard under favorable circumstances for blocks away." European-made sets of attuned bells are notoriously lacking in carrying power, being cast very thin and primarily intended for use in congested European cities where carillons (chimes) are so numerous that the tones of powerful bells would overlap into the adjoining parishes. It is no uncommon thing for Americans founders to be employed for the purpose of correcting the attunement and attempting to increase the carrying power of tone of foreign-made bells that have been installed in this country.

Had the purchaser of the bells whose measure you have sponsored employed bell musicians to hear and contrast attuned sets of bells of high-priced American manufacture with those of any European make, he would have learned that the best-attuned bells in the world are produced in America.

As I have pointed out to you that your recent remarks on the carrying power of European-made bells were not in accordance with the statements set forth in the document supporting your measure, and as the inclosed literature conclusively shows that large combinations of bells are made in this country, I appeal to your fairness to have this letter read on the floor of the Senate for the benefit of your colleagues who heard what you said about bells a few days ago. I would also request that you have the inclosed article from the Churchman, which gives a description of bells from the standpoint of an American founder, printed as a Senate record and made a part of the documentary evidence on bells which originally accompanied the introduction of your measure.

I am, dear Senator, yours very truly,

WM. R. MENEELY,
President Meneely Bell Co.

FEBRUARY 25, 1928.

DEAR SENATOR FLETCHER: This is the first I knew of two Meneely concerns, and the mix up is, to my mind, perfectly justifiable—of a family with such an uncommon name as Meneely choose to quarrel or have a disagreement, and each founds a separate works for the making of a specialized product as bells, in the same city, it may be clear to them, but they should not be surprised if the lay public becomes confused. All I have ever heard is of a Meneely firm in Troy that makes bells of a certain weight, but I never knew there were two opposing firms.

They may make good chimes of a certain weight, but I do not know of a single carillon of any number of bells they have ever made.

I am truly sorry there seems such a poor chance to get the bill out of the committee. It is discouraging when one wants to do a beautiful thing for the American people to find a refusal on the part of the Government to give that support to which he is really entitled. It is not the sort of stimulant that urges him on, while that is exactly what the Congress should do—to encourage men who want to do something for the people.

Very cordially yours,

EDWARD W. BOK.

THE CALENDAR

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The morning business is closed. The calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] if we can not begin where we left off the last time the calendar was called?

Mr. CURTIS. That can be done only by unanimous consent. I think, as we have only 15 minutes left to consider the calendar, that is a good suggestion. So I ask unanimous consent that we consider unobjected bills on the calendar, beginning where we left off at the last call of the calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the consideration of the calendar will begin with Order of Business 580, Senate bill 2679.

CONTINUED SERVICE OF OFFICERS WHOSE TERMS HAVE EXPIRED

The bill (S. 2679) to limit the period for which an officer appointed with the advice and consent of the Senate may hold over after his term shall have expired was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert:

That an officer of the United States who has been appointed, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, for a definite term, but who, under the act fixing such term or under any other act of Congress, is to hold office until his successor is appointed and qualified, shall not continue in office beyond the end of the next session of the Senate commencing after his definite term has expired; except that any such officer who, on the date of the approval of this act, has continued in office beyond the end of such session of the Senate, shall cease to hold office on the date of the approval of this act.

SEC. 2. After the approval of this act no person shall be eligible for appointment to fill a vacancy in any office happening during the recess of the Senate, if the nomination of such person to such office has once been rejected by the Senate. Any appointment made in violation of the provisions of this section shall be void.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I should like a brief explanation of that bill. I have not had time to read it.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, this bill was unanimously reported from the Committee on the Judiciary. A similar measure was prepared, and I think introduced, at the last session of Congress, but not reached. It grows out of this situation, which I will state very briefly:

A number of statutes applicable to Alaska and Hawaii and other places provide that various officials, marshals, judges, and so on, may hold office indefinitely—that is to say, until their successors are elected and qualified—and there is no limit to the time their terms may run.

It is felt, in view of conditions which have arisen, that there ought to be a limitation. A situation was developed which challenged the attention of the committee. A person was appointed, his successor was named but not confirmed, and the official holds on indefinitely. The Department of Justice takes the position that in a proper construction of the statute a person may hold for life, unless his successor shall have been named in the meantime, and qualified.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, I am sorry to object, but I do not approve of this bill on principle. It is not a meritorious bill, in my judgment, and I think it involves what would prove to be a very unfortunate alteration of policy. I feel bound to object.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I am sure that if the Senator understood he would take a different view; but, of course, if he objects, it will have to go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

OHIO RIVER BRIDGE AT AUGUSTA, KY.

The bill (H. R. 5721) authorizing E. M. Elliott & Associates (Inc.), its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Ohio River at Augusta, Ky., was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment to the bill. I move that wherever the words "E. M. Elliott & Associates (Inc.)" appear in the bill the words "J. C. Norris, mayor of the city of Augusta, Ky., his successors and assigns," be substituted.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator explain why he offers that amendment?

Mr. BARKLEY. Because the people in Augusta, Ky., who are behind this proposition, and desire to have the bridge constructed, have decided to proceed in the name of the mayor of the city. They think it will procure an advantage to the local community in the construction of the bridge, and they have therefore asked me to offer the amendment. It is the friends of the bill who have agreed to the proposal.

Mr. SMOOT. There is no other amendment intended to be proposed?

Mr. BARKLEY. No; that is all.

Mr. FLETCHER. Does that mean "J. C. Norris as mayor"?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. FLETCHER. Should it not read "as mayor"?

Mr. BARKLEY. "As mayor"; yes.

Mr. DALE. The bill has passed the House of Representatives, granting the authority to build this bridge to certain other parties. Do they consent to this change?

Mr. BARKLEY. I have no information from E. M. Elliott himself. I will state that the whole matter has been gone into by the author of the bill in the House, and he has communicated with the parties in the matter interested in the bridge, and they have all agreed that this substitution should be made.

Mr. DALE. What I had in mind was why the authority was not given to other parties, as the Senator requests, and then let them settle it. Why is it taken away from the parties to whom it was granted by the House?

Mr. BARKLEY. I will state to the Senator that my information is that E. M. Elliott has obtained the consent of Congress to build numerous bridges, that he is somewhat of a promoter, and that he has used the consent of Congress, granted to him, to make money out of it himself and to assign the permits, and that the people who are interested in this bridge no longer desire to deal with him or to have him interested in this bridge proposal.

These facts have all been developed since the bill passed the House. The amendment is offered at the request not only of the Member of the House who introduced the bill but of the people in Augusta who are interested in this bridge, who have learned some facts about this man Elliott.

Mr. DALE. Mr. President, I am sorry, but I think I shall have to object to the consideration of this bill until I can have another day's consideration of it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES in the chair). Objection is made, and the bill will be passed over.

Mr. BARKLEY subsequently said: Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to return to Calendar 600, House bill 5721.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. DALE. Mr. President, I withdraw my objection.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment, on page 5, line 17, to strike out "2" and insert in lieu thereof "4."

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky offers an amendment, which the clerk will state.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from Kentucky proposes that wherever "E. M. Elliott & Associates (Inc.)" appears in the bill, the language "J. C. Norris, as mayor of the city of Augusta, Ky., his successors and assigns," be substituted.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I do not want to object to the consideration of the bill, but I want to ask the Senator if I understood him correctly to state the man mentioned in this bill has come to Congress and gotten the consent of Congress for the construction of bridges for the purpose of getting contracts later from municipalities, States, or counties to build bridges?

Mr. BARKLEY. Information has been developed in connection with some bridge bills that have been passed that certain persons have taken advantage of the consent of Congress to speculate on the permits received, and to sell them to municipalities and private corporations. It is to avoid that very situation that I ask that the mayor of the city of Augusta, as mayor, the city of Augusta being primarily interested in the construction of this bridge, be substituted for the name which now appears in the bill.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I have no objection, but it seems to me that the system involves legislative scandals, private individuals coming to Congress and getting bills through both branches, and through committees, for the purpose of using the congressional acts to enrich themselves by getting contracts.

Mr. BARKLEY. I think the Seantor is correct about that. It is to avoid that very situation that I ask that the name of the mayor be substituted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

ALPHA NEWELL

The bill (S. 140) for the relief of Alpha Newell was announced as next in order.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, at the request of the Senator from California, I desire that the bill may go over for the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

BOULDER DAM

The bill (S. 728) to provide for the construction of works for the protection and development of the lower Colorado River Basin, for the approval of the Colorado River compact, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. That can not be passed to-day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

AMENDMENT OF INTERSTATE COMMERCE ACT

The bill (S. 1263) to amend section 4 of the interstate commerce act was announced as next in order.

Mr. GOODING. I ask that this bill may go over without prejudice. It can not be considered under the five-minute rule.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

REVOLUTIONARY CANNON DONATION

The bill (S. 805) donating Revolutionary cannon to New York State Conservation Department was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War, in his discretion, is hereby authorized to deliver to the order of the New York State Conservation Department five Revolutionary cannon stored in the Watervliet Arsenal at Watervliet, N. Y., and marked "W. A. 60," "W. A. 61," "W. A. 62," "W. A. 63," and "W. A. 64": Provided, That the United States shall be put to no expense in connection with the delivery of said cannon.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PRIVATE CONDUIT ON LINCOLN ROAD NE.

The bill (S. 2542) for the construction of a private conduit across Lincoln Road NE., in the District of Columbia, was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, authorized to grant permission to Trinity College to lay a conduit for the transmission of power from their power house under and across Lincoln Road NE., between Michigan Avenue and Fourth Street, in the District of Columbia, into and upon the property of Trinity College, which is located on both sides of Lincoln Road, under the regulations and subject to the limitations prescribed in the act entitled "An act regulating permits for private conduits in the District of Columbia," approved May 26, 1900.

SEC. 2. That Congress reserves the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WINFIELD SCOTT

The bill (H. R. 4115) for the relief of Winfield Scott was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HARRIET K. CAREY

The bill (H. R. 4117) for the relief of Harriet K. Carey was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

W. LAURENCE HAZARD

The bill (H. R. 4116) for the relief of W. Laurence Hazard was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TWENTY-THIRD INTERNATIONAL CONGRESS OF AMERICANISTS

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 97) authorizing the President to appoint three delegates to the Twenty-third International Congress of Americanists, and making an appropriation for the expenses of such congress was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will be passed over.

Mr. BINGHAM subsequently said. Mr. President, I was unavoidably absent from the Chamber a moment ago when Senate Joint Resolution 97 was passed over. I ask unanimous consent that we go back to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. SMOOT. Before I withdraw my objection to it, I want to say to the Senator that there is no report with the joint resolution, and I would like to have him explain what is really intended to be done by the measure, and what expense would be attached to it, whether the $5,000 would be sufficient, or whether there would be an item in the deficiency appropriation bill to cover additional expenses.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I shall be very glad to explain. The International Congress of Americanists, an organization consisting of those interested in the history of aboriginal America, in Indian lore, and archæological remains, has met in different countries for many years past. We have always had delegates at the congresses, and in whatever country the congresses have been held the government of the country has recognized the congress, has made appropriations for it, and has treated our delegates with great courtesy and hospitality. This year it is to be held in New York City.

With regard to the appropriation, the amount of $5,000 will be ample to cover the needs. I can say to the Senator that there will be no effort to secure any additional funds for it whatsoever. The congress is accustomed to paying most of its expenses, and this is merely a small amount to enable us to return hospitality which our delegates have for many years received in foreign countries.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator remember how many countries participate in these Congresses?

Mr. BINGHAM. There are generally from a hundred to a hundred and twenty-five visiting delegates, besides those who are locally interested. Of course, being in New York, the members of the New York Historical Society, the American Museum of Natural History, and others interested in like enterprises in connection with anthropology, ethnology, and archæology will be present.

Mr. FLETCHER. How many countries will be represented?

Mr. BINGHAM. Practically every country in America and in Europe will be represented. All persons interested in the prehistoric life of America, its monuments, and the development of the Indians, will follow its proceedings with interest.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, I suggest that the name "Americanists" is an entirely inappropriate designation. That is usually associated with the "Know Nothings" in the history of the country.

Mr. BINGHAM. May I say to the Senator from Maryland that I think that name is due to the fact that the congress had its origin in France and this title is a literal translation of the French title. Being translated into English it becomes "International Congress of Americanists." "Americanists" are those primarily interested in prehistoric America and the aborigines of the Western Hemisphere.

Mr. BRUCE. I desire to withdraw any objections which I may have seemed to offer to the bill in which the Senator from Connecticut is so interested. I hope that the measure may be passed.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 97) authorizing the President to appoint three delegates to the Twenty-third International Congress of Americanists, and making an appropriation for the expenses of such congress.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The preamble has been reported with an amendment, which will be stated.

The amendment to the preamble was, in line 4, before the word "races," to insert the word "aboriginal," so as to read:

Whereas the Twenty-third International Congress of Americanists will be held in New York City during the week beginning September 17, 1928, for the consideration of (1) the aboriginal races of America and their relationship to other peoples, (2) the archæological remains found in America and time relations as revealed by them, (3) the habits and customs of the various groups of American Indians and questions of the origin and distribution of these in the Old and New Worlds, (4) the native languages of America, (5) the early history of America, especially in regard to its discovery and early settlement, and (6) geographical and geological questions, especially as related to human activities: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That the President is authorized to appoint three delegates to represent the United States at the Twenty-third International Congress of Americanists, to be held in New York City during the week beginning September 17, 1928.

SEC. 2. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $5,000, to be paid by the Secretary of State to the proper officials of such Congress as the contribution of the United States toward defraying the expenses of such congress.

The amendment was agreed to.

The preamble as amended was agreed to.

TAXES IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

The bill (S. 3178) to provide an additional method for collecting taxes in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Just a moment.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Is that the bill on which the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PHIPPS] spoke the other day?

Mr. SMOOT. No; it is not. I asked for a moment because I had that very question in mind.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. What is this bill? Let it be reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read the bill.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is recommended by the commissioners and has a unanimous report from the committee.

Mr. BRUCE. It was very carefully considered.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I have no objection.

Mr. BLAINE. I do not believe there has been any explanation of this bill. I have not had time to look into it, and I would like to have some one tell what the bill would do. I may have no objection to its consideration.

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, the bill was introduced by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PHIPPS], who is thoroughly familiar with the purposes of it. I think probably it would be well to have the bill go over until the Senator from Colorado can be present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

SENATOR THOMAS J. WALSH'S SUMMARY OF OIL SCANDAL

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article appearing in the New York Times of April 1, 1928, by my colleague [Mr. WALSH], in which he sums up the oil scandal.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SENATOR WALSH SUMS UP THE OIL SCANDAL—THE MAN WHO HAS HAD A LEADING PART IN THE PROTRACTED INVESTIGATION TRACES STEP BY STEP THE DEVIOUS COURSE OF THE CONTINENTAL TRADING CO., WHICH HE TERMS "A SHAMEFUL STORY"

(The oil scandal grows in magnitude far beyond the implications of the sensational disclosures of four years ago. The first stage of investigation by a Senate committee brought out circumstances connected with the leasing of naval oil reserves to Harry F. Sinclair and E. L. Doheny. The second and present stage of the investigation inquires into the affairs of the Continental Trading Co. and the disposal of its profits. In this article, the first that he has written for publication, Senator WALSH of Montana, a leading member of the investigating committee, pieces together the evidence that has been brought out bit by bit since the affairs of the mysterious Continental Trading Co. were brought to light.)

By THOMAS J. WALSH, a Senator from Montana

WASHINGTON.

The revived inquiry into the scandals connected with, or incidental to, the leasing of the naval oil reserves has been characterized by sensational developments rivaling in public interest those at which the country was aghast when first the iniquity of the main transaction was laid bare.

Though the energetic representatives of the press have faithfully chronicled the disclosures as they were made and interpreted with substantial accuracy what was told to the committee, indicating the significance of each item of testimony of consequence, their stories were necessarily piecemeal in character. A connected narrative of the extraordinary transactions of which the committee has been told ought to be of general interest.

It should be borne in mind that though the Continental Trading Co. came into existence contemporaneously with the initiation of the negotiations leading to the leasing of the reserves, there was no inkling of its birth or evanescent career until after the labors of the committee were suspended in the year 1924 to await the determination of the courts on the principle of law upon which Harry F. Sinclair based his refusal to answer questions propounded to him.

The Continental Trading Co. was incorporated November 16, 1921, and began its business life next day. On November 30, 1921, E. L. Doheny made his celebrated "loan" to Fall, and in the last week of that year Sinclair visited the Secretary of the Interior at his ranch at Tres Rios, then expanded by the acquisition of the adjacent Harris property, a deal that excited the suspicion of his neighbors, who knew that Fall was "broke."

DISCOVERY OF THE LIBERTY BONDS

The mysterious Continental Trading Co. came to light in the course of the preparation of Atlee Pomerene and Owen J. Roberts for the trial of the suit of the Government brought at Cheyenne, Wyo., to cancel the lease of the Teapot Dome. Prowling around among the records of the banks in which Fall had accounts in the West a reference was found to 3½ per cent Liberty bonds, the numbers of which were noted.

Through the Treasury these were traced to the Continental Trading Co., for whom they had been purchased with others aggregating $3,080,000 face value by the New York branch of the Dominion Bank of Canada. It was then developed that of the bonds so acquired $230,500 worth, face value, were delivered by Fall's son-in-law to a bank at Pueblo, Colo., the avails going in part to liquidate obligations to the bank from a company the stock of which was owned jointly by Fall and his son-in-law, in part to pay off Fall's personal debts, and the remainder to the credit of his account.

Inquiry revealed that the Continental Trading Co. was organized, as stated, in 1921 by one H. S. Osler, of Toronto, Canada, all others connected with the institution being clerks in his law office, and that it had dissolved in 1923. The story of its entrance into the business world was told by ex-Senator Thomas, of Colorado, practicing law at the capital. He was called to New York by Col. A. E. Humphreys, a client, whose home was likewise at Denver, to assist in drafting a contract for the sale to the Sinclair Crude Oil Purchasing Co. and the Prairie Oil & Gas Co. by companies controlled by Humphreys of 33,333,333 barrels of oil, a part of the product of a rich field opened up by Humphreys in west Texas.

Conferences were held by Thomas, Humphreys, and his son, on the one side, and Harry F. Sinclair, Robert W. Stewart, and Henry M. Blackmer, associated with the Sinclair Crude Oil Purchasing Co., and James E. O'Neil, the managing head of the Prairie Oil & Gas Co., on the other. The stock of the Sinclair Crude Oil Purchasing Co. is owned, the one-half by the Sinclair Consolidated Co., dominated by Sinclair, and the one-half by the Standard Oil Co. of Indiana, of the board of directors of which Stewart then was and still is the chairman. Blackmer was at that time the strong man in the Midwest Refining Co., all of the stock of which was then and still is owned by the Standard of Indiana. [The resignation of H. M. Blackmer as a director in the Midwest Refining Co. was announced by the chairman of the Board at Denver on March 28.] O'Neil directed the business of the Prairie Oil & Gas Co.

The negotiations terminating in an agreement, Thomas was about to write the contract from notes taken by him during the conference when he was told that the Continental Trading Co. was to be named in the contract as the purchaser. There naturally arose a question as to the financial responsibility of that company, but all misgivings were stilled by the assurance that its obligation would be guaranteed by the two companies who throughout the negotiations were spoken of as the purchasers.

THE CONTRACT SIGNED AND SEALED

The contract having been drafted, there then appeared, for the first time, the Toronto lawyer who the day before brought the Continental Trading Co. into being and who, as president of that company, signed and sealed it.

The vendor companies became bound through the signature of Humphreys, and the guarantee indorsement was executed by O'Neil for the Prairie Oil & Gas Co. and by Sinclair and Stewart, purporting to act as directors of the Sinclair Crude Oil Purchasing Co., though they were not in fact such—a circumstance of no consequence, seeing that the transaction was subsequently ratified by the board of directors of that company.

Further information was secured by counsel representing the Government in the litigation, civil and criminal, that while the Continental Trading Co., by its contract heretofore referred to, guaranteed as stated, acquired the right to have from Humphreys 33,333,333 barrels of oil at $1.50 per barrel, it on the same day contracted to sell to the guaranteeing companies at $1.75 per barrel, O'Neil signing for the Prairie Oil & Gas Co., Sinclair and Stewart for the Sinclair Crude Oil Purchasing Co.

Deliveries were made under the contracts until June 1, 1923, when the contract of the Continental with the Humphrey companies was transferred to the guaranteeing companies, they paying for it $400,000.

The profits theretofore realized—25 cents per barrel—being thus swelled, the Dominion Bank of Canada, to which remittances were made, bought with the avails from time to time under directions from Osler 3½ per cent Liberty bonds to the amount of $3,080,000. These, under directions from the same source, were by the bank, after taking out 2 per cent, which went to the credit of Osler, evidently his commission, divided into four packages, each containing an equal amount, and delivered to him.

THE BONDS TRACED

It was established at the trial at Cheyenne of the suit to cancel the Teapot Dome lease that the bonds heretofore referred to as having been delivered to the Pueblo bank for Fall were among those thus acquired by the Continental Trading Co. The Dominion Bank kept no record of the numbers of the bonds purchased by it, but it did note the brokerage firms through which they were bought and their identity was established by their records.

The foregoing constitutes in outline the sum of the information at the command of the Government, either at the trial at Cheyenne or at the criminal trial of Fall and Sinclair in the District of Columbia, halted in consequence of the "shadowing" of the jury by Burns detectives employed by Sinclair.

There was no direct evidence on either trial concerning how the bonds came into the possession of the son-in-law of Fall, who turned them over to the Pueblo bank, nor regarding the source from which he obtained them. In both instances he declined to testify on the ground that his evidence might tend to incriminate him.

An effort was made to take the testimony of O'Neil and Blackmer, who had fled to France, when it seemed likely they would be called as witnesses, under letters rogatory issued to the courts of that country; but they, too, declined to testify and, strangely, compulsory process can not be resorted to in that Republic against recalcitrant witnesses.

In like manner an attempt was made to compel Osler to relate the story of the evanescent life of the Continental Trading Co., but he took refuge in the plea of privilege of counsel. Persisting in his refusal to answer, he was committed for contempt, his plea being overruled. He sued out a writ of habeas corpus, but again was adjudged not to be protected by the rule that counsel can not be forced to disclose confidential professional communications. From the judgment thus rendered against him he appealed and departed on a lion hunt to South Africa. Meanwhile Judge Kennedy, sitting at Cheyenne, denied a motion of the Government for a continuance until the deposition of Osler could be taken, and the effort to get his testimony proved abortive.

COLONEL STEWART DEPARTS

Such light as Col. Robert W. Stewart could shed upon the shady transaction, in view of the part he had in the negotiations leading up to the contracts, was likewise sought by counsel for the Government, but he had important business in South America about the time the trial was coming on and left for an unknown destination before the subpœna could be served upon him. It might be added that Sinclair did not offer himself as a witness at Cheyenne and was not examined. Obviously, being under indictment at the time, his testimony could not be compelled.

Notwithstanding the failure to close up the gap referred to, the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit and the Supreme Court of the United States, reversing the decree of Judge Kennedy dismissing the Government's bill, held the facts hereinbefore narrated, with others brought to light by the Senate Committee on Public Lands, to be indicative of fraud and corruption in the lease, and held that Fall, in executing the same, was a "faithless public officer."

Here begins the story of the revived investigation undertaken pursuant to a resolution of the Senate directing the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys to continue the work that remained suspended for four years, and particularly to inquire into the disposition of the bonds purchased by the Continental Trading Co.

Reference has been made to the refusal of Everhart, Fall's son-in-law, twice to testify on constitutional grounds. If he was in peril of prosecution at all it was because he might be suspected of participation in the crime for which Sinclair and Fall stood indicted—namely, conspiracy to defraud the United States—though he had never been formally charged with that or any other crime in connection with the oil leases. Nor was there any purpose to proceed against him. However, the court on both occasions perhaps properly sustained his plea.

STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS INVOKED

Prior to 1921 the statute of limitations as to all offenses against the United States not capital was three years. Shortly after his taking office Attorney General Daugherty represented that gigantic frauds, criminal in character, had been perpetrated during the war by or through the connivance of trusted officers of the Government who would be likely to escape punishment through the running of the statute, it being impossible within the brief period of the statute, owing to the complicated nature of the transactions and the iniquity of the conspirators, to unravel the tangled web sufficiently to permit the framing of indictments. He asked that the period be extended in the case of conspiracies to defraud the United States to six years and Congress promptly complied.

It is well known that the great hue and cry came to naught. No official of the Government not altogether petty was ever put upon trial. None such was ever indicted save one, and he was discharged on a demurrer, but the statute served as a screen to protect the associates of Daugherty caught red-handed in the most stupendous piece of thievery known to our annals or, perhaps, to those of any other country. Secretary Wilbur has estimated the net value of the leased reserves at $1,000,000,000.

EVERHART TELLS HIS STORY

Congress took advantage of the interruption of the Fall-Sinclair trial in Washington to repeal the Daugherty Act of 1921, thereby cutting away the immunity of Everhart, who, being called before the committee on the resumption of its hearings, testified frankly that he got from Sinclair the bonds he turned over to the bank at Pueblo, together with others to the amount of $2,500 which he put into the hands of Fall in Washington, where he came at the instance of the latter from the West.

There was some pretense that the bonds represented the purchase price of one-third of the stock of the Fall-Everhart Tres Rios Land & Cattle Co., whose ranch property was to be turned into a club, a sort of riding and hunt club, but so shallow was this fable that its details need not be dwelt upon. The testimony so loosed will be available at the trial before Justice Bailey to be entered upon again during the present month.

The futile efforts of the committee to wring information from the dummy directors of the corporations involved need not detain us. Blackmer and O'Neil were and are still abroad subject to a penalty of $100,000 for failing to respond to a subpœna to attend the criminal trial in the District of Columbia, a law to that effect having been enacted to enforce their appearance. Stewart's presence was secured, however, after the committee had enlisted the aid of John D. Rockefeller, jr., to induce him to cut short a round of activities in Habana and to postpone a contemplated trip to Mexico.

Though correspondence coming into the hands of the committee disclosed that he and Blackmer were associated in the negotiations for the purchase of the Humphreys oil from the beginning, and he was present at their culmination, as stated, he professed no knowledge of the incorporation of the Continental Trading Co. or participation therein, and could offer no reason why his company was not able to buy at $1.50 as well as the Continental Trading Co., particularly when it was unknown and had no credit, so that the ultimate purchasers had to guarantee its contract to buy.

STEWART'S DEFENSE

Stewart was present and participating, according to the testimony of Thomas Humphreys, jr., and Beaman Dawes (interested because his company, the Pure Oil, was a stockholder of the Humphries companies), when the agreement was actually entered into by which the Prairie Oil & Gas Co. and the Sinclair Crude Oil Purchasing Co. was to get the oil for $1.50. He stolidly insisted that some one told him he could not get the oil for less than $1.75 and that it was a good buy at that price, though he knew some one was getting a "commission" of 25 cents. He protested that he had never made a penny out of the transaction, but declined to tell what he knew about what disposition was made of the bonds.

Arrested by order of the Senate to answer to a charge of contempt, he sued out a writ of habeas corpus which was, after hearing, quashed, and he is now at large pending an appeal from the order remanding him to the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate. Meanwhile he has been indicted for his refusal to answer and stands in peril of a jail sentence, like that imposed upon Sinclair for a like offense.

Not all the witnesses holding places with the companies involved, however, suffered from amnesia, though that affection was most extraordinarily general among them.

The gentleman who succeeded O'Neil as chairman of the board of the Prairie Oil & Gas Co., long associated with him, told an amazing story of having been called, in the year 1925, by O'Neil to Montreal, whither, obviously avoiding the United States, he had secretly come from France, ill and expecting to die. He conveyed to his friend the intelligence that he had made a profit out of the transactions of the Continental Trading Co. amounting, with accrued interest, to $800,000, which he asserted he considered and had always considered belonged to the Prairie Oil & Gas Co.

He gave the messenger so summoned an order on his son in New York to deliver to the bearer bonds to the amount above indicated for that company, which was done, and the bonds were taken to the office of the company at Independence, Kans., where they now are in the possession of an affiliated company.

BLACKMER CREPT TO CANADA

Another actor in the drama, Henry M. Blackmer, anticipated the discovery by the committee of the whereabouts of his share of the loot by sending his attorney to tell about it. He, too, cautiously crept to Canada, where he summoned his counsel to tell him that, as in the case of the O'Neil bonds, none of the coupons on his had been cashed except those maturing in December, 1922, and June, 1923, and that they were held intact to the amount of $763,000 in New York.

This was done because he had some misgivings about a claim that might be made thereto by either the Midwest Refining Co. or the Standard of Indiana, with the directing head of the latter of which he had been associated in the transaction through which the bonds had been acquired, and of the former of which he was himself the directing officer at a salary of $50,000 or more. In his case it was apparently the promptings of prudence that brought him from his sanctuary, not of conscience, as in the case of O'Neil.

Neither volunteered any information concerning the disposition of the remainder of the bonds, O'Neil indicating quite clearly to his intimate friend, on announcing his purpose to surrender, that he did not desire to be questioned concerning details. It is known, however, that Sinclair participated in the distribution, seeing that Fall got $233,000 worth of the bonds from him, in addition to $25,000 more not identified as Continental bonds, said to have been turned over as a loan in the summer of 1922, about the time that he and Sinclair started on a trip to Russia in connection with an oil concession which the latter got or hoped to get from the government of that country.

TURNED OVER TO HAYS

It was further developed at the original hearing that he had turned over to Will H. Hays, for the Republican National Committee, about December 3, 1923, $75,000 in bonds, which at the later inquest were shown to be Continental bonds. That gentleman, who had been chairman of the committee mentioned prior to and during the campaign of 1920, and who became Postmaster General on the incoming of the Harding administration in March, 1921, felt impelled, though he had retired from both positions in the fall of 1923, to help raise funds to meet the large deficit resulting from a somewhat liberal course of spending in that campaign.

He left the impression, if he did not actually state when on the stand in 1924, after much prodding, that the contribution had been made by Sinclair in cash, but another witness revealed that what the committee received were bonds in the amount above indicated, which were converted and applied to the liquidation of an indebtedness at the Empire Trust Co.

On the renew hearing Mr. Hays voluntarily appeared—whether he had an acute sense that the facts would otherwise be divulged is a matter of speculation—and told the committee that Sinclair had further turned over $185,000 in bonds, in the nature of a loan, to be "used" by the committee in taking care of the debt.

HOW THE BONDS WERE USED

Pressed for an explanation as to how the bonds were to be "used," Mr. Hays was indefinite and unintelligible, but it was anticipated that in some way the delivery of them would, to that extent, serve to permit the statement to be made to the committee, then about to assemble, that the debt had been "provided for," it being understood that from moneys to be raised by nation-wide solicitation Sinclair was to be repaid.

Of the bonds so "loaned" Hays told that $60,000 was sent to Fred W. Upham, treasurer of the committee, at Chicago, and $25,000 to John W. Weeks, then Secretary of War, and $50,000 delivered to John T. Pratt, a wealthy New Yorker, a member of the "Standard Oil group." Pratt subscribed $50,000 on the receipt of the bonds on November 28, 1923, toward the fund to lift the indebtedness, remitting by check to Upham, but afterwards was prevailed upon by Hays to return either the bonds he received or an equal amount, which Hays then turned back to Sinclair, together with $50,000 more, which, according to Hays, was never "used."

Interrogated as to what Upham was to do with the bonds sent to him, Hays professed ignorance, but denied specifically that it was understood that he was to distribute them around among trustworthy Republicans in the city of Chicago and take from them checks for the avails, giving to the transactions the character of subscriptions from the recipients, respectively.

PATTEN CONFIRMS A THEORY

Information coming to the committee to the effect that that was just what was done was confirmed by the testimony of James Patten of that city, a retired grain speculator of advanced years, who got $25,000 of the bonds from Upham and subscribed for an equal amount. Patten took the bonds but, reflecting on the matter, his sense of decency revolted and he grew angry at being thus approached, but stilled his conscience by donating an equal amount to a hospital. Other Chicagoans were shown to have subscribed similarly.

Meanwhile the custodians of the papers and effects of Pratt, who died during the summer of 1927, placed in the hands of the committee, among other papers relating to the transaction in which he figured, a small slip of paper on which were memoranda in pencil in his handwriting, intended to serve as a record of the same, in the lower right-hand corner of which were four names—"Weeks," "Andy," "Butler," and "du Pont."

Senator COLEMAN DU PONT got from Hays the $75,000 in bonds which went toward discharging the obligation at the Empire Trust Co., of which DU PONT was an officer. Weeks had been the recipient of bonds, and so it was a reasonable inference that "Andy," presumably Andrew W. Mellon, Secretary of the Treasury, and Senator William M. Butler, chairman of the Republican National Committee, had some part in the transaction.

Being called they both asserted that Hays had tendered bonds to them, to the former $50,000 and to the latter $25,000, but that they had declined to accept them, though Secretary Mellon, who was told the bonds were provided by Sinclair, made a contribution in the amount of the bonds sent him.

Neither of them manifested any resentment such as stirred Patten, nor did either rebuke Hays, or counsel him to return the bonds to Sinclair, or make any effort to dissuade him from "using" the bonds, nor did either take any steps to prevent his "use" of them. Moreover, at the outset of its work the committee sought the aid of the Treasury and had been assured by the Secretary that the Secret Service of his department would give the committee all possible assistance. It responded and was collaborating with the committee in its efforts to trace the bonds, though neither had had any information touching the connection of the Secretary with any of them.

MELLON'S RETURN OF THE BONDS

Hays, recalled, explained his failure to mention his effort to get Mellon and Butler to take the bonds by saying that he felt called upon only to tell about how the bonds were "used." He added that the bonds tendered to Mellon—actually he had them for a week or 10 days—were the $50,000 worth he had said on his earlier appearance never were "used" and were turned back to Sinclair. Presumably the $25,000 which Butler refused went to Weeks.

Sinclair having recovered $100,000 of the $185,000 worth "loaned," "glancing an eye of pity on his (Hays's) losses" through speculations in Sinclair stock, generously released Hays from any obligation arising out of the "loan" of the stock by making a further contribution to the debt fund of $85,000, or $160,000 in all, a sum which no other contributor approached—not even Andrew W. Mellon, reputed to be one of the richest men in America, whose total contribution has been noted.

Reference was made at the outset to the singular circumstance that the organization of the Continental Trading Co. and the initiation of Sinclair's activities on the one hand and the preliminaries to the leasing of the naval oil reserves on the other occurred simultaneously. An even more striking coincidence in respect to time as between these two enterprises is disclosed. The date of the delivery of the bonds by Sinclair to Hays is fixed by the date of Pratt's check to Upham and the receipt of the brokerage house to which the bonds he got were delivered for sale as November 28, 1923.

FURTHER PROOF OF THE DATE

The time is further fixed by the date of the application of the avails of the bonds that went to du Pont by the records of the Empire Trust Co., showing that the proceeds thereof were received by it December 3, 1923. At that very time the facts were being unfolded before the Senate committee, from which the inference was all but inescapable that Fall had been bribed to issue the leases.

On November 30, 1923, the so-called New Mexico witnesses were examined, having been subpœnaed perhaps a week before—Clayton, the county treasurer of Fall's county, who told that he had not paid his taxes for 10 years prior to the summer of 1922, when they were liquidated; Carl Magee, who testified that Fall had told him some time prior to 1921 that he (Fall) was "broke"; other citizens who testified that conditions had been hard in the cattle business, in which Fall was engaged, and that every cattleman in that county was broke; Fall's neighbor, Harris, who had just sold his ranch to the former for $94,000 cash, and Johnson, the ranch foreman, who testified to extensive and costly improvements on Fall's place. So significant was this testimony that his friends on the committee, Senators SMOOT and Lenroot, telegraphed Fall at once that he ought to come on without delay to explain.

SINCLAIR'S NEED OF FRIENDS

This synchrony suggests at once that the extraordinary sum yielded up at that critical time by Sinclair was not altogether voluntarily donated, and that either hope or fear, if not gratitude, stimulated his generosity and accentuated his devotion to the principles of the Republican Party. In the predicament in which he found himself at that juncture he stood in dire need of friends at court.

The committee was directed to resume its work because of a widespread belief that the fund accumulated by the Continental Trading Co., which had been denounced by the Supreme Court of the United States as a fraudulent institution, was to be devoted, and, perhaps, had been devoted, to corrupt uses of one form or another, seeing that some of it had been shown to have been so employed.

It seems now, however, to have been the ill-gotten gains of a contemptible private steal, the peculations of trusted officers of great industrial houses, pilfering from their own companies, robbing their own stockholders, the share of the boodle coming to one of the freebooters serving in part as the price of the perfidy of a member of the President's Cabinet. It is a shameful story, for which, happily, our annals furnish no parallel.

FARM RELIEF

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, Senate bill 3555.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3555) to establish a Federal farm board to aid in the orderly marketing and in the control and disposition of the surplus of agricultural commodities in interstate and foreign commerce.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Oregon if he would be willing to lay aside the unfinished business until we complete the call of the calendar?

Mr. MCNARY. Mr. President, I would go a great distance to please the Senator from Florida. I am going to yield the floor to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] to enable him to make a speech on the unfinished business, because of his desire to leave the city, and for that reason I must insist on proceeding with the unfinished business.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seventy-nine Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. MCNARY. I yield to the senior Senator from Indiana.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I desire to address myself somewhat briefly to the pending measure. I shall confine my remarks this afternoon to a discussion of the equalization fee, and that alone, reserving until a later time in the debate some observations on the general aspects of the measure.

It is my deliberate judgment that no farm legislation will be of present practical value to agriculture in this country unless it provides a method of taking care of staple crop surpluses and one that will be effective in two ways: First, to regulate the available supply in the interest of a fair and stable price; and, second, to afford producers the advantage of existing or future tariffs.

In my judgment the only sound way of doing this necessary thing is by means of an equalization fee to pay the costs of the proposed control of crop surpluses. No other practical means short of direct or indirect Treasury subsidy has been proposed to stabilize and protect our staple surplus crops. It matters not whether we have a Republican tariff or a Democratic tariff, the principle is the same—the cost of managing the surplus so as to make any tariff effective on a surplus crop in its domestic market must be met either by the benefited commodity, as this measure through the equalization fee proposes, or by direct or indirect Treasury subsidy. There is no other practical way.

Therefore, I desire to say to the Members of the Senate, and particularly to those who in the past have opposed this measure, that to deny the farmers the McNary-Haugen bill with the equalization fee is to deny them the benefits of the protective system. And let me warn you that any Member of Congress or any executive officer assumes a grave responsibility, indeed, when he takes the position that farmers should be denied an opportunity to enjoy our American standards of living, and alone of all our major groups must be submerged to levels prevailing in less fortunate lands. We boast of our high standards of living, but they will not long prevail in our cities or industrial communities if the farmers are denied an equal opportunity to enjoy them.

II

The opposition to surplus-control legislation has picked the equalization fee as the vital point in this legislation, and special efforts have been made to eliminate such a provision from any bill that may be passed by Congress.

One by one the other objections which for four years have been urged against farm relief legislation have been abandoned. The most unreasoning opponent no longer denies that the condition of agriculture is desperately bad; and all but a few concede that there is nothing in present conditions and tendencies which promises relief. Only a negligible number any longer deny that the agricultural situation justifies constructive aid by the Government.

The plain and simple terms of this measure supported by representative farm organizations have silenced, if they have not convinced, the partisans who have been shouting "price fixing." "subsidy," and "Government in business," but every opponent of this legislation now joins in the chorus of opposition to the equalization fee. The entire controversy, in Congress and out of it, over farm legislation has finally resolved itself into this proposition from the opposition: "Any farm legislation within reason, provided it contains no equalization fee."

It is singular and, I believe, significant, that this fire now centered against the equalization fee comes not from farmers, but from those who a year or so ago were opposing any kind of farm-relief legislation. In the last analysis, the farmers will pay the equalization fee, and they are here advocating it, not opposing it.

The reason for all this is obvious. The fee is the crux of the whole situation. Surplus-control legislation without the equalization fee would be unworkable and ineffective, unless we are to turn to direct or indirect Treasury subsidy, which the farmers do not want, the country will not support, and which, in short, is unthinkable.

III

Opposition to the equalization fee has been voiced many times in Congress, in personal discussions, and in the press, yet one will have difficulty in recalling more than three definite reasons for opposition to it. It is argued that it is unconstitutional; that farmers do not want it; and that the fee would be difficult to collect and would require an army of collectors.

As to whether or not the fee is constitutional the Supreme Court probably will be called upon to decide, since able lawyers differ on this question as they have done on all major pieces of national legislation. In my opinion, there are abundant precedents and sound grounds upon which the courts may rest a favorable judgment, but it is not my intention to embody a brief on the constitutionality of the measure in these remarks. The committee report on this bill contains a painstaking and comprehensive study of the constitutional phase which Members of this body would do well to read.

For my part, at this time I want to discuss the practical rather than the legal principle of the equalization fee. This principle is as old as government itself. It is that all beneficiaries of an undertaking shall contribute ratably toward paying the cost. It is new in name only. I can see no difference in its practical effect between the principle involved in the equalization fee and those prevailing in the usual and accepted custom of corporations in their ordinary activities, or the principle employed in local improvements under paving districts, drainage districts, or irrigation districts, or the principles accepted in the Federal reserve act and the transportation act.

Under the provisions of the Federal reserve act every national bank is required to be a member of the Federal reserve bank in whose district it is located, and is required to subscribe to the capital stock of its Federal reserve bank in a sum equal to 6 per cent of its paid-in capital stock and surplus. Only one-half of the amount of this subscription, however, is required by law actually to be paid in, the remainder being subject to call when deemed necessary by the Federal Reserve Board. In addition, every member bank of the Federal reserve system is required to maintain reserve balances with its Federal reserve bank. These are compulsory exactions imposed upon national banks by act of Congress. The national bank that fails or refuses to join the Federal reserve system forfeits its charter.

PARALLEL CASES

Under the transportation act, the Interstate Commerce Commission is directed to prescribe just and reasonable rates in order that carriers may earn a fair return upon the capital invested, and provision is made for disposition of amounts received in excess of what is fixed as a fair return. This likewise is a compulsory exaction.

In both the Federal reserve act and the transportation act Congress has employed the principle of requiring contributions to be made under certain circumstances for a purpose which is conceived to be in the interest of the contributors. I am merely seeking to establish these as practically analogous to that provision of the McNary-Haugen bill which requires a ratable contribution to be made by the beneficiaries for the regulation and control of interstate and foreign commerce which this measure seeks to establish. I do not here assert a precise legal analogy, but rather a practical one, between the equalization fee in the pending bill and the stock-subscription requirement of the Federal reserve act or the recapture clause of the transportation act. The question which the courts must at last decide is whether Congress has the power to regulate commerce in the manner provided in this measure; and if Congress has that power, then whether the equalization fee is necessary to such regulations; and, finally, if it be admitted that Congress has the power, and that the equalization fee is essential to its exercise in this manner, then whether the equalization-fee principle contravenes to an unjustifiable extent any other provisions of the Constitution, such as the due-process clause of the fifth amendment.

My personal judgment is that on these points the courts will hold with the majority of Congress, which has expressed its belief that it has the power to enact this legislation.

It is claimed, as a second reason for opposition to the bill, that farmers themselves do not want it. To me it is significant that during all of the years of hearings and debates during which the various surplus-control proposals have been considered by Congress, not one single responsible farm organization, through its properly designated officers, has appeared before the Committee on Agriculture in either House of Congress in opposition to the equalization fee in the bills. On the contrary, representatives of practically all of the responsible farm organizations and cooperative associations handling widely grown staple crops believe in it.

It is true that the officers of the National Grange favor the debenture plan, which is an indirect subsidy, in that it would convert import duties into export bounties, thus directly lessening the revenues of the Government, but the grange has carefully refrained from going on record in opposition to the equalization-fee plan. On the contrary, upon at least one occasion in the past the duly authorized representative of this organization testified before the committee of another body in favor of the McNary-Haugen proposal.

ANOTHER CHARGE REFUTED

As to the third charge, that the collection of the equalization fee will be difficult or impossible, I believe it can be demonstrated that it would be a simple matter.

The bill provides (sec. 8, par. (c)) that—

> Under such regulations as the board may prescribe, there shall be paid, during a marketing period for any agricultural commodity and in respect of each marketed unit of such commodity, an equalization fee upon one of the following: The transportation, processing, or sale of such unit. The equalization fee shall not be collected more than once in respect of any unit. The board shall determine, in the case of each class of transactions in the commodity, whether the equalization fee shall be paid upon transportation, processing, or sale. The board shall make such determination upon the basis of the most effective and economical means of collecting the fee with respect to each unit of the commodity marketed during the marketing period.

Paragraph (d) of the same section provides that—

> The board may by regulation require any person engaged in the transportation, processing, or acquisition by purchase of any agricultural commodity—
>
> (1) To file returns under oath and to report in respect of his transportation, processing, or acquisition of such commodity, the amount of equalization fees payable thereon, and such other facts as may be necessary for their payment or collection.
>
> (2) To collect the equalization fee as directed by the board and to account therefor.

Paragraph (e) provides that—

> The board, under regulations prescribed by it, is authorized to pay to any person required to collect such fees a reasonable charge for his services.

This last provision should remove all doubt as to the willingness of any agency to collect the fee. The procedure can best be shown by outlining a few examples of how the fee might be collected on a few commodities in the manner provided in the bill; that is, upon transportation, processing, or sale.

TRANSPORTATION

In the case of cotton the board might find that the "most effective and economical means of collecting the fee" would be upon "transportation." The amount of the fee would have been determined and published as a certain amount per pound or per bale, which amount could be collected without expense or difficulty by the transportation company along with the freight charge. The carriers would be required to remit the amount of fees collected directly to the board, which would deposit the remittance in the stabilization fund for cotton. The farmers would know the amount of the fee, and it would be reflected in their price, just as is freight, but the labor and the expense of collecting the fee in this manner would be very little.

In case cotton is delivered by wagon or truck direct to the mills, or to market for export without intervening handling by a common carrier, the equalization fee could be collected on "sale" under the regulations prescribed by the board. In other words, the regulations of the board might provide that in all cases when cotton was moved by common carrier the fee should be collected on "transportation," otherwise the collection should be upon the "sale" as defined in the measure.

PROCESSING

In the case of wheat the board might find that "the most effective and convenient means of collecting the fee" would be upon "processing." After the amount of the fee had been determined and published, the board might by regulation require that the millers remit the fee on the quantities of wheat processed by them. The amount of the fee collected would be remitted to the board at required intervals, and the amount collected on each bushel would be reflected in the farmer's price just as is the freight. It is apparent that if the fee is collected upon "processing" in the case of wheat, such quantities as are imported from abroad would be subject to the fee on the same basis as domestic wheat.

The export market takes the largest part of the wheat that enters commerce but is not milled. It has been argued that since it might be impossible under the Constitution to collect the fee upon the last sale for export, it might be that the exported wheat would escape payment of the fee, and that this would increase relatively the amount of the fee collected upon processed wheat. But on close examination this apparent inequity disappears, since it becomes evident that exporters would have no advantage over flour-exporting millers, even if the former paid no fee and the millers did, because both would be exporting under contract with the board, and in its payment of costs and losses upon the exports, under the terms of the respective marketing agreement, the board would, of course, take into account the fact that the cost of the flour exports included the fee paid, while the cost of the grain exports did not, and settlement would be made on that basis.

In the case of livestock, since we export but few live animals, the fee could be collected almost exclusively upon "processing," while any inequity between the exporter of live animals and the exporter of animal products would be prevented in the settlement under the marketing agreements, just as in the case of the wheat miller and exporter.

SALE

Tobacco may be used to illustrate the case where "sale" might be found "the most effective and economical means" of collecting the fee. Every buyer of tobacco is registered and numbered and is required to make a report to the Treasury Department each month showing the number of pounds and the kind of tobacco he has bought during the month. After the amount of the fee had been determined and published, each buyer could be required to remit the amount of the fee, as directed by the board, for all the tobacco purchased during the preceding month. The money could be remitted either to the Treasury, to be turned over to the board, or to the board directly as required. At the end of the operating period the board would have received the amount of the fee from every pound of tobacco purchased without setting up any new machinery of any kind.

IV

It is still contended by some of the opponents of this legislation that the job could be done by voluntary action through cooperative associations without Government intervention.

Theoretically the banks of the country could have cooperated in the control of their credit resources and brought stability without Federal legislation, but actually the task was impossible and Congress by the device of the Federal reserve act created a plan of stabilization and compelled national banks to provide ratably the capital necessary to operate it.

Theoretically it was possible for the many railroad corporations to set up by voluntary action agencies necessary to equalize railroad returns. Actually effective voluntary cooperation was impossible. Hence, by the device of the transportation act Congress provided the necessary supplement to voluntary action. If I cared to occupy the time of the Senate at length, these examples might be extended indefinitely to prove that when the public good can not adequately be served by voluntary action, it has been the settled policy of our Government to provide by legislation the means to the desired end. Frequently it is nothing more than a device by which the minority may be required to conform. The device varies with the subject matter. It was compulsory stock subscription in the case of the Federal reserve act; it was compulsory pooling of excessive earnings and distribution thereof of the transportation act.

It may be argued that it is possible for all cotton growers, for example, to cooperate in withholding the unneeded portions of their crops from the market in years of large production and in feeding it back again as needed, but actually such a thing is impossible, as has been demonstrated in many cases.

The same is true of all other agricultural commodities that may be widely grown. All farmers never will join cooperative associations, just as all national banks would never voluntarily join the Federal reserve system, and just as all railroad corporations would not voluntarily surrender a portion of their earnings for the benefit of other roads.

A fraction of a group will not voluntarily assume the entire cost of a service to the entire group and continue to bear that cost indefinitely. Quite a number of farmers' cooperatives in the United States have undertaken to stabilize markets by carrying seasonal surpluses over into the next year; but in every case the effort has failed, and in some cases the cooperative itself has been wrecked, because, even in cases where the act of the cooperatives resulted in a substantial benefit to all the producers, the outsiders escaped the costs, and thus benefited relatively more than did the members themselves.

V

The leading farm organizations and cooperative associations of the country tell us they believe they will be able to do the job with the aid of the device suggested, since the equalization fee would compel all the producers of a commodity, whether or not members of a cooperative association, to pay from the benefits received their share of the cost of the stabilization of the commodity. These cooperatives tell us frankly that they can not accomplish the desired results without the equalization fee.

Congress, by the enactment of the Capper-Volstead Act of 1922, and the act of 1926, to create a division of cooperative marketing, as well as by numerous other acts, such as the rural credits act of 1923, looking toward better credit facilities for cooperatives, has recognized the principle of cooperative marketing.

The President upon every appropriate occasion has expressed sympathy with the development of cooperatives and has voiced the hope that the problem might be solved by them. In his message to the Seventieth Congress he said:

> The main problem which is presented for solution is one of dealing with the surplus production. * * * Price fixing and subsidy will both increase the surplus instead of diminishing it. Putting the Government directly into business is merely a combination of subsidy and price fixing aggravated by political pressure. * * * The Government can * * * assist cooperative associations and other organizations in orderly marketing and handling a surplus clearly due to weather and seasonal conditions. * * * While it is probably impossible to secure this result at a single step, and much will have to be worked out by trial and rejection, a beginning could be made by setting up a Federal farm board or commission of able and experienced men in marketing, granting equal advantages * * * to the various agricultural commodities and sections of the country, giving encouragement to the cooperative movement in agriculture, and providing a revolving loan fund at a moderate rate of interest for the necessary financing. * * *

The McNary bill provides exactly that. As losses and costs of stabilizing farm commodities must be paid out of stabilization funds for each commodity, there will be need for periodical or occasional replenishment. Funds for that purpose would be provided by the particular commodity benefited through the operations made possible by the equalization fee. Under no conceivable circumstances can loans only, whether by the Government or by some other agency, accomplish this purpose.

If agriculture is to enjoy its most favorable markets under fair price conditions, it is essential that it be placed in position to control supply and to feed it out to the markets in response to demand. Our farmers may produce more of some crops than the domestic demand will absorb at a fair price if all of it is thrown into the home market. Yet there are markets abroad that need what we have to sell. To be sure, their prices are fixed by production costs lower than ours. The problem is to sell in such markets abroad and still maintain an independent domestic market that is related to our home cost of production; or, as in the case of cotton, to influence the world's price through the control of surpluses in strong hands close to the growers in this country.

That the large industries have found a way to engage in export trade without permitting the price for the portion sold in export to influence adversely the price at home is not denied.

The late Judge Elbert H. Gary, of the United States Steel Corporation, in the last annual report of that corporation published before his death, explained quite frankly that steel export prices are not permitted to establish domestic prices when he said:

> Prices received in 1926 were fairly stable throughout the year, with, however, a downward tendency. Prices obtainable in the foreign markets, and to some extent for domestic tonnage in markets bordering on the Atlantic, Gulf, and Pacific coasts of the United States, were, however, relatively low, owing to the severe competition of European manufacturers, whose labor cost in production and transportation cost in delivery were materially less than that of the mills in the United States. As a consequence, the direct profit results from the export business as a whole were not fully compensatory for the proportion of capital invested and employed in the business.

This is simply one illustration of the manner in which industrial organization, assisted by protective legislation, disposes of its output to its own advantage. Farmers in the United States help pay the bill. At the same time, they lack an equivalent power to dispose of their output in a manner which would enable them to bring the domestic prices on their products up to a fair relationship with the things they have to buy.

VI

It is unthinkable that we should refuse farmers an opportunity to protect their home market, or, if and when loans can not accomplish the desired result, that we must resort to Government subsidy for 30,000,000 people. The farmers do not want a subsidy. The very suggestion is distasteful to the American mind, and it offers a spectacle of 30,000,000 of people when in need reaching their hands into the Treasury, and suggests the time when another group, in similar straits, may demand a dole also—and they will not be denied if the precedent is once established.

Any plan of subsidy compels an involuntary contribution or "equalization fee" to be paid by the whole people, since it draws from the Public Treasury, as contrasted with the McNary bill, which would secure its contribution or "equalization fee" from the particular growers benefited.

We must recognize that the very nature of our Government is rooted in our respect for property rights. No group of our citizens have been more ardent in their loyalty to this principle than the farmers. To put them upon the dole system might mean, and I believe it would mean, the beginning of the end of their respect for the property rights of other groups. To deny them this legislation with the equalization fee is to deny them admission into the protective system. I repeat, it matters not in principle whether we have a Republican or a Democratic tariff.

They offer to pay the cost of the experiment themselves out of the benefits they expect to receive; and as it is conceded that all new legislation is experimental, why should they be denied the right to make this experiment?

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, before the Senator takes his seat I should like to ask him one question in reference to the principle involved in this bill.

I can understand how wheat, which has to meet the competition of the world, could be benefited by virtue of a tariff on wheat when, through the processes of this bill, the Government shall cooperate with the cooperative associations to control the price, directly or indirectly, and in the case of whatever surplus is exported abroad to meet the competition of the world the difference between what it sells for here and the loss that is sustained in the export shall be made up by the equalization fee. I can understand that thoroughly, and how it might and perhaps would benefit the wheat grower. The same thing might be true of those who are engaged in the animal industry.

In regard to cotton, however, the great American monopoly, I have studied carefully to see in what respect, other than controlling the surplus, to which I will call attention in just a minute, the equalization fee could operate—it might be there nominally—for the reason that seventy-odd per cent of all the world's cotton is produced in America, and 90 per cent of all the spinnable cotton, as it is known to the spinners, is produced in this country; so that whatever price is fixed in America fixes the world's price.

There is no cotton, broadly speaking, that comes in competition with American cotton. The only thing that competes with American cotton is American cotton. That paradox can be explained on the ground that during periods of excess production and very low prices Europeans buy in large quantities, and it has been the case that when the price rose in this country at the beginning of the production of another crop that cotton has been reexported to this country at a profit. American cotton has been brought back to America from the Old World. Even then, however, American cotton is fixing the world's price for cotton; and if by any means, by this bill or any other device, the producer is able to control his surplus, we need not have any equalization fee, for the reason that the minute you establish an American price you have established a world's price for cotton.

That is not true of wheat. It is not true of any other farm product that is made in quantities equal to or in excess of American production; and I was thinking that perhaps the bill would be more readily accepted by those producing cotton if the so-called equalization fee, as it is really not necessary, were given some other terminology, or if an explanation were placed in the bill that would indicate that no tax should be imposed other than the interest that would be essential upon the money devoted to removing the surplus from the market, because there could be no loss unless the surplus was bought at a price which, joined to a subsequent crop that was made, would be lower than the money advanced to take care of the surplus; and I do not think any business man would permit such an exigency as that to arise.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator let me make just one statement? If the Senator has studied the bill, as I assume he has, he knows that the equalization fee for cotton applies only in the event that there is a surplus in excess of orderly marketing, for the purpose of steadying the flow to the foreign world, and, therefore, maintaining a higher world price.

Mr. SMITH. Yes.

Mr. McNARY. It is not a tax in any sense any more on cotton than it is on wheat.

Mr. SMITH. No.

Mr. WATSON. It is purely a withholding proposition to feed it in as the market demands.

Mr. SMITH. Yes; but there is this distinction: If we have a certain amount of wheat in this country, and if there is a tariff on wheat—which there is—undoubtedly, through the proper organization of this machinery, you can fix an American price that is equal to the tariff, but you can not fix a world price; and the difference between the exported wheat and the domestic wheat sale, which is the measure of the tariff, would be lost in the export wheat. Therefore, you have an equalization fee to reimburse the Government for whatever loss might be entailed in the price of the export wheat, which, joined to the excess price that the American millers would pay, might and perhaps will show a profit. That is not true of cotton, however, because the export cotton is going to bear identically the same price that the domestic cotton does, for the reason that it has no competitor. It does not have to meet any world price. The American price is the world's price.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, that is true; but is not this a fact that accompanies the Senator's argument: If the American supply is orderly distributed to the world's market, it would have a tendency to stabilize the market?

Mr. SMITH. Oh, to be sure; and that is the distinction I am making.

Mr. WATSON. That is all there is to it as far as cotton is concerned. It is a withholding process so far as cotton is concerned.

Mr. SMITH. Not meeting competition.

Mr. WATSON. Taking the surplus off the market and feeding it in as the market demands.

Mr. SMITH. And the only expense would necessarily arise from the interest and whatever fee it would be essential to contribute for the upkeep of the machinery; but so far as paying an equalization fee is concerned, there is going to be nothing to equalize. You have got to equalize the foreign price for wheat with the domestic price; and, when you have brought them together, whatever difference there is the farmer will pay. He must pay it under the terms of this bill.

Mr. WATSON. Why, certainly.

Mr. SMITH. To illustrate, suppose we had 2,000 bushels of wheat, and that we consumed a thousand and exported a thousand. Under the present system the domestic price is the world price, and the farmer gets no benefit of any tariff. The domestic price is the world price. Suppose we were to put into effect a tariff of 50 cents a bushel, and the domestic man paid $1.50 a bushel for the domestic wheat and the export wheat brought a dollar. The 2,000 bushels of wheat—let us say it was a dollar a bushel—would bring $3,000, whereas sold in the world market it would bring only $2,000. So that the farmer has gotten for the 2,000 bushels $3,000—that is, he sold his domestic wheat for $1.50 a bushel, exported for $1. He has made by that proposition. The equalizing fee that he would have to pay would be $500. So that he would make $500, because he would have to equalize the price, domestic and foreign. Not so with cotton, because the domestic price would be the foreign price.

I do not believe we would export any other thing except wheat and corn, but the difference between the world price and the domestic price is going to be what you have to equalize.

Mr. GOODING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. GOODING. Does not the Senator believe that cotton will occupy a more favorable position in this bill if it becomes a law than the wheat growers' product, because he will stabilize the world's price, and the wheat grower can not do that?

Mr. SMITH. There is much fear about it not appealing to the farmers on the ground that they will have to pay a tax—an equalization fee—at the gin or on the railroad. In the case of wheat, as I explained a moment ago, I do not think many of them see the point that is involved in the protective tariff on wheat. We export about one-third of our wheat crop, or did for a while. I think it is higher than that now. Whatever amount we export the farmer will be guaranteed the domestic price plus the tariff. He is supposed to get that for all his wheat.

Mr. WATSON. But he does not.

Mr. SMITH. To illustrate, suppose we raise 2,000 bushels, and ship a thousand bushels, with the tariff 50 cents a bushel; fixing the price at $1.50 a bushel will not mean the farmer will get $1.50 a bushel for 2,000 bushels; he will get $1.50 per bushel for the thousand bushels used domestically.

The farmer has to pay the difference. He does not get $1.50 for 2,000 bushels; he gets only $1 for 1,000, and he equalizes that price by paying the difference between the domestic price and the export price. That is the theory of this bill.

I used an illustration a moment ago, saying that we exported as much as we consumed domestically. You would have to double the price in this country in order for the farmer to get any material benefit if he sold in the world's competitive market. But that is not true of cotton, because we have a monopoly of that, and the only benefit that would come to us—and when I say "only" I do not mean it in any disparaging sense—would be by the formation of an organization that would take the surplus off the market and hold it for the lean years, and distribute it as the world needed cotton, at a price that would at least reflect a reasonable profit to the producer. But I do not believe that we ought to incorporate in the bill, so far as any commodity that sets the world's price is concerned, what we would term an "equalization fee." There is nothing to equalize. The moment you fix a price on American cotton you fix a price for the world. It has no competitor, none anywhere, and what is grinding not only the cotton grower but the wheat grower is the fact that he has no say so in his market. I make the statement that the price is not fixed in this country at all; it is fixed abroad. There is the monstrous proposition of this proud American people producing a world necessity, cotton, which has no substitute, and yet Liverpool fixes the price every morning of the American production.

The same is true of wheat. The foreign market fixes the price, and I am going to support this bill on the general principle that the American farmer can not be any worse off; he has to look up to see the bottom now, and though it may be a mistake, it may not work out right, I am going to join forces with those who I believe are sincere, and attempt to legislate some plan by which the American farmer may be able to get into the picture with some degree of prosperity, and revive some hope to the rapidly despairing element that feeds and clothes us.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I welcome the Senator into the ranks of the supporters of the bill. I am very glad he made that remark. I welcome his support this year.

I want to present, in one word, the situation as I believe it affects cotton, and if the Senator will agree with me, perhaps there will be no difference whatsoever with respect to that commodity.

We must agree that the 60 per cent of cotton we use moves into foreign markets and therefore receives a world price. If there is any machinery by which that cotton can be marketed in an orderly way through the season, which would effect at least an increase in the world price, it would be reflected in the domestic price. Consequently the purpose of the equalization fee, as applied to cotton, is to collect a fee—we will say one-fifth of a cent a pound, which would be $1 a bale, and in a production of 18,000,000 would be $18,000,000—which would be used to withhold for the purpose of orderly marketing the surplus that was depressing the world's market. That is the theory, an indisputable theory, in my opinion, entirely workable and feasible, one that would react in a higher price for cotton if we employ the method which the Senator himself has said ought to be understood.

Mr. SMITH. The Senator has stated the case clearly. It is not an equalization fee, but a sum collected, or a reserve fund gathered, for the purpose of preventing the dumping of the surplus on the market to the detriment of the other portion of the crop.

I will have something more to say about the bill, unless it should pass as the flood control bill did; but I want to say that the hearings we are having now, in the probe into the slump in the price of cotton, are bringing out facts sufficient to astound any man, information not only as to the marketing of that product but typical of the marketing of all staple farm products.

The orgy of speculation, the violent fluctuations of wheat and cotton, indicate how the producer is absolutely at the mercy of the speculative element. It is clearly evident that if the agricultural interests of this country are to be put on a footing with the manufacturing industries of the country, somewhere, somehow, by some kind of organization, the farmer must be able to hold his products and market them when they reflect a reasonable profit to him.

So long as the buyer of cotton and wheat and other farm products has the privilege of fixing the price, all our work is in vain. Until and unless the producers of the different agricultural products of this country are enabled, through their own initiative or by the aid of the Government, to so organize themselves that they can calculate the cost of machinery, the taxes, the overhead, all incidental expenses that go into the producing of the article, and then realize the reimbursement on the sale—until that is accomplished agriculture will never be other than what it is to-day. It is idle to talk about it.

If this bill shall be a step in the direction of enabling the farmers, through proper organization, to have a measure of control over the production and the prices of their products, within reasonable limits, we will have accomplished that for which agriculture has been waiting all these years, and I believe there was never a more propitious time for such a step than now, with the facilities for transportation and the facilities for communication and getting knowledge to them that we have now.

The farmers of this country in every market center should have provision for radio broadcasting, by which every day intimately and particularly the conditions of the market and the demands may be broadcasted to them. I believe that is one facility we ought to insist should be available for the agricultural interests of this country, under their own control, and I hope this bill will be a step in the direction, not of the Government permanently marketing and controlling farm products, but granting to the farmers the facilities by which they can organize themselves, as the protective tariff did for manufacturing, not in the same direction and not, perhaps, by the invocation of the same principle, but at least extending the powerful credit of all the people to enable those who feed and clothe us to be protected.

Mr. BARKLEY. Is it not contemplated by the bill that before the board acts in any case the initiative must be taken by those who speak for the growers of whatever crop is involved? The board could not of its own initiative simply levy the equalization fee in order to accumulate the funds to take care of some imaginary surplus that might exist in the future. The emergency must arise, as I understand it under the terms of the bill, to such an extent that those who speak for the farmers will apply to the board for a declaration of the operating period.

Mr. BORAH. The board might act upon its own motion.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, the Senator from Idaho is right. The old bill provided that before the board could act it must consult a large number of cooperatives and farm organizations. There was a provision written in the old bill that if in any section of the country a particular commodity was raised where 50 per cent was not represented by cooperatives, there should be a county assembly. That suggestion was made by the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; by a separate amendment.

Mr. McNARY. It was one of the items that offended the Attorney General. In the bill now before us we are proceeding upon the assumption that the board is not going to abuse its power. No bill was ever written into law that attempted to say what the board must do on all particular occasions, nor could we write such a stupid measure. In this case the board, having general power to act as in all matters of wise legislation, can proceed on their own motion, but the language is that they shall confer with cooperative organizations and farm groups and the advisory council before a marketing agreement is entered into.

The practicability of the plan is simple. The board, having these general powers, no broader than contained in hundreds of bills that have proven satisfactory from a legislative and administrative standpoint, and being composed of rational and reasonable men, would consult the advisory council and farm groups and organizations raising the particular commodity in relation to which agreements are about to be entered into, and if in their judgment it is the part of wisdom that the marketing agreement should be entered into which would finally invoke the equalization fee, that would be done, and only in a case of that kind.

Mr. GOODING. Mr. President, I am sure it would be helpful if the author of the bill would proceed in explanation of its provisions. I am sure he is going to answer all these questions and give the Senate a complete understanding of the terms of the bill. Then we can proceed to debate it.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, I would like to have an opportunity to ask the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], who opened the discussion, some questions before he leaves, as I understand he is compelled to do.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, before we leave the immediate subject matter under consideration—that is, under what conditions the board will begin operations in a given commodity—I desire to say that I understand that under the pending bill, as under former bills, the board must find "that there is or may be during the ensuing year a domestic, national, seasonal, or year's total surplus in excess of the requirements for the orderly marketing" of the commodity to be dealt in; so that in no event may the board operate in a commodity until it finds that there is either a surplus in excess of domestic requirements or one in immediate prospect.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, the Senator from Arkansas is quite right, but there are still two other findings to make. That, however, is not the point that was raised, I may say to the distinguished Senator from Arkansas. It was what forces must operate before the board will start a marketing agreement or period. In the old bill, may I repeat, it was started upon the advice of the advisory council and of a substantial number of cooperative associations in farm organizations. It was held by the Attorney General in his opinion to the President of the United States that that was a delegation of legislative power. Consequently, in this bill we have overcome that constitutional objection by providing that the board may on its own motion start a marketing agreement after it makes these three findings of fact.

There is also a suggestion in the bill that the board should consult the advisory council and also cooperative associations and farm organizations.

It is true that the board may initiate operations on its own motion, but it must find three facts, as suggested by the distinguished Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]. What are they? Namely, one, that there is a surplus above orderly marketing or above the requirements of domestic consumption. Two, can the board through local and cooperative associations handle this proposition or are the associations unable to assume that responsibility? Three, is the particular commodity adapted to a marketing agreement by reason of its physical characteristics or the manner of processing? When the board shall make the three findings which I have just mentioned it may enter into marketing agreements with cooperative associations.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. And it must make those findings public?

Mr. McNARY. Absolutely, as a condition precedent to operation.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I cited that provision of the bill to show that, after all, arbitrary power is not vested in the board by this bill, but that the board must proceed in an orderly manner to determine the necessity for operation before there is any basis for its dealing in a commodity.

Mr. BORAH. But what I have in mind, Mr. President, is what is clearly stated in the bill. The jurisdiction of the board did not obtain under the old bill until certain parties had manifested their desire that it should act. Under the pending measure the jurisdiction of the board would obtain whenever the board wished to act.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. No; but only when the board finds the existence of facts defined in the proposed law to justify action.

Mr. BORAH. That is what the board proceeds to do after jurisdiction is obtained, but, in the first instance—that is to say, with reference to acquiring jurisdiction, the board may take jurisdiction whenever it gets ready to do so.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. It may enter upon an investigation, but unless it finds the facts referred to by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY] to exist it has no authorization under the proposed statute to proceed.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator from Arkansas will look at line 20, on page 10 of the bill, he will see that the board has publicly to declare its findings; it not only has to declare its findings but it has to publish them.

Mr. BORAH. It has publicly to declare them, but the fact that those findings shall be publicly declared does not place any restraint upon their action. Those interested may read the findings, but the board is not restrained in any way by that fact, and nobody can take an appeal from the board.

Mr. McNARY. Of course, after the board finds these facts to exist, I repeat it may upon its own motion start an operation; there is no doubt about that. I do not proceed upon the theory, however, that the board is going to abuse that power. The board is given these powers for the purpose of helping agriculture, and any man who stands on this floor and assumes the bill to be bad because the administrator might abuse his power will never be found voting for the bill.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Will the Senator from Oregon yield to me?

Mr. McNARY. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Unless that power shall be given to the board the probability is that there will be no effective operation under the provisions of the bill.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I did not assume that the bill was bad because of that fact; I merely undertook to state the provisions of the bill.

Mr. HARRIS. I am quite willing to vote for anything that the western Senators think will help the producers of wheat.

Mr. SIMMONS. So am I.

Mr. HARRIS. I can understand how the bill might help them a great deal because of the protection given wheat, while the cotton producers would not be benefited in the same way. I should like, however, to ask the Senator from Oregon a question. The Senator from North Carolina has referred to an 18,000,000-bale cotton crop which we may have any year——

Mr. SIMMONS. Which we had last year.

Mr. HARRIS. And he has referred to the small amount that would be collected from an equalization fee, and he stresses that point. Suppose we should have an 18,000,000-bale cotton crop this year. I should like to know from the Senator from Oregon exactly how the equalization fee on cotton would be collected and how much it would be.

Then I should like to ask the Senator another question. Suppose there should be a slump, as there was last year, which would involve a loss of a hundred million or two hundred million dollars in the price of cotton, and there was only an equalization fee of a dollar a bale, amounting in all to $18,000,000, how would the farmer be protected from great loss? Suppose, furthermore, that the following year there should also be a loss. I am not asking the questions in the way of criticism; I am asking for information. I am anxious to do anything to help the farmers, but taxing him does not help.

Mr. McNARY. I gave in a very brief way my impression of that general subject a few moments ago in discussing the question of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS].

Mr. HARRIS. I did not happen to be in the chamber at the time.

Mr. McNARY. If the Senator will bear with me and let me fashion my own remarks in my own way I will come to that some time during the debate; but this afternoon I promised myself, at least, that I would discuss, rather informally, the bill as distinguished from its predecessors. I should like first to do that before going into other phases of the bill having to do with its administrative application.

Mr. HARRIS. I will be glad to have the Senator answer the question in his own time.

Mr. McNARY. I appreciate the courtesy of the Senator.

Mr. President, I propose briefly to discuss the pending measure. I am not unmindful of the observation that is sometimes made that a Senator who speaks on his own bill is, perhaps, filibustering against its passage. I think that is true in a general way, and I would not speak upon this bill if it were not for the fact that it contains some provisions that are new and which were not found in the bills of similar nature which we have considered heretofore.

I do not know of anything I could say that would throw any particular light upon the old bills and the controversies that have waged about them during the years 1926 and 1927. During those two sessions of the Senate I spoke quite at length upon the bills which had the same general purpose, though perhaps omitting some refinements and changes that are in the pending measure.

The committee has prepared at great length a report, which in my opinion sets forth all of the changes in a very clear way; and I recommend to the Members of this body the reading of that report.

I shall not discuss the general question of agricultural depression. That subject has been discussed every year we have had this bill up for consideration. It is a condition which now obtains, and is universally acknowledged.

The President, in various messages and speeches, has declared that there is a farm problem. I only desire to cite two witnesses in this regard who I think will offer indisputable evidence that there is a farm problem.

I refer to the United States Chamber of Commerce and the National Industrial Conference Board. After collaboration and a study of this problem for a great many months, in December of last year, in a report by Mr. Charles Nagel, the chairman, they said:

> The evidence is clear that American agriculture has undergone a prolonged and trying readjustment to postwar conditions, in the course of which those engaged in it have suffered seriously in their relative economic prosperity in comparison with those engaged in other fields. On the human side, it has been deprived of the energy, experience, and knowledge of many thousands of farmers who have lost their resources and have been persuaded or compelled to leave the farm for other occupations, while the land resources of the Nation have been impaired by neglect and wasteful exploitation under the pressure to which those who remained on the farm have been subjected.

I cite these two great organizations as showing that there is a farm problem; and for that reason I do not desire further to discuss the subject.

I think, Mr. President, all agree that the one great problem is the problem of the surplus, and how to deal with it.

Whenever there is a surplus, it is an economic adage that that surplus fixes the price for the whole commodity; and, inasmuch as it is necessary for the producers of the country to sell this surplus in foreign markets, it naturally follows that the price obtained by the American producer is the world price; and so long as we are working and living under a protective tariff, it is not fair to the farmers of the country to be compelled to sell their whole product on the foreign-price level, and buy that which they need and must have in a protected market. That is one of the cardinal principles and one of the foundation stones upon which this measure is built, as were all of its predecessors.

It is true this bill differs from some of the bills which have been here before. There are far-reaching changes, but they are all addressed to the same problem and are built upon the same general principles. I think it might be well for me at this time to discuss one of the radical changes that have been made, and yet it is not so radical in substance as it appears to be from a general, cursory reading of the bill.

In this bill there are two separable remedies. We have first adopted the remedy of loaning money to cooperative organizations for the purpose of promoting the orderly marketing of farm products, or to loan them money for the purpose of acquiring the surplus products and selling them or making such disposition of them as in their judgment seems best. This provision was in the last bill, but not precisely in the same form. Such a scheme, complete in itself, has been advocated by the Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Jardine. We have been told by him that that remedy would be effective, and during a cycle of a great many years—I think he used a period of five—the losses would perhaps be quite absorbed by the gains.

I have never been so hopeful an advocate of this plan proposed by the Secretary of Agriculture. I have thought we needed a more heroic scheme. I have believed, however, that the loaning of money to cooperative organizations might, when the surplus was small, or as it affects some commodities, be efficacious. I still entertain that belief; but I am not one of those who advocate the theory that the whole job can be done by the loaning of money.

I know it will be said that the farmers have received too much money; in other words, that the money they have borrowed has been too easily obtainable. That situation and statement does not apply to the plan set forth in this measure. Here we propose to loan up to $250,000,000 from a revolving fund to cooperative organizations that are willing to borrow the money to withhold a surplus until there is a time of famine or scarcity, and then market it.

What would be the advantage in that procedure to the association? It would be simply that the members would not pay the equalization fee, and they probably would sell the product at a profit which would inure to the benefit of the members of the cooperative organization.

I want to say to some of my friends who are very much interested in this proposition, and perhaps a little skeptical, that I do not believe that remedy could apply effectively to the surplus of wheat in the ordinary year; but if there is a small surplus of other products which might occur to your own imagination at this time, I can see how a temporary or seasonal surplus, or even a year's surplus, might be handled through the borrowing of money at 4 per cent to withhold the producers' products until there was a season when it could be sold at an advantageous price. The same provision was in the bill last year, practically in the same form that it is in this bill, with the exception that while authority was given to the board last year to make loans to cooperative associations of the same amount of money in quantity at the identical rate of interest, this year there must be a finding by the board that they are unable to handle the surplus because the cooperatives will not undertake it by borrowing the money, or are unable to do it. We simply make that one of the necessary findings for the purpose of indicating to those who have attempted to say the problem could be solved by the loaning of money that an honest effort was made to handle it in that fashion. Then, if the board finds that the cooperatives are not interested in borrowing the money for that purpose, or that they are unable to loan the money they have borrowed, the board, with the other two findings, can start a marketing operation.

That is the difference between last year's provision regarding loans and this year's provision regarding loans.

There has been some misunderstanding about that provision. I did not know it until to-day, but some of the Members of the Senate told me they had telegrams and letters criticising this particular change. It is a change, but it is a change for the better. It is an honest effort made by the board through the loaning of money to handle the surplus problem; and, let me repeat, I am not deceiving myself when I say that I do not think the whole of the problem can be solved in that fashion. There are certain surpluses that will be too large for that purpose, but there are surpluses of certain commodities in certain years and in certain seasons and sections that, in my judgment, can be handled in that manner. I challenge anyone who has studied this bill and the plan to demonstrate that it is not a practical, businesslike proposition.

Mr. President, one of the criticisms of President Coolidge last year, when this bill was sent to him, was that Congress was playing favorites with certain agricultural commodities. Because we enumerated in the vetoed bill five basic commodities—namely, wheat, corn, cotton, hogs, and tobacco—it was said that we were not in sympathy with the producer who raised other agricultural commodities, and therefore that the bill was not fair to agriculture generally. That was also the comment of the Attorney General in his criticism of the bill to President Coolidge. This year we have tried to be sympathetic to all and generous to every producer of agricultural commodities; and in the declaration of policy found in section 1, and throughout the bill, reference is made to all agricultural commodities. Nothing can be broader than that, and I hope it will satisfy the President.

On that subject I may say that in the last few days criticisms have reached my office that perhaps that is too broad. It was said that we were not broad enough before. We may be too general now. My very esteemed and able friend, the senior Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND], has brought to me complaints from the apple growers. I have received from other Senators, from the growers of apples and fresh fruits and vegetables protests running from the State of Washington to New York and into Virginia.

I can see how easy it would be to misunderstand that this bill carried nothing but an equalization fee, because practically all the discussion of this bill has been on the equalization fee; and the group of producers who believe that whenever the board attempted to operate under this bill it would operate for the purpose of levying a fee upon some commodity. I can see, as my friend the able Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] said, that the equalization fee is the heart of the covenant, or, I might say, article 10 of the league. It has its useful purpose, but the bill is not dependent upon the equalization fee. It is made better, in my opinion, by its inclusion. Consequently, when the apple grower from the State of Washington, or the pear grower, or the potato grower from the State of Idaho, or the sugar-beet producer from Utah heard about this bill and the equalization fee, he thought that it applied to fruits and vegetables. In my opinion, it does not apply at all. There is one finding, No. 3, which is necessary before the board can enter into marketing agreements: The board must find that the product is adaptable to the purposes of the bill, which would mean the equalization fee in part; that physically it is suitable for purposes of that kind in the way of its preparation, its durability, its processes. Those are facts which the board must find before they are authorized to enter into one of these market agreements.

Anyone who knows the instability and want of durability of fresh fruits and vegetables knows that they do not come within the definition of the finding of the board.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McNARY. I gladly yield.

Mr. COPELAND. Suppose the vegetables or fruits were put into cans; what would then be the attitude?

Mr. McNARY. I can not speak for the board, of course. That brings about a very different situation. They would then be susceptible to the terms of the bill, and come within the folds of its language, I would say. If a product is canned, its preservability becomes apparent. If there is a surplus of canned goods, and in the judgment of the canner or the producer of canned products he desires the opportunity to take off the surplus and enter into a contract whereby the surplus of canned goods would be withheld until a season where it could be sold at a more advantageous price, it is my judgment that the board could operate on canned goods.

I am in this difficulty, as the Senator must be; this is new legislation, and I do not know what the board would do. I know what I would do if I were a member, and I am giving the Senator the distinction I would make between canned goods and preserves by reason of the processes and fresh vegetables and fruits.

Mr. COPELAND. I have had in mind to offer an amendment at this point to exclude fruits and vegetables, because it stands to reason that they are perishable; but when they are put into cans they become really manufactured products, and I do not believe it would weaken the bill at all if there were an amendment which would exclude fruits and vegetables when they are processed.

Mr. McNARY. I would not commit myself as to what my attitude would be with respect to the amendment. The Senator has an undoubted right to offer an amendment. I would in no sense feel offended. I do not think the measure applies. I am quite certain it does not apply to a product such as he mentions. The board certainly would not operate without first being encouraged to do so by the producers of this commodity. It was made general, I may repeat, only because the President criticized the bill before for not being sufficiently broad, and it would not hurt the bill in any way if those commodities were taken without its operation.

Mr. COPELAND. Of course, the Senator knows my sympathy for the bill, and I would not seek to present any amendment that would weaken it, but I can see how we might even include rope, or something made from hemp or cotton, some manufactured article which came originally from an agricultural product. So I do think we might have an amendment to the bill which would exclude fruits and vegetables, because, in the first place, they are perishable, and then, if they are put into permanent form, they become manufactured products. So I think that change might be made without weakening the general principle which the Senator has in mind.

Mr. McNARY. I thank the Senator. That section of the bill which refers to the Federal farm board has been changed particularly from the bill that was vetoed last year. In that measure, the Members of the Senate will recall, the members of the board were to be appointed from those who had been recommended to the President by the so-called nominating committee. The Attorney General, in his opinion given to President Coolidge, held that that deprived the President of an undoubted constitutional right—namely, that he had the right freely to exercise his choice in appointing the members of the board, subject to the advice and consent of the Senate.

In order to conform to the general practice which obtains in the fashioning of legislation, this bill provides that the President, unrestricted, without any hamper at all, shall be permitted to appoint the board.

The vetoed bill provided that nominations should be made by farm organizations to the President, whose power to appoint was limited to the list of such nominee. In the present bill there is no limitation or restriction upon the President's power to appoint the board members. He would be entirely responsible for the men named.

This change in the method of appointing the board overcomes one of the objections which the President stressed in his veto, and upon which the Attorney General's opinion as to the unconstitutionality of the former bill quite largely rested. For example, the Attorney General wrote:

> One provision of the act which is plainly in violation of the Constitution is that which limits the President in his appointments of members of the board to select in each district one man from a list of three submitted by a nominating committee.

The President in his veto message said:

> That appears to be an unconstitutional limitation on the authority of the President.

The President in his message also referred to what he called a fact, or perhaps a tendency, that if through the operation of the measure agricultural prices were advanced or price levels were increased, there would be excessive planting or breeding. Some of us, in discussing a similar bill at a former session, disagreed with that theory, but inasmuch as it is a very hard problem to solve, there is a provision in the bill on that very subject to which I shall refer. This bill carries a provision authorizing the suspension of operations with any commodity whenever an abnormal increase in planting or breeding contrary to the board's advice as to a sound program resulted from the marketing agreements.

I do not know how effective that provision would be. No one, perhaps, unless he has the power of prophecy, would hazard even a guess. I have never been a devotee of the theory that because you increase the price of cotton or wheat or standardize the price and prevent violent fluctuations, which do more, perhaps, than low prices to ruin the farmer, there would be excessive planting, but if the board should exercise a helpful and guiding influence upon the producers of the various commodities, and an excessive planting of crops or breeding of livestock should result in an abnormal increase in production, which was against their program, they have authority under this bill not to operate upon that particular commodity to relieve them from their distress—that is, a penalty, plus the other penalty, which I have always thought was a wholesome one, namely, the application of the equalization fee, which increases as the crop surplus increases and decreases as the surplus decreases. So if by the application of the equalization fee there would be a surplus so large as to absorb the benefits, that in itself would be a deterrent to further overproduction that was not thought to be sufficiently powerful to influence the farmers in their planting program. Hence this other provision has been inserted in the bill; that is, in case of excessive planting or breeding, the board can refuse to operate on the given commodity.

I might digress to observe that in all matters of this kind we can not be perfect in our language. There may be provisions in the measure that would prove to be, from the result of experience, not feasible, but it occurs to me, as one who has had a little practical experience in that field, that with a deterrent of this kind, based not upon an arbitrary rule, but one which would be persuasive from the standpoint of study and experience to the agriculturalist, the board itself could render a great service in that field.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, the Senator may reach the point in his address, but for fear he does not I want to ask him how this new bill meets the objections of the President in his veto message as to the constitutionality of the equalization fee?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I am so fond of the Senator that I would like to refer to that subject now, but I am sure he will pardon me if I defer discussion until a later moment or a later day.

Mr. OVERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. McNARY. Permit me to suggest to the Senator that he read the splendid argument in the committee's report, not made by the chairman or any member of the committee but by the advisory council which so ably represents the United States Senate. I think if he has any misgivings about the constitutionality of the equalization fee, in view of the refinements in the declaration of policy—and it is based entirely upon the power of Congress to operate whenever interstate or foreign commerce is affected—he will be very willing, indeed, to resolve all doubts in favor of the constitutionality of the bill.

There is one thing we must keep in mind on that—and I shall digress for only a moment; I had not intended to at all—there is no more orderly way, in my opinion, to regulate the flow of commerce than by such an organization as is set up in this export surplus bill. There is nothing, in my opinion, that will help more to stabilize commerce than the orderly marketing of agricultural products, and if there is some function, some machinery, created by Congress, based upon the commerce clause of our Constitution, that will prevent the glutting of markets and the overpacking and stocking of market agencies and the transportation system, so that commerce will flow in a smooth, even stream throughout the year—I repeat, there is nothing, in my opinion, that will more clearly and positively carry out the declarations intended by the fathers in the constitutional provision involved in the commerce clause of the Constitution.

Two years ago Senator Cummins, one of the ablest lawyers who perhaps ever occupied a seat in this body, made a speech on the constitutionality of a bill similar to this, based upon the commerce clause of the Constitution. That bill did not as clearly indicate the foundation upon which it rested as this bill does at this time. That is one of the improvements, in my opinion, clearly brought about by this bill, that it is based entirely on the commerce clause of the Constitution and not at all upon any clause appertaining to taxation or revenue.

Proceeding, I promise to conclude in a few minutes. This bill eliminates the State convention scheme which was criticized by the President last year in the veto message. It may be recalled that there was a provision inserted in the bill to the effect that when less than 50 per cent of the producers of an agricultural commodity did not belong to a cooperative association they would call a State convention to determine whether the board should be advised to invoke the equalization fee.

The Attorney General, in his communication to the President of the United States, criticized that as a delegation of power from Congress to outside agencies. The bill now before us eliminates the State conventions altogether and then permits the board to operate on its own motion, intimating, however, that they should receive advice from the advisory council, cooperative organizations, and associations of producers.

Also the President criticized the provision in the bill which permitted the issuance of receipts to those who deliver their cotton to agencies prescribed by the board. The President said, and it is true, that cotton is the only commodity where receipts were given, and those receipts meant simply that if the equalization fee was in excess of the benefits, the money should be returned to the farmer who made the deposit of his cotton. The President argued, perhaps correctly, that no other agricultural commodity was given the same advantage as cotton. It was a small advantage, in my opinion, a mere bagatelle, difficult to identify. But the pending bill in all cases provides that if there is an excess estimate of equalization fee over the cost and charges, it shall go back to the stabilization fund.

Mr. President, there is an entirely new provision in the bill which I shall mention at this time, and that is the clearing house and terminal markets association. This provision was not found in the bill last year nor its predecessor which came before the Senate in 1926. This provision has the sanction of those who are engaged in the handling of vegetables and fruits. It is thought that they should have agencies of this type to help them under certain conditions. I am not speaking now of any transaction that might be operated through the equalization fee. I am speaking about the agencies which borrow money from the equalization fund.

Section 6 of S. 3555 authorizes the board to "assist in the establishment of and provide for the registration of clearing-house associations adapted to prevent gluts or famines in any market for, and to reduce waste incident to the marketing of," any agricultural commodity. It further provides for assistance in establishing "terminal market associations adapted to maintain public markets in distribution centers for the more orderly distribution and marketing" of any agricultural commodity. Only cooperative associations are eligible for membership in such clearing house or terminal marketing associations.

This section is intended to provide a way in which the board can assist producers of perishable commodities like fruit and vegetables, whose nature does not readily adapt them to operations under marketing agreements as provided in section 7. It is felt that such clearing houses can substantially improve conditions under which perishable crops are marketed, by coordinating the activities of shippers for the purpose of preventing gluts in one market while there is an undersupply elsewhere—a condition that frequently develops now.

It was not the intention of the framers of the bill to suggest that fruit and vegetables, on account of their physical nature, should come within the terms of the equalization fee. It is the desire only that those agencies shall be helpful in the orderly marketing of their fruits and vegetables to prevent gluts and famines, which always bring about a violent fluctuation in prices.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. McNARY. Yes.

Mr. FLETCHER. What tax or burden is imposed on the fruit and vegetable growers? The general provisions of the bill do not refer to perishables, but here is a provision with reference to marketing, and they have the idea that there is some tax or burden attached to them and that they get no corresponding benefits.

Mr. McNARY. May I repeat to my friend from Florida what I just said? It was not the purpose of the committee, it is not the belief of the committee, and it is not the belief of the chairman of the committee that any of the vegetables or fruits would come under the provision which provides for the levying of any equalization fee. I think that is very clear to the Senator. There is a provision that money can be loaned to cooperative associations, but those cooperative associations have no marketing agencies and clearing houses in the large cities, and it is thought that when they were loaned money to handle their product if they could establish those agencies in the cities under the beneficial influence of the bill and obtain the money which it is provided shall be loaned it would help gluts in certain markets and famines in others.

Of course, there is nothing in the bill that compels or makes mandatory that the clearing houses and marketing agencies should be established, but the authority is given to establish them. They may not do it. The cooperatives may not want those instrumentalities, but if it is found to be practicable—and I am assuming the board which operates the terms of the bill is going to be an intelligent board and in sympathy with the farmer—then they can do it.

Recommendations for such a provision as this have been made from time to time in recent years. The agricultural conference on agricultural legislation, appointed by President Coolidge in 1924, submitted to him a report which was embodied in his special message transmitted to the Sixty-eighth Congress on January 26, 1925. The report of this conference as set forth in the President's message contained the following recommendation:

> The great perishable industry of the country representing the producers of vegetables, fruits, and grapes is at the present time faced with many great problems. For the most part this industry represents an unorganized group of producers searching for opportunity to solve their problems of distribution through contact with their terminal markets. For such purpose, in addition to those mentioned above, the following is recommended:
> Cooperative marketing organizations under application to Federal authority may have the right to create clearing houses for the purpose of eliminating the oversupply or undersupply in various consuming markets without interference with the restraint of trade laws. Such clearing houses have the right to freely interchange information upon the volume of the available supplies of their commodity.

A similar provision appears in a bill prepared for the Secretary of Agriculture in the Department of Agriculture, and somewhat widely circulated last summer. I presume this was the so-called Jardine plan. That provision read:

> The board shall, upon request from producers and/or distributors, assist cooperative marketing associations and/or independent dealers in forming commodity clearing-house associations for the purpose of minimizing losses in the distribution of perishable agricultural commodities which can not be economically processed or stored in their unprocessed form for any substantial length of time. Such clearing-house associations shall be operated under rules and regulations approved by the board and shall direct the movement of the commodity to market. They shall utilize the Market News Service and other facilities of the United States Department of Agriculture as far as possible.

Section 6 in the pending Senate bill differs from the suggested section in the so-called Jardine bill in that the Senate bill applies only to cooperative associations. It is recognized that the clearing-house section will be applicable particularly to fruits, vegetables, and other perishable commodities. The term "perishable" was omitted at the suggestion of representatives of the fruit and vegetable associations who were apprehensive that if the application of the section were specifically limited by the use of the term "perishable," some confusion might arise as to what such a clearing-house or terminal-market association might be able to do with fruit and vegetable by-products that were dried or canned or otherwise processed for safe storage and handling.

In the last agricultural appropriation bill, which passed the Senate a few days ago, nearly $700,000 is carried for the purpose of the marketing news service. These agencies could be helped by the employment of that provision of the bill and these instrumentalities to assist the farmers in finding a market for their fruit and vegetables whenever there was a glut or famine, or whenever there was a seasonal or sectional difficulty in the marketing of the commodities. It was thought by the committee that this provision would be very helpful to the farmers and producers of these particular commodities.

Starts have been made in the direction of clearing houses in many parts of the country, and this section merely directs the board to assist cooperative associations in their further development. The assistance which might be given under this section is not financial, but advisory and educational in nature. Financial assistance through loans would be available to such associations under the terms and conditions set forth in section 5.

There is another provision, section 5, which was in the bill last year, to which I wish to refer briefly. I only refer to it because, while there is no substantial change in the provisions, yet it is somewhat refined to meet the conditions which I think are more clearly set forth.

Section 5, in subdivision (c) of paragraph (2), would authorize the board to make loans to a cooperative association for the purpose of furnishing the association with "funds to be used by it as capital for any agricultural credit corporation eligible for receiving discounts under section 202 of the Federal farm loan act, as amended."

The section 202 referred to authorizes intermediate credit banks to discount for or purchase from any agricultural credit corporation notes given to secure loans made in the first instance for "any agricultural purpose, or for the raising, breeding, fattening, or marketing of livestock." Under regulations prescribed by the Federal Farm Loan Board, an agricultural credit corporation is required to have unimpaired paid-in capital and surplus equal to at least $10,000.

Such an agricultural credit corporation would be a valuable adjunct to a cooperative association. It would make production and marketing credit from the intermediate credit banks available to agricultural producers for periods of time adapted to their needs, and at a minimum rate of interest.

In order to establish such an agricultural credit corporation, and get it going, a cooperative association, under the terms of this provision in section 5, would be able, if it could supply collateral that would be acceptable to the board, to borrow the $10,000 necessary to serve as capital for the agricultural credit corporation.

The insurance feature is practically the same as the insurance provisions contained in the bill which passed the Congress last year. There have been some amplifications of the provision. In a word, it simply provides, and I think it is particularly applicable to cotton, that any commodities traded in upon an exchange in sufficient volume to establish a basic price could be insured against price decline during the period in which sales take place will not be less than the period when the deliveries were made. This provision was in the bill last year and was brought to the committee by those interested in the production of cotton. I do not claim to have any personal knowledge of insurance matters, but those with whom I have discussed the matter have thought it a very practical provision and one which would work a considerable benefit to the producers of cotton. It might be possible that it would not work, but that again is for the board to determine. The provision is in the bill, which we believe is wisely to be administered by the board, and is similar to a provision in the bill last year.

I have hastened over the provisions as well as I could in an effort to be brief and yet as clear as I could possibly make myself. I think this generally sets forth the differences between the bill as vetoed and the bill as now before the Senate for consideration.

Of course, the objection which the President urged and which was so stoutly supported by the Attorney General, the equalization fee, is still in the bill.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President——

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Iowa permit me to conclude? Then I shall be glad to yield.

The equalization fee is held in reserve pending the application of another remedy, but it is still there. However, the situation, as I view it, under the pending bill is different from that under the bill of last year. If the court should determine that the equalization fee collides with the Constitution of the United States the board could function under the insurance contract, the loan, the marketing agency, and clearing-house provisions; it could exert its influence so far as breeding and seeding programs are concerned; it could collect and disseminate knowledge which the board is given power to do. So, Mr. President, while the court would be determining the constitutionality of the equalization fee the board could be functioning, in my opinion, greatly to the advantage of agriculture.

If wise men, such as the Secretary of Agriculture, say that the loan plan is sufficient to bring agriculture back to its parity with other industries, it can be found in the bill. If we require a remedy more calculated to meet the situation and more heroic in character we can fall back upon the equalization fee. Therefore I say to those who voted against a measure similar at the last session, because they doubted the constitutionality of the equalization fee that they can find comfort and hope in the fact that the board may do much for the farmers while the court is determining the constitutionality of the equalization fee.

I have never been able absolutely to satisfy myself as to the constitutionality of the equalization fee, but I have always felt that it was constitutional. I believe this bill comes nearer to satisfying the requirements of our fundamental law than the one which was vetoed in the last Congress. I think it will be clear, Mr. President, to any one who will study the measure that being based entirely upon the commerce clause of the Constitution and designed to assist the orderly marketing of agricultural products, that no court will find it competent to declare the measure unconstitutional.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I thought the Senator from Oregon had concluded.

Mr. McNARY. I shall conclude in just a moment. I am sure that Senators are all anxious for me to quit and I shall do so in just a moment.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. No, indeed. I have been very much instructed by the Senator's address, but I thought he had finished his remarks for the time being.

Mr. McNARY. I have about concluded. At another time, Mr. President, perhaps I shall again speak upon the bill; but I hope that, inasmuch as a similar measure was discussed at two former sessions of the Senate and was passed by a good majority at the last session, we may, after brief consideration, come to a final vote. I do not believe anything that I have said to-day—others may be more fortunate—will in any way influence Senators in casting their votes, but in closing I urge those who may not have read the report to do so, and I ask those who may have felt that the proposed act is unconstitutional to remember that there are two remedies provided. If one shall fail the other will be equal and whole unto itself. If the first remedy, the loan provision, will do the work, well and good. If it shall not, we can fall back on the larger remedy, and if that be found unconstitutional and the loan features will not satisfy the demand of agriculture to be placed on an equality with other industry, then in the fullness of time and the wisdom of Congress we shall seek another remedy. In the meantime, however, I ask Senators to give this measure their cordial consideration.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I send forward to the desk two amendments which I intend to propose to the pending bill, and I ask the attention of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY] for just one moment. I thank him for his very clear exposition of the bill. Of course, I am concerned, as the Senator knows, about the attitude of the fruit and vegetable growers. So I am suggesting an amendment to the bill on page 10, line 19, after the words "as authorized by this section," to insert the words 'Provided, It is not a fruit or vegetable in its natural state or processed."

Then I offer another amendment, to insert the word "nonperishable" before the word "agricultural" wherever it appears in the bill.

I ask that the amendments may be printed and lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendments will be printed and lie on the table.

FUNERAL EXPENSES OF THE LATE SENATOR FERRIS

Mr. FESS. From the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate I report favorably without amendment Senate Resolution 185, and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The resolution (S. Res. 185) submitted by Mr. COUZENS March 30, 1928, was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate hereby is authorized and directed to pay from the contingent fund of the Senate the actual and necessary expenses incurred by the committee appointed by the Vice President in arranging for and attending the funeral of the Hon. Woodbridge N. Ferris, late a Senator from the State of Michigan, upon vouchers properly approved.

GRAND ARMY OF THE REPUBLIC MEMORIAL DAY SERVICES

Mr. NORBECK. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 3791) to aid the Grand Army of the Republic in its Memorial Day services, May 30, 1928. I make this request because I have been urged to do so by the clerk to the Committee on Pensions, who called me on the telephone and stated that the chairman of the committee, the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON] would be out of the city for several days. The bill provides an appropriation of $2,000 to aid the Grand Army of the Republic in its Memorial Day exercises, the explanation for the legislation being that only a few hundred members of that organization remain in the District of Columbia and the immediate vicinity, and there are 38,000 graves to be looked after. Their funds became exhausted last year, and they are making this request.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from South Dakota?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $2,000 be, and the same hereby is, appropriated to aid the Grand Army of the Republic (Inc.) in its Memorial Day services, May 30, 1928, and in the decoration of the graves of the Union soldiers, sailors, and marines with flags and flowers in the national cemeteries in the District of Columbia and in the Arlington National Cemetery in Virginia.

SEC. 2. That said fund shall be paid to the quartermaster of the Grand Army of the Republic, department of the Potomac, for disbursement.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE WORLD COURT—ADDRESS BY HON. DAVID J. LEWIS

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, Hon. David J. Lewis, who was formerly a Member of the House of Representatives and who later served as a member of the United States Tariff Commission, on the 28th day of January, 1928, delivered to the Pennsylvania Society of New Jersey, at Newark, N. J., an interesting address on the subject of the World Court. I ask unanimous consent to have that address printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. Toastmaster, ladies, and gentlemen, I feel that there is a singular appropriateness to the occasion in the subject we are now to consider. It was William Penn who was first, I believe, to propose the establishment of "a great court of arbitration."

Perhaps I can not develop our great subject in any way so well as by relating my own experience. In my boyhood, working in the coal mines of Pennsylvania, I came under the influence of a Quaker, Mr. Joseph Harrison, an extraordinary man, who made me a pacifist. He made it seem strange to me that governments organized to prevent private wars should claim the privilege of waging public wars, should make themselves the only exception to the rule of peace and order. But when the Lusitania was sunk I at once became a militarist, and could think only of punishing the transgressor. A pacifist—a militarist; I was both of these conflicting things at one and the same time.

This conflict of ideas and feelings challenged me. Which was wrong? Was either right—the pacifist or the militarist within me? About this time we had a recess of Congress, and I took the perplexing problem up for examination de novo and without prejudice, as I shall ask you to do to-night.

THE RESPONSIBLE CAUSE OF WAR

Mr. President, eventually I made this discovery. The Quaker was right in principle; but his philosophy demanded an institution—the familiar institution of government. I could be a pacifist in Cumberland, it had this institution—a government which clearly defined my rights and my neighbor's duties—and, if disputes arose between us as to the facts or the law, we had courts to adjust them without bloody encounters. I could be a pacifist in Maryland; it, too, had these courts. I could also be a pacifist in the great interstate community we call the United States: for it, too, had its laws defining rights and duties and courts to settle disputes.

But there was one community in which I could not be a pacifist; it was the community of nations, where nations meet and have their human controversies, for, though it had had the laws from the time of Grotius and Vattel, it had no courts to decide disputes. The community of nations was living under the rule of anarchism, not law; in that community we were not citizens, but anarchists, because before the war it had no court to decide the disputes which lead to war. You ask what is the cause of war. Well, the causes of controversies between nations which when not settled by diplomacy may lead to war, are legion, and their occurrence inevitable. But the final cause of war, the responsible cause is the failure to have a court with jurisdiction to decide such controversies.

PEACE AND ORDER INSTITUTIONAL PRODUCTS

My friends, peace and order in this world are not natural gifts at all, but institutional products; only those communities enjoy peace and order that have instituted courts to decide disputes. Even when men purpose the same things in life they think so differently, their methods of accomplishment are so various that not even in a community of saints could peace and order be long maintained without this institution. But why the rule of anarchism in the international community alone when government was elsewhere universal? Why this gap in government? The answer is that governments have been built by the sword and because no conqueror's sword was long enough or strong enough to build a world government. This gap was left for the reign of anarchism where governments cease at their own respective boundaries or at the ocean's edge.

A COURT OF NATIONS

Do the nations need a court? Do they, like individuals, have controversies which may lead to bloodshed in the absence of a court to determine them? Let the facts speak. The United States is a peace-loving nation, but it has had four foreign wars, a war to each generation, to decide its controversies. The direct, audited losses in the late war were $200,000,000,000, exceeding the total wealth even of the United States before the World War.

Our railways, 250,000 miles in extent, cost twenty billions. They could therefore have been destroyed and rebuilt ten times with the direct costs of the war. And the continuing burden—well, more than 75 per cent of our national taxation represents past wars or preparations for threatened or possible wars. The mobilized soldiers, the killed, the wounded, the total casualties were—but I can not state their value. One drafted soldier alone, the British scientist Mosley, who at the age of 27 had discovered and developed a physical table of the elements which supplanted the famous chemical table of Mendeleef and was said to be the only living man who might have calculated the orbits of the electrons within the atom, was slain by a Turkish bullet before he could be recalled to the laboratory. So I give figures, not values, here:

Total mobilized	65,038,810
Killed	8,543,515
Wounded	21,219,452
Prisoners and missing	7,750,919
Total casualties	37,499,386

Oh, the agony; oh, the responsibility of statesmen. If the Gladstones and the Clevelands, if the Bismarcks and the Crispis, the Blaines and Carnots had done their duty in their generation this unspeakable woe should not have been. It was Huxley who once declared that if these needless miseries were not to be stopped he was not sure that he "would not regard it as a great blessing if some kindly comet should strike the planet and sweep the human race with all its anguish from the face of the earth."

THERE IS A COURT

But the Great War brought many changes. The proudest monarchs of Europe are no more: Muscovite, Hapsburg, and Hohenzollern empires have gone and seven or eight republics have come, and a court of nations with them. It is the Permanent Court of International Justice—and permanent, and international, and just may it ever be, even as our own Supreme Court. The international community is no longer callously abandoned to the rule of force and anarchy.

The community of nations, like all other communities, now has a court, a court set up by men destined to be reverenced in history with the authors of our own Constitution, and chief among them is a former Secretary of State, the Hon. Elihu Root, perhaps the most gifted since Daniel Webster. This court is firmly established; it is functioning satisfactorily; and 48 of the world's sovereign powers have given it their allegiance. After the holocaust, wisdom did come to the earth's rulers; and as Germany pledged its allegiance in its dawn as a Republic "the morning stars sang together and the sons of God shouted for joy."

THE WORLD COURT AND THE AMERICAN SENATE

Ladies and gentlemen, the World Court came into being on September 14, 1921, and at once met with the approval of the peoples and responsible statesmen of the world. President Harding gave it his approval, and the Hon. Charles E. Hughes, our Secretary of State, drafted the provisions for our adherence. They provided—

(a) That the adherence should not imply any legal relation to the league.

(b) That the United States should participate in the election of judges.

(c) That the United States should pay its share of the expense of the court's maintenance.

(d) That the statute of the court should not be amended without the consent of the United States.

The Hughes provisions were statesmanlike and carried no implication of design to cripple the functioning of the court itself.

In both Democratic and Republican conventions this court was approved. A third convention said nothing of the court. It proposed instead "public referendums on peace and war." Its leaders seemed to think that an umpire was not necessary in a baseball game between Cumberland and Hagerstown, forsooth, but that if disputes arose between the teams referendums to the bleachers would suffice. The Senate got the Hughes draft in February, 1923. It delayed action until January, 1926, nearly three years, so that a vote of cloture had to be taken, the first for 50 years. Meanwhile the House of Representatives had approved our entry by a vote of 303 to 28.

Now, what was done to the Hughes treaty in the Senate? You know that on a treaty a vote of two-thirds is required. This is almost tantamount to saying that treaty legislation can be had only by unanimous consent. But the bitter-enders were there with their old Wilson vendetta. The nonpolitical public little understands the range or intensity of "personal politics" in the Senate. Wilson was dead; that is, what was not immortal in Wilson was dead, but his Senate enemies were not all dead. And—

> "Double, double toil and trouble;
> Fire burn and cauldron bubble."

The bitter-enders had imbibed deeply of the witches' broth. They professed to be in favor of a world court but not of this court. Could they be placated by reservations? Probably. To placate them the following reservations were added:

(1) That the United States might withdraw from the court at any time.

This sounds ominous. Please remember this reservation. I shall refer to it again.

(2) That the court shall not render any advisory opinion without the consent of the United States in any case in which the United States has an interest or claims an interest.

Several American States, notably Massachusetts, provide in their constitutions that the legislature, in case of doubt, may call on its supreme court for an advisory opinion as to the validity of proposed legislation. Now, out of 21 cases tried by the World Court, 14 cases were advisory. Some 56 nations of the world through the league have recourse to the court in this way. And its advisory jurisdiction is of momentous importance. Only recently it has, perhaps, prevented armed measures between Great Britain and Turkey. As left by the Senate, the court was not permitted to determine when the United States had an interest, nor were any means provided for informing the court when we claimed an interest. Thus, the court's whole advisory jurisdiction, about two-thirds, might be held up or paralyzed. The United States is not now bound by the court's advisory decisions, and it would have sufficed in all reason to have provided that the United States should continue as now unbound on entering the court by any advisory opinion unless it was a party to the case. But this course, forsooth, would have left the court's jurisdiction unimpaired. Moreover, it would have failed to give certain members of the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the Senate a meddling vetoing power over the constitutional operations of the League of Nations.

Now, suppose the foregoing reservation was accepted and we had become a member of the court, could an American mother press her boy to her breast and say: "You shall not be gassed on the battle field as was your father." Note well the next Senate reservation.

(4) Recourse to the court for the settlement of difference between the United States and any other State can be had only by agreement thereto through general or special treaties concluded between the parties in dispute.

That is, although we have entered the court, and taken our place there, as a member with the other sovereign powers, yet this court can not be called on by the President or by the other party, though also a member, to hear and determine the merits of the controversy, though it threatened war. The Senate must first, by a two-thirds vote, pass another treaty with the other country before the President can submit the case to the court.

Consider, gentlemen, thanks to Secretary Root and Secretary Bryan, that we have now 36 treaties of arbitration with different countries negotiated when no such tribunal existed. This was the great defect which Secretary Root and Secretary Hughes sought to remedy by our adherence to the World Court. These 36 countries are members of the court which is to be a city of refuge from war. Now, a court is, of course, something sui generis. Need I say that it is a judicial tribunal having authority to hear and decide disputes between parties accepting its jurisdiction. Our own Supreme Court has just such jurisdiction between the 48 sovereign States and no State can prevent its functioning by a refusal to present its case. If it could, with such recalcitrancy the Union itself would shortly perish. Yet this is exactly what this reservation means. We have pledged our faith to have our controversies with other members disposed of by judicial decision, and we have entered the World Court and they have entered it for that purpose, yet it can not proceed with the hearing, because the President is prohibited by this reservation from presenting our case.

It is well known that the President by his initiative can involve us in war, but he is denied by this reservation a like initiative to keep us out of war, as McKinley might have done in the case of Spain. When faced with war, the President can not say: "Peace be with us; we have agreed that law not war, judges not generals, justice not poison gas, shall decide our controversies. We are both members of the Permanent Court of International Justice for that purpose. Let the court judge between us." He would have first to submit a new treaty to the Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, something he could have done had we not already entered the court. Perhaps eventually, if and when the committee pleased, this treaty might come out of the committee into the open Senate, and if and when the Senate by a two-thirds vote permitted, the case in dispute might go to the World Court. Incredible, you say!

But how, in what state, with what reservations would such Senate treaty submittal go to the court? In the light of the foregoing reservations who can say that conditions and question-begging reservations would not be attached making its acceptance by the court impossible? And so one-third of the Senate, sustained by a yellow press, might boggle us out of the court and into a war by preventing the World Court from hearing the dispute. Summarizing these reservations: We enter the World Court but refuse to give it jurisdiction to decide any of our controversies; at the same time we are demanding the privilege of vetoing the court's jurisdiction to decide controversies between other nations through its advisory opinions. Think of a controversy between France and Germany. The World Court is being asked to decide it by an advisory opinion. Think of the Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs cogitating as to whether the United States Senate shall let the court go on. Can you think of a parallel in judicial history?

SUBSEQUENT HISTORY

Gentlemen, the subsequent history of the subject is a sequel to the futility of the Senate's action. The other court members did the United States the honor of meeting in international conference to consider the reservation. They invited—yes, requested—our Government to send representatives to aid them. This it curtly declined to do. Forced to a one-sided consideration, the conference at length reluctantly concluded that all the reservations should be accepted; but advised our Government that if they "did not work out well," the 48 other members reserved the right to withdraw their acceptances by a two-thirds vote. And here we have the final hitch; mark you, the Senate had reserved the privilege to withdraw from the court at any time with or without reason. The other 48 countries say: "Very well. We accept all of your reservations. But if as many as two-thirds of us find your reservations 'do not work out well,' we also reserve the privilege of withdrawing our acceptance of them." The reply of our Chief Executive was: "Oh, no; the Senate would not hear to that." Now, I ask you, can one characterize an attitude so unreasonable? And there, sir, the Hughes treaty rests, a foundling in some archive of the Government, the Chief Executive declining to take or advise action or to express an opinion on the merits of the situation.

"Can it be that the people of the United States do not care whether or not anything is done to make it possible to outlaw war?" asked Senator Root with reference to our entry into the court. Well, the Senator is very advanced in years. It may be the lot of this illustrious man to lead his people within sight only of the promised land. But his work is imperishable.

ENTRY BY ACT OF CONGRESS

Yes, gentlemen, the work is imperishable. It has passed the Red Sea, it has come out of the wilderness; 48 countries have acclaimed it—all except Russia, Mexico, Turkey, and the United States; it stands, in principle, approved by the House of Representatives, and, though, as was the case in getting our Constitution adopted, recalcitrancy aided by remissness in high places may delay adherence by a few countries, they can not prevent its holy triumph. There is another gateway through which the measure may pass, a gateway not barred by cabals of irresponsible recalcitrants taking advantage of the two-third rule in treaty ratification in the Senate. Entry, genuine entry, under reasonable conditions can be effected by a resolution of Congress—without a treaty—when the two-thirds rule in the Senate will not apply. Congressional action is as competent to determine our international relations as a Senate treaty, and this method has been frequently employed during the century and a half of our national life. Recently Senator BURTON, after a full investigation, reported to the House of Representatives:

"It seems clear that by resolution originating in the House adherence to the world court could be secured by legislation."

There are many examples of such action by Congress where action by the treaty method had failed in the Senate under the two-third rule. Texas, an independent republic, was seeking to enter the Union. The treaty failed to secure a two-third vote in the Senate. A resolution was then introduced, secured a majority in both Houses, was signed by the President, and Texas was admitted to the Union to remain forevermore. More recently a peace treaty with Germany failed to secure a two-third vote in the Senate.

In this case too, a resolution passed by a majority vote in each House and signed by the President was necessary to fix our peace relations with the second largest republic in the world. May God forstay the day when our destiny shall depend on two-third rule legislation. There probably would be no Senate, no United States at all, had a two-third vote been required in each State to ratify the Constitution. Do you know that of the 13 original States, in only 7 was a two-third vote secured for the Constitution? While adoption required nine States, Massachusetts, New York, yea even Virginia, adopted it only by close votes. I say again may God forstay the day of two-thirds vote absolutism. It is almost as impracticable as government by unanimous consent.

A VOICE. "What would our relations be if we entered the World Court and did not enter the league, what would they be compared with nations that entered the league."

Mr. LEWIS. Well, sir, let me give you an illustration. Suppose Virginia had declined to enter the Union. And I may say that the wisdom of Washington barely prevailed by a vote of 89 to 79 over the fiery pessimism of Patrick Henry, and would not have prevailed had there been party interests to oppose it; well suppose Virginia had proposed instead of entering the Union to submit any controversy it might have with the other States, to the Supreme Court for decision, in order to avoid war; or suppose Virginia had refused to accept even the Supreme Court; roughly, this will give you a picture of the United States in the World Court, and not in the league or as not in either World Court or league. The picture unnerves me—I tremble to think of the fate of the North American Continent. The parallel is rough and fails at important points, of course.

SOVEREIGN RIGHTS AND DUTIES

But rights, rights, certain rights may be jeopardized if we enter the court, we are told—not by Taft, not by Root, not by Hughes, not by Wilson. By whom? Well, if humanity be divided into those who do things and those who have to be pushed out of the way while things are being done, these objectors fall into the second class. When pressed for a specification they talk hazily of sovereign rights. But what are sovereign rights? Just where and when is the United States sovereign? Well, it is sovereign over territory, over land and water, as to which it has the exclusive right to make laws and to apply them through its own courts. It is sovereign in the great interstate community of our 48 States, sovereign in Hawaii, the Philippines, Porto Rico, and Alaska, and sovereign over 3 miles of the oceans which wash their shores. But on the high seas it is not sovereign, because the jurisdiction of its courts does not apply to other peoples there. There we do have rights, but not exclusive rights, and such rights can not be sovereign; they are international rights we share but equally with all other countries which only an international court can protect. And it is to secure, and to effectuate, these rights that the Permanent Court of International Justice is organized. But I have lost patience with the man who talks only of rights. I want to hear from the man who thinks also of duties. There are no real rights without corresponding duties with institutions providing for their discharge. It was duties that built Cumberland and Newark. It is duties that make it safe to ride on the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad, duties that fed and schooled us as children and secured for us the blessings of civilization. Rights, rights were not lacking when the Lusitania went down; rights, rights that have never been doubted. Five hundred women and children, vainly struggling in the waves, their white faces looking upward to heaven, are asking the Sovereign of the universe to grant them a protection and a justice denied them by sovereigns on earth. Sovereign rights: Why mock their spirits with such fallacy and cant?

FAITH AND LAW

A warless world. A court to take the place of poison gas in adjusting disputes between nations! It is only a dream, says the pessimist, only a dream. Well, my friend, the trouble with the pessimist is that he dreams just as much as any other dreamer, but he always dreams nightmares. Thoughtful men know that in human affairs a reasonable faith is necessary, and should not be denied to agencies like courts to secure world as well as domestic peace and order. I think it was Turgot, the encyclopedist, who said that he never admired Columbus so much for discovering America as for going out to look for it on the faith of an opinion. I speak only of the faith we grant to our banking, railway, and other industrial organizations, and to our courts. Suppose the framers of our Constitution had lacked this faith; suppose James Wilson, suppose Franklin, suppose the Keystone State had lacked this faith to enter the Union under the Constitution, what would be our lot to-day? Gentlemen, it is not the fool who grants this faith; it is the fool who refuses to grant it.

Let us be frank with ourselves! We must stand for law or stand for anarchism in the international community; and if for anarchism there, what shall be said to the discontented or disorderly elements at home? Personally I consider the institution of government the greatest of human blessings. Without it the strong and cunning would trample their fellows beneath their feet, especially the unorganized workers. If we want law and order in the community of nations, we must be willing to vest the necessary authority for that purpose in the appropriate institutions. Nor should we heed the false suggestion that in thus extending our faith we are stretching and, perhaps, impairing our patriotism. This would be a most serious consideration if true. The love of a man for his country is more than a duty; it ennobles his whole nature. It is related that Daniel Webster, in the last days of his illness at Marshfield, directed that the flag be unfurled to the breezes outside his window, and that at night a lantern be hung near to illuminate it, so that his prayer as uttered in the Senate might be fulfilled.

"When my eyes shall be turned for the last time to behold the sun in heaven, may I not see him shining on the broken fragments of a once glorious union, on States discordant, belligerent, or drenched it may be in fraternal blood. Let their last feeble and lingering glance rather behold the ensign of the Republic, still full high advanced, its trophies streaming in their original luster, not a stripe erased, not a single star obscured."

And what, pray you, inspired this sublime feeling? Think you Massachusetts would have done it alone? Was it not the Washingtonian federation of sovereign States organized to "insure domestic tranquility"? And do not the 48 countries now gathered around the World Court to insure the peace of the world constitute such a union? Would Webster have been more a patriot if Massachusetts had refused to enter the Union? Am I less a loving husband and brother because I love the State of Maryland? Does my loyalty to Maryland suffer because I love the flag which Webster loved? No, no—it is sophistry, a monstrous sophistry they offer. They little understand, indeed, the divine properties of love; how it increases, deepens, and strengthens as it widens in application; and Mr. Toastmaster, if ever my humble being expands to those dimensions, "not wholly unworthy their Almighty Architect," it is when I behold these 48 sovereign countries of the world, including now the Republic of Germany, advancing majestically to pledge their high allegiance to this court of world peace as its ensign rises from the waves which engulfed the Lusitania. Noble men and women will not deny their reverence and loyalty to that ensign. It represents the promise of our Father in fulfillment. The sword now has been beaten into the ploughshare. For "He doth keep His covenants." The hills and the valleys may pass away. The Alleghany Mountains may sink to the molten center of the earth. The "Alps and Andes may come and go like rainbows." But "His word endureth forever."

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

MONDAY, April 2, 1928

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Again, O God, we take Thy holy name upon our lips; again we thank Thee for the riches of Thy mercy and again we look up for the helpful consciousness of Thy presence. Our prayer is that we may not only be industrious, but that we may love industry; not only do the right things, but may enjoy the right things; not only pure, but that we may love purity. By the cords of infinite love bridge the pathless distance that stretches between Thee and Thy children. We praise Thee for all that Thou hast made. Oh, how wonderful for us to take some work of Thy creation and make it a little better and worthier; to make some human life wiser and happier. Oh, there is no other greatness. We thank Thee that Thou hast called us to be colaborers with Thee. If any have suffered the wrongs of injustice, let there be some forgotten place, where no paths lead, and there in silence may all be buried; flood their hearts with peace, and evermore help them to hold their course to Thee. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last was read and approved.

JOINT RESOLUTIONS AND BILL PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT

Mr. CAMPBELL, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that on March 31, 1928, they presented to the President of the United States, for his approval, joint resolutions and a bill of the following titles:

H. J. Res. 217. House joint resolution providing for the remission of duties on certain cattle which have crossed the boundary line into foreign countries;

H. J. Res. 253. House joint resolution authorizing certain customs officials to administer oaths; and

H. R. 9831. An act authorizing J. E. Turner, his heirs, legal representatives, or assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Ocmulgee River at or near Fitzgerald, Ga.

DESIGNATION OF SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE FOR TO-MORROW

The SPEAKER. The Chair designates the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] to preside as Speaker pro tempore to-morrow.

WASHINGTON GARDNER

Mr. HOOPER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOOPER. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, on Saturday, March 31, 1928, the Hon. Washington Gardner, for 12 years a Representative from the third district of Michigan, died at his home in Albion, Mich. Mr. Gardner was born February 16, 1845, on a farm in Morrow County, Ohio, but for the greater part of his life lived in Michigan and for 39 years in the city of Albion.

He was a soldier in the Union Army. He took part in the Battles of Corinth, Stone River, Shiloh, Chickamauga, Chattanooga, Mission Ridge, and Resaca, and was severely wounded in the latter engagement.

He studied theology and later studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1876, and practiced for a time in Grand Rapids.

He was appointed by Governor Rich as secretary of state of Michigan to fill a vacancy, and was afterwards elected for two terms to that office.

In 1898 he was elected to Congress, and for 12 years he faithfully and ably represented our district in this Hall. In the second term to which he was elected he became a member of the Appropriations Committee and served in that capacity during the rest of his term.

He left the House in 1910, but great honors were still in store for him. He became the national commander of the Grand Army of the Republic, and later, in 1921, was appointed by President Harding to the office of Commissioner of Pensions, which office he filled until he was incapacitated by a serious accident.

Mr. Gardner was one of the finest, strongest, and ablest men whom it was ever my privilege to know. He was a splendid orator; he had a fine figure and presence; but beyond that and beyond all he was a patriot to his very core.

I know personally that one of the finest things in his life was to witness during his service in Congress the growing spirit of friendship and reconciliation between the North and the South. His service as a soldier did not lessen, but rather intensified his love for the whole Nation.

While here he was a friend and confidant of Presidents McKinley, Roosevelt, and Taft. When he returned to private life he went back to his home city of Albion rich in the splendid recollections of public service nobly performed. He died there having the love, confidence, respect, esteem, and admiration of all who knew him.

During his later years he was totally blind, but he bore that great affliction with the same cheerfulness and with the same courage with which he had been battling for his country in the days of its adversity.

The example of Washington Gardner will be a beacon for young men in the community in which he lived for many a year to come. His services to his Nation will not be soon forgotten.

So when a good man dies for years beyond our ken,
The light he leaves behind him lies upon the souls of men.

[Applause.]

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Reserving the right to object, this is the day for the Consent Calendar, and many Members are here to get their bills through.

Mr. TILSON. Can not the gentleman wait until to-morrow?

Mr. McCLINTIC. I would like to speak this morning to answer an attack made on the Naval Committee, which I think ought to be replied to.

Mr. TILSON. The trouble with that is that it may give rise to controversy. Somebody else may wish to answer it. This is consent day, and many bills that are not passed on this day can not be passed at all. I dislike to refuse the gentleman, but I wish he would wait until to-morrow. I shall try to see that he has such time as he needs. To-day is a special day and should be used for the special purpose only.

Mr. McCLINTIC. I have always yielded to the suggestions of my good friend from Connecticut.

Mr. TILSON. If the gentleman will renew his request to-morrow, I shall make no objection.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Very well.

THE JUDICIAL CODE

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I present a conference report on the bill (H. R. 8725) to amend section 224 of the Judicial Code, for printing under the rules.

CONSENT CALENDAR

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the Consent Calendar.

BRIDGE ON HOOPA VALLEY RESERVATION, CALIF.

The first business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 441) to authorize an appropriation to pay half the cost of a bridge and road on the Hoopa Valley Reservation, Calif.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is any provision made for the United States Government obtaining a return of the amount of money that it contributes for a construction of a bridge?

Mr. LEA. There is not, so far as this bridge is concerned.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I see that the bridge may be amortized and then converted into a free bridge. If it is going to be amortized and the State gets a return of its contribution——

Mr. CRAMTON. This is not a toll bridge.

Mr. LEA. I do not understand that there is any provision with reference to amortization.

Mr. CRAMTON. If the gentleman will yield, this is not to be a toll bridge.

Mr. LEA. No; this is to be a free bridge.

Mr. CRAMTON. It is to be a free bridge from the beginning.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman object to inserting the word "free" in line 5 on page 1?

Mr. LEA. None whatever.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. With that understanding, I shall withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That an appropriation of $35,000 is hereby authorized out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay half the cost of the construction of a bridge and approaches thereto across the Trinity River within the Hoopa Valley

Indian Reservation, Calif., and for the construction of a road leading over said bridge from the Weitchpec Road on the north to the public highway at the south line of said reservation, including the cost of surveys, plans, estimates, and specifications, and other necessary expenses connected therewith, on condition that the State of California or the county of Humboldt furnish an equal sum; and under rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, who shall also approve the plans and specifications therefor: Provided, That before any money is spent hereunder, said State or county shall agree, in writing, to maintain the bridge and road without expense to the United States or the Indians.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LAGUARDIA: Page 1, line 5, after the article "a," insert the word "free."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I offer two or three amendments, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendments offered by Mr. CRAMTON: Page 1, line 3, after the word "of," where it occurs the first time, insert the words "not more than"; in line 5, after the word "pay," insert the words "not more than"; in line 7, strike out the words "for the construction"; and on page 2, in line 2, after the word "furnish," strike out the words "an equal sum" and insert in lieu thereof the words "the balance."

The amendments were agreed to, and the bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by inserting a statement by the gentleman from California [Mr. LEA] as to the contributions by the State and county in respect to bridges on this reservation. It is because of these liberal contributions that I have withdrawn my objection to the bill.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

IN RE H. R. 441

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., March 29, 1928.

Hon. LOUIS C. CRAMTON,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. CRAMTON: I have personally been over the roads on Hoopa Reservation, which I have visited a number of times.

The proposed bill calls for an equal division of the costs. The object of the bridge is to connect the east and west sides of the river on the reservation. The object of the money to be used on the road is principally to connect with the new road at the south line of the reservation. The hospital, school, and general headquarters of the reservation are on the west side. Over half the population, including the school children, are on the east side.

The proposed road and bridge is not a part of the State highway system of roads in California. The State highway runs east and west through the State about 8 miles south of the reservation.

The county has spent money on Hoopa Reservation roads:
Klamath Bridge, Hoopa-Weitchpec	$28,500
Assistance on Hoopa-Weitchpec road	6,000
Trinity River Bridge	10,000
On reservation		$44,500
The county also helped build the road on the reservation leading to Hoopa from the southwest, but I do not know at what expense.
Roads to the reservation line:
Willow Creek to reservation	$50,000
Redwood Creek to reservation	20,000
Bridge over Redwood Creek	4,400
Total		74,400
Grand total		118,900

The Klamath Indian Reservation connects with Hoopa on the north and runs down the Klamath River a mile on each side. The State has recently built a bridge on that reservation on the State highway costing probably a million dollars without thought of requesting a contribution. The county built the only road running from the coast to the north line of the reservation, about 40 miles, including a bridge across Klamath River at Martin's Ferry on the Klamath Reservation without any contribution by the Government.

The expense of the State highway from the coast, which is the first thick white settlement running within 8 miles to the south of the reservation, will cost $600,000 or more. That road is, of course, for the benefit of the whites, but it affords the best way out for these Indians. The county spent $50,000 to reach the reservation from the highway. This bill proposes to divide the expense of connecting up on the reservation.

The construction of this bridge will save the agency from operating a ferry in wintertime and from constructing a temporary bridge each summer.

Sincerely yours,

CLARENCE F. LEA.

UNIFORM RETIREMENT DATE

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 10288) to provide for a uniform retirement date for authorized retirements of Federal personnel.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That hereafter retirement authorized by law of Federal personnel of whatever class—civil, military, naval, judicial, legislative, or otherwise—and for whatever cause retired, shall take effect on the first day of the month following the month in which said retirement would otherwise be effective, and said first day of the month for retirements hereafter made shall be for all purposes in lieu of such date for retirement as may now be authorized.

SEC. 2. This act shall become effective July 1, 1928. All laws or parts of laws, in so far as in conflict herewith, are repealed.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WILLIAMSON: Page 1, line 10, strike out the period and insert in lieu thereof a semicolon and the following: "except that the rate of active or retired pay or allowances shall be computed as of the date retirement would have occurred if this act had not been enacted."

The amendment was agreed to, and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

RETURNS OFFICE OF THE INTERIOR DEPARTMENT

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 9570) to provide for the transfer of the returns office from the Interior Department to the General Accounting Office, and for other purposes.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the returns office, together with its activities, personnel, contract, bids, offers, proposals, advertisements, books, records, documents, furniture, office equipment, and papers and property of whatsoever character, is hereby transferred from the Interior Department to the General Accounting Office; and all powers and duties whatsoever in connection therewith now vested in or required to be performed by or under the Secretary of the Interior are transferred to, vested in, and required to be performed by or under the Comptroller General of the United States.

SEC. 2. That so much of appropriations for the Interior Department as applies to expenditures for the returns office, including personnel therefor, is transferred to and made applicable for expenditure by the General Accounting Office.

SEC. 3. That the Comptroller General of the United States is authorized to perform all acts and make such rules and regulations as necessary to carry the provisions of this act into effect.

SEC. 4. That all laws and parts of laws in so far as inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

SEC. 5. This act shall take effect July 1, 1928.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 4, strike out the word "contract" and insert in lieu thereof the words "contracts."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

SALARY OF THE PUBLIC PRINTER AND DEPUTY PUBLIC PRINTER

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6669) fixing the salary of the Public Printer and the Deputy Public Printer.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I ask the gentleman in charge of this bill whether this is taking out of the classification these two particular positions and fixing their salaries?

Mr. KIESS. I will state to the gentleman that the salaries of the Public Printer and the Deputy Public Printer can be fixed by Congress. They were originally fixed that way. We have taken care of the salaries of all the other employees of the Government Printing Office.

Mr. UNDERHILL. That is the reason why they are not included in the classification?

Mr. KIESS. Yes. They are not in the classified service. We have taken care of the salaries of all the other employees in the Government Printing Office. Usually the men at the top have had their salaries raised. In this case it is the reverse.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Let me say to the gentleman in behalf of the legislative subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations that I think I represent the sentiment of the entire committee when I say that the committee favors it. We think it ought to pass.

Mr. DYER. How much does the Public Printer now get?

Mr. KIESS. Seven thousand five hundred dollars. This is to increase it to $10,000. We recently raised the salary of the Librarian of Congress from $7,500 to $10,000.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the passage of this act the salary of the Public Printer shall be $10,000 per annum and the salary of the Deputy Public Printer shall be $7,500 per annum.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

COINAGE OF LINDBERGH MEDALS

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 11078) to provide for the coinage of medals in commemoration of the achievements of Col. Charles A. Lindbergh, and for other purposes.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be stricken from the calendar.

Mr. SCHAFER. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, what is the matter with this bill?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I think for the present it ought to be stricken from the calendar. That action will meet the approval of every one concerned.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the bill be stricken from the calendar. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADDITIONAL PAY FOR SUBMARINE AND DIVING DUTY

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 9289) to provide additional pay for personnel of the United States Navy assigned to duty on submarine vessels and diving duty.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I suggested an amendment to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ANDREW] last week, the last time the Consent Calendar was before the House. In the meantime, I have communicated with the Navy Department, and I have received a statement from the department showing wherein we can increase these salaries for submarine service:

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
BUREAU OF NAVIGATION,
Washington, D. C., March 31, 1928.

Hon. F. H. LAGUARDIA,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN LAGUARDIA: I have received your letter of March 30, 1928, relative to H. R. 9289, a bill to provide additional pay for personnel assigned to duty on submarines.

You have asked me for a statement showing the extra compensation that will be paid in the event this bill becomes a law. Should this bill become a law, it would be the purpose of the department to pay all men assigned to duty aboard submarines in active operating service extra pay to compensate for the arduous service involved and certain additional extra pay to such of those men who qualify for submarine operation, giving a preference to the more arduous and difficult duty on those submarines which cruise with the fleet.

The following is the tentative schedule before the bureau: $25 to $30 per month to qualified men on submarines cruising with the fleet; $15 per month to unqualified men on the same vessels; $20 to $25 per month to qualified men on submarines of the local defense forces; $10 per month to unqualified men on the same vessels.

It may be advisable to alter in some respects the above schedule after experience is had, probably by differentiating between qualified submarine of the higher ratings, of longer service in submarines, who occupy the more responsible positions, and those of lower ratings, comparatively new to the service, who are assigned to less responsible posts.

Trusting that this information is what you desire, I am,

Very truly yours,

R. H. LEIGH.

The statement seems to be satisfactory, and the proposal is deserving of a trial. If the plan does well we can extend it at the next session. If we pass the Senate bill to-day it will close the matter and these men can get the increased pay right away. If we pass the House bill it will cause delay if we make even the slightest change.

Mr. ANDREW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that we take up the bill S. 3131, which is the same except as to a very slight difference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to consider the bill S. 3131 in lieu of the House bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Senate bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 3131) to provide additional pay for personnel of the United States Navy assigned to duty on submarines and to diving duty

Be it enacted, etc., That hereafter all officers of the Navy on duty on board a submarine of the Navy shall, while so serving, receive 25 per cent additional of the pay for their rank and service as now provided by law; and an enlisted man of the United States Navy assigned to duty aboard a submarine of the Navy, or to the duty of diving, shall, in lieu of the additional pay now authorized, receive pay, under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Navy, at the rate of not less than $5 per month, and not exceeding $30 per month, in addition to the pay and allowances of his rating and service: Provided, That divers employed in actual salvage operations in depths over 90 feet shall, in addition to the foregoing, receive the sum of $5 per hour for each hour or fraction thereof so employed.

The Senate bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

The similar House bill was laid on the table.

MEMORIAL TO SACAJAWEA, OR BIRD WOMAN

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the resolution (H. J. Res. 75) authorizing the erection of a monument to the memory of Sacajawea, or Bird Woman.

The title of the resolution was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. CRAMTON. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, the resolution provides for a monument on the grave of this woman, and, as I understand, there is a great deal of doubt and controversy as to what State the grave is located in. Unless those on the committee can give some pretty definite assurance that they have located the grave, I think it ought not to pass at present. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard.

PUEBLO INDIANS OF NEW MEXICO

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 9483) to provide for the acquisition of rights of way through the lands of the Pueblo Indians of New Mexico.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the provisions of the statutes of the United States governing the acquisition of rights of way through Indian lands, to wit, the Code of Laws of the United States of America, in force December 6, 1926, title 25, Indians, sections 311, 312, 313, 314, 315, 316, 317, 318, 319, 320, and 321, be, and they are hereby, extended over and made applicable to the Pueblo Indians of New Mexico and their lands: Provided, however, That no right of way for a railroad or public highway shall be granted any portion of which lies less than 500 yards from the plaza of any existing pueblo.

SEC. 2. That the provisions hereof shall not affect the act approved May 10, 1926 (44 Stat. L. 498).

With the following committee amendments:

Page 1, in line 7, strike out "316."

In line 8, strike out "320," and after the figures "321" insert:

"And title 43, public lands, section 935, and the basic acts of Congress cited in such sections."

On page 2, line 3, strike out "railroad or."

In line 5, strike out "any existing pueblo" and insert in lieu thereof "Santo Domingo pueblo, in the State of New Mexico."

Strike out all of section 2.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Montana offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LEAVITT: On page 2, line 2, after the word "lands," strike out the remainder of the bill and insert in lieu thereof the following: "under such rules, regulations, and conditions as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe."

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I have consulted with the department as well as with the gentleman from Montana, and I am advised by them that the amendment presented is broad enough to give the Secretary authority to disapprove of a certain location for a road if he so desires, and with that construction of it I have withdrawn any objection I may have to the bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ALABAMA AND COUSHATTA INDIANS IN POLK COUNTY, TEX.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5479) to provide for the purchase of land, livestock, and agricultural equipment for the Alabama and Coushatta Indians in Polk County, Tex., and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I have a copy of the unfavorable report of the department upon this bill and I ask unanimous consent to insert it as a part of my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

The report referred to follows:

SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, February 13, 1928.

Hon. SCOTT LEAVITT,
Chairman Committee on Indian Affairs,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. LEAVITT: This will refer further to your letter of January 12, transmitting for report and recommendation copy of H. R. 5479, proposing to authorize an appropriation of $125,000 for the purchase of land, livestock, and agricultural equipment for the Alabama and Coushatta Indians in Polk County, Tex.

These Indians, who were originally located in Alabama, went from there to Louisiana, and in 1815 or 1816 on to Texas, settling near what is known as Old Peach Tree Village, close to the line of Polk and Tyler Counties. In 1836 they moved back to Louisiana, remained there about two years, when they returned to Texas and located in Tyler County on Horsepen Creek, in what is known as Fenced In Village, where they remained until 1854, when the State of Texas gave them 1,280 acres of land on Big Sandy Creek in Polk County, free of taxation, and with inability to sell.

Former Special Agent Loker, who investigated conditions among the Indians in 1910 under the act of April 4 of that year (36 Stat. L. 274), found that they do not pretend to have a claim of any sort against the Government, but that their needs were for additional land and a manual-training school. The special agent's report was submitted to Congress on December 23, 1910, and is printed in House Document No. 1232, Sixty-first Congress, third session.

Several years ago Congress made an appropriation for the erection of a schoolhouse for the children of this band, and now annually appropriates a small sum for the payment of tuition to the local authorities who operate the school as a part of the regular public-school system. Bills were introduced in the Sixty-sixth Congress proposing to appropriate $100,000 for the purchase of land and $125,000 for land and industrial purposes, both of which, however, failed of passage.

These Indians have never been regarded as Federal wards, as the United States never made a treaty with them, and they do not live on a Federal reservation or have any property held in trust. Should an appropriation be made, it would be merely an act of grace, which this department hesitates to sponsor.

I am unable to recommend the favorable consideration of the bill.

The Director of the Bureau of the Budget advises that the proposed legislation is in conflict with the President's financial program.

Very truly yours,

HUBERT WORK.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, believing that the State should make more of a showing of performing its responsibility with reference to these Indians, I shall be obliged to object. They are not Indians for whom this Government has the same responsibility as it has with respect to other Indians in the West. They went into Texas before Texas came into this Union. The State of Texas retained all of its public lands, and these Indians are citizens of Texas, for whom the State of Texas appears to have been doing very little, if anything. We are even making a contribution toward the maintenance of the schools carried on for their benefit. For the present I shall have to object.

Mr. BRIGGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes.

Mr. BRIGGS. I would like to say that for several years past the Government of the United States has been recognizing an obligation to these Indians.

Mr. CRAMTON. I will say to the gentleman that we have never recognized an obligation, for we expressly stated that it is a gratuity, a matter of grace, and a matter of generosity, but there has been no obligation admitted.

Mr. BRIGGS. I am speaking about the general moral obligation. The Supreme Court of the United States has recognized that the United States is under obligation to all Indians, and no one in the House knows better than the gentleman from Michigan that the bulk of the appropriations made by Congress are gratuity appropriations. I will say this, too: That the Indians here represented have just as much right to relief from the Federal Government as any other Indians, and the obligation imposed upon it is just as clear as it is in the case of other Indians that are being maintained to-day, like the Mississippi Choctaws, the Seminoles in Florida, the homeless bands in California, and other Indians.

Mr. CRAMTON. So far as I am concerned, if the gentleman from Texas could secure some information as to what, if anything, the State of Texas is doing or proposes to do for these Indians, or if there is any possibility of some cooperation, I would be very glad to go into that with the gentleman.

Mr. BRIGGS. I want to say to the gentleman that the State is carrying on some educational work and, I understand, contemplates even further educational work for these Indians. This measure is only providing, as amended by the Committee on Indian Affairs, that the Alabama Indians in Texas be given, not what was in the original bill, an unqualified appropriation for some land and agricultural livestock and equipment, but only a loan under a reimbursable proposition to enable these Indians to get some land and make themselves self-supporting with some livestock and equipment. The Committee on Indian Affairs, after a very full hearing, has, after amending the bill, reported it favorably and recognized the Government's obligation to these Indians.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. SNELL). Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CRAMTON. I object.

DISPOSAL OF PLANT INTRODUCTION GARDEN, HERNANDO COUNTY, FLA.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was House joint resolution (H. J. Res. 26) authorizing the Secretary of Agriculture to dispose of real property, located in Hernando County, Fla., known as the Brooksville Plant Introduction Garden, no longer required for plant introduction purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, if we are going to sell this property now it is to be hoped the Department of Agriculture will not come in within a few days and ask for the purchase of property somewhere else in this same neighborhood for some other purpose. This is what has happened very often, and I simply want to serve notice that if this property is sold, as it should be sold if there is no further use for it by the Department of Agriculture, they should not come in here within a short time and ask for authority to purchase other land in the same vicinity.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of Agriculture be, and he hereby is, authorized to sell or cause to be sold at public or private sale at such price or prices, on such terms, and in such manner as he may deem for the best interests of the Government, the tract or parcel of land situated in Hernando County, Fla., ordinarily referred to as the Brooksville Plant Introduction Garden, and more particularly described as follows: The south half of the southwest quarter of the southwest quarter of section 30, township 22 south, of range 20 east, containing 20 acres, more or less, and the entire portion of the north half of the southwest quarter of the southwest quarter of section 30, township 22 south, of range 20, which lies south of and adjacent to the county road, running through said section and township, consisting of 15 acres, more or less, in the county of Hernando, State of Florida, together with the buildings and improvements thereon, which said tract or parcel of land, with the buildings and improvements aforesaid, is no longer needed for plant-introduction purposes, and to execute and deliver in the name of the United States and in its behalf any and all contracts, conveyances, or other instruments necessary to effectuate and complete such sale.

SEC. 2. That the net proceeds from the sale of the aforesaid property be deposited in the Treasury of the United States.

The resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ENTRIES WITHIN RECLAMATION PROJECTS

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 475) to amend certain laws relating to the submission of proof on entries within reclamation projects.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object—I shall not object—but I think I should give notice that I intend to offer an amendment to protect the Government's lien, an amendment that is satisfactory to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. WINTER].

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I want to submit a suggestion to the gentleman, and I will abide by his judgment in the matter. On page 3, line 18, after the word "may," should there not be inserted "one year's notice to entrymen"? Should there not be something done to protect the entryman? How does he know when the State is going to move on him to collect taxes if he has not completed his entry?

Mr. WINTER. What is the language the gentleman is suggesting?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. On page 3, line 18, insert "after one year's notice to entrymen." What I fear is that the State may start to tax this property without the knowledge of the entryman and thereby establish another lien on his property.

Mr. WINTER. I do not share the gentleman's apprehension in that regard, but I have no particular objection to a provision for notice being inserted there.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I admit I am hazy about it. If the gentleman is sure these entrymen will be protected, that they will have due and timely notice that their land is subject to State taxation, that covers my objection to the bill.

Mr. WINTER. In my judgment they would have sufficient notice, and no hardship could be worked even though the amendment which the gentleman suggests is not in the bill.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I shall not press the amendment if the gentleman is sure about it.

Mr. WINTER. If any of the members of our committee are here who have any other idea about the matter, I would be glad to hear from them.

Mr. LEAVITT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. LEAVITT. My idea is the same as that of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. WINTER]. They are absolutely protected, and the permanent settlers on the project generally desire this legislation in order to have funds for the local development of schools and roads.

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what is the nature of the amendment the gentleman from Michigan is offering?

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, when this bill came up before I raised the question as to whether, when Congress expressly consented to the taxation of property which has not yet been patented we might thereby be held to have waived our prior lien for the charges for improving the water right. I have an amendment drawn by the Reclamation Service which Mr. Dent, the acting commissioner, suggests may not be necessary, but he thinks it is better to put it in to make sure that we retain a prior lien so that our claim will be prior to the lien for taxes. Mr. Dent's letter is as follows:

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, BUREAU OF RECLAMATION,
Washington.

Memorandum for Congressman WINTER.

Pursuant to telephone conversation with you some days ago in regard to H. R. 475, providing for taxation of unpatented entries on reclamation projects, I have endeavored several times to get into communication with Mr. CRAMTON over the telephone but have been unable to do so. I am advised by his office that he has been absent, I believe on account of sickness. For this reason I have been unable to discuss with him H. R. 475.

I inclose copy of section 3, which was originally drafted as a part of the amendment suggested by the department to your bill. The general view at that time seemed to be that this section was unnecessary in order to reserve the Government's prior lien. For this reason the provision was eliminated as being surplusage. Personally I rather feel that it might be well for this provision to be inserted to repel possible attack. If it affirmatively appears upon the bill that a prior lien is reserved it is less likely that the point would be questioned. It seems to me that it certainly could do no harm, even though it is mere surplusage.

P. W. DENT, Acting Commissioner.

Mr. EDWARDS. The amendment, then, is really to protect the interests of the Government?

Mr. CRAMTON. It is to protect the Federal Government's interests.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 1 of the act entitled "An act providing for patents on reclamation entries, and for other purposes," approved August 9, 1912, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"That any homestead entryman under the reclamation act approved June 17, 1902, as amended, including entrymen on ceded Indian lands, shall, within five years from the date of his entry (or within six months after the date of passage of this amendatory act, if his entry was made more than four years and six months prior to such date), submit proof that he has complied with the provisions of law applicable to such lands as to residence, reclamation, and cultivation. Such proof, if found regular and satisfactory, shall entitle the entryman to a patent, and all purchases of water-right certificates on reclamation projects shall be entitled to a final water-right certificate upon proof of the cultivation and reclamation of the land to which the certificate applies to the extent required by the reclamation act for homestead entrymen, except that no such patent or final water-right certificate shall issue until after the payment of all sums due the United States on account of such land or water right at the time of the submission of proof entitling the homestead entryman to such patent or the purchaser to such final water-right certificate."

SEC. 2. The second paragraph under the caption "Reclamation Service" in the deficiency appropriation act approved August 26, 1912, is amended to read as follows:

"That any desert-land entryman whose desert-land entry has been embraced within the exterior limits of any land withdrawal or irrigation project under the reclamation act approved June 17, 1902, as amended, and who may have obtained a water supply for the land embraced in any such desert-land entry from the reclamation project by the purchase of a water-right certificate, shall, within five years from the date of his entry (or within six months after the date of passage of this amendatory act, if his entry was made more than four years and six months prior to such date), submit proof that he has complied with the provisions of law applicable to such lands and that he has cultivated and reclaimed the land to the extent required by such act of June 17, 1902, as amended, for homestead entrymen. Such proof, if found regular and satisfactory, shall entitle the entryman to a patent and a final water-right certificate under the same terms and conditions as required of homestead entrymen under the act entitled 'An act providing for patents on reclamation entries, and for other purposes,' approved August 9, 1912, as amended."

With the following committee amendment:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That the lands of any homestead entryman under the act of June 17, 1902, known as the reclamation act, or any act amendatory thereof or supplementary thereto, may, after satisfactory proof of residence, improvement, and cultivation, and acceptance of such proof by the General Land Office, be taxed by the State or political subdivision thereof in which such lands are located, in the same manner and to the same extent as lands of a like character held under private ownership may be taxed.

"SEC. 2. That the lands of any desert-land entryman located within an irrigation project constructed under the reclamation act and obtaining a water supply from such project and for whose land water has been actually available for a period of four years, may likewise be taxed by the State or political subdivision thereof in which such lands are located."

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment to the committee amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan offers an amendment to the committee amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CRAMTON to the committee amendment: Insert after section 2 a new section, to read as follows:

"SEC. 3. That all such taxes legally assessed shall be a lien upon the lands and may be enforced upon said lands by the sale thereof in the same manner and under the same proceeding whereby said taxes are enforced against lands held under private ownership: Provided, That the title or interest which the State or political subdivision thereof may convey by tax sale, tax deed, or as a result of any tax proceeding shall be subject to a prior lien reserved to the United States for all the unpaid charges authorized by the said act of June 17, 1902, whether accrued or otherwise, but the holder of such tax deed or tax title resulting from such tax shall be entitled to all the rights and privileges in the land of an assignee under the provisions of the act of June 23, 1910, Thirty-sixth Statutes, page 592."

The amendment to the committee amendment was agreed to.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended.

LASSEN VOLCANIC NATIONAL PARK

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 11685) to accept the cession by the State of California of exclusive jurisdiction over the lands embraced within the Lassen Volcanic National Park, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The last time the Consent Calendar was up I asked to have this go over on account of a question of jurisdiction. Since that time the Speaker has made a ruling that leaves no doubt about it, and I withdraw the objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the provisions of the act of the Legislature of the State of California (approved April 20, 1927) ceding to the United States exclusive jurisdiction over and within the territory which is now or may hereafter be included within the Lassen Volcanic National Park are hereby accepted, and sole and exclusive jurisdiction is hereby assumed by the United States over such territory, saving, however, to the State of California the right to serve civil or criminal process within the limits of the aforesaid park in suits or prosecutions for or on account of rights acquired, obligations incurred, or crimes committed in said State outside of said park; and saving further to the said State the right to tax persons and corporations, their franchises and property on the lands included in said park, and the right to fix and collect license fees for fishing in said park; and saving also to the persons residing in said park now, or hereafter, the right to vote at all elections held within the county or counties in which said park is situated. All the laws applicable to places under sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the United States shall have force and effect in said park. All fugitives from justice taking refuge in said park shall be subject to the same laws as refugees from justice found in the State of California.

SEC. 2. That said park shall constitute a part of the United States judicial district for the northern district of California, and the district court of the United States in and for said northern district shall have jurisdiction of all offenses committed within the boundaries of the said park.

SEC. 3. That if any offense shall be committed in the said park, which offense is not prohibited or the punishment is not specifically provided for by any law of the United States, the offender shall be subject to the same punishment as the laws of the State of California in force at the time of the commission of the offense may provide for a like offense in said State; and no subsequent repeal of any such law of the State of California shall affect any prosecution for said offense committed within said park.

SEC. 4. That all hunting or the killing, wounding, or capturing at any time of any wild bird or animal, except dangerous animals, when it is necessary to prevent them from destroying human lives or inflicting personal injury, is prohibited within the limits of said park; nor shall any fish be taken out of any of the waters of the said park, in any other way than by hook and line, and then only at such seasons and at such times and in such manner as may be directed by the Secretary of the Interior. That the Secretary of the Interior shall make and publish such general rules and regulations as he may deem necessary and proper for the management and care of the park and for the protection of the property therein, especially for the preservation from injury or spoliation of all timber, mineral deposits other than those legally located prior to the passage of the act creating and establishing said park, natural curiosities, or wonderful objects within said park, and for the protection of the animals in the park from capture or destruction, and to prevent their being frightened or driven from the said park; and he shall make rules and regulations governing the taking of fish from the streams or lakes in the said park. Possession within said park of the dead bodies or any part thereof of any wild bird or animal shall be prima facie evidence that the person or persons having same are guilty of violating this act. Any person or persons, or stage or express company, or railway company, who knows or has reason to believe that they were taken or killed contrary to the provisions of this act, and who receives for transportation any of said animals, birds, or fish so killed, caught, or taken, or who shall violate any of the other provisions of this act, or any rule or regulation that may be promulgated by the Secretary of the Interior, with reference to the management and care of the said park, or for the protection of the property therein for the preservation from injury or spoliation of timber, mineral deposits other than those legally located prior to the passage of the act creating and establishing said park, natural curiosities, or wonderful objects within said park, or for the protection of the animals, birds, or fish in the said park, or who shall within said park commit any damage, injury, or spoliation to or upon any building, fence, hedge, gate, guidepost, tree, wood, underwood, timber, garden, crops, vegetables, plants, land, springs, mineral deposits other than those legally located prior to the passage of the act creating and establishing said park, natural curiosities, or other matter or thing growing or being thereon, or situated therein, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and shall be subject to a fine of not more than $500 or imprisonment not exceeding six months, or both, and be adjudged to pay all the costs of the proceedings.

SEC. 5. That all guns, traps, teams, horses, or means of transportation of every nature or description used by any person or persons within the limits of said park when engaged in killing, trapping, ensnaring, or capturing such wild beasts, birds, or animals, shall be forfeited to the United States and may be seized by the officers in said park, and held pending prosecution of any person or persons arrested under the charge of violating the provisions of this act, and upon conviction under this act of such person or persons using said guns, traps, teams, horses, or other means of transportation, such forfeiture shall be adjudicated as a penalty in addition to the other punishment prescribed in this act. Such forfeited property shall be disposed of and accounted for by and under the authority of the Secretary of the Interior.

SEC. 6. That the United States District Court for the Northern District of California shall appoint a commissioner who shall reside in the park and who shall have jurisdiction to hear and act upon all complaints made of any violations of law, or of the rules and regulations made by the Secretary of the Interior for the government of said park and for the protection of the animals, birds, and fish and objects of interest therein, and for other purposes authorized by this act. Such commissioner shall have power, upon sworn information, to issue process in the name of the United States for the arrest of any person charged with the commission of any misdemeanor, or charged with a violation of the rules and regulations, or with a violation of any of the provisions of this act prescribed for the government of said park, and for the protection of the animals, birds, and fish in said park, and to try persons so charged, and if found guilty to impose punishment and to adjudge the forfeiture prescribed. In all cases of conviction an appeal shall lie from the judgment of said commissioner to the United States District Court for the Northern District of California and the United States district court in said district shall prescribe the rules of procedure and practice for said commissioner in the trial of cases and for appeals to said United States district court.

SEC. 7. That such commissioner shall also have power to issue process as hereinbefore provided for the arrest of any person charged with the commission within said park of any criminal offense not covered by the provisions of section 4 of this act, to hear the evidence introduced, and if he is of the opinion that probable cause is shown for holding the person so charged for trial, shall cause such person to be safely conveyed to a secure place of confinement within the jurisdiction of the United States District Court for the Northern District of California and certify a transcript of the record of his proceedings and the testimony in such case to said court, which court shall have jurisdiction of the case: Provided, That the said commissioner shall grant bail in all cases bailable under the laws of the United States or of said State.

SEC. 8. That all process issued by the commissioner shall be directed to the marshal of the United States for the northern district of California, but nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to prevent the arrest by any officer of employee of the Government or any person employed by the United States in the policing of said reservation within said park without process of any person taken in the act of violating the law or this act or the regulations prescribed by the said Secretary as aforesaid.

SEC. 9. That the commissioner provided for in this act shall be paid an annual salary as appropriated for by Congress, payable quarterly: Provided, That the said commissioner shall reside within the exterior boundaries of said Lassen Volcanic National Park at a place to be designated by the court making such appointment: And provided further, That all fees, costs, and expenses collected by the commissioner shall be disposed of as provided in section 11 of this act.

SEC. 10. That all fees, costs, and expenses arising in cases under this act and properly chargeable to the United States shall be certified, approved, and paid as are like fees, costs, and expenses in the courts of the United States.

SEC. 11. That all fines and costs imposed and collected shall be deposited by said commissioner of the United States, or the marshal of the United States collecting the same, with the clerk of the United States District Court for the Northern District of California.

SEC. 12. That the Secretary of the Interior shall notify in writing the governor of the State of California of the passage and approval of this act, and of the fact that the United States assumes police jurisdiction over said park as specified in said act of the State of California.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

EXECUTION OF WARRANTS IN CRIMINAL CASES

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 9784) for the issuance and execution of warrants in criminal cases and to authorize bail.

The Clerk read the title to the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, this bill has no place on the Consent Calendar. It is too important a measure, and I object. I ask unanimous consent that I may place in the RECORD a brief statement in regard to the measure.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I dislike to be placed in a position of opposing legislation which seeks to bring about a speedier administration of the criminal law, but I can not subscribe to the last paragraph of the report, which says:

> The bill is designed to bring about a speedier administration of the criminal law, without, on the other hand, depriving the defendant of any of his substantial rights, and it is earnestly urged in the interest of the better and more efficient administration of justice.

Under our present system, which is most favorable to the Government, there are but three things which can be considered on a removal, namely: First, is the person named in the indictment the person sought to be removed; second, does the indictment state a cause of action; and third, under the indictment has the court jurisdiction of the person sought to be removed?

To-day the law provides when a warrant is served the party is taken before a commissioner, where the question of probable cause must be shown. Then it is up to the defendant to put the case before the commissioner to show that the grand jury was without probable cause. This evidence may be rebutted by the Government if the district attorney so elects. The matter then proceeds to the trial judge, where the holding of the commissioner on the question of probable cause can be assailed. Defects in the indictment can only be raised in the court where the indictment is found.

As we all know, the conspiracy statute has been used quite frequently the past few years. If this bill becomes a law, there is extreme danger of persecution rather than prosecution.

It is common knowledge that the country is at the present time suffering from a crime wave, but surely conditions will return to normal. Are you going to pass a law that will require one of your constituents to give bond for an appearance on an information in jurisdictions other than that in which he resides without giving him an opportunity to require that the Government show the indictment or information states a cause of action? Much as I would like to see a speedier administration of the criminal law, I do not want to deprive a citizen of this right. Nor do I feel it would be wise to provide a procedure such as is outlined in this bill when an information is issued.

Why, some district attorney, through spite or upon being misinformed, by merely signing a paper could have a man extradited all the way from the Philippine Islands to Florida or from Seattle, Wash., to Portland, Me.

I feel the arguments made before the committee, as shown by the report, are grossly exaggerated. I have been unable to find, in the district in which I reside, no cases where you are allowed a trial as to probable cause or a hearing into the merits.

Because the present law has been abused in some instances, why pass a bill which might do a great injustice to many innocent people?

In objecting to the consideration of this bill to-day I am calling to the attention of the Members a very important measure which has no place on the Unanimous Consent Calendar, and I hope that before it is reached again, which will be in two weeks, the Members will give the bill special consideration.

THE ABSAROKA AND GALLATIN NATIONAL FORESTS

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 15) authorizing an appropriation to enable the Secretary of the Interior to carry out the provisions of the act of May 26, 1926 (44 Stat. L. 655), to make additions to the Absaroka and Gallatin National Forests, and to improve and extend the winter-feed facilities of the elk, antelope, and other game animals of Yellowstone National Park and adjacent land.

The Clerk read the title to the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection:

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $150,000, which sum shall continue available until expended, to enable the Secretary of the Interior to carry out the provisions of the act of May 26, 1926 (44 Stat. L. 655), entitled "An act to make additions to the Absaroka and Gallatin National Forests and the Yellowstone National Park, and to improve and extend the winter-feed facilities of the elk, antelope, and other game animals of Yellowstone National Park and adjacent land, and for other purposes": Provided, That the total expenditures from this appropriation shall not exceed the combined total of the sums contributed by private or other agencies under the provisions of clause (a) of section 1 of said act and the appraised values of land donated or bequeathed under the provisions of clause (b) of section 1 of said act.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

REIMBURSEMENT FOR INTEREST PAID ON RAILROAD-AID BONDS

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 9207) granting to the State of New Mexico certain lands for reimbursement of the counties of Grant, Luna, Hidalgo, and Santa Fe, for interest paid on railroad-aid bonds, and for the payment of the principal of railroad-aid bonds issued by the town of Silver City, and to reimburse said town for interest paid on said bonds, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title to the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill go over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

THE LA FAYETTE EXTENSION ROAD

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 11723) to provide for the paving of the Government road, known as the La Fayette Extension Road, commencing at Lee and Gordon's mill, near Chickamauga and Chattanooga National Military Park, and extending to La Fayette, Ga., constituting an approach road to Chickamauga and Chattanooga National Military Park.

The Clerk read the title to the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Reserving the right to object, what assurance have we that the State of Georgia will take over the road?

Mr. CRAMTON. If the gentleman from New York will yield, I have prepared two amendments which the gentleman from Georgia has agreed to accept. One is a provision that the money will not be expended unless it is matched by an equal amount by the State or locality, and the other is that the money is not to be spent until the county or State has accepted the title. I think that covers the situation, and the gentleman from Georgia states that that is what they intend to do.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And the Government will be relieved from further maintenance of the road?

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War is authorized to improve and pave the Government road, known as the La Fayette Extension Road, commencing at Lee and Gordon's mill, near Chickamauga and Chattanooga National Military Park, and extending to La Fayette, Ga., in the length of approximately 12.9 miles, for which an appropriation of not to exceed $193,500 is hereby authorized out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated: Provided, That should local interests desire that said road be improved and paved in such manner as would involve an expenditure of more than $193,500 the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to expend such sum as may be contributed by said local interests concurrently with the appropriation herein authorized in the improvement and pavement of said road: Provided further, That no part of the funds herein authorized to be appropriated shall be expended prior to such time as agreements have been made for the conveyance of the Federal jurisdiction over said road, as provided in the act of March 3, 1925 (43 Stat. L. 1104), immediately upon the completion of such improvements as may be made hereunder.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 2, line 6, strike out the words "local interests" and insert in lieu thereof "the State of Georgia or any county or municipality or legal subdivision thereof, or any State or county or municipal highway commission, or equivalent public authority."

Page 2, line 12, after the colon, strike out all down to and including line 18, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"Provided further, That should the State of Georgia or any county or municipality or legal subdivision thereof, or any State or county or municipal highway commission, or equivalent public authority desire that the position of said road be changed in any particular from the present Government-owned right of way, and should such local interests acquire title to the land necessary to effect such changes, the Secretary of War may expend the funds herein authorized for the improvement and pavement of such road as changed: And provided further, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended until the State of Georgia, or the counties or municipalities thereof concerned, have obligated themselves in writing to the satisfaction of the Secretary of War that they will accept title to the present Government-owned road known as the La Fayette Extension Road and will maintain said road as built under the provisions of the act approved March 3, 1925 (43 Stat. L. 1104), immediately upon the completion of such improvements as may be made under this appropriation."

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I offer two amendments to the committee amendment and ask that they be considered together.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, as a substitute for the committee amendments, strike out lines 4 to 9, inclusive, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "Provided, That no part of the appropriation herein authorized shall be available until the State of Georgia or any county or municipality or local subdivision thereof, or any State or county or municipal highway commission or equivalent public authority, shall contribute at least an equal amount for the same purpose and the Sec-."

Amend the second amendment by striking out lines 5 to 10, inclusive, on page 3, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "And provided further, That no part of the appropriation herein authorized shall be expended until the State of Georgia or the counties or municipalities thereof concerned have accepted title to the present Government-owned road known as La Fayette Extension Road and have obligated themselves in writing to the satisfaction of the Secretary of War that they will maintain."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The amendments as amended were agreed to, and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

CONSTRUCTION OF CULVERTS AT CAMP M'CLELLAN, ALA.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5590) to authorize appropriations for construction of culverts and trestles in connection with the camp railroad at Camp McClellan, Ala.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, though I shall not object, I desire to say this: This is one of those bills of which there is a flood coming in here from the War Department—bills authorizing appropriations, where the appropriations are already authorized by law. This is just a subterfuge on the part of the Army to get a larger appropriation than they otherwise would. However, the amount is not large, and the need is apparent. If the department would allocate more to this particular purpose they could do this with the money they have now; but I have reason to believe that there will not be a continuance of this flood of that sort of bills. Therefore, I am not going to be unpleasant about this bill, and I withdraw my objection.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I suggest to the gentleman from Alabama that we ought to strike out in line 5 the comma and the words "in order", and in line 8 insert the words "a sum."

Mr. JEFFERS. There is no objection upon my part to the proposed amendments, Mr. Speaker, because they will clarify the language.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated for the purpose of purchasing the necessary materials and hiring the necessary labor, in order to construct or repair culverts and trestles and other parts of the camp railroad at Camp McClellan, as in the opinion of the Secretary of War may be necessary, not to exceed $36,440.

With the following committee amendment:

Line 8, strike out "$36,440" and insert "$19,830."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LAGUARDIA: Page 1, line 5, strike out the comma and the words "in order"; and in line 8, after the word "necessary," insert the words "a sum."

The amendments were agreed to, and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

RELIEF OF STATE OF KENTUCKY

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 10565), to authorize an appropriation for the relief of the State of Kentucky on account of roads and bridges damaged or destroyed by the recent flood.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. THATCHER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill go over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I think that this is a pretty important bill which does not belong on this calendar. Therefore, I object to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky, and I object to the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan objects.

IMPORTATION OF COFFEE INTO PORTO RICO

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8559), to amend section 58 of the act of March 2, 1917, entitled "An act to provide a civil government for Porto Rico, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is the Delegate from Porto Rico [Mr. DAVILA] in favor of this legislation?

Mr. DAVILA. I am.

Mr. DYER. And it would be beneficial to the island of Porto Rico?

Mr. DAVILA. It would.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I think the RECORD should show that this is not a duty imposed upon the people of Porto Rico, but it is a duty imposed to prevent coffee from other countries entering Porto Rico and then being exported from Porto Rico as Porto Rican coffee.

Mr. DAVILA. That is correct.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 58 of an act entitled "An act to provide a civil government for Porto Rico, and for other purposes," approved March 2, 1917, be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 58. That all laws or parts of laws applicable to Porto Rico not in conflict with any of the provisions of this act, including the laws relating to tariffs, customs, and duties on importations into Porto Rico prescribed by the act of Congress entitled 'An act temporarily to provide revenues and a civil government for Porto Rico, and for other purposes,' approved April 12, 1900, are hereby continued in effect, and all laws and parts of laws inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed: Provided, That on all coffee in the bean or ground imported into Porto Rico there shall be levied and collected a duty of 10 cents per pound, any law or part of law to the contrary notwithstanding."

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

REPAIR OF CUSTOMS BUILDINGS IN PORTO RICO

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 9363) to provide for the completion and repair of customs buildings in Porto Rico.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to contract for:

(1) The completion of the customhouse at San Juan, P. R., at a cost not to exceed $41,019.91;

(2) The pavement of the roadways and approaches on the customhouse property around said building, at a cost not to exceed $25,000;

(3) The repairing of the customhouse at Ponce, P. R., at a cost not to exceed $4,500;

(4) The repairing of the customs warehouse shed and customs office building at Mayaguez, P. R., at a cost not to exceed $1,500;

(5) The repairing of the customhouse at Humacao, P. R., at a cost not to exceed $4,000.

That all said amounts are to be paid out of duties collected in Porto Rico, as an expense of collection, under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

SALARY OF CERTAIN JUDGES OF PORTO RICO

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 10952) to fix the salaries of certain judges of Porto Rico.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, there is another bill on this calendar which includes the Porto Rican situation in respect to increasing the pay of judges. The Committee on the Judiciary has reported the bill, which is on the Consent Calendar, which takes care of the increase in pay for judges of the Territory of Hawaii, Porto Rico, the Philippines, the United States Court for China, and the Virgin Islands. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KIESS] whether he will permit his bill to pass without prejudice and see if we can not take up the other bill?

Mr. DAVILA. Mr. Speaker, I think we ought to have this bill passed at this time, because it is possible there may be some objection to the Philippine or Hawaiian provisions of the other bill, although not to the Porto Rican. It is money paid out by the Porto Rican treasury.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. No objection has manifested itself so far as I know to any of the legislation.

Mr. DAVILA. In Porto Rico the money is paid by the Porto Rican treasury. In Hawaii I understand it is paid out of the Federal Treasury. I believe this bill has more chance of passage in its present form than if it were linked with the Hawaiian bill.

Mr. SCHAFER. Has this bill the approval of the Commissioner from the Philippine Islands?

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that we dispose of this question now before the House.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, there is now a bill before the House, coming from the Committee on the Judiciary, of which the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER] is a member. I ask for the regular order on that bill at this time. The regular order is, Is there objection?

Mr. DYER. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that that bill be passed over temporarily until we reach the other bill. This is on the calendar and it includes all the courts to which I have made reference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the bill be passed over temporarily.

Mr. KIESS. How far down on the calendar is the other bill?

Mr. DYER. It is No. 435.

Mr. KIESS. We do not want to lose our rights.

Mr. DYER. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. KIESS. I object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. DYER. I object.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

MONTEZUMA NATIONAL FOREST, COLO.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6854) to add certain lands to the Montezuma National Forest, Colo., and for other purposes.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that it be passed over until we can get further data on the matter. I have asked for a report from the Interior Department.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado?

There was no objection.

GUNNISON NATIONAL FOREST, COLO.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7223) to add certain lands to the Gunnison National Forest, Colo.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, this bill, H. R. 7223, provides for the addition of some 6,120 acres of public land to the Gunnison National Forest, in Gunnison County, Colo., in my congressional district.

I introduced the bill at the express request of the board of county commissioners of that county and a large number of ranchmen and cattlemen and many other citizens of the county. In fact, there is no opposition to the measure that I am aware of in that vicinity.

The land lies adjacent to the Gunnison National Forest along the Taylor River and certain creeks tributary to the Gunnison River. The land is mountainous in character and contains a substantial amount of timber, consisting principally of Douglas fir, lodge-pole pine, and western yellow pine.

The Secretary of the Interior and Secretary of Agriculture both formally approved the bill and the matter was referred to the National Forest Reservation Commission, and Mr. Dwight F. Davis, the Secretary of War, who is the president of that commission, has made a favorable recommendation of the bill to the President of the United States, and on the 19th of March of this year President Coolidge favorably recommended the bill to Congress. So that with the unanimous approval of all the official machinery of the Government pertaining to the public domain, and the approval of practically all the people of the county in which the land is located, I confidentially hope that the measure will meet with the approval of the House and Senate.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the following-described public lands be, and the same are hereby, added to and made a part of the Gunnison National Forest, Colo., and are to be hereafter administered under the laws and regulations relating to the national forests:

Township 14 south, range 85 west, sixth principal meridian: North half northeast quarter, southeast quarter of section 26; all of section 35.

Township 15 south, range 83 west, sixth principal meridian: West half northeast quarter, west half southeast quarter, northeast quarter southeast quarter of section 7; south half northeast quarter, southeast quarter, east half southwest quarter of section 8; all of section 17; northwest quarter, west half northeast quarter, southeast quarter northeast quarter, south half southeast quarter, northwest quarter southeast quarter, south half southwest quarter of section 18; all of section 19.

Township 15 south, range 84 west, sixth principal meridian: East half of section 7; all of section 13; south half of section 14 southeast quarter of section 15; east half of section 22; all of section 23; all of section 24; northeast quarter of section 27: Provided, That the inclusion of any of the aforesaid land in the Gunnison National Forest shall not affect adversely any valid application or entry pending at the date of the approval of this act.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 2, line 8, strike out the word "southeast" and insert in lieu thereof the word "southwest."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

POST-OFFICE BUILDING AT PHILIPPI, W. VA.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 10799) for the lease of land and the erection of a post office at Philippi, W. Va., and for other purposes.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, my understanding is that public buildings and post-office buildings are being erected throughout the country now according to the Elliott bill. This bill may be all right, but I would like to know the reason for the departure from the regular practice?

Mr. BOWMAN. This bill is based on an emergency which exists in Philippi. Philippi has postal receipts amounting to $17,000 annually. It does not come within the Government building program, which is limited to towns having postal receipts of $20,000 a year. After the destruction of the former post-office building at Philippi by fire there was just one place where the post office could be moved, and that was in a small room of the county courthouse. Inspectors were sent to Philippi who attempted to get other rented quarters at Philippi, but were unable to do so. This plan was devised in order to meet the emergency.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. I have four or five towns in my district that are in that situation.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The Government does not own the land in Philippi on which the building is to be constructed. If the Government purchased the land, the cost would be about $70,000. Under the arrangement provided by the bill it would cost a total of $52,600. Personally I do not approve the suggestion of leasing the land from this association, but I do approve giving them permission to construct this building under a lease which will provide for payment in 10 years.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. What does the gentleman think of establishing a precedent? The committee has limited buildings to towns of $20,000 annual postal receipts. Now, if you break the precedent do you not open up a flood of similar bills?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Is not the gentleman confusing it with cases where the Government does not own the land?

Mr. BOWMAN. They are making provision to provide the land.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Then it comes under the rule?

Mr. SIMMONS. I have a number of cities in my district where the people would gladly give the sites if the Government would build the buildings.

Mr. BUSBY. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, I happen to be on the committee that reported the bill. I will explain to the gentleman that this would set a precedent. It would set a precedent, especially as to those places where the Government has bought sites heretofore, there being about 150 of them in the United States. This bill proposes that a certain business organization shall be formed by the citizens of this place and they, in order to entitle them to proceed with the construction of this building, must necessarily lease the Government land for that purpose only. That gives them authority to go on that land and construct this building, and it is to be done on the basis of paying back to these individuals one-tenth of the construction price, plus 6 per cent, and that will pay for the building in 10 years, at which time it will become the property of the United States Government. It does set a precedent, but a precedent which, perhaps, all the rest of us can follow who have sites in our districts. I do not have any in mine.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. It, perhaps, establishes an economical precedent.

Mr. BUSBY. It establishes an economical precedent and opens up an additional way by which post-office buildings might be obtained.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. I wish the gentleman would suggest something by which others of us can open up an additional way to get post offices in our districts.

Mr. BUSBY. I think the gentleman is entirely right, but it would afford an additional way of securing buildings, not in the way I would get them, but in the way some Members would like to get them, and if they want to get them in that way it is all right with me.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. The gentleman is a member of the committee which wrote the Elliott bill?

Mr. BUSBY. But I did not support the Elliott bill.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. I know the gentleman did not.

Mr. ROMJUE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. ROMJUE. Did I understand the gentleman from Mississippi correctly a moment ago that this is to be built on leased ground?

Mr. BUSBY. It is to be built on Government ground that is to be leased to this organization, and this will entitle them to go on the ground for the purpose of erecting the building.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. If the gentleman will yield, if there is no objection to this bill, I shall move to strike out the first proviso and leave in the second proviso, which will grant them permission to erect the building.

Mr. BUSBY. That would be entirely practicable.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. The gentleman from Oklahoma is going to congratulate the gentleman from West Virginia, and so far as he is concerned withdraws his reservation of objection.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, further reserving the right to object, may I call the attention of the gentleman from West Virginia and the gentleman from Mississippi, who is an expert on this——

Mr. BUSBY (interposing). I do not claim to be.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Instead of leasing this property, now the property of the Government, for 10 years, as provided in the first proviso of the bill, I would strike out that proviso and leave the second proviso in the bill, which would authorize this Philippi Association to erect a building upon this land and then leave the rest of the provisions in the bill.

Mr. BUSBY. Let me suggest that my understanding is that the Treasury Department thought it would be best to lease this land to this association in order to give them the right to go on it and do anything that is necessary.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. When we grant them permission to build we grant them a right.

Mr. BUSBY. And that might be a license which could be revoked.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Exactly. When we grant them a lease for 10 years it becomes a property right which may be recorded. That lease for 10 years, together with the building, would be taxable. Now, why incur the possible risk of having it taxed when we are going to buy this building. On the other hand, if we give no title to the land the Government will retain title to the land and there would be no doubt about escaping the $5,000 tax.

Mr. BUSBY. I think what the gentleman suggests is entirely sufficient and would serve the purpose, but that is a question for the gentleman from West Virginia to determine.

Mr. BOWMAN. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Certainly.

Mr. BOWMAN. This bill has been approved by the Treasury and Post Office Departments and also by the Budget; and this bill, after it had been prepared, contrary to the usual practice, was submitted to the Comptroller General for his approval. It was submitted to him simply because in the very beginning of this proposition the Post Office Department and the Treasury Department, as well as the Budget, had worked out this plan for the construction of a post office in Philippi. However, it struck a snag when it went to the Comptroller General's office, and he said it would be necessary to have special legislation if we expected to construct the building. So this bill has been approved by the Budget, the Post Office Department, the Treasury Department, and has the O. K. of Comptroller General McCarl. But I can see no objection to the amendment of the gentleman from New York if he insists on having his amendment in the bill.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. With all due deference to the departments, we have not yet given up our parliamentary form of government in this Republic.

Mr. BOWMAN. I understand; but I am fearful we might run into something that would prevent us from carrying out the purposes of the bill. I will accept the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Just listen to this in the letter of the Postmaster General:

Taxes over a 10-year period will amount to $5,007.

I am trying to get away from that if I can.

Mr. BOWMAN. I understand.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. I reserve the right to object, Mr. Speaker. The principal defect I see in this bill is that it commits the Government of the United States to paying 6 per cent interest when it has no difficulty whatever in borrowing money at 4 per cent or less. It is said this bill is to serve as a precedent, and I think it would be unwise to adopt the precedent of committing the Government of the United States to paying 6 per cent interest at a time when it can borrow money for much less. If it is agreed that this bill will be amended so that the rate of 6 per cent will be reduced to 4 per cent, I shall not object.

Mr. BOWMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK of Texas. I yield.

Mr. BOWMAN. The gentleman understands that the money for the construction of this building is provided by the Philippi Improvement Co. It is necessary for this company to go into the banks in Philippi and borrow this money, and they must pay 6 per cent.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. I know; but the Government must repay the 6 per cent when it can borrow money at the rate of 4 per cent.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. This is not a private corporation.

Mr. BOWMAN. Oh, no.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. I understand that; but it seems to me it would be unwise to commit the Government to paying a rate of 6 per cent when it is well known it can borrow money at a much less rate.

Mr. BOWMAN. But the gentleman understands, I am sure, the Government is not lending the money on this proposition.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. I know; but it is to repay it.

Mr. BOWMAN. If the gentleman had to borrow money at 6 per cent and somebody was to reimburse him, he would expect to be repaid at the rate of 6 per cent.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. There is the whole trouble with the proposition. It is a novel one, and I understand it is thought it might set a precedent which might be followed in other cases.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. There is one consideration I might suggest to the gentleman. The difference between 4 per cent and 6 per cent would be trivial in comparison with the difference in cost of $70,000 and $52,600.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. I will say, if this was the only proposition that was ever to be enacted under this kind of a law it would be a different proposition; but I have been informed it is thought this would probably act as a precedent for 150 other communities similarly situated.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. This would save the Government a lot of money on our buildings.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. It would not save in interest if we paid 6 per cent when the Government can borrow money at 4 per cent.

Mr. BARBOUR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Yes.

Mr. BARBOUR. Has not an arrangement similar to this been made in a great many towns and cities throughout the United States wherein local interests have gone ahead and built a post office and then the Government has agreed to reimburse them the amount which the building cost, together with a reasonable rate of interest over a certain period of years?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. It is a very good arrangement.

Mr. BARBOUR. Is not this a somewhat similar arrangement to that?

Mr. BOWMAN. I think that has been done in the case of temporary buildings only.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill may be passed over without prejudice so that we may look into it further. I do not wish to arbitrarily interpose an objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

SUBSCRIPTION CHARGES FOR NEWSPAPERS, MAGAZINES, ETC.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 11989) providing that subscription charges for newspapers, magazines, and other periodicals for official use may be paid for in advance.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman withhold his objection?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Certainly.

Mr. DYER. I will say to the gentleman that this bill simply provides that subscriptions may be paid for in advance, which would make it unnecessary to carry such a provision in appropriation bills.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, section 3648 of the Revised Statutes is one of the most wholesome, most necessary, and most protective statutes of all the statutes of the United States, and I am going to object to every bill that comes in seeking to break down that statute.

Mr. DYER. This does not break it down.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. If the United States Government has not sufficient credit to obtain a paper for one year and pay for it at the end of the year, then we might as well go out of business.

Mr. DYER. They can not always do it.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Then they can send over to the Congressional Library and get the papers.

Mr. DYER. The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations has urgently asked for this legislation to save trouble to the committee in carrying this provision in the appropriation bill year after year.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And with the same degree of urgency I object.

SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5495) to provide for cooperation by the Smithsonian Institution with State, educational, and scientific organizations in the United States for continuing ethnological researches on the American Indians.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, it has come to my attention that where work of this kind is carried on on land subject to the National Park Service or the Bureau of Indian Affairs that there has sometimes been a little disagreement between the representatives of the Smithsonian in charge of the work and the Park Service as to the disposition of the various articles that are brought up in these excavations. For instance, we are establishing museums, and it is quite desirable that some of the specimens be there preserved. So I have framed an amendment which the gentleman from Tennessee has accepted. I did not know that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] was on the floor, or I would have shown it to him. It provides that where lands are involved which are under the jurisdiction of the Bureau of Indian Affairs or the National Park Service cooperative work thereon shall be under such regulations and conditions as the Secretary of the Interior may provide. I trust that that will be acceptable to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. LUCE. I did not know that the Bureau of Indian Affairs had established museums.

Mr. CRAMTON. I have not stated that they have established museums on Indian lands, but this prevents any question coming up in the future, and I think it can do no harm in any event.

Mr. LUCE. The gentleman from Tennessee is more familiar with the subject than I am, and whatever he accepts I will abide by.

Mr. BYRNS. This bill provides for work being done by the State or scientific organizations, and I can see how there might be work done on land by educational scientific organizations, and it occurred to me that under the statement made by the gentleman from Michigan there could really be no particular objection to the adoption of this amendment. Therefore, I told him that as far as I was personally concerned I would not object to it.

Mr. LUCE. And I gladly defer to the opinion of the gentleman from Tennessee.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Reserving the right to object, I want to point out to the gentleman from Massachusetts, who is one of the most careful and painstaking legislators in the House, who takes the utmost pains in his work, that a few days ago he very kindly and with many reservations criticized some of the Members who take an active part on this calendar. I submit that here is a bill providing authority for excavations and for an appropriation of $20,000, and I want to ask anyone in the House if they can glean one intelligent bit of information from the report submitted by the gentleman from Massachusetts. [Laughter.]

Mr. BYRNS. Perhaps the gentleman from Massachusetts felt that it did not need any explanation.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. But it does. It is highly scientific and we are not endowed with the profound knowledge that the gentleman from Massachusetts has, and therefore it required a great deal of time and research on our part to ascertain the facts which an ordinary report of the committee would have given us. But, Mr. Speaker, on the assurance of the gentleman from Michigan and the gentleman from Tennessee I shall not object. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution is hereby authorized to cooperate with any State, educational institution, or scientific organization in the United States for continuing ethnological researches among the American Indians and the excavation and preservation of archæological remains.

SEC. 2. That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $20,000, which shall be available until expended for the above purposes: Provided, That at such time as the Smithsonian Institution is satisfied that any State, educational institution, or scientific organization in any of the United States is prepared to contribute to such investigation and when in its judgment such investigation shall appear meritorious, the Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution may direct that an amount from this sum equal to that contributed by such State, educational institution, or scientific organization, not to exceed $2,000, to be expended from such sum in any one State during any calendar year, be made available for cooperative investigation: Provided further, That all such cooperative work and division of the result thereof shall be under the direction of the Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, at the end of the section 2 I move to amend by inserting the following:

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 17, after the word "institution," insert: "Provided further, That where lands are involved which are under the jurisdiction of the Bureau of Indian Affairs or the National Park Service cooperative work thereon shall be under such regulations and conditions as the Secretary of the Interior may provide."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

TABLETS TO AMERICAN SOLDIERS IN THE BATTLE OF BRANDYWINE

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8546) authorizing an appropriation of $2,500 for the erection of a tablet or marker at Lititz, Pa., to commemorate the burial place of 110 American soldiers who were wounded in the Battle of Brandywine and died in the military hospital at Lititz.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Reserving the right to object—and I shall not object to this bill—I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Massachusetts, chairman of the committee that reported the bill. I did it at the last session of Congress. I insisted that we provide that the monument, marker, tablet, or whatever it may be should be the work of American artists. Only a few days ago a semipublic institution awarded a medal to America's foremost young man—Lindbergh—and it happened to be the work of an artist here on a visit. I submit that while we provide for monuments, markers, and tablets, we want them to have artistic value, but we should do something to protect American art. On the other occasions I offered an amendment. I hate to do it on every bill coming up, and I hope that when the Committee on the Library reports these bills in the future they will bear in mind this suggestion and put the provision in the bill itself.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $2,500, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby authorized to be appropriated, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, in the erection of an appropriate tablet or marker at or near the spot in or near the borough of Lititz, in Pennsylvania, where 110 American soldiers of the Revolution, who were wounded in the Battle of Brandywine and were cared for in the military hospital at Lititz, lie buried.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 2, line 2, after the word "buried," insert a colon and the words "Provided, That the site on which the proposed tablet or marker is to be erected shall be acquired by the borough of Lititz."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. LAGUARDIA: Page 2, at the end of the bill insert: "SEC. 2. The design of said marker or tablet shall be the work of an artist who is a citizen of the United States."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

LIBRARY OF CONGRESS

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 9355) to provide for the acquisition of certain property in the District of Columbia for the Library of Congress, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. SNELL). Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman withhold his objection for a moment?

Mr. SCHAFER. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. There is a great need for some expansion of the Library facilities.

Mr. SCHAFER. This is a bill which covers about $600,000. I do not think the Consent Calendar is the proper calendar to consider such a bill on.

Mr. CRAMTON. I shall not argue with the gentleman about that. I am glad to know that he is not opposed to the bill.

Mr. SCHAFER. I think it is improper to have it on the Consent Calendar, and, therefore, I object.

NATIONAL ARCHIVES

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 10545) to create an establishment to be known as the national archives, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Speaker, I object.

SIOUX TRIBE OF INDIANS

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6862) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Interior to investigate, hear, and determine the claims of individual members of the Sioux Tribe of Indians against tribal funds or against the United States.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to investigate, hear, and determine the claims of the individual Indians whose names are enrolled on the approved rolls of the following Indian agencies: Rosebud, Pine Ridge, Lower Brule, Crow Creek, Cheyenne River, Yankton, Sisseton, and Flandreaux, in the State of South Dakota; Fort Peck, in the State of Montana; Fort Totten, in the State of North Dakota; Standing Rock, in the States of North and South Dakota; and Santee, in the State of Nebraska: Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to make all rules and regulations necessary to carry out the provisions of this act: Provided further, That the claims which shall be investigated under this act shall be individual claims for allotments of land and for loss of personal property or improvements where the claimants or those through whom the claims originated were not members of any band of Indians engaged in hostilities against the United States at the time the losses occurred. If any such claims shall be considered meritorious, the Secretary of the Interior shall adjust same where there is existing law to authorize their adjustment, and such other meritorious claims he shall report to Congress with appropriate recommendation.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

NATIONAL CEMETERY, BATON ROUGE, LA.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8742) to authorize the Secretary of War to grant and convey to the city of Baton Rouge, La., a perpetual easement for public-street purposes over and upon a portion of that part of the United States National Cemetery at Baton Rouge, La., lying outside the cemetery wall.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman reserve his objection?

Mr. SCHAFER. I shall reserve the objection, but there is no provision in the bill that this property be returned to the Federal Government should the State of Louisiana discontinue the use of the property for public-road purposes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I propose to offer that amendment.

Mr. SCHAFER. Then I shall not object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the Clerk will report the committee amendment.

There was no objection, and the Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized, subject to such conditions as may seem to him proper, to convey by proper quitclaim deed, to the city of Baton Rouge, La., a municipal corporation of the State of Louisiana, for use as a public street, all the right, title, and interest of the United States in and to a parcel of ground 31.5 feet by 322 feet between parallel lines and fronting 31.5 on the north side of Convention Street and 31.5 on the south side of Florida Street, being the east 31.5 feet of square 21 in that part of the city of Baton Rouge, La., known as Hickey Duncan and Mather Town as shown on map made by William G. Waller, civil engineer, dated July 18, 1878, on file with clerk of the court in the courthouse of East Baton Rouge Parish, State of Louisiana, being that small portion of land belonging to the national cemetery at Baton Rouge, La., lying outside the cemetery wall: Provided, That prior to the delivery of any conveyance under this act the city of Baton Rouge, La., shall notify the Secretary of War, in writing, of its willingness to accept and maintain as a public street the parcel of ground included in such conveyance: Provided further, That upon the execution and delivery of any conveyance herein authorized the jurisdiction of the United States of America, which has been heretofore ceded to the United States by the State of Louisiana over such parcel of ground, shall hereby cease and determine and shall hereafter vest and be in the State of Louisiana."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LAGUARDIA: Page 4, add the following:

"SEC. 2. No part of the property granted and conveyed by the Secretary of War for the purposes aforesaid shall be used for any other than street purposes and when such property shall cease to be so used it shall revert to the United States of America, together with jurisdiction over such parcel of ground."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The title was amended to read: "A bill to authorize the Secretary of War to convey to the city of Baton Rouge, La., a portion of the Baton Rouge National Cemetery for use as a public street."

ROADS AT THE PRESIDIO OF SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 9047) to authorize appropriations for the construction of roads at the Presidio of San Francisco, Calif.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this is another bill in the same class I referred to in connection with the bill of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. JEFFERS]. There is ample authority already. This bill is just an effort to expedite those appropriations. For the reasons I gave in withdrawing my objection to the Alabama bill, and because this is a bill by the lady from California [Mrs. KAHN], I am not going to object. I have reason to hope that we will not continue to get these bills, which are really an evasion of the Budget.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $47,200 for the purpose of completing the military roads at the Presidio of San Francisco, Calif.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

PAVING OF RINGGOLD ROAD, GEORGIA

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 11724) to provide for the paving of the Government road, known as the Ringgold Road, extending from Chickamauga and Chattanooga National Military Park, in the State of Georgia, to the town of Ringgold, Ga., constituting an approach road to the Chickamauga and Chattanooga National Military Park.

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill, of which I am the author, be striken from the Consent Calendar.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Speaker, in view of the statement of the gentleman from Georgia, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be rereferred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ACOMA PUEBLO INDIANS

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 11479) to reserve certain lands on the public domain in Valencia County, N. Mex., for the use and benefit of the Acoma Pueblo Indians.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, we take care of the Acoma Indians at the present time. Will we be called upon to do a similar thing for the Lagunas?

Mr. MORROW. This is for the purpose of closing the matter and letting both Indian pueblos have an equal amount.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And this will settle the matter permanently?

Mr. MORROW. This will settle it entirely. It is the idea to give them the grazing lands when the opportunity exists, which they now have. They have been using this land under Executive order. It is now proposed to reserve the area to them, so that they will have the land and it will be settled for all time.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit, I visited this section three or four years ago and urged at that time that something of this kind should be done to settle a long-standing dispute between these two pueblos. Incidentally it will interest the gentleman to know that no Indians are showing better results in progress than these Acoma Pueblo Indians.

Mr. MORROW. Mr. Chairman, in order that full information may be had concerning the legislation I am inserting herein my report from the Committee on Indian Affairs, which report includes the letter from the Acting Secretary of the Interior, Mr. E. C. Finney, on the measure:

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all vacant, unappropriated, and undisposed of lands within township 7 north, ranges 7 and 8 west, and fractional township 8 north, range 8 west, New Mexico principal meridian, in New Mexico, be, and they are hereby, reserved for the sole use and occupancy of the Indians of the Acoma Pueblo: Provided, That the rights and claims of any bona fide settler initiated under the public land laws prior to October 3, 1927, the date of withdrawal of the lands from all forms of entry, shall not be affected by this act.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

Mr. MORROW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing the report on this bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Mexico?

There was no objection.

The report referred to is as follows:

Mr. MORROW, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, submitted the following report (to accompany H. R. 11479):

The Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 11479) to reserve certain lands on the public domain in Valencia County, N. Mex., for the use and benefit of the Acoma Pueblo Indians, having considered the same, report thereon with a recommendation that it do pass without amendment.

Inquiry into the situation which this bill seeks to remedy reveals that for many years the Indians of the Acoma and Laguna Pueblos have been engaged in controversy over lands which were set aside for their joint use. The Lagunas, about 1,900 in number, have a total of 264,880 acres under their control at present, while the Acomas, numbering about 841, have only 95,791 acres of land. This provides approximately 100 acres of grazing land per capita for the Acomas. Since they are strictly a shepherd folk, engaged in sheep and goat raising, this is absolutely inadequate.

There are near by approximately 14,000 acres of semiarid lands of little value except for grazing which were temporarily withdrawn from entry on October 3, 1927, and upon which there had previously been little interest in the establishment of homestead entries. This bill would reserve the area for the sole use and occupancy of the Indians of the Acoma Pueblo.

The bill contains a proviso for the protection of any bona fide settlers who went upon the land prior to its temporary withdrawal.

The Secretary of the Interior favors enactment of the bill as indicated by the following letter addressed to the chairman of the committee:

THE SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, March 10, 1928.

Hon. SCOTT LEAVITT,
Chairman Committee on Indian Affairs,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. LEAVITT: Further reference is made to your letter of February 29, 1928, transmitting for report copy of H. R. 11479, a bill to reserve certain lands on the public domain in Valencia County, N. Mex., for the use and benefit of the Acoma Pueblo Indians.

The Acoma pueblo is a community of Indians numbering about 841 located in Valencia County, N. Mex. Part of the land of this pueblo is held by the Indians through original grant from the King of Spain, made during the Spanish sovereignty and confirmed by Congress since the acquisition thereof (10 Stat. 309; 11 Stat. 374). In addition they have acquired by purchase small grants from Mexicans, and lands were provided for the joint use of the Acoma and Laguna pueblos by the Government through Executive order of March 21, 1917.

However, these Indians and the Indians of the Laguna pueblo have for many years been engaged in a controversy over lands. As stated above, Executive order of March 21, 1917, set aside certain lands for the use of the Lagunas and the Acomas, but the Lagunas thereafter contended that the land thus set aside was for their use exclusively. In order that the Indians of both pueblos might keep their livestock separate and not encroach upon each others' territory and at the same time settle somewhat the existing controversy, the Lagunas were given permission to build a fence inclosing the greater part of the Executive order area of 1917 and were given exclusive grazing rights on the areas thus fenced. The Lagunas, with a population of approximately 1,900, have a total of 264,880 acres under their control, while the Acomas, with a population of approximately 841, have only a total of 95,791 acres, or a little more than 100 acres of grazing land per capita.

Reports from the field show that the future welfare of the Acoma Indians is dependent upon additional grazing lands as they are a strictly shepherd folk engaged in sheep and goat raising and their present areas are inadequate for their needs. The lands involved in the bill covering approximately 14,000 acres were temporarily withdrawn from entry October 3, 1927, and are in a semiarid belt and are of so little value except for grazing purposes that no interest has been shown to any great extent in establishing homestead entries thereon.

In view of the facts herein set out it is respectfully recommended that the proposed legislation be given favorable consideration by your committee and the Congress.

Very truly yours,

E. C. FINNEY, Acting Secretary.

CLAIMS OF CALIFORNIA INDIANS

The next business on the Censent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 491) authorizing the attorney general of the State of California to bring suit in the Court of Claims on behalf of the Indians of California.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that this is merely one of many bills that pass the House practically without explanation and which breaks pretty nearly every policy laid down by the House. In the first place, it ignores the statute of limitations without making any excuse whatever for so doing. In the second place, this particular bill, on page 2, makes a declaration which I think is particularly dangerous in matters of legislation. It declares, although the committee has stricken out the words "to be the judgment of the Congress"—

It is hereby declared to be the judgment of the Congress that the loss to the said Indians on account of their failure to secure the lands and compensation provided for in the 18 unratified treaties is sufficient ground for equitable relief.

And then this bill goes on and refers this matter to the Court of Claims for adjudication, determining the case even before it reaches the court.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERHILL. In a moment.

This particular bill goes back to the year 1852. This is directly against the policy of the House, for the Committee on War Claims has refused thus far at this session and in the past two or three sessions to take up matters which occurred during the Civil War and some time subsequent to that.

Mr. KNUTSON. The gentleman is in error when he states that the Committee on War Claims has done that.

Mr. UNDERHILL. That is my understanding, at least. My understanding is that the committee has passed a rule in the committee refusing to take up such claims at this session, and it passed the same rule at the last session.

Mr. LEAVITT. This, of course, is not a war claim. It is a claim by Indians against their Government for losses incurred through the actions of people of the white race. It has to do with the robbing of these Indians by some of those who went into California at the time of the gold rush. They have been trying for many years to get into the Court of Claims and adjudicate their claims. It has not been due to failure on their part that they have not been in the Court of Claims. If justice is to be done them, the statute of limitations must be waived. The gentleman from California [Mr. LEA] has asked that the bill be passed over temporarily while he is getting information from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs regarding an amendment.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Speaker, I want to continue for a moment. I have picked out the most reasonable bill of this character, the one that has the best argument back of it that I could possibly find, to bring this matter to the attention of the House. I will say in connection with this particular bill that not one of the Indians whose land was taken is living. The Indians of our land are becoming the wealthiest of our people.

Mr. LEAVITT. Not these Indians.

Mr. UNDERHILL. "Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these," and yet "they toil not, neither do they spin." We are constantly passing out from the Treasury of the United States, not one million dollars, or two millions, but many millions, to the Indians, and I am getting, I will say, not rather suspicious, but of an inquiring turn of mind to find out why this particular group should be subject to treatment different from the treatment accorded white people and other people of the land.

Mr. LEAVITT. It would be just as fair to say that all the white people of the country are rich simply because John D. Rockefeller is a multimillionaire as to make that statement. The Osage Indians and other tribes of Oklahoma are rich because of the discovery of oil on their land. But these Indians in California are destitute, except as the result of their own labor, and they do work.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Are they wards of the Government, under the jurisdiction of and supported by the United States?

Mr. LEAVITT. Many of them are, and many of them are not.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, the bill is an unusual bill. I do not want to make a strong general statement concerning it, but I do not believe there is any State where they criticize more the Federal Government for lack of care of the Indians and do less for them than the State of California. Here the State of California is to bring a suit, and later there is an unlimited amount to which the State may be reimbursed. They are not even limited to the amount the State expends. The State may be reimbursed and find this a very profitable undertaking, this care they are giving the Indians.

Furthermore, on page 3, the bill provides that the Government may set off against the Indians' claims any amount expended under specific appropriations, but we spend a lot more under general appropriations than we do under specific appropriations. Any money that we spend for the benefit of these Indians under general appropriations, and it will run into the millions, can not be set off under this bill. For that and a number of other reasons I think it very desirable that the bill go over as suggested.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes.

Mr. UNDERHILL. I have not mentioned what is a strong suspicion in my mind, that these various bills which come before us are raked up by claims attorneys here in Washington, and the way this bill is drawn is pretty conclusive evidence that some shrewd claims lawyer had a finger in the pie or pen in the ink when he wrote the bill.

Mr. LEAVITT. The gentleman knows that the proceeding in this case is by the attorney general of California.

Mr. UNDERHILL. But he did not write the provisions of the bill.

Mr. CRAMTON. In that connection I will say that section 5 provides that we shall not reimburse the State for the services of the attorney general, but for moneys expended by the State in the employment of attorneys to prosecute the claims. So on the face of it the attorney general is not going to prosecute the claims.

There is one other aspect to this case, since it has gotten to the attention of the House. The Budget suggested in this particular case that the bill would be all right if it carried with it also a provision that after this settlement is made the health and education work for these Indians should be carried on by the State of California. That is logical. When we make a settlement and pay them every cent, if any, we owe them, then the State of California should take up the burden of educating them and caring for their health, the same as it does for its other citizens. However, I would be opposed to that provision for the reason that I do not think the State of California would or could give them the care that the Federal Government is now giving them and should continue to give them.

Mr. KNUTSON. The gentleman is not criticizing the committee for not incorporating the suggestion of the Budget Bureau into this legislation, I take it.

Mr. CRAMTON. But since the report of the committee leaves upon the Federal Government all the burden for continuing their health work and their education that is upon it now, the bill itself is hardly logical.

Mr. LEAVITT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. I yield, although I do not have the floor.

Mr. LEAVITT. I do not wish to take time from other bills, but since this bill has been attacked I ought to say this: In this case, just as in the case of the Texas Indians, something can be said with regard to the duties of the State, but the Indians themselves are in destitute circumstances; they are in many cases wards of the Government and in many cases where they have not been they have not been properly treated. It is a practical fact that unless the Federal Government does do this thing itself it is not done and the Indians are the sufferers.

Mr. CRAMTON. Just as an illustration, may I ask the gentleman from Montana this: We are now appropriating moneys to buy lands for the homeless Indians in California. Suppose this bill passes, claims are allowed, and there is a million dollars, or such a matter——

Mr. UNDERHILL (interposing). Two million dollars.

Mr. CRAMTON. They hope for $5,000,000, but they should not have over $1,000,000 at the outside. But suppose this bill passes, and settlement is made, and the money is frittered away. Then they expect us to go on just the same in buying lands for the homeless Indians of California, and they will be just as needy and just as much of an obligation as they are to-day. If this is to go through, there ought to be some provision written into the bill which would provide that whatever money is found to be due them shall constitute a fund which is to be expended for their benefit, which is to be expended for the purpose of buying lands for them and the providing of hospitals, and so forth.

Mr. KNUTSON. That is exactly what is contemplated.

Mr. CRAMTON. And the money ought not to be frittered away in some kind of a per capita payment.

Mr. KNUTSON. That is exactly what is contemplated.

Mr. CRAMTON. I should like to see it written into the law.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is: Is there objection?

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Montana desires to make that request I shall withdraw my objection.

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Speaker, I make that request at the suggestion of the gentleman from California [Mr. LEA].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Montana asks unanimous consent that this bill may be passed over without prejudice. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

RELIEF OF THE STATE OF VERMONT

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 9767), to authorize an appropriation for the relief of the State of Vermont on account of roads and bridges damaged or destroyed by the recent flood.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this bill is not quite as serious as the Kentucky bill, which we recently passed over. That bill placed on the Federal Government the responsibility for all roads. This, I understand, is only for the Federal-aid roads, but it is a very large amount. I understand it has been put on as an amendment to the agricultural bill. For these reasons I think it ought not to be on this calendar and I, therefore, object.

EDUCATIONAL LEAVE TO EMPLOYEES OF THE INDIAN SERVICE

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 11629) to amend the proviso of the act approved August 24, 1912, with reference to educational leave to employees of the Indian Service.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. SNELL). Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I have some perfecting amendments, and may I call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that in referring to the United States Code it is customary to refer to sections and not to paragraphs, because there are paragraphs in the sections, and it is the sections that are numbered.

Then may I also suggest that we strike out everything after the word "amended" in line 8, down to the words "so that the proviso shall read," and then will follow the amended proviso. Otherwise we will have in our statutes a provision striking out certain words and inserting others. It is quite proper to report the bill in this way for the information of the House, but when you write it into law the gentleman can readily see the difficulty of inserting, for instance, in the fourth line certain words after the word "year." What the gentleman wants is that the act be, and the same is hereby, amended so that the proviso shall read, and so forth.

Mr. LEAVITT. There can be no objection to that. The bill is practically in the form in which it came from the department.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the proviso of the act approved August 24, 1912 (37 Stat. L. 519), as amended by the act approved August 24, 1922 (42 Stat. L. 829), be, and the same is hereby, amended by inserting in the second line of the sixth paragraph thereof, after the word "schools," the words "and physicians of the Indian Service," and by inserting in the fourth line thereof, after the word "year," the words "or not to exceed 60 days in every alternate year," so that the proviso shall read: "Provided, That hereafter employees of the Indian schools and physicians of the Indian Service may be allowed, in addition to annual leave, educational leave not to exceed 30 days per calendar year, or 60 days in every alternate year, for attendance at educational gatherings, conventions, institutions, or training schools, if the interest of the service require, and under such regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe, and no additional salary or expense on account of this leave of absence shall be incurred."

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 4, after the figures "519," insert the words "United States Code, title 25, paragraph 275"; and page 1, line 7, after the figures "829," insert the words "United States Code, title 25, paragraph 275."

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I have an amendment to the committee amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LAGUARDIA to the committee amendment: Page 1, line 8, after the word "amended," strike out the balance of the line and all of line 9; and on page 2 strike out all of lines 1, 2, 3, and the words "in every alternate year" in line 4.

The amendment to the committee amendment was agreed to.

The committee amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I have another amendment: On page 1, line 5, strike out the word "paragraph" and insert in lieu thereof the word "section," and in line 7 strike out the word "paragraph" and insert in lieu thereof the word "section."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE WABASH RIVER

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 9485) granting the consent of Congress to Roy Clippinger, Ulys Pyle, Edgar Leathers, Groves K. Flescher, Carmen Flescher, their heirs, legal representatives, and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Wabash River.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the author of the bill if Roy Clippinger and the other parties mentioned in the bill are going to construct this bridge or whether they are bridge speculators, such as have been obtaining rights from Congress to construct bridges and then selling such rights to the big bridge trust?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. The parties named in the bill are all residents of the vicinity where this bridge is to be constructed. They now own and operate a ferry across the Wabash River at this point and they intend to build the bridge themselves.

Mr. SCHAFER. I shall not object.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. DYER. Are they going to charge tolls on the bridge?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. Certainly.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Does the gentleman know of his own knowledge if permission to construct a bridge has been granted to the permittees mentioned in this bill heretofore and whether they have assigned any such permit?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. No, sir; they have not.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to Roy Clippinger, Ulys Pyle, Edgar Leathers, Groves K. Flescher, Carmen Flescher, their heirs, legal representatives, and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Wabash River at a point suitable to the interests of navigation between a point at or near McGregors Ferry in White County, Ill., and a point in Posey County, Ind., in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906, and subject to the conditions and limitations contained in this act.

SEC. 2. There is hereby conferred upon Roy Clippinger, Ulys Pyle, Edgar Leathers, Groves K. Flescher, Carmen Flescher, their heirs, legal representatives, and assigns, all such rights and powers to enter upon lands and to acquire, condemn, occupy, possess, and use real estate and other property needed for the location, construction, operation, and maintenance of such bridge and its approaches and terminals as are possessed by railroad corporations for railroad purposes or by bridge corporations for bridge purposes in the States in which such real estate or other property is situated, upon making just compensation therefor, to be ascertained and paid according to the laws of such State, and the proceedings therefor shall be the same as in the condemnation and expropriation of property in such State.

SEC. 3. The said Roy Clippinger, Ulys Pyle, Edgar Leathers, Groves K. Flescher, Carmen Flescher, their heirs, legal representatives, and assigns, are hereby authorized to fix and charge tolls for transit over such bridge, and the rates of toll so fixed shall be the legal rates until changed by the Secretary of War under the authority contained in the act of March 23, 1906.

SEC. 4. After the completion of such bridge, as determined by the Secretary of War, either the State of Indiana, the State of Illinois, any political subdivision of either of such States, within or adjoining which any part of such bridge is located, or any two or more of them jointly, may at any time acquire and take over all right, title, and interest in such bridge and its approaches, and any interest in real property necessary therefor, by purchase or by condemnation in accordance with the laws of either of such States governing the acquisition of private property for public purposes by condemnation. If at any time after the expiration of 50 years after the completion of such bridge the same is acquired by condemnation, the amount of damages or compensation to be allowed shall not include good will, going value, or prospective revenues or profits, but shall be limited to the sum of (1) the actual cost of constructing such bridge and its approaches, less a reasonable deduction for actual depreciation in value, (2) the actual cost of acquiring such interests in real property, (3) actual financing and promotion cost, not to exceed 10 per cent of the sum of the cost of constructing the bridge and its approaches and acquiring such interest in real property, and (4) actual expenditures for necessary improvements.

SEC. 5. If such bridge shall be taken over or acquired by the States or political subdivisions thereof as provided in section 4 of this act, and if tolls are charged for the use thereof, the rates of toll shall be so adjusted as to provide a fund sufficient to pay for the cost of maintaining, repairing, and operating the bridge and its approaches, to pay an adequate return on the cost thereof, and to provide a sinking fund sufficient to amortize the amount paid therefor as soon as possible under reasonable charges, but within a period of not to exceed 20 years from the date of acquiring the same. After a sinking fund sufficient to pay the cost of acquiring the bridge and its approaches shall have been provided, such bridge shall thereafter be maintained and operated free of tolls, or the rates of toll shall thereafter be so adjusted as to provide a fund of not to exceed the amount necessary for the proper care, repair, maintenance, and operation of the bridge and its approaches. An accurate record of the amount paid for acquiring the bridge and its approaches, the expenditures for operating, repairing, and maintaining the same, and of the daily tolls collected shall be kept, and shall be available for the information of all persons interested.

SEC. 6. Roy Clippinger, Ulys Pyle, Edgar Leathers, Groves K. Flescher, Carmen Flescher, their heirs, legal representatives, and assigns, shall within 90 days after the completion of such bridge file with the Secretary of War and with the State highway commissions of the States of Indiana and Illinois, a sworn itemized statement showing the actual original cost of constructing such bridge and its approaches, the actual cost of acquiring any interest in real property necessary therefor, and the actual financing and promotion costs. The Secretary of War, at any time within three years after the completion of such bridge, shall investigate the actual cost of constructing the same and for such purpose the said Roy Clippinger, Ulys Pyle, Edgar Leathers, Groves K. Flescher, Carmen Flescher, their heirs, legal representatives, and assigns, shall make available all its records in connection with the financing and construction thereof. The findings of the Secretary of War as to the actual original cost of the bridge shall be conclusive, subject only to review in a court of equity for fraud or gross mistake.

SEC. 7. The right to sell, assign, transfer, and mortgage all the rights, powers, and privileges conferred by this act, is hereby granted to Roy Clippinger, Ulys Pyle, Edgar Leathers, Groves K. Flescher, Carmen Flescher, their heirs, legal representatives, and assigns, and any corporation to which or any person to whom such rights, powers, and privileges may be sold, assigned, or transferred, or who shall acquire the same by mortgage foreclosure or otherwise, is hereby authorized and empowered to exercise the same as fully as though conferred herein directly upon such corporation or person.

SEC. 8. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill authorizing Roy Clippinger, Ulys Pyle, Edgar Leathers, Groves K. Flescher, Carmen Flescher, their heirs, legal representatives, and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Wabash River at or near McGregors Ferry in White County, Ill."

BRIDGE ACROSS LAKE CHAMPLAIN

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 10643) authorizing the Gulf Coast Properties (Inc.), its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across Lake Champlain at or near Rouses Point, N. Y., and a point at or near Alburg, Vt.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Reserving the right to object, I ask the gentleman if the permittees have been granted permission to construct other bridges which they have assigned?

Mr. DENISON. The gentleman from New York just presiding as Speaker pro tempore is the author of this bill, and I will yield to him to answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. SNELL. What is the question?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. We have a situation here which is stated in documents of which I have photostatic copies whereby it has been the practice of a certain group to obtain these permits to construct bridges and then assign them to others. I deem it my duty to make this inquiry in all of these bridge bills.

Mr. SNELL. I can answer the gentleman. This company is going to construct the bridge itself. They have the money and are doing it at the request of the local people on both sides of the river in New York and the State of Vermont.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. CHINDBLOM). The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10643) authorizing the Gulf Coast Properties (Inc.), its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across Lake Champlain at or near Rouses Point, N. Y., and a point at or near Alburg, Vt.

Be it enacted, etc., That in order to facilitate interstate commerce, improve the postal service, and provide for military and other purposes, the Gulf Coast Properties (Inc.), its successors and assigns, be, and is hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across Lake Champlain, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, between a point at or near Rouses Point, N. Y., and a point at or near Windmill Point, Vt., or near Alburg, Vt., in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906, and subject to the conditions and limitations contained in this act.

SEC. 2. There is hereby conferred upon Gulf Coast Properties (Inc.), its successors and assigns, all such rights and powers to enter upon lands and to acquire, condemn, occupy, possess, and use real estate and other property needed for the location, construction, operation, and maintenance of such bridge and its approaches as are possessed by railroad corporations for railroad purposes or by bridge corporations for bridge purposes in the State in which such real estate or other property is situated, upon making just compensation therefor, to be ascertained and paid according to the laws of such State, and the proceedings therefor shall be the same as in the condemnation or expropriation of property for public purposes in such State.

SEC. 3. The said Gulf Coast Properties (Inc.), its successors and assigns, is hereby authorized to fix and charge tolls for transit over such bridge, and the rates of toll so fixed shall be the legal rates until changed by the Secretary of War under the authority contained in the act of March 23, 1906.

SEC. 4. After the completion of such bridge, as determined by the Secretary of War, either the State of New York, the State of Vermont, any public agency or political subdivision of either of such States within or adjoining which any part of such bridge is located, or any two or more of them jointly, may at any time acquire and take over all right, title, and interest in such bridge and its approaches and any interest in real property necessary therefor, by purchase or by condemnation or expropriation, in accordance with the laws of either of such States governing the acquisition of private property for public purposes by condemnation or expropriation. If at any time after the expiration of 20 years after the completion of such bridge the same is acquired by condemnation or expropriation, the amount of damages or compensation to be allowed shall not include good will, going value, or prospective revenues or profits, but shall be limited to the sum of (1) the actual cost of constructing such bridge and its approaches, less a reasonable deduction for actual depreciation in value; (2) the actual cost of acquiring such interests in real property; (3) actual financing and promotion costs, not to exceed 10 per cent of the sum of the cost of constructing the bridge and its approaches and acquiring such interests in real property; and (4) actual expenditures for necessary improvements.

SEC. 5. If such bridge shall at any time be taken over or acquired by the States or public agencies or political subdivisions thereof, or by either of them, as provided in section 4 of this act, and if tolls are thereafter charged for the use thereof, the rates of toll shall be so adjusted as to provide a fund sufficient to pay for the reasonable cost of maintaining, repairing, and operating the bridge and its approaches under economical management, and to provide a sinking fund sufficient to amortize the amount paid therefor, including reasonable interest and financing cost, as soon as possible under reasonable charges, but within a period of not to exceed 20 years from the date of acquiring the same. After a sinking fund sufficient for such amortization shall have been so provided, such bridge shall thereafter be maintained and operated free of tolls, or the rates of toll shall thereafter be so adjusted as to provide a fund of not to exceed the amount necessary for the proper maintenance, repair, and operation of the bridge and its approaches under economical management. An accurate record of the amount paid for acquiring the bridge and its approaches, the actual expenditures for maintaining, repairing, and operating the same, and of the daily tolls collected, shall be kept and shall be available for the information of all persons interested.

The findings of the Secretary of War as to the reasonable costs of the construction, financing, and promotion of the bridge shall be conclusive for the purposes mentioned in section 4 of this act, subject only to review in a court of equity for fraud or gross mistake.

SEC. 7. The right to sell, assign, transfer, and mortgage all the rights, powers, and privileges conferred by this act is hereby granted to Gulf Coast Properties (Inc.), its successors and assigns, and any corporation to which or any person to whom such rights, powers, and privileges may be sold, assigned, or transferred, or who shall acquire the same by mortgage foreclosure or otherwise, is hereby authorized and empowered to exercise the same as fully as though conferred herein directly upon such corporation or person.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE KANAWHA RIVER AT POINT PLEASANT, W. VA.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 11138) authorizing Point Pleasant Henderson Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Kanawha River at or near Point Pleasant, W. Va.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I have talked with the gentleman who introduced the bill, and he assures me that the people who are to construct this bridge do not propose to assign their rights. As Members know, I have been objecting to Eugene M. Elliott and his associates, as well as any corporation in which he is interested, from securing additional grants. I find Mr. Elliott has numerous corporations. I have copies of charters, and he controls practically all the stock. I also found that he assigns the franchises and does not construct the bridges.

Now, it is going to be a pretty hard matter for a Member to keep track of all the bills as well as learn the officers of the corporations who are asking for permits to build the bridges. I want to ask the gentleman from Illinois if it would be requesting too much if his committee required corporations or the Member who introduces the bill to file a statement with the committee, to be included in the report, giving the names and officers of the corporation, and a statement as to whether they propose to build the bridge or to assign their rights? I am sure this would assist to expedite business of the House. If we could get this information from the report, and it was found the persons requesting the passage of the bill intended to construct the bridge and not simply to sell the franchise, I doubt if any Member would offer an objection, unless a local situation warranted the action.

Mr. DENISON. In these bridge franchises granted by Congress, if they are granted to private individuals or companies, the bills give the right to assign. Sometimes the companies or persons authorized to build a bridge may fail financially after they get the bridge started, and before it is completed, and they assign the franchise to somebody who will finish the job. After careful consideration it has been found necessary to give the right to assign. That is the policy of the House and Senate, and it is a necessary provision in any bill granting a franchise to private individuals to build a bridge.

As to the committee ascertaining who the officers of the company are, that is a matter with which the committee is not concerned. Any Member of Congress can see the Member who introduces the bill and get the information from him. If he ascertains any facts concerning the company or the individuals who are going to construct the bridge which he thinks would justify him in objecting, he has that privilege. That is a matter the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce does not have time to go into.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I want to say that my interest is only in protecting the people.

Mr. DENISON. I understand the gentleman's interest.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Numerous bills were passed for Mr. Elliott and his corporations before I made my statement on the floor. Since then bills have been introduced; two were on the Consent Calendar which were objected to by me, and I do not see them on the calendar to-day. I want to ask the gentleman if it is his purpose to call up the bills?

Mr. DENISON. To what bills does the gentleman refer?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. One is in the name of E. M. Elliott & Associates, and the other in the name of the American Bridge & Ferry Co., which he controls. One is over the Mississippi River at St. Louis and the other is over the Missouri River between St. Louis and St. Charles Counties, in Missouri.

Mr. DENISON. May I ask the gentleman who introduced the bills?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. My colleague, Mr. NIEDRINGHAUS, who had no knowledge at the time of the activities of Mr. Elliott.

Mr. DENISON. Let me say that as I understand it those bills have been objected to and are off the calendar.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Yes; but they can be put back.

Mr. DENISON. The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce does not request bills to be put on the Consent Calendar after they have once been objected to. That is the business of the author of the bill. Sometimes the author may come and request some member of the committee to do it, but the members of the committee have no personal interest in these bills. The bills referred to will not get back on the Consent Calendar unless the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. NIEDRINGHAUS] requests the Clerk to put them on.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. In view of the statement made by the gentleman from Illinois, and in view of the fact that there is a bill pending before the gentleman's committee now granting a franchise to Mr. Elliott or the American Bridge & Ferry Co., will the committee report that bill to the House if the department makes a favorable report?

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, I do not know the bill the gentleman has reference to.

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SCHAFER. I object.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman will not object.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. I think I can settle this matter to-day.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, I shall object to that at this time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Speaker, this bill has been passed by the Senate, and we expect to substitute the Senate bill for the House bill.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate bill be read in lieu of the House bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection the Clerk will read the Senate bill (S. 3558).

There was no objection, and the Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in order to promote interstate commerce, improve the postal service, and provide for military and other purposes, the Point Pleasant Henderson Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, be, and is hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Kanawha River, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at or near Point Pleasant, W. Va., in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 22, 1906, and subject to the conditions and limitations contained in this act.

SEC. 2. After the completion of such bridge, as determined by the Secretary of War, either the State of West Virginia, any political subdivision thereof within or adjoining which any part of such bridge is located, or any two or more of them jointly, may at any time acquire and take over all right, title, and interest in such bridge and its approaches, and any interest in real property necessary therefor, by purchase or by condemnation or expropriation, in accordance with the laws of such State governing the acquisition of private property for public purposes by condemnation or expropriation. If at any time after the expiration of 20 years after the completion of such bridge the same is acquired by condemnation or expropriation, the amount of damages or compensation to be allowed shall not include good will, going value, or prospective revenues or profits, but shall be limited to the sum of (1) the actual cost of constructing such bridge and its approaches, less a reasonable deduction for actual depreciation in value; (2) the actual cost of acquiring such interests in real property; (3) actual financing and promotion cost, not to exceed 10 per cent of the sum of the cost of constructing the bridge and its approaches and acquiring such interests in real property; and (4) actual expenditures for necessary improvements.

SEC. 3. If such bridge shall at any time be taken over or acquired by the State of West Virginia, or by any municipality or other political subdivision or public agency thereof, under the provisions of section 2 of this act, and if tolls are thereafter charged for the use thereof, the rates of toll shall be so adjusted as to provide a fund sufficient to pay for the reasonable cost of maintaining, repairing, and operating the bridge and its approaches under economical management and to provide a sinking fund sufficient to amortize the amount paid therefor, including reasonable interest and financing cost, as soon as possible under reasonable charges, but within a period of not to exceed 20 years from the date of acquiring the same. After a sinking fund sufficient for such amortization shall have been so provided, such bridge shall thereafter be maintained and operated free of tolls, or the rates of toll shall thereafter be so adjusted as to provide a fund of not to exceed the amount necessary for the proper maintenance, repair, and operation of the bridge and its approaches under economical management. An accurate record of the amount paid for acquiring the bridge and its approaches, the actual expenditures for maintaining, repairing, and operating the same, and of the daily tolls collected shall be kept and shall be available for the information of all persons interested.

SEC. 4. The Point Pleasant Henderson Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, shall, within 90 days after the completion of such bridge, file with the Secretary of War and with the highway department of the State of West Virginia, a sworn itemized statement showing the actual original cost of constructing the bridge and its approaches, the actual cost of acquiring any interest in real property necessary therefor, and the actual financing and promotion costs. The Secretary of War may, and at the request of the highway department of the State of West Virginia, shall, at any time, within three years after the completion of such bridge, investigate such costs and determine the accuracy and the reasonableness of the costs alleged in the statement of costs so filed, and shall make a finding of the actual and reasonable costs of constructing, financing, and promoting such bridge; for the purpose of such investigation the said Point Pleasant Henderson Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, shall make available all of its records in connection with the construction, financing, and promotion thereof. The findings of the Secretary of War as to the reasonable costs of the construction, financing, and promotion of the bridge shall be conclusive for the purposes mentioned in section 2 of this act, subject only to review in a court of equity for fraud or gross mistake.

SEC. 5. The right to sell, assign, transfer, and mortgage all the rights, powers, and privileges conferred by this act is hereby granted to Point Pleasant Henderson Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, and any corporation to which or any person to whom such rights, powers, and privileges may be sold, assigned, or transferred, or who shall acquire the same by mortgage foreclosure or otherwise, is hereby authorized and empowered to exercise the same as fully as though conferred herein directly upon such corporation or person.

SEC. 6. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 1, line 5, after the word "Pleasant," insert the word "and."
Page 4, line 5, after the word "Pleasant," insert the word "and."
Page 4, line 21, after the word "Pleasant," insert the word "and."
Page 5, line 6, after the word "Pleasant," insert the word "and."

Mr. SCHAFER (when the Clerk had read section 1). Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word in order to ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON] whether his committee holds hearings on these bridge bills, and whether those interested in obtaining these vested interests appear before the committee or the subcommittee so that the committee can develop the necessity for the bridges, and who are behind the bills?

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, whenever a bill of this kind is referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, the committee refers it to the different departments of the Government for a report. If there is no objection presented to the committee by any Member of the House or anyone else, then the committee requires a statement to be filed by the author of the bill giving the committee certain information, if it is to be a privately constructed bridge. If the Member of the House who files the bill makes a satisfactory statement as to the facts about which he is asked for information, the committee puts the bill in proper shape to conform to the standard forms agreed upon by the committees of the House and Senate, and then reports the bill favorably. If anyone asks for a hearing, he is given one.

Mr. SCHAFER. If the committee has knowledge that the franchises are requested by speculators who have no intention themselves of constructing the bridge, but merely obtain the right to construct and sell out at a handsome profit to some other corporation, would the gentleman's committee favor continuing that practice?

Mr. DENISON. Not at all, if the committee had that information, but we do not have that information. We will be glad to have the gentleman from Wisconsin or anyone else give us any information of that kind.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill authorizing Point Pleasant and Henderson Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Kanawha River at or near Point Pleasant, W. Va."

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

A similar House bill (H. R. 11138) was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS OCMULGEE RIVER, GA.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 11203) granting the consent of Congress to the counties of Telfair and Coffee to construct, maintain, and operate a free highway bridge across the Ocmulgee River between a point at or near lands owned by Duncan McLean in Coffee County and a point at or near the northern terminus of the present Jacksonville Ferry in Telfair County, said bridge to be at or near said ferry on a public road to be constructed from McRae in Telfair County to Broxton and Douglas in Coffee County.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the counties of Telfair and Coffee to construct, maintain, and operate a free highway bridge across the Ocmulgee River between a point at or near lands owned by Duncan McLean in Coffee County and a point at or near the northern terminus of the present Jacksonville Ferry in Telfair County, said bridge to be at or near said ferry on a public road to be constructed from McRae in Telfair County to Broxton and Douglas in Coffee County, in accordance with the provisions of an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 1, line 4, after the word "Coffee" insert "State of Georgia".

Page 2, line 1, strike out "between a point at or near lands owned by Duncan McLean in Coffee County, and a point" and insert "at a point suitable to the interests of navigation", and in line 3, strike out "the northern terminus of" and in line 5 insert the word "Georgia" at the beginning of the line and strike out "said bridge to be at or near said ferry on a public road to be constructed from McRae in Telfair County to Broxton and Douglas in Coffee County."

The committee amendments were agreed to, and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended to read as follows: "A bill granting the consent of Congress to the counties of Telfair and Coffee to construct, maintain, and operate a free highway bridge across the Ocmulgee River at or near the present Jacksonville ferry in Telfair County, Georgia."

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE MISSOURI RIVER, N. DAK.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 11212) authorizing Paul Leupp, his heirs, legal representatives, or assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Missouri River at or near Stanton, N. Dak.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I ask the gentleman from North Dakota whether to his knowledge the permittees granted in this bill have in the past received similar permission to build other bridges and have assigned such permits to others?

Mr. SINCLAIR. This bill is to permit the county officers of Mercer County to construct this bridge.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That answers the question.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to see if we can not settle this question. In view of the statements that the chairman of the committee knows I made on the floor of the House, in the event that a Member makes a favorable showing as to the necessity for a bridge will the committee report out a bill in which Mr. Elliott or any one of his corporations is to receive the consent of Congress to construct that bridge?

Mr. DENISON. Well, Mr. Speaker, in answer to that question, I can speak only for myself as a member of the committee. I can not express the views of the other members of the committee, but so far as I am concerned I do not have any personal information about the matter the gentleman has referred to. If a Member of this House, upon his responsibility as a Member of the House, files a bill asking Congress to consent to the building of a bridge in his district and he presents the proper evidence to the committee, which we require in all cases, so far as I am concerned I will approve the bill granting the consent of Congress to build the bridge. I have no prejudice against Mr. Elliott or anyone else, and if any Member of Congress on his responsibility asks to grant to him the privilege of building a bridge under those circumstances I shall have no objection.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Concerning the gentleman's reference to Mr. Elliott, I wish to state that Mr. Elliott is not a proper person for this Congress to give consent to the building of a bridge on his personal assurance.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Clerk may read this document from the United States Federal Court, which shows Eugene M. Elliott was indicted for defrauding the Government; and it is further stated in the indictment——

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is demanded. The Clerk will report the next bill.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE KANAWHA RIVER, W. VA.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 11265) authorizing the Cabin Creek Kanawha Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Kanawha River at or near Cabin Creek, W. Va.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SCHAFER. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is heard. The Clerk will report the next bill.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER, MINN.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 11267) authorizing the board of county commissioners of Itasca County, Minn., to construct, maintain, and operate a free highway bridge across the Mississippi River at or near the north line of section 35, township 144 north, range 25 west.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

BRIDGE ACROSS THE KANAWHA RIVER, W. VA.

Mr. ENGLAND. Mr. Speaker, I do not know who it was who objected to the consideration of this bill; I mean the bill H. R. 11265. This bridge is to cross the Kanawha River at St. Albans. Local people are behind it.

Mr. SCHAFER. If we can not have information on the activities of a professional bridge speculator, who does not build bridges but speculates upon them, I am going to object to every such bill on this calendar.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill H. R. 11265?

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, I will withdraw my objection in the hope that we will have this evidence presented to the House in the near future.

Mr. ENGLAND. Mr. Speaker, I am with the gentleman on that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from West Virginia asks unanimous consent to return to Calendar No. 490, the bill H. R. 11265. Is there objection?

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for just one minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. DYER. I want to say a word with reference to the matter referred to by my colleague, Mr. COCHRAN, concerning the bridge bill introduced by my colleague, Mr. NIEDRINGHAUS, containing the name of Mr. Elliott. Mr. NIEDRINGHAUS is not on the floor. I know from him that he does not know Mr. Elliott. I know that he never met him. He introduced this bill at the request of numerous constituents of his in St. Louis County and also probably of citizens in St. Charles County. I know many of them in St. Louis County expected him to introduce this bill. As I say, he does not know Mr. Elliott and knows nothing about him. I want it understood that whatever may be wrong in this bill, Mr. NIEDRINGHAUS, my colleague, is entirely blameless.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from West Virginia that we return to the consideration of the bill H. R. 11265?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is heard. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in order to promote interstate commerce, improve the Postal Service, and provide for military and other purposes, the Cabin Creek Kanawha Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, be, and is hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Kanawha River, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at or near Cabin Creek, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906, and subject to the conditions and limitations contained in this act.

SEC. 2. After the completion of such bridge, as determined by the Secretary of War, either the State of West Virginia, any political subdivision thereof within or adjoining which any part of such bridge is located, or any two or more of them jointly, may at any time acquire and take over all right, title, and interest in such bridge and its approaches, and any interest in real property necessary therefor, by purchase or by condemnation or expropriation, in accordance with the laws of such State governing the acquisition of private property for public purposes by condemnation or expropriation. If at any time after the expiration of 25 years after the completion of such bridge the same is acquired by condemnation or expropriation, the amount of damages or compensation to be allowed shall not include good will, going value, or prospective revenues or profits, but shall be limited to the sum of (1) the actual cost of constructing such bridge and its approaches, less a reasonable deduction for actual depreciation in value; (2) the actual cost of acquiring such interests in real property; (3) actual financing and promotion cost, not to exceed 10 per cent of the sum of the cost of constructing the bridge and its approaches and acquiring such interests in real property; and (4) actual expenditures for necessary improvements.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri moves to strike out the last word. The gentleman is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I have been objecting to the consideration of bills granting the consent of Congress to one Eugene M. Elliott and associates to build bridges. In my investigation I have discovered that Mr. Elliott had been convicted of defrauding the United States Government and that he was indicted in the District Court of the United States in and for the Southern District of Florida at the regular term, December, 1925, held at Jacksonville, Fla.

I hold in my hand a copy of the indictment, a copy of his plea of guilty, and a copy of the sentence imposed by the court. I ask unanimous consent that I be permitted to publish this in the RECORD as a part of my remarks. It is an official document and contains the seal of the court.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks by printing a document, reference to which he has just made. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The document referred to follows:

In the District Court of the United States of America in and for the Southern District of Florida. Regular December term thereof, A. D. 1925, held at Jacksonville, Fla.

The grand jurors of the United States of America, duly impaneled, sworn, and charged to inquire within and for the southern district of Florida, upon their oaths present:

That on, to wit, the 13th day of April, 1923, at St. Petersburg, Fla., in the said southern district of Florida and within the jurisdiction of this court, Eugene M. Elliott, then and there having been duly sworn and having taken an oath before E. Richard Hall, a competent officer, to wit, a notary public of the State of Florida, whose commission expired January 13, 1924, and said E. Richard Hall being then and there duly authorized to take said oath, that said defendant, Eugene M. Elliott having been sworn as aforesaid, did swear that the statements in the income-tax return of said defendant for the calendar year 1922 on Form 1040 of the United States Internal Revenue, had been examined by him and to the best of his knowledge and belief was a true and complete return made in good faith for the taxable period as stated, pursuant to the revenue act of 1921 and regulations issued under the authority thereof, and did subscribe said affidavit, having been duly sworn as aforesaid, did willfully, knowingly, unlawfully, and feloniously and, contrary to such oath, state and subscribe a certain material matter, to wit, that his total income was $13,208.15, which said statement the said defendant then and there did not believe to be true and knew to be untrue in that the true and correct compensation of said Eugene M. Elliott, from the Gandy Bridge Co., of St. Petersburg, Fla., for said calendar year 1922, was $59,404.55, on which there was due to the Government a tax in the amount of $11,667.59, and not $415.48, and that said oath as aforesaid was administered in a case in which a law of the United States authorized an oath to be administered, to wit, that said oath was taken to an individual income-tax return on Form 1040, United States Internal Revenue, as provided in and by the provisions of the revenue act of November 23, 1921.

Contrary to the form of the statute in such case made and provided and against the peace and dignity of the United States of America.

SECOND COUNT

And the grand jurors aforesaid upon their oaths aforesaid do further present:

That on, to wit, the 15th day of March, 1924, at St. Petersburg, Fla., in the said southern district and in the internal-revenue collection district of Florida and within the jurisdiction of this court, Eugene M. Elliott was an individual who was then and there required by law to make to the collector of internal revenue for said collection district, under oath, a return stating specifically the items of his gross income and the deductions and credits allowed under Title II (income tax) of the act of Congress approved November 23, 1921, and entitled, "An act to reduce and equalize taxation, to provide revenue, and for other purposes," by reason of the fact, which said grand jurors, upon their said oath, charge to be the fact, that during the calendar year 1923, he, the said Eugene M. Elliott, had a net income in a large amount, to wit, in the total sum of $206,326.74, arising from business (not including income from partnerships), said amount being paid to the said Eugene M. Elliott as compensation by the Gandy Bridge Co., of St. Petersburg, Fla., upon which said income of said Eugene M. Elliott an income tax under said act of Congress then and there became due to the United States from said Eugene M. Elliott, in the total sum of $90,545.51, one-fourth of which at least should then and there have been paid by said Eugene M. Elliott to said collector of internal revenue; and that said Eugene M. Elliott, on March 15, 1924, at St. Petersburg, Fla., in said southern district of Florida, then and there so being indebted to the United States on account of said tax in this count mentioned, imposed by said title of said act of Congress, unlawfully, willfully, and knowingly did refuse and fail to make the required return, in this count of this indictment above referred to, or any return whatever to the said collector of internal revenue in respect to his said income for said calendar year 1923.

Contrary to the form of the statute in such case made and provided and against the peace and dignity of the United States of America.

[SEAL.] EDWIN R. WILLIAMS,
Clerk United States District Court,
Southern District of Florida.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I desire to read the second count of this indictment for the benefit of the members present, to which count Mr. Elliott entered a plea of guilty.

Mr. COCHRAN read the second count.

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, I desire, in the interest of time saving, to make the point of order that the gentleman is not talking to his amendment, which was to strike out the last word.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Missouri desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. No; it would be useless. I do not care to discuss the point of order.

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my point of order.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I have received the consent of the House to print the transcript of the court record and I now ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I regret I found it necessary to bring this indictment to the attention of the Members in this way, but failing to secure an agreement that the committee would not report bills in the future where the consent to construct a bridge was given to Eugene M. Elliott and associates or a corporation in which he is interested I feel it is my duty to Members who might be requested to introduce a bill. Mr. Elliott is operating all over the country. He has been active in Florida, Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, Kentucky, Missouri, and at the present time I am objecting to a bill of his for a bridge in my own city, St. Louis, and another in St. Louis County which adjoins St. Louis. I want it distinctly understood that Members who introduced bills where Mr. Elliott secured consent to construct bridges either in his own name or in the name of a corporation which he controlled or in the name of individuals who agreed in advance to assign the franchise to him, should not be subject to any criticism because at the time they introduced the bills the information I placed before the House was not available to them. For instance, my colleague, Mr. NIEDRINGHAUS, whose district adjoins mine, was asked to introduce two bills. The requests came from the county court of St. Louis County, from the Carondelet Improvement Association which is in the vicinity of one location, and he also received petitions from numerous citizens of both communities to introduce the bills. This was long prior to the time I made my first statement concerning the activities of Mr. Elliott. He followed the same procedure I would have followed myself had I been requested to introduce bills, in the absence of any information whatsoever that the promoters were not proper persons to finance and construct a bridge.

Further, I want it distinctly understood I have no personal grudge against Mr. Elliott. I do not know him, have never met the man. I have received some telegrams from him and one letter. In that letter of March 22, which was in reply to a communication I addressed him on March 14, he said, in part:

> The situation is one I think requires a man to man talk straight across the table and therefore I think I had best wait until I go to Washington.

I immediately replied I would not deny him an interview if he called at my office, but added that unless he could show me that the information I had that he entered a plea of guilty to an indictment in the United States court at Jacksonville, Fla., in which he was accused of defrauding the United States Government in connection with an income-tax return and was fined $500, was false, under no consideration would I agree to withdraw my opposition to bridge bills which granted either Mr. Elliott or a corporation in which he was interested the right to construct a bridge.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I fully realize bridges must be built, but I contend that when the States are not in a position to construct the bridge, then we should have assurance that some responsible person or corporation will construct the bridge and does not apply for a franchise solely for the purpose of assigning it for his financial benefit and who has no idea of being interested in the structure other than from the standpoint of selling the franchise. When I receive proper assurance from Members that public-spirited citizens of a community apply for the franchise or that the corporation applying proposes to build the bridge is responsible and will actually construct the bridge I shall not object.

I feel I have convinced the Members to-day Mr. Elliott should not receive any additional franchises.

It is well known to the Members I am interested in seeing some amendment worked out where a limitation will be placed upon the amount of bonds and other securities that can be issued in connection with a bridge project. I offered an amendment and forced a roll call on my amendment some weeks ago, but the House did not approve of my proposal.

At that time Members expressed the thought it was unwise to ask the Secretary of War to arrive at a cost of construction prior to the building of the bridge. I contended if it could be done after the bridge is built that it could be done prior to start of construction. Under the recapture clause the Secretary of War must arrive at a cost value if requested to do so by the State, county, or city after the bridge is built.

Recently during the debate on the bill which provided for additional employees for the Water Power Commission, the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. ARENTZ], in answer to a question of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. MCDUFFIE], made the following statement which appears in the RECORD, page 5069, of March 20, 1928:

> Mr. ARENTZ. An individual or a corporation comes to Washington and applies for a license to the Federal Power Commission. He must present to the Federal Power Commission a statement as to the kind of dam he is going to construct, whether or not he has had soundings made on that site, how long and how high the dam is to be, what is to be the cost, where the power plants are to be erected, and how much they will cost, where he is going to run his transmission lines, and how much it will cost, and approximately what the rates will be; and the men in the field must go over these matters item by item, and the men in the office must correlate these facts, and then, on the basis of that, a license is given to the individual or corporation and issued by the Federal Power Commission.
> Mr. MCDUFFIE. So I understand, but is not all of that field work done through the Corps of Engineers?
>
> Mr. ARENTZ. Up to this time.
>
> Mr. MCDUFFIE. And it is through the Corps of Engineers that the data is secured to which the gentleman has just referred?
> Mr. ARENTZ. Up to this time I must admit that they pick from the Geological Survey an expert on geology and things of that sort; they pick a man from the War Department who knows something about the figures in connection with the construction of dams, and they pick a man from the Interior Department who knows something about water rights to determine whether or not the State has given a permit to this man or this corporation to construct a dam or for the use of that water within the State, because the Federal Power Commission is subordinate to the rights of a State in every case.

The gentleman from Nevada, I understand, is very well informed on the work of the Water Power Commission, and as no one challenged his statement, I accept it as the policy of the commission.

You will note he states the Water Power Commission arrives at the cost of the dam, and so forth, before the license is issued, and furthermore this is in connection with a project where he says the Federal Power Commission which acts for the Government is subordinate to the rights of a State in every case.

Now, I have contended and still contend the State can not object when Congress once says a bridge can be built. You will recall in the last session of the Sixty-ninth Congress the Representatives from the State of Oregon opposed on the floor the construction of a bridge over the Columbia River at Longview, Wash., while the Representatives of the State of Washington advocated its passage. The consent of Congress was finally granted. Since then the State of Oregon, through its highway commission, has been trying to find a way to prevent the construction of this bridge. I have been informed the attorney for the highway commission of Oregon contended in an opinion that the act of Congress consenting to the construction of the bridge was not an expression of the plenary power of Congress but was a consent only, leaving the beneficiaries of the act, or the permittees, subject to the reasonable regulation of the States affected by the construction of the new bridge. Other attorneys took the opposite view. Then the city of Portland and others interested employed Hon. John W. Davis to pass upon the act, and an article in the Portland Oregonian printed last week states Mr. Davis has submitted his opinion, and while the opinion was not printed, the article did say the State authorities can do nothing to prevent the construction of the bridge. Therefore, if Congress grants its consent, I take it that it is not necessary to receive permission from a city, county, or State to proceed with the construction of the bridge. In other words, the Government is in complete control.

Now, if the Water Power Commission can operate, as the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. ARENTZ] says the commission does, why is it unreasonable to ask the engineers of the Army to determine the cost of a bridge before construction, especially when it is pointed out the engineers of the Army assigned to the Water Power Commission are the ones that determine the cost of dams, and so forth. If it can be done by the Water Power Commission, which is subordinate to the rights of a State, certainly it can be done in the case of a bridge when it is admitted the State has no right to interfere after Congress grants the franchise.

I am pleased to be able to advise the House that an effort will be made at the November election to pass an amendment to the constitution of Missouri, which will provide for a bond issue of $75,000,000 for good roads, and in the amendment it will be provided the highway commission will be given the right to construct bridges. I sincerely hope the amendment will be passed, and I feel it will pass, and that provisions will be made for the construction of all necessary bridges in the State.

Some years ago in Missouri an amendment was adopted providing for a $60,000,000 bond issue for good roads. That $60,000,000, together with the Federal aid of $30,000,000, will probably be exhausted this year, and I am informed that before the last bond has been sold the first bond issue will be redeemed. The money collected from the gasoline tax and automobile licenses is used entirely to pay interest, retire the bonds, and maintain the roads. I am further informed that it will be possible to guarantee to the people of my State there will be no increases in taxes of any kind, but that the gasoline tax and automobile license tax is sufficient to pay the interest as well as maintain the roads and create a sinking fund for the retirement of the bonds.

The Clerk continued the reading of the bill, as follows:

SEC. 3. If such bridge shall at any time be taken over or acquired by the State of West Virginia or by any municipality or other political subdivision or public agency thereof, under the provisions of section 2 of this act, and if tolls are thereafter charged for the use thereof, the rates of toll shall be so adjusted as to provide a fund sufficient to pay for the reasonable cost of maintaining, repairing, and operating the bridge and its approaches under economical management and to provide a sinking fund sufficient to amortize the amount paid therefor, including reasonable interest and financial cost, as soon as possible under reasonable charges, but within a period of not to exceed 30 years from the date of acquiring the same. After a sinking fund sufficient for such amortization shall have been so provided, such bridge shall thereafter be maintained and operated free of tolls, or the rates of toll shall thereafter be so adjusted as to provide a fund of not to exceed the amount necessary for the proper maintenance, repair, and operation of the bridge and its approaches under economical management. An accurate record of the amount paid for acquiring the bridge and its approaches, the actual expenditures for maintaining, repairing, and operating the same, and of the daily tolls collected shall be kept and shall be available for the information of all persons interested.

SEC. 4. The Cabin Creek Kanawha Bridge Co., its successors and assigns shall, within 90 days after the completion of such bridge, file with the Secretary of War and with the Highway Department of the State of West Virginia, a sworn itemized statement showing the actual original cost of constructing the bridge and its approaches, the actual cost of acquiring any interest in real property necessary therefor, and the actual financing and promotion costs. The Secretary of War may, and at the request of the highway department of the State of West Virginia, shall, at any time within three years after the completion of such bridge, investigate such costs and determine the accuracy and the reasonableness of the costs alleged in the statement of costs so filed, and shall make a finding of the actual and reasonable costs of constructing, financing, and promoting such bridge; for the purpose of such investigation the said Cabin Creek Kanawha Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, shall make available all of its records in connection with the construction, financing, and promotion thereof. The findings of the Secretary of War as to the reasonable costs of the construction, financing, and promotion of the bridge shall be conclusive for the purposes mentioned in section 2 of this act, subject only to review in a court of equity for fraud or gross mistake.

SEC. 5. The right to sell, assign, transfer, and mortgage all the rights, powers, and privileges conferred by this act is hereby granted to the Cabin Creek Kanawha Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, and any corporation to which or any person to whom such rights, powers, and privileges may be sold, assigned, or transferred, or who shall acquire the same by mortgage foreclosure or otherwise, is hereby authorized and empowered to exercise the same as fully as though conferred herein directly upon such corporation or person.

SEC. 6. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 2, line 8, strike out the words "with in" and insert the word "within."

In line 16, strike out "twenty-five" and insert "twenty."

On page 3, line 15, strike out "financial" and insert "financing."

In line 16, strike out "thirty" and insert "twenty."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

WAR FINANCE CORPORATION

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H. R. 12245) to amend the War Finance Corporation act, approved April 5, 1918, as amended, which I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves to suspend the rules and pass House bill 12245, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense, and, for the purpose of assisting in the prosecution of the war, to provide credits for industries and enterprises in the United States necessary or contributory to the prosecution of the war, and to supervise the issuance of securities; and for other purposes," approved April 5, 1918, as amended, be, and the same hereby is, amended so as to extend for one year the period specified in section 1 of said act during which the War Finance Corporation shall have succession; and the expiration of the period of 10 years specified in said section 1 shall not be construed to affect any right or privilege accrued, any penalty or liability incurred, or any civil or criminal proceeding commenced, or to diminish any authority conferred on any offical necessary to enable him to carry out the duties remaining to be performed by him under said act.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second may be considered as having been ordered.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. ARENTZ. Mr. Speaker, may I direct attention to the fact that you can not get a copy of the bill. The House ought to be shown the courtesy at least of being notified that a bill of this nature is going to be brought up.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman permit me to make a statement?

Mr. ARENTZ. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. I will state that it is brought up out of order on my account, as I am ill and want to leave early. This bill has the unanimous report of the committee, and all on earth it does is to extend the life of the War Finance Corporation for 12 months for liquidating purposes. That is all. We went into it thoroughly for two days, and that is all on earth the bill does. It is necessary from the standpoint of the Government and from the standpoint of the few remaining claims they have against cattlemen and a few country banks.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Is the bill limited to liquidation during the next 12 months?

Mr. WINGO. It limits it absolutely. They can not do anything but collect past due bills. That is all on earth the bill does.

Mr. ARENTZ. I want to say to the gentleman I am in entire sympathy with the purpose of the bill. It is simply the manner in which it was brought up that I am objecting to.

Mr. WINGO. I will state to the gentleman I am responsible for that. I have not been well for two or three days and I came up to the House to-day solely to help pass this bill, and the Speaker very kindly consented to recognize us at this time.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, on the general question of procedure I would like to say just this word. Suspension day has been provided by the rules of the House for the purpose of taking care of emergency legislation, and every Member of the House has notice that upon that day matters may come up about which there is no previous notice. As a matter of fact, under suspension there does not have to be a bill introduced, there does not have to be any report of the committee; all you need to do is to move to suspend the rules and pass that which you present to the House at that very moment.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. And in the past that has been done very often.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I do not think any criticism should be leveled at the procedure.

Mr. ARENTZ. The natural procedure then, I will say to the gentleman from Illinois, would be for the personnel of the House to be advised of such fact through notice on the calendar and have the bills here so that a person can get a copy of the bill if he wants to.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Of course, it is desirable that that be done, but I do not think the procedure is subject to any criticism.

Mr. KING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFADDEN. Yes.

Mr. KING. The bill is on the Union Calendar and has been on the calendar for some time.

Mr. McFADDEN. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. If the gentleman will yield further, as a matter of fact, there is this emergency. This power, we find, will expire on April 4. This bill ought to be passed and go to the Senate this afternoon so that it can be passed, signed, and become the law before April 4 in order to protect the rights of the Government in these claims.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

The question was taken; and two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

SEC. 2. After the completion of such bridge, as determined by the Secretary of War, either the State of North Dakota, any political subdivision thereof within or adjoining which any part of such bridge is located, or any two or more of them jointly, may at any time acquire and take over all right, title, and interest in such bridge and its approaches, and any interest in real property necessary therefor, by purchase or by condemnation, in accordance with the laws of such State governing the acquisition of private property for public purposes by condemnation or expropriation. If at any time after the expiration of 20 years after the completion of such bridge the same is acquired by condemnation or expropriation, the amount of damages or compensation to be allowed shall not include good will, going value, or prospective revenues or profits, but shall be limited to the sum of (1) the actual cost of constructing such bridge and its approaches, less a reasonable deduction for actual depreciation in value; (2) the actual cost of acquiring such interests in real property; (3) actual financing and promotion cost, not to exceed 10 per cent of the sum of the cost of constructing the bridge and its approaches and acquiring such interest in real property; and (4) actual expenditures for necessary improvements.

If such bridge shall at any time be taken over or acquired by the State of North Dakota, or by any municipality or other political subdivision or public agency thereof, under the provisions of section 2 of this act, and if tolls are charged for the use thereof the rates of toll shall be so adjusted as to provide a fund sufficient to pay for the reasonable cost of maintaining, repairing, and operating the bridge and its approaches under economical management and to provide a sinking fund sufficient to amortize the amount paid therefor, including reasonable interest and financing costs, as soon as possible under reasonable charges but within a period of not to exceed 20 years from the date of acquiring the same. An accurate record of the amount paid for acquiring the bridge and its approaches, the actual expenditures for maintaining, repairing, and operating the same, and of the daily tolls collected shall be kept and shall be available for the information of all persons interested.

Paul Leupp, his heirs, legal representatives, or assigns, shall, within 90 days after the completion of such bridge, file with the Secretary of War and with the highway department of the State of North Dakota a sworn itemized statement showing the actual original cost of constructing the bridge and its approaches, the actual cost of acquiring any interest in real property necessary therefor, and the actual financing and promotion costs. The Secretary of War may, and, at the request of the Highway Department of the State of North Dakota shall, at any time within three years after the completion of such bridge, investigate such costs and determine the accuracy and the reasonableness of the costs alleged in the statement of costs so filed, and shall make a finding of the actual and reasonable costs of constructing, financing, and promoting such bridge; for the purpose of such investigation the said Paul Leupp, his heirs, legal representatives, or assigns, shall make available all of his records in connection with the construction, financing, and promotion thereof. The findings of the Secretary of War as to the reasonable costs of the construction, financing, and promotion of the bridge shall be conclusive for the purposes mentioned in section 2 of this act, subject only to review in a court of equity for fraud or gross mistake.

SEC. 5. The right to sell, assign, transfer, and mortgage all the rights, powers, and privileges conferred by this act is hereby granted to Paul Leupp, his heirs, legal representatives, or assigns, and any corporation to which or any person to whom such rights, powers, and privileges may be sold, assigned, or transferred, or who shall acquire the same by mortgage foreclosure or otherwise, is hereby authorized and empowered to exercise the same as fully as though conferred herein directly upon such corporation or person.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled "An act granting the consent of Congress to the State of Montana, Valley County, Mont., and McCone County, Mont., or to any or either of them, jointly or severally, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Missouri River at or near Glasgow, Mont.," approved February 16, 1928, be amended to read as follows:

"That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the State of Montana, Valley County, Mont., and Garfield County, Mont., or to any or either of them jointly or severally, to construct, maintain, and operate a free bridge and approaches thereto across the Missouri River, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at or near Glasgow, Mont., in township 25 north, range 40 east of the Montana principal meridian, in accordance with the provisions of an act entitled 'An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters,' approved March 23, 1906.

"SEC. 2. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved."

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

Amend the title so as to read: "An act granting the consent of Congress to the State of Montana, Valley County, Mont., and Garfield County, Mont., or to any or either of them, jointly or severally, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Missouri River at or near Glasgow, Mont."

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS PEARL RIVER, RANKIN COUNTY, MISS.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (S. 3119) to authorize the construction of a temporary railroad bridge across Pearl River in Rankin County, Miss., and between Madison and Rankin Counties, Miss.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Pearl River Valley Lumber Co. is hereby authorized to construct a temporary railroad bridge connecting its timber holdings and its lands and timber across Pearl River at a point between or near sections 33 and 34, township 8 north, range 3 east, in Madison County, Miss., and sections 3 and 4, township 7 north, range 3 east, in Rankin County, Miss., and between Madison County and Rankin County, Miss., in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 2, line 4, after the figures "1906," strike out the period, insert a comma and the words: "Provided, That if the bridge authorized by this act shall at any time be abandoned and no longer used for railroad purposes, the same shall be removed from the river by the Pearl River Valley Lumber Co. or its assigns at its or their own expense.

The committee amendment was agreed to, and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS MISSOURI RIVER AT NIOBRARA, NEBR.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (S. 2827) granting the consent of Congress to the States of South Dakota and Nebraska to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Missouri River at or near Niobrara, Nebr.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. This is the last bridge bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, I do this in order to explain to the House the procedure in reference to these bridge bills in view of the colloquy which took place on the floor a while ago. When these bridge bills are introduced by Members, of course they are referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. That committee has to act, or at least it feels that it is its duty to act. The bills are referred by the committee to the War Department and to the Bureau of Roads of the Agricultural Department. When reports are received from those two departments the bills are referred by the committee to the subcommittee on bridges, and the subcommittee gives them consideration. If any person files with the committee any objection to a bill, the objection is considered by the committee. If any person files any objection to the bill and asks to be heard, the committee always grants him a hearing. If any Member of the House asks the committee to be heard on the bill, we always give him an opportunity to be heard. So that if there is any objection made known to the committee to any of these bills the committee investigates the matter, and we give the person objecting an opportunity to be heard.

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] has some personal feeling against the man named Elliott, who has obtained franchises to build some bridges heretofore it seems. So far as I am concerned, I am very glad to have the gentleman from Missouri put into the RECORD in connection with his remarks anything that he has to say against Mr. Elliott; and if any Member of the House has any objection to any person or company who is asking for permission to build a bridge, our committee would be very glad to have those objections presented to the committee. We will give any objections full and careful consideration. If they are meritorious, I have no doubt that the committee will refuse to report the bill favorably. But if the committee does not think them meritorious, then the committee will report the bill; and it is the privilege of any Member of the House, when these bills are called up on this calendar, to object. The Member does not have to state his reasons if he does not want to do so. Therefore it is not necessary on consent day to take up time of the House and delay the consideration of other important bills by getting into long arguments about certain individuals.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. In view of the suggestion made by the gentleman from Illinois, would it not be well for the committee to direct some inquiry concerning the permittees mentioned in the bills? Surely that is not an unreasonable thing. This House has confidence in the gentleman's committee. If there is just one statement in the report that the permittees have been investigated and that they are bona fide and that they intend to proceed with the construction of the bridge, that is all that would be necessary.

Mr. DENISON. Does not the gentleman think that is the duty of the Member who introduces the bill? If I introduce a bill, I am sure I will know something about the person who is asking for the franchise, and if he is not a proper person I shall not introduce the bill. That responsibility rests with the Member who introduces the bill. Our committee respects the Members who introduce bridge bills. We ask them to give us certain information, and when they do so we accept the information the Member gives us.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And when one of us directs an inquiry to the Member who introduces the bill, then the gentleman should not take that as an affront to his committee.

Mr. DENISON. I am sure I did not do so, and I am sure I do not want the gentleman from New York to think that there is anyone on the committee who takes an inquiry of that kind as an affront at all.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. Yes.

Mr. DYER. The gentleman in his remarks referred to my colleague from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] as having some personal feeling against a man named Elliott. I am sure the gentleman from Illinois does not wish that statement to stand, because I feel sure that my colleague [Mr. COCHRAN] does not know Mr. Elliott and has never met him; but he has learned that he has been peddling these permits about. For that reason and because of the facts that he has adduced here he believe it is his duty—and I am sure that he is doing his duty—to bring the information to the attention of the House.

Mr. DENISON. I have no complaint to make about the gentleman. I assumed that he had some personal feeling, but if he has not, then let me say this: The statement is often made here about certain parties who are "peddling" these permits. I have never heard of that being done. Nobody in this country is justified in paying one dollar for a bridge franchise, because anyone who wants to can come to our committee and get one for nothing. We grant no monopolies. We grant no exclusive rights to build these bridges. Whenever anyone wants the right to build a bridge across a river, if he can get a Member of Congress to introduce a bill for him and vouch for him as a Member ought to do, our committee will grant that person a right to build a bridge, and it will not cost him a cent.

Mr. DOWELL. The gentleman well knows that after a franchise has been granted to one person or individual or corporation, that another one can not secure a franchise for the same place.

Mr. DENISON. The gentleman is entirely wrong. The fact is exactly the contrary.

Mr. DOWELL. But as the practical proposition, the gentleman knows it would not work.

Mr. DENISON. I do not. The gentleman from Iowa can state what he knows, but he can not state what I know. I know the contrary is true.

Mr. DOWELL. It may be a certain case where a contest is on, but when a franchise is granted to one firm to place a bridge in a certain place, another franchise will not be asked for, and there will be no competition in that case. If it is true that certain companies are asking for permits for different localities with the idea of securing proper locations in order that they may build bridges, it seems to me your committee ought to stop the speculation in the franchises.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON] may have five additional minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, I want to complete my statement so that there may be no misunderstanding about this. At this session of Congress we have granted in a number of instances the right to build bridges in the same place to two parties. That is the rule of the committee. I would like to discuss that at some length and give the reasons for it. I have explained that on the floor heretofore. We do not grant an exclusive right at any locality because we do not want persons to place a value on these franchises and then speculate in them. If anyone wants a franchise to build a bridge in a certain locality and anyone else wants to build a bridge there and comes here to get the right to do so, he can get it without its costing him 1 cent.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. But the gentleman's statement is not generally understood throughout the country. There have been cases where men have secured franchises for building bridges and have been peddling them out.

Mr. BURTNESS. Has the gentleman from Illinois any information as to people securing franchises to build bridges and then peddling out the franchises?

Mr. DENISON. Nothing of the kind has ever been brought to our attention. If any Member of the House has any information as to persons who do that, or have done that, and that any such person comes before our committee asking to be granted a franchise, we would be glad to hear from him.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I have a telegram here from J. G. White & Co. (Inc.) addressed to the St. Louis Post-Dispatch under date of March 1, in which they say:

> In re article appearing in your issue of February 22 under head "Bridge promoter fosters schemes for 33 projects," which has just come to our attention. E. M. Elliott and E. M. Elliott & Associates (Inc.) are promoters who have attempted to interest us in various bridge projects, several of which we have under consideration. For any projects which we accept we have agreed to pay a promoter's fee, but beyond that E. M. Elliott and E. M. Elliott & Associates have no relation whatsoever to our company or to J. G. White Engineering Corporation, and are not our agents, or in any way authorized to act or speak for us. Furthermore, they have no voice whatever in any matter relating to construction or financing of any bridge project which we may acquire from them. We feel your article above mentioned inaccurately states our position and hence gives us undesirable publicity. For example, our engineers' report on Olive Street and Carondelet bridge projects are unsatisfactory and we have no present intention of financing construction of these bridges nor have any franchises for same been acquired by us. Therefore request that you please publish substance of this telegram and in such way as to correct erroneous impression created by your article.
> J. G. WHITE & CO. (INC.).

Mr. DENISON. Well, J. G. White & Co. are bankers.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes. This fellow gets a permit and then disposes of it, and gets out from under.

Mr. DENISON. The gentleman is wrong. He has to get the money necessary from the bankers. These men who build bridges may not have the money themselves.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Then this man gets another permit, and gets out from under that.

Mr. DENISON. These bridge franchise bills are filed, and, of course, all Members have notice of them. We ask the gentleman from Iowa or any other Member to come before us and show us that the committee ought not to report any bill.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. We have such confidence in the committee that they can do that——

Mr. DENISON. We can not do it unless we have the information.

Mr. BURTNESS. I agree thoroughly with the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOWELL] in what he suggested. He stated that if there was speculation in these franchises it ought to be stopped. I for one have never heard of such speculation, and as one member of the committee I want to say that if such speculation is suspected I would be glad to have information from anyone who can tell about the peddling of these franchises for a consideration. Of course, everyone will understand that when a man gets a franchise he will go to the banker and interest him in the building of the structure, but he is not to be considered as selling the franchise for a consideration.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I have already read you what the J. G. White Co. had to say.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has again expired. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

IMPROPER PRACTICE BEFORE THE PATENT OFFICE

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5527) to prevent fraud, deception, or improper practice in connection with business before the United States Patent Office, and for other purposes.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] to page 2, line 11, where the language appears "to habitually aid or assist." If you are going to use the word "habitually"—well, we will not fight about that, but I believe if you made the burden of proof too difficult, although I do not think that was the intention, it would not be expedient.

Perhaps you intended just to use the words "aid or assist." If you do that I think you will achieve the purpose you seek.

Mr. CRAMTON. I think that the word "habitually" carries out the idea of——

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Constant?

Mr. CRAMTON. Repeated practice; whereas to insist on one case would not be sufficient.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. As a matter of practice you are assuming a burden of proof that will be very difficult to establish.

Then I have another suggestion. On line 18, you say:

This section shall not apply to clerks or others supervised by persons duly admitted to practice before the United States Patent Office.

The practice at this bar and others is that when a lawyer is debarred he unites with another lawyer, perhaps, in the capacity of a clerk, and then his work is as vicious as before. You should prevent a disbarred lawyer from being taken in as a clerk.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, I object to this bill. This is too important a bill to have on the Consent Calendar.

CHIPPEWA INDIANS OF MINNESOTA

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7463) amending an act entitled "An act authorizing the Chippewa Indians of Minnesota to submit claims to the Court of Claims."

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 8 of the act entitled "An act authorizing the Chippewa Indians of Minnesota to submit claims to the Court of Claims," approved May 14, 1926 (44 Stat. L., 555), be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 8. All actual and necessary expenses incurred by the attorney or attorneys so employed to represent the Chippewa Indians of Minnesota, including court costs, bills for printing required by law or court rules, the cruising and examination of lands and timber, the auditing and tabulation of accounts, travel and subsistence of said attorneys and their employees while engaged solely in the preparation or prosecution of said suit or suits, securing and taking evidence deemed material therein, the compensation of stenographers and such clerical assistance as shall be reasonably employed solely upon work in connection therewith, fees or commissions of notaries public or commissioners, and any other expense reasonably necessary for the preparation for trial or prosecution of any such suit or suits, shall be paid by the Secretary of the Interior from time to time, as they accrue, out of the funds standing to the credit of said Indians in the Treasury of the United States upon verified accounts submitted in such form as may be required by the Secretary of the Interior: Provided, That no payment shall be allowed hereunder for expense incurred for compensation to other attorneys for rendering service as attorneys in assisting in said suits, nor for any item of so-called overhead, office, or other expense not solely and exclusively incurred for or on account of such suit or suits: And provided further, That before the attorneys are authorized to incur any expense in excess of $500 for any purpose they shall first secure the approval of the Secretary of the Interior."

With the following committee amendments:

Page 2, line 23, strike out "$500" and insert "$200."

Page 2, line 24, after the word "the," insert the words "Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

CROW RESERVATION, MONT.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 11478) to amend an act to allot lands to children on the Crow Reservation, Mont.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 1 of an act entitled "An act to allot lands to living children on the Crow Reservation, Mont.," approved May 19, 1926 (44 Stat. L. 566), is hereby amended to read as follows:

"That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to allot lands in severalty to children of the Crow Tribe, now living, not heretofore allotted, from any suitable lands belonging to the tribe now available for allotments or which may become available, including any Crow lands heretofore opened to entry and sale, and to allot land to children hereafter born so long as there are lands of said tribe available for allotment purposes: Provided, That the areas allotted shall be as authorized by the general allotment act of February 8, 1887 (24 Stat. L. 388), as amended."

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

PORTO RICAN TAXPAYERS

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (S. 754) for the relief of certain Porto Rican taxpayers.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this bill ought to be disposed of one way or another to-day. There are some facts which I believe should come to the attention of the House, and I ask unanimous consent that I may have 15 minutes and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KIESS] may have 15 minutes, and then present the matter to the House and get a vote thereon.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that he may have 15 minutes and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KIESS] may have 15 minutes to discuss Senate bill 754. Is there objection?

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I do not think we ought to take a half hour on one Senate bill. I have no objection to the bill being passed over without prejudice.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I would suggest, then, that it be passed over without prejudice until 4 o'clock or 4.30 o'clock and then I will call it up.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Suspensions will come later in the afternoon and it may not be possible to reach this bill after that time.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, what is the hurry about this bill? There are as important bills or more important bills on this calendar.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I will state to the gentleman from Wisconsin that the circuit court of appeals in Massachusetts is holding up the remittitur on these cases and the matter ought to be disposed of one way or another to-day. If objections are made it will simply mean that the bill is stricken from the calendar but will not be disposed of. I believe the bill is vicious and ought not to be passed.

Mr. SCHAFER. I think it is a vicious bill and is in the interest of a few tax dodgers. I object.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. We ought to get the facts before the membership and I think the gentleman should not object to our disposing of it.

Mr. DYER. Mr Speaker, I shall not consent to the taking of a half hour upon this bill, which the gentleman from New York says ought not to be passed. If it is a vicious bill it ought to be objected to now.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Why not dispose of it?

Mr. CRAMTON. The gentleman from New York should note that the gentleman from Wisconsin is opposed to the bill and I fear that even after the gentleman from New York and the gentleman from Pennsylvania have used a half hour they will not to be able to overcome the gentleman's objection. One objection then will kill the bill.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. No; the gentleman will listen to the facts.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will call attention to the fact that this bill requires three objections.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that it may be passed over without prejudice for one hour, and I will call it up later.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, does the gentleman from New York believe that after he speaks against the bill for 15 minutes that the gentleman from Pennsylvania can convince him the bill is all right. One objection will kill it.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. No; it takes three objections.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

AUTHORIZING CERTAIN BANDS OF INDIANS TO PRESENT CLAIMS TO THE COURT OF CLAIMS

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5574) authorizing the Lower Spokane and the Lower Pend Oreille or Lower Calispell Tribes or Bands of Indians of the State of Washington, or any of them, to present their claims to the Court of Claims.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. HILL of Washington. Will the gentleman withhold his objection?

Mr. CRAMTON. I will.

Mr. HILL of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a word on this bill and call attention to the status of the Indians who are seeking to present these claims. In the Sixty-eighth Congress, under an act that is now Public Law 402, a number of tribes of Indians in the western part of the State of Washington, among whom were certain nontreaty tribes, were given authority to present their claims to the Court of Claims. On the eastern side of the State of Washington and western side of Idaho, back in the early days of the settlement of that country——

Mr. UNDERHILL (interposing). Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL of Washington. Yes.

Mr. UNDERHILL. How much was involved in that first assignment of claims to the Court of Claims?

Mr. HILL of Washington. No sum was indicated by the bill itself.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Has the court made a finding?

Mr. HILL of Washington. No; it has not been finally determined.

Mr. UNDERHILL. So the gentleman does not know how much the award will be?

Mr. HILL of Washington. Under this bill?

Mr. UNDERHILL. No; under the act passed in the Sixty-eighth Congress.

Mr. HILL of Washington. There has been no determination of those claims. The amount, of course, is not fixed, so I do not know what it will be.

Mr. UNDERHILL. How much was asked?

Mr. HILL of Washington. They did not set out in the bill or in the hearings how much it was. It was simply a blanket proposition.

Mr. UNDERHILL. This was not the bill in which you allowed them to sue for $750,000,000?

Mr. HILL of Washington. No; we have no such claims arising in my State. I want to say this: The Indians in whose behalf this bill is introduced and is being pressed have always been peaceable Indians. Many of the tribes in the State of Washington were hostile at certain times and those Indians were treated with and their rights have been cared for by the Government. These Indians were promised similar treatment, but because of the fact that they were peaceable and gave the Government no trouble they were simply neglected, and they have never yet been able to succeed in getting a hearing from the United States Government, either for the negotiation of treaties or to present their claims to the Court of Claims.

Certain Indians occupying a similar status in the western side of the State having been granted authority to go into court and present their claims, it certainly could not be expected that these Indians would feel any great respect for the treatment they receive if they are denied treatment similar to that accorded other tribes in another part of the State.

I believe this Government should give them their day in court. This bill does not create any new cause of action. It simply gives them the right to present claims that now exist, and while they may be oversanguine as to the amount due them, yet they ought to have that simple American right of their day in court.

The Department of the Interior has not reported adversely on this bill. The department was rather noncommittal but said there had been a prima facie showing that warranted the department to enter into contracts with attorneys to present claims for them. The Bureau of the Budget, it is true, said it was contrary to the financial program of the President, but there is no adverse report on the merits of the bill from the department, and I hope the gentleman will not object.

Mr. CRAMTON. There are two reasons for objecting. First, there is the adverse report from the Budget. This is not necessarily controlling, but there is the further fact that there are only certain books of the Government to be consulted, and so many of these bills have already been passed that it will be four or five years before access to the books could be secured by the attorneys for these Indians so great is the congestion of these claims. I am obliged to object, Mr. Speaker.

GREENLAWN CEMETERY

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7475) to provide for the removal of the Confederate monument and tablets from Greenlawn Cemetery to Garfield Park.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War is authorized and directed to provide for the removal of the Confederate monument and tablets erected by the United States from Greenlawn Cemetery, Indianapolis, Ind., to Garfield Park, Indianapolis, Ind.

SEC. 2. That there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $3,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ASPHALT, GILSONITE, ELATERITE, AND OTHER LIKE SUBSTANCES

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 68) to provide for the disposition of asphalt, gilsonite, elaterite, and other like substances on the public domain.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. DYER, Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri, and Mr. ROWBOTTOM objected.

AVIATION PENSION ACT

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 10479) granting double pensions to dependents under existing pension laws in all cases where an officer, warrant officer, or enlisted man or student flyer of the United States Army dies or is disabled due to aircraft accident.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object in order that I may make a short statement before I object emphatically to the passage of the bill.

This bill creates a discrimination which should not exist with reference to the defenders of our Nation. Men who serve in the aviation service now get more pay than men who serve in other branches of the service, deservedly so, because of the risks which they take. It is extra hazardous and they ought to be paid more; but when a man is killed in an accident, whether he crashes and is killed, or whether he is killed by contact with the propeller of an airplane, or run over by an Army truck or Army tank on the ground, or whether he is kicked and killed by an Army mule, or whether he is killed by the explosion of a shell, he is equally dead in any event, and if he leaves dependents, they are equally entitled to consideration on the part of the Government. If we are not paying the dependents of these men who are employed in the defense of our Government and of our Nation pension enough, I will vote for an increased pension for all; but I never will vote for anything which makes for discrimination between those engaged in one branch of the service and those engaged in another branch of the service. Every branch of the service is interdependent and equally important.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes.

Mr. SCHAFER. I agree with the gentleman. We ought to increase the general pension rate. The widow who files a claim under the general pension law will only get $12, and $2 for each dependent child, and it is about time the Pension Committee recommended legislation to take care of these people properly.

Mr. UNDERHILL. If they will do so, I will gladly go along with them.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes.

Mr. KNUTSON. Is the gentleman aware of the fact that this bill simply amends the act of August 29, 1916, which provided for a double pension for the dependents of those who are killed or injured in the Navy or Marine Corps aviation? It amends that bill by adding the Army. This was an oversight, I assume, at the time the act of August 29, 1916, was passed, and there is no reason why the Army aviation service should not be placed on the same footing as the Marine Corps and the Navy aviation services.

Mr. UNDERHILL. I regret very much that the Pension Committee introduced or recommended and that Congress passed any such bill as that. It is wrong in principle and unjust because it is discriminatory and inequitable. I am obliged to object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This bill requires three objections.

Mr. UNDERHILL, Mr. COLLINS, and Mr. BUSBY objected.

INDIAN PEACE COUNCIL AT MEDICINE LODGE, KANS.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8132) authorizing the appropriation of $2,500 for the erection of a tablet or marker at Medicine Lodge, Kans., to commemorate the holding of the Indian peace council at which treaties were made with the Plains Indians in October, 1867.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $2,500 is hereby authorized to be appropriated to be expended, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, in the erection of a tablet or marker at Medicine Lodge, Kans., to commemorate the holding at Medicine Lodge, Kans., of the Indian peace council at which treaties were made between the United States and the Kiowa, Comanche, Apache, Cheyenne, and Arapahoe Indians in October, 1867.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

THE DESCHUTES PROJECT IN OREGON

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (S. 1186) to provide for the construction of the Deschutes project in Oregon, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title to the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that that bill be passed without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

LOAN OF AERONAUTIC EQUIPMENT TO MUSEUMS AND EDUCATIONAL INSTITUTIONS

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (S. 1822) to authorize the Secretary of War to transfer or loan aeronautical equipment to museums and educational institutions.

The Clerk read the title to the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Minnesota a question. This provides for loaning this property to museums or properly accredited schools, colleges, and universities. Is it left entirely to the discretion of the Secretary of War, or how are the schools to be classed? I know several schools that are seeking to get obsolete equipment, and I would like to know if it is general so that a bona fide school can get it?

Mr. FURLOW. I think the intent is that it will be left to the discretion of the Secretary of War to determine what are the bona fide schools, and what colleges and schools should get this equipment.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. But that language is rather indefinite.

Mr. FURLOW. Can the gentleman suggest any language that will make it more clear? Our intention was to leave it to the discretion of the Secretary of War to determine.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I am willing to leave it to the discretion of the Secretary of War, but I do not want any artificial standards. I do not think it should be confined to universities or colleges. I think the small class of schools near aviation fields should be entitled to the instruction.

Mr. HUDSON. I presume that it would be given to standard A schools and colleges.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Does not the gentleman think that standard A colleges is too high?

Mr. FURLOW. I do not think that it would be limited to colleges or universities only in the discretion of the Secretary of War.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Standard A schools would be limited. If the gentleman on the Military Affairs Committee will state that it was the intention of the committee reporting the bill that sufficient latitude is to be given to the Secretary of War to give the equipment to such schools as he believes are worthy and deserving, carrying on proper instruction, I would not object.

Mr. JAMES. It is to be given to schools, colleges, or universities that will give such assurance to the Secretary of War.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized, in his discretion, to transfer or loan to museums or properly accredited schools, colleges, and universities, for exhibition or instructional purposes, any aircraft, aircraft parts, instruments, or engines that have become obsolete or impaired to the extent that repair would not be economical: Provided, That such aircraft, aircraft parts, or engines will not be used in actual flight: Provided further, That no expense shall be caused the United States Government by the delivery or return of said property.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment. On page 2, line 2, I move to strike out the word "delivery" and insert the words "transfer or loan." I think that would be better language.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I think it would make it much more expensive to loan the equipment, because they would have to keep a record of it and carry it in the inventory. This is all obsolete equipment that the department wants to get rid of.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. The bill already permits the transfer and loan, but the amendment I have offered is with regard to the expenses to the Government. The proviso if amended would read:

Provided further, That no expense shall be caused the United States Government by the transfer or loan or return of said property.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

AMENDING THE NATIONAL DEFENSE ACT

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (S. 2950) to amend the second paragraph of section 67, national defense act as amended.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objectionn?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Reserving the right to object I would like to inquire what is the necessity of these officers attending the Adjutants General Association? I can understand the regular officers attending the National Guard Association, but the Adjutant General's Association is a new line.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. It is always held at the same period as the National Guard Association. I do not know that it makes any particular difference, but they are usually held on the same date at the same place.

But this is of a great deal of importance as affording an opportunity for the Regular Army officers on duty with the militia and the General Staff to confer at that time. The adjutants general of the States are all there, and they could clear up matters which might involve the calling of the adjutants general to Washington under conditions where their traveling expenses would under the law be a charge against the Government. As I understand, the entire expense involved in this change of the law has run not over $1,000.

Mr. JAMES. There is no additional expense at all.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Is there not a tendency to form more of these associations? The next thing we know, we will have an association of quartermaster generals, and then an association of surgeon generals. I can see that perhaps an exchange of views at the National Guard convention might be productive of some good. But just why the adjutants general should have an association I can not understand.

Mr. SPEAKS. The conventions of the National Guard Association of the United States have been held annually for more than a quarter of a century. They accomplish much for the benefit of our nonprofessional national defense organizations. The expenses of the adjutants general and the officers representing the several States are paid from State funds. The meetings are of great importance and should be encouraged.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I understand that.

Mr. SPEAKS. The gentleman was speaking of forming additional organizations. This is one created many years ago. It meets annually for a necessary purpose.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And I suppose a good time is had by one and all.

Mr. SPEAKS. Surely just as good a time is being had on the floor by the gentleman from New York.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the second paragraph of section 67, national defense act, as amended, be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"The appropriation provided for in this section shall be apportioned among the several States and Territories under just and equitable procedure to be prescribed by the Secretary of War and in direct ratio to the number of enlisted men in active service in the National Guard existing in such States and Territories at the date of apportionment of said appropriation, and to the District of Columbia, under such regulations as the President may prescribe: Provided, That the sum so apportioned among the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia shall be available under such rules as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War for the actual and necessary expenses incurred by officers and enlisted men of the Regular Army when traveling on duty in connection with the National Guard; for actual and necessary expenses incurred by officers of the Regular Army, and reserve officers holding commissions in the National Guard on active duty in the Militia Bureau or the War Department General Staff, while traveling in attending the annual conventions or the National Guard Association of the United States and the Adjutants General Association; for the transportation of supplies furnished to the National Guard for the permanent equipment thereof; for office rent and necessary office expenses of officers of the Regular Army on duty with the National Guard; for the expenses of the Militia Bureau, including clerical services; for expenses of enlisted men of the Regular Army on duty with the National Guard, including an allowance for quarters and subsistence provided in section 11 of the pay readjustment act of June 10, 1922, medicine, and medical attendance; and such expenses shall constitute a charge against the whole sum annually appropriated for the support of the National Guard, and shall be paid therefrom and not from the allotment duly apportioned to any particular State, Territory, or the District of Columbia; for the promotion of rifle practice, including the acquisition, construction, maintenance, and equipment of shooting galleries, and suitable target ranges; for the hiring of horses and draft animals for use of mounted troops, batteries, and wagons for forage for the same; and for such other incidental expenses in connection with lawfully authorized encampments, maneuvers, and field instruction as the Secretary of War may deem necessary, and for such other expenses pertaining to the National Guard as are now or may hereafter be authorized by law."

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

COMMISSION FOR ENLARGING CAPITOL GROUNDS

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (S. 2301) to creat a commission to be known as the commission for the enlarging of the Capitol Grounds, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Vice President of the United States, the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States, the chairman of the Senate Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, the chairman of the House Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, the minority leader of the Senate, the minority leader of the House of Representatives, and the Architect of the Capitol are hereby created a commission to be known as the commission for the enlarging of the Capitol Grounds. The commission shall have charge of the area between the Capitol and the Union Terminal Station, now owned by the Government, and such other parcels of land as may be added thereto, and is authorized to consider plans and estimates for the creation of a park area to enlarge the Capitol Grounds, both the plans showing the original scheme for the development of this area, and the alternative scheme for the development of this and added areas, and to recommend to the Congress such original and alternative plans or schemes with estimates of costs therefor, together with recommendations for the purchase of such other areas as may be considered necessary to give to the plans for the enlargement of the Capitol Grounds a suitable landscape treatment for the Capitol Building in relation to the landscape treatment with the proposed arrangement of the Mall area.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 1, line 5, after the word "chairman," insert "and ranking minority member"; and in line 6, after the word "chairman," insert "and ranking minority member."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

Mr. HOOPER. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendments offered by Mr. HOOPER: Page 2, line 2, after the word "commission," strike out the remainder of lines 2, 3, 4, and 5, down to and including the word "and."

Page 2, line 7, after the word "grounds," strike out the words "both" and insert in lieu thereof the word "including."

Page 2, after line 16, insert a new section, as follows:

"SEC. 2. If the commission is unable to submit a final report before the expiration of the Seventieth Congress, those Members of the House of Representatives who are members of the commission at the date of expiration of such Congress, if Members elect to the succeeding Congress, shall continue as members of such commission until their successors are determined by the organization of the House of Representatives of the Seventy-first Congress."

The amendments were agreed to, and the bill as amended was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

REGULATING POSTAL RATES

Mr. GRIEST. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H. R. 12030) to amend Title II of an act approved February 28, 1925 (43 Stat. 1066, U. S. C., title 39), regulating postal rates, and for other purposes, as amended, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

than 2 pounds, stamps to the value of 10 cents shall be affixed (in addition to the regular postage); weighing more than 2 pounds but not more than 10 pounds, stamps to the value of 15 cents shall be affixed (in addition to the regular postage); and on such matter weighing more than 10 pounds, stamps to the value of 20 cents shall be affixed (in addition to the regular postage).

EFFECTIVE DATE

SEC. 9. This act shall become effective July 1, 1928.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. BELL. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. GRIEST. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRIEST] is entitled to 20 minutes, and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BELL] to 20 minutes.

Mr. GRIEST. Mr. Speaker, this bill if enacted, as the committee unanimously recommends, will be the first postal rate law in the history of the Congress to equalize and popularize by revision downward postal rates in all classes of mail. It is the result of an intensive study of postal rates by members of the Post Office Committee of the House, the late joint subcommittee of the House and Senate, and the Post Office Department during the period that has elapsed since the last postal rate bill was hurriedly constructed to meet the emergency caused by the salary bill for postal employees in 1925.

The pending bill corrects and modifies that act and other postal-rate enactments. It accomplishes an equitable readjustment and reduction of rates in all classes, the reduction being estimated, in aggregate, by the Post Office Department, which gives its approval to the bill, at $13,585,000. The bill also provides several new postal facilities with well-considered and moderate rates attached thereto.

That the bill is not perfect in all of its minutiæ goes without saying, but it is conceded to be a well-balanced measure and is as nearly perfect as a unanimous committee has been able to make it after exhaustive hearings and study. Permit me to send to the Clerk's desk for reading the following letter, which is somewhat personal, but came to me as chairman of the committee:

ROBERT COLLIER (INC.),
New York City, March 16, 1928.

Hon. W. W. GRIEST,
House of Representatives, United States,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. GRIEST: You remember the story of the schoolboy who was called to the blackboard to do an example. Arriving at the correct solution, he turned expectantly to the teacher.

"That is good, Johnny," commended the teacher; "you did it very well."

"Good," retorted Johnny, disgustedly. "Hell, that's perfect!"

That's the way I feel about the new postal bill (H. R. 12030) which you have just reported to Congress. More power to you, Mr. GRIEST! You and your committee have done a fine job.

Cordially yours,

ROBERT COLLIER.

Many other letters of similar import have been coming to the committee. Not a single witness during the hearings but favored the passage of the bill even if his own particular recommendation or criticism was disagreed to. I am well convinced that there is general agreement by both the so-called "big" and "little fellows" who are users of the mails, that this bill should pass. To achieve such a situation, the House will realize that we had to overcome many difficulties and divergent views in order to frame provisions that would be acceptable both to the Post Office Department and to the users of the mails. This, I believe, has been accomplished sufficiently well to justify our committee's indorsement of the bill for passage by the House.

Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. RAMSEYER]. I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. RAMSEYER] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. GRIEST. I also ask unanimous consent that all Members of the House may have the privilege of inserting their remarks in the RECORD on this bill for three legislative days.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Speaker, I do not know what I can say to elucidate this bill in five minutes. I agree with our chairman [Mr. GRIEST] that the bill is a good one and as nearly perfect as the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads could make it. If there is any phase of this bill which anyone wants to have explained I shall willingly yield for questions. Before yielding I wish to state that this bill is the result of careful study. The postal salary and postal rate bill in 1925, you will remember, carried some increases in postage rates which I thought very unwise. Post cards, for example, were increased from 1 cent to 2 cents. That proved unprofitable and the rate has been restored to 1 cent. The rate on third-class matter, which is direct-by-mail advertising, was increased from 1 cent for 2 ounces to 1½ cents for 2 ounces. It resulted in diminishing the postal revenues.

Most of the provisions of this present bill passed the House during the last Congress in separate bills by unanimous consent. They went to the Senate, and the Senate passed its own bill, and then in conference we agreed to a rate bill substantially like this rate bill that is now before you. This bill, however, has a few new provisions. That rate bill would have been enacted into law at the last session of Congress but for the unfortunate filibuster in the Senate during the closing week of the last Congress.

In the bill before us the post-card rate has been reduced from 2 cents to 1 cent. As to second-class mail, you know we established a zone rate back during the war and provided for four increases; an increase in the fiscal year 1919, another in 1920, another in 1921, and then another in the fiscal year 1922. The users of second-class mail want to go back to the 1920 rate. This bill is a compromise and carries the 1921 rate.

The third-class rate stays at 1½ cents for 2 ounces. But we carry a provision here for bulk mailing; that is, when envelopes with stamps affixed or without stamps affixed are presented, all of the same size, either in 20-pound bulk, or 200 separate pieces, it is taken at the rate of 12 cents a pound. That means that each separate piece weighing 1⅓ ounces or less goes for 1 cent. According to the estimate of the Post Office Department from 80 to 85 per cent of third-class mail consists of pieces weighing less than 1⅓ ounces. That means that the bulk of third-class mail will hereafter enjoy a rate of 1 cent per piece. This rate, I think, will prove quite satisfactory to the users of third-class mail.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSEYER. Yes.

Mr. GREEN. How does this bill take care of seed houses mailing out a small parcel of seed?

Mr. RAMSEYER. It gives them a flat rate of 1 cent for 2 ounces, or if offered in bulk, 8 cents a pound.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Is the time all taken?

Mr. GRIEST. No. I yield to the gentleman three addiminutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa is recognized for three additional minutes.

Mr. THURSTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSEYER. Certainly.

Mr. THURSTON. On page 4 I notice there is a provision for catalogues. Would you object to including in that provision circulars?

Mr. RAMSEYER. Everything printed that goes into third class less than a catalogue or a book could be designated or classed circulars. There would be objection to the gentleman's proposal unless we should decide to go back to 1 cent for 2 ounces, which was the rate prior to 1925. The rule under which this bill is considered, amendments are not in order.

Mr. THURSTON. What is the practical aspect of that exception now?

Mr. RAMSEYER. It is that when circular mail is offered for mailing in bulk, the rate is 12 cents for each pound, which means that if the pieces do not weigh over 1⅓ ounces each, they go for 1 cent apiece.

Mr. HUDSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSEYER. I yield.

Mr. HUDSON. In reference to section 2, was any representation brought before the committee as to what this might possibly do to the small retailers?

Mr. RAMSEYER. No.

Mr. HUDSON. It seems it will work a hardship to the small retailer and to the special advantage of the mail-order houses.

Mr. RAMSEYER. I do not think so. The mail-order houses are here and they are here to stay. Mail-order houses advertise largely through newspapers and catalogues. On the other hand there are a lot of small business concerns and small factories which can not afford to advertise in the newspapers and which depend upon selling their goods almost exclusively on direct-by-mail advertising, using the third-class mail.

Mr. HUDSON. This will greatly stimulate their business?

Mr. RAMSEYER. I think it will help.

Mr. HUDSON. Therefore it must take business from somebody else.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Not necessarily.

Mr. HUDSON. It is a serious question, to my mind as a former retailer, as to what it will do.

Mr. RAMSEYER. I do not think it will be as serious as the gentleman thinks.

Mr. KNUTSON. How are the rates changed on large catalogues?

Mr. RAMSEYER. Well, large catalogues go by parcel post or fourth-class mail. They pay the regular parcel-post rates. There is only one other feature in this bill to which I wish to call your attention and that is the last part, the special handling and special delivery services combined on parcel post. In the bill of 1925 we inaugurated special handling, that is, if you paid 25 cents extra on a parcel it received the same expeditious handling that first-class mail received.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has again expired.

Mr. GRIEST. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman one additional minute.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Ordinarily, a parcel-post package does not travel with the same expedition as first-class mail, but if it had that 25 cents extra placed on it it would receive expeditious handling from the office of entry to the office of delivery, the same as first-class mail. When it got to the office of delivery it would have to take its turn in getting to the sendee, but now, with the combined special handling and special delivery, there is promise of greater expedition to those who want to pay for these new services. By paying a little extra you not only get expeditious handling from post office to post office, but you get immediate delivery at the post office of delivery.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has again expired.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, can the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield me one minute in order to ask a question?

Mr. GRIEST. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman one minute.

Mr. CRAMTON. Referring to the so-called Watson bill, with reference to the delivery of parcel post C. O. D., which has not been ordered, is there anything in this bill covering that matter?

Mr. GRIEST. There is nothing in this bill in regard to that. This is purely a rate bill and we cut out all extraneous matters. The so-called Watson bill is now before our committee. I understand it has been favorably reported by a subcommittee, but it has not yet been acted upon by the full committee.

Mr. CRAMTON. I hope it will receive the same favorable report from the full committee.

Mr. BELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. SPEARING].

Mr. SPEARING. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, I do not rise in opposition to the bill. On the contrary, I voted in the committee to report it favorably and will vote for the bill on the floor of the House to-day, and I think it should be passed. However, in the committee I did offer an amendment to the second-class rates, particularly with reference to the rates on newspapers, and were it possible to offer an amendment now I would repeat the amendment here on the floor of the House and urge, as vigorously as I might, that it be adopted.

The situation with reference to newspapers is that under the war revenue law of 1917 an increase of rates was provided on newspapers and all other second-class matter. Those rates were increases of 25 per cent to 225 per cent more than they were before, effective July 1, 1918. There was another increase of 50 per cent to 450 per cent more than the prior rate, effective July 1, 1919, known as the 1920 rate, and another increase of 75 per cent to 675 per cent more than the original rate, effective July 1, 1920. That increase is what is known as the 1921 rate. The present bill proposes to restore the 1921 rate. There was a further increase under the war revenue law of 1917 of 100 per cent to 900 per cent more than the original rate, effective July 1, 1921. There was a slight change, a small increase and a slight decrease by act of February 28, 1925, effective April 15, 1925, which need not be considered here. It seems to me it would be perfectly fair to go back to the 1920 rate, and if ever the occasion presents itself I shall offer an amendment to that effect and urge it.

I do not think anyone disputes that the newspapers—the weekly periodicals to a large extent, and the monthly magazines to a certain extent—are matters of education. The running of the post office and the operations of carrying the mail—first class, second class, and all classes of mail—are matters of governmental function and are carried on for the purpose of increasing the means of communication between the people throughout the country and with other nations. We should encourage that. The evidence before the committee shows that as the result of the increases in the newspaper rates the circulation of certain papers has decreased. That has resulted because they have not been able to send their papers at the same rate they sent them before.

To my mind a newspaper is one of the greatest means of education that we have. It supplements the school education beyond expression. It gives the youth, particularly, knowledge of current events and of everyday happenings. It is history in the making. Show me a boy or a girl, a man or a woman, who keeps up with the current literature through the daily press and the weekly press, and I will show you a person who is well informed not only about current history but about history of years ago. It is an education; it is knowledge; and we should encourage it and we should increase the circulation. The increase in the postal rates had a tendency to discourage it, and, as I say, if it were possible I would offer an amendment urging the 1920 rate. Of course, that is not now possible, but I mention it at this time merely for the purpose of calling the matter to the attention of the House in the hope that when an opportunity does present itself the Members of the House will bear that fact in mind and will vote for such an amendment when it is offered or for such a proposition when it may come before the House in any form for action.

Mr. PEERY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPEARING. Yes.

Mr. PEERY. That opportunity will not come now?

Mr. SPEARING. Not on this bill at this time, but it may later on.

As indicated by its name, the war revenue act of October 3, 1917, was a war measure. It was, of course, necessary to raise increased and additional revenues. It was natural at that time to seek additional income from any and every source possible, including the Post Office Department. Many other activities were included as means of increasing the income of the Government. Practically every one of the increases which were necessitated by war conditions have been abolished. The only remaining ones are the so-called nuisance taxes and the additional charge of second-class postage. The act of February 28, 1925, to which I have already referred, made very little change in the second-class postal rates; in fact, one charge was increased from 5 cents per pound to 6 cents, while another was reduced from 7 cents to 6 cents, and a third, which affects very few newspapers, from 10 cents to 9 cents, so that for all practical purposes the existing rates are the same as those which have been in effect since July 1, 1921, being the fourth raise under the war revenue act of October 3, 1917. The newspaper publications did not at the time of the increase make any complaint, but the necessities of the case having ceased to exist, it is fair that the newspaper publications should be given consideration and that the extraordinary increases in the rates charged to them by reason of war conditions should be reduced. There is no pretense that the rates which existed prior to the war should be restored, but it is seriously urged that there is a middle ground which will be fair to the newspapers, the people, and the Post Office Department. It seems to me, and I insist, that no one can with reason complain if increases ranging from 50 per cent to 450 per cent more than the original rate are reinstated. Those are the increases effective July 1, 1919, and known as the 1920 rates. They should be restored. The pending bill restores the 1921 rates, with increases ranging from 75 per cent to 675 per cent over and above the rate which prevailed prior to the war, and, for that matter, during the first several years of that conflict. Those rates are too high and unreasonable, and there is nothing to justify them except the desire to obtain revenue for the Post Office Department.

As I have already said, the carrying of the mails is a governmental function. The Post Office Department is the only department of the Government that seeks to obtain a revenue from its operation, or, more properly speaking, for the services which it renders. Every other department of the Government renders services to the people free of charge. We all know the unlimited number of publications issued by the Agriculture Department and distributed free to the people. This is as it should be. I am not finding fault with that policy; on the contrary I approve it; because the distribution of the bulletins, the yearbooks, and other publications of the Agriculture Department result in the education of the people and the improvement of conditions in the country. That also is a governmental function. So, in the Department of Commerce an incalculable amount of literature is distributed among the people for their education and for the improvement of conditions, economic and otherwise. The Public Health Service renders countless services to the people and likewise distributes free hundreds of thousands, and possible millions, of publications in pamphlet form and otherwise. This list could be increased to such an extent that it would be unreasonable to include in these few remarks the unlimited number of services which various departments of the Government render to the people without cost or charge to them.

What I have said of those other departments is true of the Post Office Department. It is as much a department of the Government as are the others. It is performing a governmental function just as truly as are the other departments. There is no pretense, and I am not contending, that the Post Office Department should render its services or perform its functions without compensation. The price demanded from those who use that department need not necessarily be the cost of the service, though each should bear some relation to the other.

As I have already indicated, the carrying of the daily newspaper, and in lesser degree the weekly publications, and the monthly magazines, is a means of educating the people just as is the distribution of the publications of the Agricultural Department, the Commerce Department, the Public Health Service, and of all those other departments of Government which issue and distribute literature of one kind or other to the people for their education, uplift, and improvement. In my judgment, there is nothing more important than the dissemination of news, of putting into the hands of the people the records of current events. It is a means of education that can not be obtained in the schools or colleges, but it is just as important as is the instruction in the educational institutions. The Government should do everything to encourage the distribution of newspapers, particularly the dailies, so that the people throughout the country will be more fully informed and advised of current events and happenings. To put postage rates on daily newspapers at a reasonable figure accomplishes, or in all events helps to accomplish, this purpose. It is undeniable that one of the principal causes of the advance and progress of this country is the daily newspaper and its distribution among the masses of the people, bringing to them knowledge of events which have happened, contemplation of those which might come to pass. The free interchange of news and views has done as much for the progress and advancement of this country as any one thing, if not more. This is not the time to limit, retard, or interfere with the distribution of the daily newspaper but to encourage it, and this can be done by restoring the 1920 rates which, as I have already indicated, are fair to the Government, to the people, and to the publishers.

This subject has been discussed and has been under consideration for several years. The justice and fairness of the 1920 rates were recognized by the special joint subcommittee of the Senate and of the House, which was created by the act of February 28, 1925, to study and consider the rearrangement of the postal rates which, as we have already seen, were increased purely and simply as a war measure. Thus, in a report made by that subcommittee to the House on May 11, 1926 (Rept. No. 1157, 69th Cong., 1st sess.), that committee said among other things:

> The committee recognizes a degree of force in the arguments submitted to it in favor of the 1920 rates for second-class matter. The figures presented by the Post Office Department do not, however, warrant a recommendation to this effect.

The dissemination of news and information, the education of the people, their uplift, improvement, and advancement are not properly matters of financial cost, but should be pursued as a governmental duty without regard or reference to the cost in dollars and cents. The results can not be measured by the rule of a dollar. It is not so treated in other departments of the Government and should not be in the Post Office Department. If the 1920 rates are fair they should be adopted irrespective of whether or not they insure sufficient revenue in money to satisfy those in charge of the Post Office Department.

It is true that in the report (No. 1006, 70th Cong., 1st sess.) of the committee on the pending bill (H. R. 12030) it is indicated that there are reductions from existing rates. That statement is literally true, but the "existing rates" are so much higher than were the rates which prevailed before the war that it is idle to talk about reductions. The rates recommended by the committee and carried in the bill are largely in excess of, and are general increases over, the rates which existed under normal conditions, and the rates should be restored to those which should properly prevail under the present normal conditions. Confessedly, the rates recommended in the bill are for revenue or, in all events, to prevent a decrease in revenue. As we have already seen, that is not the function of the Government and should not be made the excuse for charging a higher rate than is justified by the conditions of the case or situation.

Much more could be said in favor of a fair rate on second-class matter, and particularly to the daily newspapers, but under present conditions I have said enough, I trust, to draw to your attention what seems to me to be unfair and improper rates on second-class matter to the end that when a reduction of those rates is properly before the House for action the Members will give the subject their serious and favorable consideration to which it is entitled.

Mr. BELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. OLIVER].

Mr. OLIVER of New York. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the committee, this probably is the most difficult subject Congress has to deal with—the matter of rate making. I do not care what the rate is on, it becomes a complicated task and one which a new member on a committee finds it difficult to follow.

This bill has been declared by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRIEST] and by Mr. Robert Collier as a perfect bill. It may be perfect—at least, we had a committee which tried to make it as perfect as it could.

Mr. ARENTZ. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of New York. Yes.

Mr. ARENTZ. Speaking about a perfect bill, it comes to mind that on page 8, line 17, the committee possibly had in mind helping the farmer, but it seems to me if you are going to be a real help to him you should exclude the provision requiring the consent of the Interstate Commerce Commission to an investigation with respect to weight limits, rates, zones, and so forth.

Mr. OLIVER of New York. I have not a copy of the bill before me, but I know the provision the gentleman alludes to.

Mr. ARENTZ. I admit frankly I do not know just what that provision means and I wish if the gentleman himself does not know about it that some member of the committee would give me light upon the subject.

Mr. KELLY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of New York. Yes.

Mr. KELLY. I would like to state to the gentleman that that is a provision of law that has been carried since the act of 1912. It is word for word the provision of law now and has been carried continuously with the idea of enabling the Postmaster General to go to the Interstate Commerce Commission and lay down a schedule if he desires to work out a rate which will pay the cost of the service. So far it has been left to the Post Office Committee of the House to suggest such a rate.

Mr. ARENTZ. There is no relief for the farmer.

Mr. OLIVER of New York. I hope the gentleman will yield to me now, as I have only five minutes and I want to use a few of them myself. I think farm relief is going to be up some time next week in a broader way than this, and I hope this will not be the only thing the gentleman has in mind to give to the farmers. [Laughter and applause.]

I was pointing out that it is a difficult thing for the Congress to make postal rates. There is a provision in the bill authorizing the Interstate Commerce Committee to make parcel-post rates so that the rates given to the Government will carry the cost. That is the provision the gentleman alludes to.

Mr. PEERY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of New York. Yes.

Mr. PEERY. I would like to ask the gentleman his opinion as to the rates given to newspapers and second-class matter.

Mr. OLIVER of New York. With respect to the rates on newspapers I would like to see those rates established in accordance with the suggestion of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. SPEARING], but we can not give everybody a break in the rates. We had a jump in the rates when we raised the postal salaries and it was a quick jump. It was a jump that was probably unscientifically made; in fact, I think almost all rates made by Congress are more or less unscientific, but we are now trying to get back to a normal condition and get back to that condition as fast as we can. This bill will cause a deficit of $13,500,000, according to the estimates of the Post Office Department. I want to discuss the subject of deficits.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of New York. Yes.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. This bill has been referred to as a perfect bill. But was there not considerable protest before the gentleman's committee with regard to the third-class rates from the retail merchants and shopkeepers in the smaller towns who feel that their business will be affected by privilege accorded the large mail-order houses?

Mr. OLIVER of New York. No; there was hardly a word of protest about that.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Some of us have been receiving protests about that provision.

Mr. OLIVER of New York. That is the same old protest that was raised to the parcel post when it was said that the stores in the large cities would gobble up the trade of the merchants in the smaller towns. This probably ought to have been referred to as the perfect committee rather than the perfect bill, because we have a perfect chairman and a perfect ranking minority leader [Mr. BELL].

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. I admit the allegation so far as the committee is concerned, but I am not so sure about it so far as the bill is concerned.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. BELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS].

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I regret the committee did not feel it wise to report a provision in this bill restoring the 1920 rates for newspapers, particularly in the first, second, and third zones. For reasons expressed by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. SPEARING], I think such a provision would have been just and proper, and it also would probably have brought in more revenue.

Since no amendment can be offered under a motion to suspend the rules, it is my purpose to vote for this bill with the hope that the Senate may restore these rates and that they may be agreed upon in conference.

I have asked for this time particularly in order to call the attention of the House to a telegram on the subject from Maj. E. B. Stahlman, one of the most prominent citizens of the South and the owner and publisher of the Nashville Banner, of Nashville, Tenn., one of the leading newspapers of the country. Major Stahlman has made a very thorough and extended investigation, covering a period of several months, of newspaper rates as they relate to postal revenues.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the manner indicated.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The telegram follows:

NASHVILLE, TENN., February 17, 1928.

Hon. JOSEPH BYRNS,

Member of Congress, Washington, D. C.:

I am sending this telegram to you as a Member from my district with the request to call together members of the Tennessee delegation and read it to them asking them to join you in supporting the reestablishment of the 1920 postal rate on newspapers. I have been quite ill, but improving, and the indications are that within a few weeks I shall be able to go to Washington. I would go to-day if I could, but I am not able. I must therefore rely upon my good friends to stand with me and the other newspapers of the State in an effort to secure justice in connection with this postal matter. I understand the House committee will likely report a bill for a return to the 1921 rate. There is nothing in that proposition that is worth anything to newspapers of the interior in the Banner class, whose mail circulation is practically confined to a 200-mile limit, and if there ever was a question that I have investigated with great care the postal matter is the one. In 1917 I spent months visiting Chicago, Cincinnati, St. Louis, Atlanta, and other large cities to enable me to reach a definite conclusion as to the cost of handling the newspapers at these different places, and spent a solid four months in Washington City to determine from the records of the department what the real cost of transportation and handling of newspaper mail would be. I then reached the conclusion that the cost of transporting newspapers under the contract made by the Post Office Department with the railroads would not exceed more than 12 cents per hundred pounds for the first zone of 50 miles, 29 cents for the second zone of 100 miles, and 56 cents for the third zone of 300 miles; and that the cost, including all terminal charges as well as transportation, would not exceed 17 cents for the first zone, 40 cents for the second zone, and 78 cents for the third zone. I say to you in all seriousness and candor that no changes have taken place nor arrangements made by the department with the railroads for transportation since 1917 that would change the rates in the slightest respect since I made this investigation. The present rate by mail is $2 per hundred pounds for the first two zones and $3 for the third zone. The rate the newspapers are asking is a return to the 1920 rate, which fixes $1.50 for the first two zones and $2 for the third zone.

The circulation of my newspaper is now 65,000, 35,000 of which could be sent by mail if the rates were right. I am sending nearly 25,000 by express and by trucks, because of the excessive postal rate. The department has been extremely unfair to the newspapers and lost a large revenue from the newspapers because of its unfair treatment of the newspapers. I don't care what the experts of the department and others may say, I am only saying what I know to be true; that is, that the talk about the newspapers being responsible for the deficit in the Post Office Department is without a shadow of justification. The 1920 rate would assuredly give the Government at least 100 per cent profit over and above the cost of transportation and handling, one of the things that ought to discredit the claims of the department experts who seek to support their contention by the statement that the overhead charge for carrying newspapers should be about $4.86 per 100 pounds, and that this applies to all distances carrying a newspaper 50 miles, as well as 1,000 miles. There never was a more preposterous suggestion, and especially in the light of the fact that the Interstate Commerce Commission, and even the department itself, established a rate of $1 per 100 pounds for carrying newspapers from New York, Boston, Philadelphia, etc., to Chicago and other western and southern cities, including Nashville, for a distance of 1,200 or more miles. I therefore reassert, and with emphasis, that there never was a time since the last contract was made by the department with the railroads some 15 years ago that the newspapers of the Banner's class were responsible for any deficit in the Post Office Department. May I not therefore ask that the solid Tennessee delegation unite with me in an effort to enact the 1920 basis of rates on newspapers and secure a vote on the question in the House. With profoundest respect and best wishes to all, believe me, your friend,

E. B. STAHLMAN.

Mr. BELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to myself. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, as a matter of course, it will be impossible for anyone to discuss the provisions of this bill in the short time allotted for its consideration. I believe our committee has presented to the Congress the best postal rate bill we have ever presented. I believe it will come nearer giving general satisfaction than any bill we have ever presented.

Of course, there is some little dissatisfaction among newspaper people, but not very much. I believe they will be satisfied with the bill which we have adopted.

We have reduced the postage on post cards to one-half of the present rate. We found upon investigation that our rate of 2 cents on post cards was driving this class of mail from the mails and, therefore, we put it back at 1 cent, as I think it should have been. There was a popular demand for this reduction.

I would like to discuss at length, if I had the time, the rates on second-class matter, but in view of the fact that several members have discussed this and have expressed their opinions about it——

Mr. GREEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BELL. I will.

Mr. GREEN. If the gentleman has time in his discussion, I would like for him to bring out just what relief has been brought to the newspapers. There are several newspapers in my district that have requested relief along this line.

Mr. BELL. There is a reduction in second-class matter, that is, on the advertising portion, of $3,860,000, based upon the actual business handled in 1927, adjusted to the prospective business which will be handled during the fiscal year 1929. This, of course, inures to the benefit of users of the second-class matter.

It will be noted by investigation that these reduced rates on second-class matter amounts to about $3,000,000. It seems to me the newspapers will be satisfied with this.

Mr. GREEN. What would it reduce the revenues if we had gone to the 1920 rate?

Mr. BELL. I can not answer that question, because I did not investigate it. The present rate on newspapers, second class, is 2 cents per pound for the first and second zones, 3 cents for the third zone, 6 cents for the fourth, fifth, and sixth zones, 9 cents for the seventh zone, and 9 cents for the eighth zone, and between the Philippine Islands and any portion of the United States, including the District of Columbia and the several Territories and possessions. The net loss on zone rates of advertising matter is $58,000,000 per annum.

We combined the zones in 1925, as above outlined, but under the bill presented to you to-day we have the following zones, with rates submitted:

For the first and second zones, 1¾ cents.
Third zone, 2½ cents.
Fourth zone, 4 cents.
Fifth zone, 4¾ cents.
Sixth zone, 5½ cents.
Seventh zone, 7 cents.

For the eighth zone, and between the Philippine Islands and any portion of the United States, including the District of Columbia and the several Territories and possessions, 7¾ cents.

The rate of transient second class—that is, when sent by others than publishers or news agents—is reduced to 1 cent for each 2 ounces or fraction thereof. Your committee believes that this low rate to the users of this class of mail will stimulate its mailing and eventually produce some revenue to the department, although at present it appears that there will be a loss of about $100,000. This reduction will be a great saving to the people who use this particular service.

It will be remembered that in 1925, under an emergency bill, we increased the postage on post cards from 1 cent each to 2 cents. We now reduce this rate to 1 cent on each, believing this will ultimately bring back into the mails that which was lost on account of the increased rate of 1925.

BUSINESS REPLY CARDS AND ENVELOPES

This is an entirely new postal feature and it is estimated that this will increase the revenue to the department $4,000,000. This, however, is based upon claims made by prospective users of the new facility. A simple explanation of this facility is that a firm doing business in Chicago, for instance, may, in advertising its wares, inclose a postal card or envelope for reply without postage affixed, which when returned to the sender the regular rate will be paid, and, in addition, not more than 2 cents will be charged. A public demand for this service suggests that it will be popular with the business of the country generally and that it will be finally very profitable to the department.

DEFICIENT POSTAGE

All mail matter of the first class upon which one full rate of postage has been prepaid shall be forwarded to its destination, charged with the unpaid rate, to be collected on delivery. If the postage is short paid one rate, the additional charge shall be 2 cents, or the deficient postage. If it is short more than one rate, the deficient postage and an additional charge of 1 cents for each ounce or fraction thereof shall be collected.

This is an entirely new feature, not introduced as a revenue producing facility but as a penalty measure. It is estimated that this feature will produce revenue of approximately $75,000.

A reduction of 1 cent per piece on parcel-post matter will be quite a saving to farmers as well as business people, and while it may reduce the revenue of the department $2,000,000 or more, this special charge on parcel post, as carried in the emergency rate bill of 1925, was, I fear, not on a very fair basis.

LIBRARY BOOKS

On library books 3 cents shall be charged for first pound and 2 cents for each additional pound; a flat rate to the limit of first, second, and third zones or within the State in which such books are mailed, and in Texas and California. It is quite probable this will become a revenue producer.

So much has been said with reference to the deficit in the Post Office Department, and reasons assigned for such deficit, I feel impelled to submit the following table as shown by the annual report of the Postmaster General:

Profit on first class for 1927 was $83,174,429.

Loss on second-class matter for the same year was $84,022,702, less $9,000,000, for "free in county," leaving a loss to the department of $75,022,702 on second-class matter.

It has been charged, especially by new candidates for Congress, that millions multiplied by millions of dollars are spent annually by the Government and Members of Congress for penalty and franked matter, when in fact, the expenditure for both services is a mere bagatelle as compared with the enormous expenses of our Government.

The following is the report of the Postmaster General as to these much-misrepresented items of expenditures:

Penalty matter for 1927 was $6,263,620. Franked matter by Members of Congress and Senators for the same year was $520,691.23.

It is estimated that should this bill be enacted into law it will increase the deficit in the Post Office Department $13,000,000, which, when added to the deficit of 1927 of $29,000,000, will cause a deficit of about $42,000,000.

I feel it is proper for me to say in this connection that such a deficit as will be is not due to extravagance on the part of our post office officials, but it may be well said it is due to the splendid service given the people of this great country of ours—the greatest in the world, and my observation, after 24 years of continuous service in this House is that the present Postmaster General, Mr. Harry S. New, is one of the most capable officials the United States of America has ever had.

Mr. BELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ASWELL].

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Speaker, this bill proposes a more general revision in postal rates than has ever been undertaken at one time. Great credit is due to the members of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads for working out this intricate measure, but I can not bring myself fully to agree with all its provisions.

I shall direct your attention specifically to the proposed adjustment of the rates on second-class mail matter.

Second-class mail consists of periodicals and newspapers that are issued at regular stated intervals and handled by the mails to a legitimate list of subscribers. From its inception it has been a wise policy of the Federal Government to favor this class of mail with postal rates that aid in the wise distribution of news and literature. It is not necessary at this time for me to prove the beneficial results of that policy, which policy has been the prime factor in creating a unity of thought and purpose in the development of the United States, in giving us one country, one people, one flag.

For many years prior to the war all publications having second-class mail entries were given a flat rate of 1 cent per pound regardless of distance and regardless of cost. This was a subsidized rate in that the revenue was less than the actual cost of the service, although no one definitely knows or ever will know what the actual cost is in handling any one class of mail matter.

At the outbreak of the war Congress found it necessary to find new means of raising revenues to carry on its operations. At first it was thought advisable to place a tax upon advertising matter, but that principle was abandoned. It was therefore decided to include in the war revenue act of 1917 a provision for increasing the postal rate on second-class matter, first by increasing the rate on the reading portion to 1½ cents per pound and by placing a much higher rate on the advertising matter. This was purely a war measure.

Congress realized that the burden of this proposed increase of 300 or 400 per cent was too great for the publishers to absorb at one time, therefore the bill provided for four yearly increases, the first to become effective July 1, 1918, and other increases at the beginning of each succeeding year. The final rates that became effective on the advertising portion ranged from 2 cents to 10 cents per pound, based upon the distance handled.

The publishers at first felt inclined to protest, but they realized it was a patriotic duty to acquiesce and thus do their part in the prosecution of the war; but they understood that this was to be a temporary measure and that the burden would be removed when the emergency passed.

Included in the same bill were several other tax items on transportation and postal matters. After the signing of the peace terms steps were taken for the repeal of other tax items. At the present time none of the transportation taxes remain except that on the advertising matter in newspapers and periodicals.

The publishers have realized that changed conditions have greatly increased the cost of the handling of mail matter and therefore recognized that the old rates were too low and that a compromise should be found. They have agreed that a fair basis would be reached by the elimination of one-half the raise, the last two of the four increases, which would leave in effect the rates that became effective on July 1, 1919, and generally known as the 1920 rates, which were the rates that were effective during the 1920 fiscal year.

It is true that the so-called cost reports of the Post Office Department indicate that second-class mail is carried at a tremendous deficit, and I do not care at this time to go into the details as to how those figures were obtained. Personally, I do not admit that there was any such deficit, because the results were obtained by prorating all expenses of the postal operations to the various classes of mail matter, regardless of the value of the services or the conditions under which rendered.

At the hearings conducted by the House committee there was a large amount of evidence introduced to prove that the present rates on second-class matter are higher in many cases than the cost of similar services by other means. This was proven conclusively by the fact that since 1920 there has been a tremendous increase in the volume of advertising matter published in periodicals and newspapers that could move at second-class mail rates. In fact, the department admitted at the hearings that the weight of this mail matter carried in 1927 was 31,000,000 pounds less than handled by them during the fiscal year 1920. It was also shown that the actual weight of the advertising matter in only 150 publications was 106,000,000 pounds greater in 1927 than in 1920.

This 106,000,000 pounds of these 150 publications is being distributed by commercial means other than by the Post Office Department and it only represents a part of the tremendous increase in this matter that could have been handled by the Post Office Department if the 1920 rates had remained in effect. In other words the rates are higher than the traffic can bear. These facts prove, I think, that it will be an economically sound policy to adopt the 1920 rates on second-class matter.

Second-class mail rates are applicable to approximately 29,000 publications of various sizes and with many different conditions under which they are handled. Included in this classification are newspapers that are delivered free in the county of publication and therefore pay no revenue; then there is a group of some 6,000 publications to which Congress has given a special flat rate of 1½ cents per pound regardless of weight per piece, advertising content, or distance handled, and these factors are very important elements in determining the cost per pound. I recently read an analysis in regard to one of these publications with a national distribution and was amazed to see that the difference between the postage rate paid by it on its advertising content and the rate that would have been paid had the present zone rate been applied enabled the publication to save $205,000 per year. That is, this publication receives a subsidy of $205,000 per year as against its competitors for the advertisements carried by it. It is undoubtedly a wise policy to give this rate and it undoubtedly creates a deficit, but it must be kept in mind that that is part of the deficit on second class that is referred to by those opposed to a proper rate on portions of second-class mail and it has nothing whatever to do with the question involved of reducing the rate on the advertising portion of commercial publications to the 1920 basis.

This second-class grouping also includes many publications of unusually small size, with known cases of where it takes over 150 of them to make one pound and when it is remembered that a pound rate applies to them in the same manner as a pound rate applies to a publication weighing one pound, although the piece element of cost is only one-one hundred and fiftieth as great, it can easily be seen what the major portion of the deficit is on such mail matter. This is due entirely to a sound policy of Congress to help these small publications.

It was shown at the hearings that the actual deficit, if any exists, on the so-called zone-rate-paying publications is due to the rate on the reading matter, which is entirely a question of the governmental policy that has been in existence since the foundation of the Government, and that there would be no actual deficit on the advertising portion by itself if we restore the 1920 scale of rates on advertising matter in such publications.

As stated before, the present rates on this advertising matter is a result of a war revenue act to meet an emergency. That emergency has passed. This bill removes only one of those four yearly increases and would have the effect of restoring the so-called 1921 rates. This does not go far enough. Congress should take immediate steps to right this wrong by restoring the 1920 rates. This would be amply justified from an economical standpoint, because it would bring back to the mails a large volume of this second-class mail matter.

I regret that the House will not be permitted to-day to vote on an amendment restoring the 1920 rates, which, in my opinion, if properly debated, would be adopted; but in view of the fact that the Senate has on two occasions approved the 1920 rates on second-class mail matter, and with the hope that the Senate may do so again, with the conferees approving, I shall vote for the passage of this bill as it is written. [Applause.]

Mr. GRIEST. Mr. Speaker, I yield five and a half minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY].

Mr. KELLY. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, in the history of Congress there have been very few measures dealing with the revision of postage rates on so extensive a plan as this measure. While this bill does not cover all rates on mail matter, it does involve more than has been customary in such legislation, which has generally revised postal charges in piecemeal and by fractions.

The act of February 20, 1792, was the first postal rate bill under the Constitution. It served as the basis for all changes until the act of March 3, 1825, which repealed all previous rates but did not make any substantial changes in the new rates enacted.

The next revision was is 1851, and the schedules were again rewritten without any real departure from original principles. In 1863 another revision was made, which abolished the zone rates on first-class matter and established new postage charges.

The act of March 3, 1879, repealed all former rates and established the four classes of mail matter as we have them to-day. These 1879 rates were modified by bills dealing with separate classes. The 2-cent letter rate and the 1-cent a pound rate for second class were established in 1885.

These rates have been the basis during a generation. In 1917 zone rates were established for commercial second class. In 1925 we formulated a number of new rates in connection with the postal salary bill.

The 1925 changes taken with this bill before us to-day amount to a general revision of postage rates, one of the six measures of the kind in our history.

Each one of these general revisions has been followed almost immediately by laws making minor changes, indicating the strength of the protests against specific rates.

I give it as my belief that when this bill is finally enacted into law, there will be less dissatisfaction with its provisions and fewer appeals for changes than after any former rate revision.

I do not mean that this measure is perfect. I do mean that it is the result of years of patient study and considerable experimentation and resulting experience. Its provisions are not hastily drawn but are the fruits of many hearings where the representatives of every class of mail users have had their day in court. It carries with it the indorsement of the Post Office Department, whose official representative, Mr. Joseph Stewart, has made a commendable effort to cooperate with the Post Office Committee and the mail users in working out a postage-rate structure which shall be as just and fair as possible. I can not forbear to say also that the organizations representing the mail users, with few exceptions, have acted in a spirit of fair play, which proves that they consider the public interest as well as their own.

Some changes may yet be desired by certain of these organizations, but I am confident that not one of them will take the responsibility of opposing this bill exactly as it stands if such opposition should mean its defeat.

Mr. Speaker, this bill is founded on just and correct principles of postage rate making. It does not segregate the classes of mail matter and attempt to make each one self-sustaining as a unit. Such an attempt has never been seriously advocated in Congress, whose deliberate policies have made it impossible. It does not attempt to make users of paid mail matter pay for free services. This bill deals with all paid mail matter as a whole and provides aggregate revenue to cover all costs of the service given such mail matter. It puts paid mail matter on a self-sustaining basis.

Proper consideration is given the fact that the primary function of the Postal Service is to carry first-class mail matter. This great nation-wide communication organization must be maintained for that purpose. Therefore, it is fair to assess a considerable proportion of the overhead expense to this class of mail, and this is done by the retention, without change, of the 2-cent letter rate.

We have provided rates for commercial second class to assure payment of the cost of carrying the advertising portions, while the reading matter has a less-than-cost rate in accordance with traditional policy.

The third-class rates will pay all costs of handling, and the same principle is carried out as to fourth-class or parcel post.

Taking all paid mail matter in these four classes as a whole the revenues will be about $572,463,000. This is almost exactly the actual expenditures which will be required to handle this mail matter.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLY. Certainly, I yield.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. A great many of us have heard from the retail dealers, the merchants, in our districts, objecting to certain features of the bill, particularly that it favored the large mail-order houses at their expense.

Mr. KELLY. There are only three provisions in this bill over which there is the slightest controversy. The gentleman from New York refers to one of them, that dealing with third-class mail matter. I will say that the small dealers to whom he refers do not understand the provisions if they believe there is a discrimination. The fact is that this bill carries a preferential rate for catalogues under 8 ounces in weight. That rate is 1 cent for 2 ounces and applies any distance. The big mail-order houses, with their heavy catalogues, pay parcel-post rates by zones. Those rates are higher in all except the first, second, and third zones.

We also provide a rate on regular third class, which means 1 cent for 1⅓ ounces where as low as 200 pieces are mailed. This will serve even the smallest retailers in the country, as well as those who send out vast quantities at one mailing.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Would the gentleman say, then, that the fears of that class of merchants are ill founded, as far as the rates in this bill are concerned?

Mr. KELLY. Yes; and they will learn on experience that we have given them great advantages in this measure.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLY. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. Even though we can not amend this bill in any particular, the gentleman is for it.

Mr. KELLY. I am for it as a fair and square postage rate schedule which is built on proper principles.

Mr. BLANTON. Under the circumstances, I will vote for the bill with the gentleman. I follow my friend from Pennsylvania on postal matters.

Mr. KELLY. The gentleman does me high honor, and I appreciate it.

Now, Mr. Speaker, let me sketch the provisions of this bill. First, I will outline the changes and the new services provided which are not in the least controversial, since they have been approved without qualification by every party concerned.

POST CARDS AND PRIVATE MAILING CARDS

This bill restores the 1-cent rate on post cards and private mailing cards. For the past three years the rate has been 2 cents.

When this change was made it was estimated that 1,250,000,000 post cards and private mailing cards were being carried in the mails. Allowing for a reduction of 250,000,000 the new rate was estimated to bring in an additional $10,000,000 in revenue. It appears that a great mistake was made in the number formerly carried. In any case, the cost ascertainment for 1926 showed only 206,000,000 carried in 1926 and 183,000,000 in 1927.

It is probable that this increased rate has reduced postal revenues at least $6,000,000 a year. It is eloquent evidence of the fact that a rate may be higher than the traffic will bear and results in decreased receipts.

The department now estimates that the 1-cent rate will result in decreased revenues of $1,200,000 a year. It seems to me that assuredly the first year should witness the mailing of double the number now being carried, which would mean no loss in revenues.

COLLECT POSTAGE ON DELIVERY POST CARDS AND ENVELOPES

This bill authorizes a new postal facility which will be of great value to direct mail advertisers. It is provided that reply cards and envelopes may be mailed under proper regulations, and that they may be returned by the recipient and delivered to the sending firm without prepayment of postage.

A charge of not more than 2 cents on card or letter will be collected on delivery. It has been urged that persons who receive these reply cards for requesting catalogues, and so forth, do not use them often because they must affix postage or do not have the stamp available at the time. The advertiser will gladly pay the postage if the card is returned.

While this is a departure from the fixed rule that postage stamps must be affixed to mail matter, it is believed that it is justifiable and will be a valuable service while bringing in revenues sufficient to pay the cost. It is believed that it will lead to greatly increased use of the Postal Service. The department estimates increased revenues of $4,000,000 as a result of this new postal facility.

Postmasters in first, second, and third class offices will receive credit on the additional postage collected while postmasters of the fourth class will receive credit on the regular rate only.

SHORT-PAID FIRST-CLASS MATTER

This bill undertakes to provide a remedy for the abuse of sending first-class mail with deficient postage. There are some concerns which have made a practice of sending large amounts of this mail of greater weights than 1 ounce with only 2 cents postage affixed.

This practice entails much additional clerical work, and the carriers are obliged to keep separate records and collect the postage due. An attempt to end this practice is believed justifiable.

If the postage affixed is deficient by one rate, the charge is made 2 cents, which is the postage due. This will care for all cases of inadvertence and incorrect estimate.

If the shortage is more than one rate, there must be payment of the postage due and 1 cent additional for each ounce or fraction thereof.

TRANSIENT SECOND CLASS

What is known as second-class matter consists of newspapers and other publications mailed by others than publishers and news agents.

There was more widespread complaint about the rate on this class than on any other rate in that law. The old rate had been 1 cent for 4 ounces, and this was universally agreed to be too low. The act of 1925 made the rate 2 cents for 2 ounces up to 8 ounces, and parcel-post rates above.

The increase was too great, and resulted in a great falling off in the mail matter under this classification. The department reports that in 1923 about 109,000,000 pieces of transient second class were carried. In 1926 the number was about 49,000,000 pieces.

In 1923 the weight was reported as 43,000,000 pounds, and in 1927 as 11,000,000 pounds.

This bill cuts the current rate in two and makes it 1 cent for 2 ounces. The department estimates a net loss in revenues of $100,000. Surely the restoration of a great part of the pieces which have gone out of the mails will cover the estimated loss. The new rate will bring in 7 cents a pound and will pay for the entire cost of handling.

LIBRARY BOOKS

In this bill we have a new classification through which library books sent from and returned to libraries, organizations, and associations not organized for profit shall be given a special rate.

At the hearings before the committee a strong case was made for this provision. We have limited it within a distance of 300 miles or within the State in which mailed. The rate is 3 cents for the first pound and 2 cents for additional pounds.

The advantage may be seen by comparison with present parcel-post rates. For instance, a 2-pound book sent to local, first, and second zones now costs 8 cents. Under the new rate it will be sent for 5 cents. In the third zone the charge is 10 cents and under this bill it will be 5 cents.

It is said that there are 42,000,000 people living in rural areas in the United States, or in very small towns, where there are no public libraries. This low rate on books will enable these people to take advantage of libraries in the cities, and will serve in some degree as a means of educational advancement.

SPECIAL DELIVERY AND SPECIAL HANDLING

The act of February 28, 1926, established a new service known as "special handling." It was provided that the payment of 25 cents would secure to fourth-class mail matter the same expeditious transportation and handling as first class.

In view of the fact that this additional payment and the regular parcel-post rates are far less than the first-class rate this service offers a great advantage. However, it has not been as popular as had been expected.

In this bill we give a combined special delivery and special handling. Parcels up to 2 pounds will be 15 cents; between 2 and 10 pounds, 25 cents; over 10 pounds, 35 cents.

Those who desire only the special-handling advantage may have it for parcels up to 2 pounds by the payment of 10 cents; for parcels between 2 and 10 pounds, 15 cents; and over 10 pounds, 20 cents.

The bill also increases the fees paid to special-delivery messengers. For delivering mail matter of the first class up to 2 pounds, the fee will be 9 cents; for other than the first class, up to 2 pounds, the fee is 10 cents; for any class between 2 and 10 pounds, 15 cents; and for any class above 10 pounds, 20 cents.

Mr. Speaker, there is unanimous agreement as to the adoption of these provisions I have mentioned. Differences of opinion can only arise as to the specific rates recommended for advertising portions of commercial publications, circular mail, and parcels post.

Let us consider these rates so that the reasons for fixing these rates may be understood by all.

SECOND-CLASS MAIL RATES

For 11 years there has been continual agitation and protest, study and experimentation as to second-class rates. The war revenue act of 1917 established a new policy for these rates and assessed zone rates upon the advertising portions of commercial publications.

This class embraces all newspapers and other periodicals issued at stated intervals and entered under the postal requirements. These requirements as fixed by law are as follows:

First. The periodical must regularly be issued at stated intervals, as frequently as four times a year, bear a date of issue, and be numbered consecutively.

Second. It must be issued from a known office of publication.

Third. It must be formed of printed sheets of paper, without board, cloth, leather, or other substantial binding.

Fourth. It must be originated and published for the dissemination of information of a public character, or devoted to literature, the sciences, arts, or some special industry, and have a legitimate list of subscribers: Provided, however, That nothing contained herein shall be so construed as to admit to the second-class rate regular publications designed primarily for advertising purposes, or for free circulation, or for circulation at nominal rates.

According to the report of the Postmaster General for the fiscal year 1927, there are 29,531 publications entered in the various post offices as second-class mail matter under the above requirements of the law.

These publications having second-class entry are divided into a number of subclasses for various reasons. The main divisions as far as postage rates are concerned are as follows:

First. Free in county; that is, publications delivered free by the Post Office Department in the county of publication.

Second. Religious, scientific, fraternal, and so forth, publications not conducted for private profit, on which a flat rate of 1½ cents per pound applies regardless of distance carried or the advertising content.

Third. Other publications containing 5 per cent or less advertising, on which a flat rate of 1½ cents per pound applies.

Fourth. All other publications which take a combination rate of 1½ cents per pound on the reading matter, and a zone rate on the advertising portion which increases with the distance.

From the beginning of the United States Postal Service it has been the traditional policy to encourage the dissemination of knowledge and information by low postal rates on periodicals.

In 1793 President George Washington recommended that public prints be sent through the mails without any charge. In making this request of Congress, he said:

> There is no resource so firm for the Government of the United States as the affections of the people, guided by an enlightened policy, and to this primary good nothing can conduce more than a faithful representation of the public proceedings diffused without restraint throughout the United States.

The first congressional act dealing with postage rates fixed rates on letters by zones. A single letter sent 30 miles cost 6 cents; over 450 miles, 25 cents. Letters of two sheets took double rates. A letter weighing an ounce paid the rate of four single letters.

In this same bill newspapers carried 100 miles paid 1 cent and over 100 miles 1½ cents.

It may thus been seen that the original policy was to grant extremely low rates to newspapers and periodicals.

By the act of 1825 papers were ordered sent through the mails free for distances within 30 miles of the place of publication. This was repealed two years later and all papers made subject to postage, but all persons having the franking privilege were given the right to frank newspapers.

In 1851 weekly newspapers were ordered sent free within the county of publication.

In 1879 the rate was reduced to 2 cents a pound for all publications and this rate was further reduced to 1 cent in 1885.

This 1 cent a pound rate continued for 32 years or until the war revenue act of 1917.

Abuses were certain to creep in and a multitude of publications secured this low rate when by no stretch of the imagination could they be said to disseminate knowledge and information.

Postmasters General complained of the violation of the real purpose of these low rates. It was not the loss on legitimate newspapers which cried for remedy; it was the misuse of the second-class privilege.

In 1917, through the war revenue act, a change was made in the rates accorded second-class matter. While confirming the traditional theory of a very low rate on reading matter, the Ways and Means Committee differentiated between reading matter and advertising columns. The committee said in substance, "We will fix a permanent rate of 1½ cents a pound on reading matter in ordinary commercial publications any distance. We will fix zone rates on the advertising in four successive increases in order to make the advertising contents pay all the cost of handling such advertising matter.

Now, waiving the obvious argument that it is the advertising contents which make the publication possible, the fact remains that Congress did enact its determination to make the advertising part of the newspaper pay the cost, while the reading portions were deliberately given a rate much lower than actual cost.

The war revenue act of 1917 provided for four yearly increases and the act of 1925 made certain changes, as follows:

	July 1, 1918	July 1, 1919	July 1, 1920 [1]	July 1, 1921	Present rates [2]

[1] Rates in H. R. 12030.
[2] Act Feb. 28, 1925.

In this bill we have fixed the rates which went into force on July 1, 1920, and since they applied during the fiscal year 1921 are usually termed the 1921 rates.

To-day the rate on reading matter in all periodical publications is 1½ cents a pound, and it matters not whether it is sent 10 miles or 3,000 miles. For policy reasons that same rate applies to all portions of religious, scientific, and similar publications not published for profit. For administrative reasons it also covers all publications containing less than 5 per cent advertising.

This is the principle upon which second-class rates are assumed to be made:

> Reading matter at a nominal rate in order to encourage the widespread dissemination of intelligence and information; advertising portions of commercial publications must pay the cost of handling such portions.

That has been the plain purpose of Congress since 1917. The confusion and misunderstanding have been due to the cost-ascertainment reports which have counted all classifications of the second class together, and have not differentiated between reading matter and advertising matter. As a result, the loss shown gives an erroneous picture of the true situation.

That there is a great loss on the reading matter is accepted. It was so decreed by Congress when it took action, knowing that the cost is several times the charge of 1½ cents a pound.

The revenues from the advertising portions were designed to pay the additional cost of carrying such advertising matter and no more.

The real question involved is, "Will the rates carried in this bill bring in revenues to pay such additional cost of handling?"

To that question there can be but one answer after complete study. These rates will pay that cost and more besides.

The only place we can secure figures of any kind is in the cost ascertainment. I have pointed out many times that the methods used in this calculation are explicitly declared by the department not to be such as can be used for just rate making. In this report all classes of mail matter are treated in exactly the same manner, just as though a railroad company should apportion costs on carrying coal and automobiles on the same basis. It simply can not be done in determining costs.

However, taking these figures just as they are, with their unwarranted gains for first class and their unwarranted losses to second, third, and fourth classes, let us see what we shall find.

This report shows that the weight of the preferential rate publications, the religious, scientific, and so forth, is 144,339,000 pounds. On this weight, I was informed by the department, the loss is estimated at $16,000,000.

Now, the total weight of the publications paying zone rates for advertising is 1,249,960,000. The proportion of half reading and half advertising would make the weight of the reading matter 624,980,000 pounds. This is carried at the flat rate of 1½ cents a pound.

This is about four and one-half times the weight of the entire religious, scientific, and so forth, class, so that the loss in carrying the reading portions of these newspapers is about $72,000,000.

The cost ascertainment states that the loss on all second-class mail matter is $84,000,000. This includes the loss on free in county, religious, and scientific, 1 cent per pound for local delivery, etc. If we take the free in county, religious, scientific, and so forth, only at the estimates furnished me by the department, we must deduct $25,000,000, which would mean a loss of $59,000,000 on the zone-rate newspapers.

We have seen that the loss on the reading matter alone is $72,000,000. Therefore the difference is $13,000,000, which is the amount paid at present rates above the cost of handling such advertising portions.

It is estimated that the return to 1921 rates provided in this bill will reduce revenues by $3,860,000. On the calculation I have just given, there will still be receipts of considerably more than the additional cost of handling the advertising portions.

It is true that it is impossible to figure this out with exactness. The department has given other figures as to the losses on these various subclasses. Even using the apportionment expense as it is given in the cost ascertainment, I believe that under the rates carried in this bill the advertising portions will more than pay their own way.

Another justification for a reduction in these rates is found in the records of advertising matter handled by the Post Office Department since 1920.

In 1920 the weight of the advertising matter in all these publications subject to zone rates was 599,098,270 pounds.

In 1926, with the increases in second-class rates, the total of the advertising matter was 551,353,779 pounds. This was a reduction of 50,000,000 pounds in the advertising matter carried by the department, although there was a considerable increase in other classes of mail and also in the advertising matter in publications carried outside the mail.

The evident cause of this reduction is that the rates were high enough to drive considerable matter out of the mail, and it found other means of transportation.

One of the fallacies in connection with second-class rates has been the belief that the loss in this class was due to the weight and volume of the large publications. The fact is that on any publication weighing a pound and over there is a profit to the department on the present rates and on the apportionment of cost used in the cost ascertainment. This was admitted at the hearings by the department representative.

The truth is that 70 per cent of the Post Office Department expense in carrying second-class mail is handling charge, and this is largely determined by the per piece cost. Some publications of this class run more than 100 pieces to the pound. The department must therefore handle, transport, sort, and deliver 100 pieces of this kind to one of a publication weighing 1 pound. Besides this, the leaflet publication usually carries less than 5 per cent of advertising and takes the 1½ cent a pound rate, while the heavy publication pays high rates on its advertising publications.

The representatives of the second-class mail users who pay zone rates requested a return to the zone rates known as the 1920 schedule. This would leave two of the four advances provided for by the war revenue act of 1917.

The publishers argued that these rates brought the best returns in revenue and that the later increases have diverted the mail to other means of handling. It was stated that in many instances these publications are being transported by private distribution systems.

The Post Office Committee of the House has for years studied this problem of second-class rates, which is the most difficult and involved of all postage rates. The numerous subclassifications and the variety of charges fixed for policy reasons add to the complex features involved.

This measure deals only with the advertising portions of the commercial publications. The return to 1921 rates is abundantly justified by the facts, and the committee urges its adoption.

THIRD-CLASS MAIL

Under this bill the users of third-class or circular mail will receive substantial benefits. According to the Post Office Department the rates provided will reduce the revenues for this class by $10,500,000 per annum.

Before the act of February 28, 1925, third-class matter covered printed matter weighing less than 4 pounds, and the rate was 1 cent for each 2 ounces or fraction thereof.

That act changed the third and fourth class limits and threw into third class all merchandise and printed matter weighing 8 ounces or less and provided a rate of 1½ cents for each 2 ounces. A preferential rate of 1 cent per 2 ounces was given books, catalogues, seeds, and so forth.

As applied to the bulk of third class the new rate meant an increase of 50 per cent. The action was taken in an effort to make this class pay the cost of service, which the cost ascertainment said it was failing to do by $16,291,000 per year.

It must be remembered that the transfer from fourth class of mail matter up to 8 ounces was a great reduction on a large quantity of mail, because the rate on such mail matter had been 1 cent an ounce up to 4 ounces and parcel-post zone rates beyond that weight.

However, the increased rate aroused great opposition. At the hearing before the Post Office Committee third-class mail users declared that it had reduced their mailings to a considerable extent. From all figures available it is probable that the rate has reduced the volume of third-class mail.

The bill before us does not restore the old rate of 1 cent for 2 ounces in so many words, but it accomplishes practically that result. Under the old rate the average circular sent weighed less than an ounce, but it required a 1-cent stamp. Under the quantity and pound provision carried in this bill the mailers will send circulars weighing up to 1⅓ ounces each for 1 cent.

Where 200 pieces, or 20 pounds in weight, of identical pieces are mailed the rate is 12 cents a pound, with a minimum charge of 1 cent for each piece. This will accommodate even the smallest mailers, since no one will send fewer than 200 pieces of this direct advertising mail matter.

It is also provided that precanceled stamps may be used and this will permit the mailers to use the pound rate and at the same time have individual stamps affixed. The bill permits the Postmaster General to require large users to route and sack their mail so that handling charges will be lessened.

While a very large loss in revenues is estimated as a result of these rates, I believe that experience will prove that revenues will eventually be increased because of them.

It is not fair to charge third class with the same apportionment of expense as first class receives. It is not given the same treatment. It is sorted and distributed by post-office clerks only after first-class mail is handled. It is sent to terminals instead of being distributed on postal cars. Letter carriers give preference to first class on delivery. There is no directory service such as is given first class. It is really fill-in mail and should be so considered in cost keeping.

I believe that the rate provided in this bill will increase the volume of third class and will result in greater returns than the present rates.

FOURTH-CLASS MAIL MATTER

By the reclassification in the act of February 28, 1925, there was taken from fourth class all packages weighing 8 ounces or less and there was added former third-class matter weighing over 8 ounces and not exceeding 4 pounds. There was no change in the specific zone rates, but a 2-cent service charge was added for all parcel post save that originating on rural routes.

At the time this change was made it was reported through the cost ascertainment that the loss on parcel post was approximately $7,000,000.

It is now estimated that the loss for 1927 was $4,479,000.

Under this bill the present rate on parcel post in the fourth, fifth, sixth, seventh, and eighth zones is reduced 1 cent. The preferential rate on parcel post originating on rural routes is still carried.

The Post Office Department estimates that the loss to revenues by this reduction will be about $2,000,000 a year.

It is generally agreed, and was so stated in the original parcel post law, that this class of mail matter should bear the total cost of the service. I admit that it is unfair to charge it with the same overhead cost as first class and it is probable that there will be no actual loss in fourth class after these rates go into effect.

However, any attempt to go further than we have done, especially as has been suggested, by the fixing of a rate of 5 cents for the local zone, would be disastrous.

Parcel-post and express matter handled by private companies are on a similar basis. The Interstate Commerce Commission fixes express rates. What is their method of fixing these rates? They have three factors. First, there is a 35-cent minimum terminal charge, and this applies to every shipment. If a shipper sends a 1-pound package 10 miles by express, this 35-cent charge must be paid. The second factor is the cost of straight transportation and the third is general overhead expense and the profit to the company.

This basis of rates was adopted after the most thorough consideration by the governmental body charged with the protection of the public. Can anyone argue that even the local rate of 7 cents provided in this bill is as high as it should be? The Post Office Department strongly urged a 10-cent rate in 1924, believing it to be necessary.

Think what must be done in handling a parcel in the local zone of New York City, for instance. The mailer goes to a substation. where a clerk weighs the parcel and sells the stamp. That stamp must be canceled. The parcel is routed by another clerk. It is sent to the main office or another substation by motor vehicle. It is again handled by a post-office clerk and is taken by a parcel-post carrier and dilvered to the addressee.

It is not like letters in first-class mail. Each parcel-post package is a separate and distinct handling. Only the efficiency of the Postal Service to-day prevents the present local rates from cutting disastrously into postal revenues. In many cities the parcel post is used by department stores for shipment of purchases.

Nor is the local rate and the other rates inclusive of a service charge for which no service is given. The so-called 2-cent service charge was adopted in 1925 as the most convenient plan of increasing the rate, so that it would include a slightly nearer approach to the charge which the express companies call a terminal charge. It was placed on the first pound for that purpose and no other.

Mr. Speaker, I have prepared a table which shows at a glance the changes made by this bill. It is as follows:

Mr. Speaker, I have reviewed the provisions of this bill with a view to showing that they are sensible, fair, and consistent with proper methods and principles of postage-rate making.

This bill is built on the basis that the Post Office establishment is an institution for the service of the American people and not for profit making.

The postal experts in the department declare that it will reduce revenues by $13,500,000. At the same time there is a reported deficit in the department of $28,000,000.

What does that mean? It means that that so-called deficit is not a deficit at all and should not be covered from postal revenues. That deficit is made up of free and partly free services performed for the public by the nation-wide postal organization by direction of Congress.

When this bill was introduced it contained an accounting section known as section 7. It contained in part the provisions of H. R. 89 introduced by myself.

The Post Office Committee after consideration decided to report them as separate measures and they were approved by the subcommittee and the main committee at the same time and ordered on the calendar. In fact, H. R. 89 is the justification for this bill, which reduces revenues in the face of a so-called deficit.

If we eliminate the free and partly free services as a charge against postal revenues, there is no deficit to-day in the Postal Service. In spite of the estimated loss of $13,500,000 by the operation of this bill, I am certain that in two years there will be a gain rather than a loss through these rates.

The Postal Service of the United States is the greatest expense-absorbing industry in the world. Through normal increase in volume, increased efficiency of the personnel, almost a billion dollars of increased costs have been absorbed in the last eight years.

The Postal Service can take on increased volume without proportionate increase of cost. It has proved that in the past and it will prove it in the future. If we will set the compass definitely and permanently for the goal "Service not profits" we will witness achievements in efficiency and usefulness which will outdo the splendid accomplishments of the past.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired. All time has expired. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

The question was taken.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I think there should be a record vote. At least, I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 220, noes 0.

So, two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS—POSTAL RATES

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, Members of the House, availing myself of the privilege granted to all Members of the House to extend their remarks on H. R. 12030, a bill to amend title 11 of an act approved February 28, 1925 (43 Stat. 1066, U. S. C., title 39), regulating postal rates, and for other purposes. I desire to say that I voted for the bill, but like many other Members regret that there was no opportunity to offer any amendment. The bill was considered and passed under a suspension of the rules, which procedure does not permit of any amendment but requires a two-third vote. The vote was unanimous, but I reiterate there were many Members who regretted that the bill was considered and passed under a suspension.

I was one of those who felt that the bill should have been considered either under the rules of the House on Calendar Wednesday or a special rule, which would have granted ample time for floor debate and that consideration which the importance of the bill justifies. To say that Congress under such circumstances as were met in the consideration of this bill under the suspension of the rule is a deliberative body is to make a mockery and a jest of the word. Five minutes given to members of the committee to present their views and answer questions in the National Assembly of the United States, the greatest territorial entity in existence with the possible exception of Russia and of a Republic whose boast is that it numbers a population of a hundred and twenty million souls all more or less interested in the pending bill, speaks for itself the travesty that parliamentary procedure sometimes assumes. Of course, there are many advocates of such a procedure who justify its operation on the ground that it is the most expedient way of securing the end in view, and they vindicate it further on the pretext that it is no more tyrannical, oppressive, or even absurd, than the previous question or the point of order. The point of order to a large extent prevents the House or its Committee of the Whole House from passing upon what, in some instances, is desirable legislation and places that authority in the hands of the Chairman of the committee or the Speaker of the House as the case may be. But, listen, if it is not promptly made the right to make it is lost. This is in mitigation of the harshness of the procedure and is an admission that it should be sustained only when the overwhelming necessity of the case demands. And listen, that which the Chairman of the Whole House or the Speaker of the Whole House may hold to be out of order can be made in order the following day by a rule from the Committee on Rules.

The ancient Egyptians were said to change the attitude of the people on many important matters by a parade of the priests of the temples holding on hieroglyphics that might not have been discernible or if that was so, not understandable by the masses who nevertheless were mysteriously impressed by the ceremony. We find that even such an august body as the House of Representatives yields complacently when a few written symbols are placed upon a piece of paper and are solemnly offered by the chairman of the Committee on Rules, the high parliamentary priests of our assembly. But that is another story and I may dwell upon it some other time. Why may I ask was this bill considered under a suspension of the rules?

Because the administration leaders knew that if the bill was considered under the ordinary rules the 1920 postal rates would be restored and that some deficit might occur as a result of that restoration. The House therefore had to be restrained from doing what it would have undoubtedly done had it been given the opportunity, for nearly everyone is convinced that the deficit would be negligible compared with the results that would flow from a cheap newspaper service. From the beginning of this Government it has been generally admitted that newspapers are an extension of the school system of this country, more certainly so than colleges, universities, and libraries. And yet the encouragement given to the newspaper extension of the school system as contrasted with the financial aid and assistance to the schools themselves by the Federal, State, and municipal governments is distressingly insignificant. Do not misunderstand me; I am not complaining about the expenditures made upon our schools. I am complaining as bitterly as I can at the lack of vision on the part of those whose duty it is to see and at their failure to give a modicum of encouragement to the newspapers and the magazines, the creators of that indispensable factor in the life of our great Republic, public opinion, which is the crystallization of national thought upon any subject.

The press—the newspapers aggregating 29,000—is the crowning glory of the educational system. No one disputes the educational value of journals, newspapers, magazines, weekly and monthly. No one disputes that public sentiment is crystallized into that overshadowing factor in the life of the Republic, public opinion by the newspapers of the country "I care not who write the laws of a country if you permit me to write its songs," said Fletcher. The average American may well stand up to-day and say, "I care not who write the laws of the country if you permit me to own its newspapers." That is an attestation of a power possessed by not one of the three coordinate branches of the Government, even if it is possessed by the three combined, which is doubtful. Jefferson in a day when newspapers had not become the intellectual force that they are to-day declared that if he had to choose between a country with a constitution and no newspapers and a country with no constitution and newspapers he would prefer and take the latter. I hope that the Senate will amend this bill so as to make for a return of the 1920 rates on newspapers and that the House will concur in that amendment, or if there be a conference report that the House will support that report in the event that it includes such a Senate amendment as I have referred to. If it be true that the pen is mightier than the sword, and that maxim of present-day life seems to be generally subscribed to, why worry about an insignificant deficit when we are appropriating hundreds of millions for guns and war vessels which, though necessary for national defense, are not such potent factors for the security of the Republic as the news which, on the wings of the morning, brings knowledge into millions and millions of homes throughout the length and breadth of the land. And knowledge means power, individually and nationally. "Ye shall know the truth and the truth will make you free."

Mr. NELSON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, the bill H. R. 12030 has been referred to as a perfect bill. While I do not regard it as such, I believe that with possibly one exception, all the changes authorized in the bill are desirable.

My objection is that proposed reductions in postal rates are not sufficient. Take for instance, the small reduction given newspapers. It represents a cutting off of but one-fourth the amount represented in the various postage increases on newspapers since the World War. A 50 per cent reduction should have been granted at this time. The press of the country, notably the rural press, has given to the Government and to the promotion of local welfare many columns which, if paid for at regular rates, would have represented a very substantial source of income. To-day there is no greater stabilizing influence than a free, honest, and untrammeled press.

The return of the 1-cent private mailing card will be welcomed by users generally. When the rate was advanced to 2 cents, the use of such cards was very largely discontinued, with resulting loss to the Government.

Another feature of the bill in which I, as a Representative of a great agricultural district, am vitally interested has to do with the postal charges, including so-called special-handling and special-delivery charge on baby chicks. The central Missouri district which I represent produces annually some 5,000,000 baby chicks. Not only are shipments made locally, but they go to practically half the States in the Union. Ever since the unreasonable rates which the present bill seeks to correct, in a limited way, at least, went into effect I have had strong and proper protests from the owners of hatcheries. During a past session of Congress I took this matter up with the Post Office Department, but without satisfaction to myself or relief to those who were so directly interested. Postmaster General New, in a letter under date of September 18, 1925, and which was in reply to one I had written him, strongly defended the 25-cent charge which became effective April 15, 1925, and to which proprietors of hatcheries had objected. The fact that some concession is now proposed is proof that the complaint as registered was not without foundation.

On September 2, 1925, Mr. H. S. Smith, of the Smith Hatcheries, wrote:

It is my opinion that this is an exorbitant charge for special handling of small boxes on short trips, even though they received the utmost care. I also do not believe the chicks receive any more special care than they did before this charge was placed on them. Just last week we had a shipment down in one of the Southern States that was carried over 100 miles beyond its destination, and the chicks were so weakened upon arrival that they all died the first day. The Postal Department is losing much business from the hatcheries because of this high charge. In most all cases where the chicks do not go out on the rural routes hatcheries are making shipment by express, as they have some protection in this way and the rates are very little more on small shipments and cheaper on large shipments.

After the adoption, in 1925, of the rates on shipments of baby chicks and which is now proposed to lower a little, George P. Player, of the Star Chick Hatchery, Westphalia, Mo., wrote in part:

A box of 25 chicks that on April 14 cost 8 cents to ship, the same box cost 37 cents to ship on April 15. The 50-size and 100-size boxes increased proportionately, and it had the effect of our shipping everything we possibly could by express, both because the express rate was cheaper, and we could insure the packages and collect the money for damage from the express company, the latter of which we could not do when shipping chicks by parcel post. For instance, the postmaster accepts the shipment of chicks and insures them and it means only that the additional postage paid for insurance is all the sender can possibly get, i. e., which spells a loss—as the Government will not pay for lost shipments or damaged shipments of chicks even though they are insured. This increase in parcel-post rates has caused nearly all of the merchants who shipped stuff by parcel post to turn to express. This proves the fallacy of the increased rates.

On February 3, 1928, Mr. Player in a letter to Resse V. Hicks, managing director of the International Baby Chick Association, 127 Wirthman Building, Kansas City, said:

It is a well-known fact that the volume of chick shipments has caused the Postal Department to sit up and take notice, so to speak, and the volume is ever increasing. Personally, I have always contended that the special handling charge meant nothing and was only one means of increasing the parcel-post rate. We actually have had more losses under the special handling charge methods than we had before it was assessed. I believe I have written you about this once before. The rates on baby chick shipments should be made the same as other parcel-post matter, weight taken into consideration. The tying of two boxes of chicks together is very detrimental and seldom do we ship chicks in this way.

For your information, we do nearly all of our shipping by express as the rates on as many as 500 chicks or five boxes is anywhere from one-fourth to one-half lower for the same amount of weight as the parcel-post rate, and the express company insures our chicks, and no matter whether there is one or all dead, they pay the claims that are made. This the Government will not do with parcel-post shipments on chicks. As the matter stands regarding shipping, the express is far more preferable than parcel post.

In connection with this question, I include in full the following letter from the proprietor of one of the largest hatcheries in the United States:

COLUMBIA, MO., February 3, 1928.

Hon. W. L. NELSON,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. NELSON: I have recently received information that some adjustment of postal rates was considered, and would especially call your attention to the fact that the hatchery men of the United States, who ship chicks by parcel post, are receiving comparatively no service for the special-handling stamp of 25 cents that we are requested to put on each package of chicks.

The mail agents are destroying as many chicks as usual this spring by getting the boxes against hot pipes or hot radiators. They carry as many past the point of delivery and, in fact, we have never received any evidence of any service, either in care or time of delivery, at the post office, or in the mail car, since this special-handling stamp has been required.

We believe it only fair that if they expect us to use this stamp—and it is a tax or expense to my business of several thousand dollars a year—that some visible service ought to be received for this outlay.

The fact of the business is, I am now shipping more than half of my output by express; first, on account of the expense being less to ship by express to many points; and, second, the extra service that the express company gives us.

We think it should be clear that the hatchery men have never asked for any adjustment of chicks at point of delivery; what they have asked for is a report of the condition of the chicks on delivery and, of course, adjustment could be made, based on this report.

The express company makes this inspection and also pays us for the dead chicks on arrival, without extra fee; and my settlements for losses on chicks with the express company last year were very satisfactory.

It does seem to me a little strange that the express company can carry 1,000 chicks, for instance, to some point in Virginia at a less charge, inspect the chicks when they arrive, take good care of them on the way—because they do—and agents follow implicit instructions to care for chicks; then when they arrive make the inspection, make the report, and then make payment for the dead chicks; and then give all this carriage and service at less cost than the Postal Service would cost us, even in the limited way that we get service at this time. At the same time the express companies are eager for this business, and it certainly pays them a profit.

We sometimes wonder if there is a concerted effort to turn this business back into private hands, or if private enterprise is so much more efficient and loyal than the public service that it gives this difference.

If for this special-handling fee the Post Office Department would give some sort of a reasonable guarantee or insurance on chicks, and at the same time provide for an inspection when the chicks arrive, it would be a service that is very essential and would, at least, furnish some reasonable grounds upon which to base the reasons for the change of the special-handling service.

There is no question but what the hauling of baby chicks is gradually drifting into the hands of the express company. We see no reason why the Postal Service should not be equal to the express service and at or below the price that they charge.

We believe that these facts ought to be brought out clear and presented to those who are interested in making fair adjustments.

We remain,

Very sincerely yours,

MISSOURI POULTRY FARMS,
Per MANUEL DRUMM.

An unreasonable charge in connection with the shipment of baby chicks means either lower prices paid farmers from whom the eggs are purchased or higher prices to be paid by the purchasers of baby chicks. So that any relief afforded in the way of lower rates, while it may result in increased business for the proprietor of hatcheries, is for the benefit of a vast number of people.

As the proprietor of the Versailles Missouri Hatchery, in protesting the higher rate at the time it went into effect, wrote:

Passing the expense on to the consumer does not solve the question, either, for any increase in cost at this time certainly does not stimulate business.

The rates on fourth-class matter up to the fourth zone remain unchanged. For the more distant zones a reduction, not of 1 cent per pound, but of 1 cent on the first pound only is made. This is so slight as to be only a gesture. Some real relief, while inadequate, is afforded in the proposed combined special delivery and special handling rate. Parcels up to 2 pounds would be 15 cents; for 2 to 10 pounds, 25 cents; over 10 pounds, 35 cents. Where special handling alone is desired charges would be, 2 to 10 pounds, 15 cents, and over 10 pounds, 20 cents.

While commending the bill as a whole I entertain the hope that the Senate may see fit to change it in some particulars and especially as regards the matters to which I have referred.

BATTLE FIELD, KINGS MOUNTAIN, S. C.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 11140) to provide for the inspection of the battle field of Kings Mountain, S. C., with a Senate amendment thereto, and concur in the Senate amendment.

The Clerk reported the Senate amendment.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is that an omnibus provision in the Senate amendment?

Mr. McSWAIN. No; it is not. It is a provision to the effect that the commission created by this bill shall work in conjunction with the War Department commission.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, this amendment just demonstrates how entirely unnecessary is the bill. We have a general commission authorized to study all of these old battle fields, to do what is proposed to be done in this special bill. Having passed a special bill for the gentleman's important battle field, the Senate put on an amendment providing that the special commission shall advise the general commission.

I believe that it is well. I favor the amendment because I think it ought to be demonstrated to the House that we do not need these special commissions.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. I will if I have time to yield.

Mr. BULWINKLE. I wish to say to the gentleman that the commission already created in the War College never has been on the battle field at all.

Mr. CRAMTON. They better get out on it and thus avoid having things put over them.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I believe when special bills come in for specific battle grounds they will be referred to the general commission.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CRAMTON. If I have time to yield, I will.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. When do you expect the report from this general commission? I have been waiting for a report from that commission for many moons.

Mr. CRAMTON. I have not been worried by the delay.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. You are not interested.

Mr. McSWAIN. There is no commission. The authority is conferred on the Secretary of War alone, and unless requested by somebody to do anything no action is taken by the department.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. I understand the Secretary of War is authorized to appoint a commission.

Mr. McSWAIN. Yes. It consists of Army officers.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. And they never report.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the Senate amendment to the House bill.

The Senate amendment was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. WURZBACH, for 10 days, on account of important business;

To Mr. THOMPSON, indefinitely, on account of sickness in his family;

To Mr. TATGENHORST, for 10 days, on account of important business;

To Mr. RAGON, indefinitely, on account of illness; and

To Mr. BURTON, for to-morrow, to attend the funeral of the late Senator WILLIS.

THE PINK BOLLWORM

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remaks on the pink bollworm in Georgia by inserting a telegram.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting a telegram, as indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the pink boll weevil in Georgia, I include the following telegram:

ATLANTA, GA., March 31, 1928.

Hon. CHAS. G. EDWARDS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

I have canvassed pink bollworm menace thoroughly with State Entomologist Wersham. Am convinced necessity imperative take immediate stringent step. If future profitable cotton growing Georgia is to continue, I earnestly appeal to you, as friend Georgia agriculture, to employ every effort secure favorable action Agricultural Committee and of Congress behalf House Joint Resolution 237, providing $5,000,000 appropriation for eradication pink bollworm. Am advised less amount inadequate. Agricultural Committee meets Monday morning.

F. H. ABBOTT,
Secretary Georgia Association.

THE NEED FOR AN ADDITIONAL FEDERAL JUDGE IN THE EASTERN DISTRICT OF NEW YORK

Mr. BACON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on a bill which I have introduced and insert therein certain data prepared for me by the clerk of the Federal Court for the Eastern District of New York.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. BACON. Mr. Speaker, on Friday I extended my remarks in the RECORD showing the need for an additional Federal judge in the eastern New York district. In these remarks I referred to certain data and tables prepared by the clerk of the United States court for that district showing the business before this court. They are as follows:

STATEMENT AND TABLES FURNISHED BY THE CLERK, UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT, EASTERN DISTRICT OF NEW YORK

The increase of business in the eastern district of New York during the past year has been phenomenal. If the slacker cases are eliminated in the totals for the year 1920, as they should be, we find that 2,034 regular proceedings were commenced in this court for the fiscal year of 1920 and 3,271 in 1921. This is an increase of 60 per cent. The increase in some of the departments is even greater. The figures for the present fiscal year indicate that this increase will be maintained or, rather, augmented. There was an increase in bankruptcy in one period of over 300 per cent and in admiralty 400 per cent. There have been days when over 20 admiralty suits have been commenced and from 10 to 15 bankruptcy petitions filed.

The following statement of business in 1906 makes an interesting comparison:

Proceedings commenced

	Cases
Admiralty	185
Law and equity	126
Bankruptcy	256
Criminal cases	74
Civil United States	14
Total	655

In 1911 the total number of cases commenced was 1,009. It was deemed necessary at that time to have two judges, thus increasing the capacity of the court by 100 per cent. Furthermore, in 1906 the judge of this district devoted a great deal of his time to criminal trials in the southern district of New York. In 1920 the business had more than doubled the figures given in 1911, and in 1921 it had more than trebled 1911.

After Judge Veeder was appointed, the judges arranged schedules of assignments so that one judge for a period of two months did the trial work, such as admiralty, law and equity, and criminal cases, while the other judge would take the motion calendars, occupying practically the whole of Wednesday and Friday afternoons of each week, and the naturalization calendar, which took up the whole of Thursday morning. In this way the judge would have Monday, Tuesday, and half of Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday to use for the purpose of attending to the ex parte business and for the purpose of going over testimony and considering cases tried before him and submitted to him for decision during the preceding two months. In very many cases judges had to read over 500 or 1,000 pages of testimony, voluminous briefs, and examine the law in opinions of courts. This practice prevailed until 1917, when the judge in charge of trials was compelled to assign the criminal work to the judge taking the ex parte and motion work. For some time this judge took, in addition to the motions and ex parte work, criminal trials on Mondays and Tuesdays. The pressure of business continued to increase, and for over a year now it has been the practice of one judge to try equity, common-law, and admiralty cases, while the other judge did all of the ex parte work—that is, applications for orders, etc.—general-motion calendar on Wednesdays at 2 o'clock, naturalizations on Thursday morning, bankruptcy calendar on Fridays at 2 o'clock, and criminal trials at every other moment that it was possible for him to be on the bench. The result has been that instead of deciding cases tried before him during the preceding months, during office hours, it was necessary for him to come down to his chambers during the evenings and on Saturday afternoons and Sundays. It is no uncommon thing for the judges to spend from half past 8 in the morning until after 6 in their chambers, go to dinner, and return, working until after 11 at night. If they did not do this they generally took home work which occupied them during the whole evening. It is difficult to think of judicial work in terms of mechanical labor when one considers the mental strain. It is not too much to say that the judges in the eastern district of New York often work from 60 to 70 hours a week. The result of this terrific strain is seen in the breakdown of Judge Chatfield and his serious illness.

Going over the calendars in admiralty for many years, it is found that the new calendars made up in October every year usually average about 75 cases. The calendar this year for October 1 had about 300 cases on it, and many more have been added since that time. The law calendar has increased and so has the equity.

During the fiscal year ended June 30, 1921, 150 civil cases were tried in the court in addition to criminal trials. This does not convey strictly an idea of the amount of work done, for the reason that while two admiralty cases may be tried in one day, it is also possible to have one admiralty case take over two weeks to try. It is not so long ago that one criminal case took a period of nine months for the trial in this district. Conditions indicate that instead of there being a slackening up of business, there will be a greater increase this year than in previous years. In addition to the regular proceeding referred to, there are many special matters, such as habeas corpus, and many applications in special matters not in regular cases.

The naturalization work is limited because of the fact that the judges can not devote more time for hearing naturalization proceedings. If more time, a half day each week, could be given to this part of the work, it would be possible to double the number of applications filed, thus relieving the situation. As it is, applications are of necessity refused, to the great inconvenience of those desiring citizenship.

The three judges are constantly occupied; one of the three takes ex parte work, motions, and naturalizations. On Mondays he may have a bankruptcy case to hear or may be able to devote his time to deciding matters already submitted or cases tried before him, being interrupted by the presentation of orders for the appointment of receivers and for various other applications. On Tuesday morning the naturalization calendar of from 300 to 600 cases has to be attende dto. Wednesday is general-motion day with a calendar of some 50 or more motions. There are motions in equity, law, and admiralty, as well as various miscellaneous applications and habeas corpus proceedings. This takes the whole morning, going on often into the afternoon. Many of the motions are sharply contested and need study and research. On Thursday the judge is again occupied with naturalization, practically for the whole morning. On Friday morning there are from 40 to 60 motions in bankruptcy. The entire morning is devoted to this. Thus it will be seen that the judge holding this part has very little time for the study of his cases.

A second judge holds criminal term. The criminal term is held every month.

This leaves one judge to try equity, law, and admiralty. It is impossible to have this class of cases tried during the months of July, August, and the early part of September. It is thus to be seen that there are nine months in the year in which trials can be had. Under the present conditions, therefore, there are three for equity, three for admiralty, and three for common law.

Take up the consideration of the admiralty calendar, which now consists of 876 cases, an increase of 146 since the 1st of October, although an admiralty term was held in November by Judge Campbell, at which time 110 cases were disposed of.

It must be evident that if 100 cases are disposed of each month, it would take over eight months of continuous trials to clear up the admiralty calendar. As only three months may be devoted to this each year, it is easy to see that we are three years behind at the present time.

The law calendar now consists of 203 cases. On October 1 there were 173; 73 have been added since and during two terms 143 cases were disposed of. The two terms were held because it was possible to get an outside judge to hold one term.

There was no objection.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, under permission given me to extend my remarks, I include herewith copy of letter received from Hon. W. P. Arnold, same relative to reduction of postal rates. This postage reduction bill undoubtedly should become a law this session of Congress:

Hon. R. A. GREEN,

DEAR MR. GREEN: I am in receipt of your letter of December 6 and assure you that the Gainesville Sun will appreciate any efforts you may put forth to have our second-class postage rates lowered.

With best wishes and kindest regards, I am,

Sincerely your friend,

W. P. ARNOLD,
Manager the Gainesville Sun.

MUSCLE SHOALS

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the bill H. R. 12448, concerning Muscle Shoals.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, in order that there may be full explanation by giving full information on the point of why the Committee on Military Affairs did not approve and recommend the passage of the only proposition before it looking to the private operation of the Muscle Shoals properties, I submit, in order to save the trouble of restating the case, a very brief interview given by myself to one of the daily newspapers of the city of Washington on the day the committee acted. This is not offered by way of apology, because the committee need not apologize for safeguarding public property and insuring national defense:

McSWAIN SAYS UNITED STATES IS FORCED TO RUN SHOALS

By JOHN J. McSWAIN, South Carolina Member House Military Affairs Committee

Undoubtedly the House Military Affairs Committee would prefer private operation of Muscle Shoals. Practically every member of the committee, with one exception, earnestly sought to obtain a satisfactory lease for private operation.

But the committee was unwilling to surrender our property at Muscle Shoals to any lessee on his own terms. That project was constructed primarily to insure a domestic supply of nitrates for use in war. Thus it is essentially a munition plant and is as essential to national defense as an arsenal to manufacture arms, or a shipyard to build battleships.

VALUABLE TO UNITED STATES

The Government is already in business at Muscle Shoals, producing and selling electric power. Common sense dictated that instead of being a constant expense, such as a munitions factory, arsenal, shipyard, battleship, or an army, that here at Muscle Shoals the plant may be not only self-sustaining and eventually pay for itself but may render a highly valuable economic function.

The only proposal for private operation before the committee was that of American Cyanamid Co. I did my best to get it in such shape as would be acceptable to the committee. I offered more than 100 amendments and practically all of them were accepted by the Cyanamid Co. and incorporated in its proposal, except three, and those three constituted the stumbling blocks, and a little explanation will show why we have been driven to Government operation.

First, the committee insisted on a recapture clause to the effect that if the company ceased to manufacture fertilizer for a period of three years, having failed to manufacture it so cheaply and of such kinds as to induce the farmers to buy it, the Government should have the right to take possession of the property, declare the lease terminated, but pay the reasonable value of any plant it may have constructed upon the property.

AUDIT PROVIDED

This seemed manifestly fair and just to both the Government and the lessee, if the lessee had faith in its power to make a success of the fertilizer proposition.

Second, adequate audit and accounting of the books and business methods of the lessee to insure that the calculation of costs and, therefore, of prices for fertilizer were correctly made.

I considered that the provisions of the bill were utterly inadequate to insure the discovery of the truth.

Third, sufficient power in the farmer board to decide and determine the kinds of fertilizer which should be manufactured.

If the lessee wished to keep the mere letter of the contract but violate its main purpose, and convert it into a power proposition pure and simple, it could manufacture the required number of tons of fertilizer of a kind that would not sell, put that fertilizer in storage, and divert all of the power to other purposes than the manufacture of fertilizer.

When the American Cyanamid Co. refused to make these essential concessions, there was nothing left for the committee except the best and most efficient plan of Government operation that could be worked out.

A mere casual reading of the report of the Committee on Military Affairs, being report No. 1095, will disclose the fact that not only since the passage of the national defense act of June 3, 1916, but since the Military Affairs Committee took definite action upon a proper policy with reference to Muscle Shoals, as shown by the committee action of April 24, 1922, through the action of Congress itself in creating the joint commission of 1926 and the action of the President's commission of 1925 and the action of the Committee on Military Affairs in 1927, there has been a consistency and continuity in the views of all responsible and thoughtful persons with reference to Muscle Shoals properties.

POLICY OF COMMITTEE

In fact, the Committee on Military Affairs for the Sixty-ninth Congress laid down as one of its fundamental and guiding principles the proposition that any lease of the Muscle Shoals property must contain a forfeiture or recapture clause of both the power rights and the fertilizer provisions if there was any failure to produce nitrates in at least 40,000 tons per year. But it was found provided in the same proposition that if such failure to produce nitrates in a minimum stipulated amount should not be due to the neglect, misconduct, or fault of the lessee, then such forfeiture or recapture would not include the loss of the reasonable value of the property placed upon the Muscle Shoals plant by the lessee, but that the lessee should be reimbursed by the Government for the reasonable value of such property at the time of such recapture. This was an exceedingly liberal proposition and was made to induce any proposed lessee to consent to the recapture or forfeiture clause whereby both the power and the nitrogen-producing plants should return to the Government in the event of a failure by the lessee to produce the minimum amount of nitrates.

From the very beginning it has been a fundamental axiom that the power and the fertilizer aspects of this proposition must remain interlocked and interlinked with each other and must not be separated. It was realized that the extreme value of the power must be employed as an inducement to carry the fertilizer side of the proposition, not that the fertilizer business will be at a loss or not self-sustaining, but that the special interests, whether financial, power, or fertilizers, whose financial state in the existing fertilizer industry may be injuriously effected, will naturally discourage in every possible way the success of the fertilizer project. Therefore the two have been tied together and the committee has consistently stood by that elemental proposition.

REASONABLE PROPOSAL REFUSED

The very great liberality of the proposal by the committee in 1927 to bind the Government to refund to any lessee that might undertake to manufacture fertilizers at Muscle Shoals and find the same unprofitable, due to the failure of the farmers to buy the same, must be emphasized in order to demonstrate the extreme desire of the committee to insure private operation at Muscle Shoals. It means this: Rather than go into Government operation and have the Government spend $10,000,000, for illustration, at Muscle Shoals to try out the proposition as to fertilizers, it was concluded that it would be better to have some private operating agency make the experiment and place its own plant upon the Government property, and if the fertilizer business failed, then let the Government take the plant over at a cost, we will say for illustration, of $10,000,000. The plant established by the lessee would then be the property of the Government. It might be useless to the Government, but it would be paying $10,000,000 to demonstrate two things; first, whether or not fertilizers can be successfully manufactured at Muscle Shoals at a cost below the existing prices of fertilizers; and second, whether or not private operation at Muscle Shoals would be a success.

The American Cyanamid Co., by its president, Mr. Bell, declined to consider amending its offer so as to incorporate this very liberal provision. Its original offer would contain a provision whereby the Government was to refund to the lessee certain expenses incurred by it, even if the lease should be terminated by reason of the default and intentional violation of the lessee of its contract. Our proposition was to refund the cost of a fertilizer plant to the lessee only when the lessee had acted in good faith and had tried to make the fertilizer business good, and had failed for causes beyond his control.

THE POOR MAN'S CHANCE

I argued to the proposed lessee, the American Cyanamid Co., that our proposition was very much like a partnership arrangement between a rich man and a poor man to go into business together. The rich man says to the poor man, "Take my factory and put up some of your money, to wit, less than 10 per cent of the value of my factory and use your money for operating expenses. If you succeed, then you shall have one-half of all the profits, though you have invested less than 10 per cent of the capital. If you fail, I will pay you back all the money that you have put into the business, so that you will have had a chance to make large profits and will not lose a cent. If any money is lost, I will lose it."

This was a perfectly safe proposition for the lessee. It was a game of "heads you win; tails I lose." To continue the illustration—the United States Government, if it should build Dam No. 3 and Cove Creek Dam, as proposed by the American Cyanamid Co., would thus have invested in the whole property approximately $250,000,000. On the other hand, the American Cyanamid Co. would have invested a minimum of $10,000,000 and a maximum of $35,000,000. In any event, the amount would be about 10 per cent on an average of the investment by the Government.

The committee said to the American Cyanamid Co., "We are so anxious to have the private operation of the fertilizer business at Muscle Shoals that we will authorize you to go to work and put up a fertilizer plant to cost, say about $10,000,000. You proceed to manufacture fertilizers and if at the end of say 15 years, you have failed for any reason other than your own intentional fault or misconduct, then we will take all the property back, including the value of the property that you have placed upon our land, and pay you the reasonable value of same."

If the lessee should manufacture fertilizers much cheaper than private industry is doing, and should manufacture such kinds of fertilizers as would appeal to the tastes of the farmers, then the business would be certain to be a success, and the lessee would make enormous profits out of the business. If on account of circumstances beyond the control of the lessee it should fail, nevertheless it would get its money back.

TIMIDITY OF AMERICAN CYANAMID CO.

Contrast this proposition of the Committee on Military Affairs with the proposition that faced the American Cyanamid Co. when it made its investment about 20 years ago on the Canadian side of the Niagara River at Niagara Falls. Then the American Cyanamid Co. invested about $20,000,000 in a plant to fix atmospheric nitrogen which was then in an experimental stage. The American Cyanamid Co. was putting in $20,000,000 upon a commercial uncertainty. But its promoters had confidence in the future and in their ability to meet future conditions. However, the present management of the American Cyanamid Co. seems to have no confidence in its ability to meet future conditions and competition at Muscle Shoals. The fixation of atmospheric nitrogen is now a practical industrial fact. It is no longer an experiment as it was 20 years ago. There is a great, not only nation-wide but world-wide, demand for concentrated fertilizers.

The American Cyanamid Co. would have every fact in its favor to enable it to manufacture fertilizers at Muscle Shoals more cheaply than private industry can manufacture them anywhere else. Mr. Bell, president of the American Cyanamid Co., admitted this to be a fact. Yet, in the face of these conditions, Mr. Bell would not agree to manufacture fertilizers at Muscle Shoals under a guaranty from the Government that if he failed his investment would be refunded. In the face of this plain, clear situation, how could anybody expect the Committee on Military Affairs to execute a lease with the American Cyanamid Co.?

VITAL TO NATIONAL DEFENSE

Since Muscle Shoals is vital to the national defense to insure a domestic supply of nitrogen, it must remain the property of the Government. Since we have been unable to obtain a satisfactory contract for the private operation of this property, which is primarily a munitions plant, the Government must proceed to operate it in some manner itself. We are therefore put to the election between the method of operation proposed by the Senate Joint Resolution 46, ordinarily called the "Norris bill," and the plan proposed by the House as a substitute for the Norris bill, to wit, operation by a corporation governed by five directors appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate. Now, which of these two methods is the better under the circumstances?

We have examined, in the Committee on Military Affairs, the Secretary of Agriculture and those officers in his department that would be in charge of experimentation in the methods and processes of manufacturing fertilizers and in charge of such mass production as the Secretary might decide to bring about. This examination by the Secretary and his chief advisers in the department has satisfied me, and evidently satisfied the overwhelming majority of the committee that it would be a waste of time and money and property to put the development of the fertilizer project in the hands of the Department of Agriculture.

They frankly and unequivocally state that they do not believe in mass production of fertilizer by the Government. Furthermore, they say that they do not believe that the Government can manufacture fertilizer at Muscle Shoals and pay to sell the same as cheaply as it is now manufactured and sold by private industries. Therefore, since they state that they can not manufacture fertilizers so as to compete with private manufacturers and since they confess they do not believe in the project, it is manifest that they will not try hard and would rather let the fertilizer manufacture drift upon the rocks in order to corroborate their own beliefs and in order to make their own predictions come true.

ATTITUDE OF DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Furthermore, it was manifest from the testimony of the officers of the Department of Agriculture that their experiments in the processes of manufacturing fertilizers at Muscle Shoals would help nobody but the manufacturers of fertilizer. These officers of the Department of Agriculture frankly stated that they would only seek by experimentation to ascertain new and more economical and more efficient methods of producing fertilizers, by the fixation of atmospheric nitrogen, and by the blast-furnace method of extracting phosphorus and by the latest methods of extracting potash. After these processes had been developed at the expense of many millions of dollars to the taxpayers, they proposed to turn over all discoveries and inventions and improved methods to the private manufacturers of fertilizer for their use. The result would be that the private manufacturer using these improved methods and devices would be able to produce the fertilizers more economically, but he would continue no doubt to sell the fertilizer at the same high price to the farmers. The net result of the experiments proposed to be conducted at Muscle Shoals by the Department of Agriculture would therefore be not to help the farmers by giving them cheaper fertilizers or better fertilizers or more fertilizers but would be to help the private fertilizer manufacturer by enabling him to make a larger margin of profit between his cost of production and his selling price.

I hardly think that this result was intended either by the friends of the Norris bill or the advocates of Government operation. Hence, it was manifest to the Committee on Military Affairs that it would be worse than futile to deliver the manufacture of commercial fertilizers at Muscle Shoals into the hands of the Department of Agriculture.

ONLY RECOURSE POSSIBLE

Therefore the committee was forced to originate such a legislative device for the operation of the Muscle Shoals properties as would insure its management by those friendly to the mass production of concentrated fertilizers at the lowest possible price and of such kinds as to prove attractive to the farmers of the Nation. We therefore resorted to the plan of having the corporation exercise its powers through five directors, one of whom who would come up for confirmation by the Senate each year, and thus maintain a close contact between the board and the Senate. It is presumed from the overwhelming vote received in the Senate by the Norris bill that the Senate is and probably will be for a great many years entirely friendly to the project of manufacturing fertilizers in substantial quantities at Muscle Shoals. We furthermore wrote into the bill certain negative and positive qualifications for persons to be appointed and confirmed as directors. First, we stipulated the negative qualifications that the directors must not have any financial investments in existing public-utility corporations selling and distributing electric power. Next, they must not have any financial interest as stockholders or otherwise in the fertilizer manufacturing industry. Neither must they have any financial interest in any business which would be adversely and injuriously affected by the success of the fertilizer project at Muscle Shoals. Second, we set up the positive and affirmative qualification for the members of the board of directors that they must profess a belief in the feasibility and wisdom of the purpose and plan of the bill to manufacture concentrated fertilizers at Muscle Shoals in mass quantities. The only way by which it may be ascertained if these directors do profess such belief is for the President in nominating them and for the Senate in confirming them to ascertain their views. It would seem that this is a simple matter, easily ascertained and administered.

PLAN OF OPERATION

Every reasonable effort being thus made to place the management in the hands of the friends of the plan to manufacture fertilizers in mass quantities, next a framework and set-up is contemplated that should insure efficiency and economy in the administration of the business. The board will enact general rules and prescribe general regulations for the conduct of the business. Next the board will elect one general manager as the chief executive officer and will upon his recommendation elect two assistant managers, one for electric power and the other for fertilizers. The board is instructed to set up a system of organization and business management that will fix responsibility and accomplish efficiency through a gradation of responsibility through chiefs and subchiefs, through foremen and subforemen running through each department of the business and thus contemplating something like military discipline heading up in the general manager and branching out from him through the two assistant managers. The general manager will have the power to "hire and fire" all employees, and thus we seek to insure subordination to his instructions and discipline in the organization. No greater power is vested in the superintendent of a cotton mill or the superintendent of a railroad or the president of a bank. We feel that this method and system of organization will guarantee efficiency in the human agencies necessary to keep the machinery going. If efficiency is thus procured, undoubtedly fertilizers will be produced at Muscle Shoals at very low cost.

PRIVATE OPERATION PREFERRED

The committee would much prefer the private operation of the Government properties at Muscle Shoals. As a general policy we are opposed to the Government operation for the production in mass quantities of commodities that private industry is equipped to produce. But the situation at Muscle Shoals is peculiar. It was constructed primarily for the production of nitrates for use in war. This would constitute it a munition plant whose operation is essentially a Government function. In the next place, the Government is already in business at Muscle Shoals in the production and sale of power, and has been so engaged in business for several years. It has not been proposed by anyone that the Government should sell this property and part with the fee-simple title. But it has been insisted by many, with which we agree, that the Government should lease the property for a long term for operation by private capital in the production of nitrates and fertilizers, so that the plant may thereby be kept in a "stand-by" condition for the fixation of atmospheric nitrogen, so that in the event of war it may be taken over by the Government, if necessary, and its entire capacity employed in the production of explosives or the constituents of explosives.

But our peculiar problem has not been the settlement of the general principle of private ownership and private operation as against public ownership and public operation. We have been faced with an actual condition and not a theory. We have as a matter of national-defense policy the Government ownership of this property, just as we have the Government ownership of arsenals, navy yards, aircraft factories, battleships, and warehouses for the storing of arms and arsenals.

It appears to me, viewed from the broad policy of national defense, that the Congress was wise when in 1916 in the national defense act it enacted section 124 into law in the following language:

> Authorize the President to make or cause to be made such investigation as in his judgment it is necessary to determine its cheapest and most available means for the production of nitrates and other products for munitions of war, and useful in the manufacture of fertilizers.

If we had no adequate source for the production of nitrate explosives from atmospheric nitrogen, and if an enemy fleet should get control of the seas and thus prevent transports from bringing Chilean nitrates to our shores, or if enemy airplanes or battleships should destroy our short route through the Panama Canal by bombing our locks, then our means of national defense would be otherwise made impotent and defenseless.

Without nitrates, explosives would be impossible; without explosives, guns of all kinds, both large and small, would be useless and powerless; without explosives, bombing airplanes, however long the range and however powerful the lift, would be ineffective and harmless. Consequently, as a national defense proposition, which is first and foremost in our eyes, the maintenance and the provision in an up-to-date condition for the fixation of atmospheric nitrogen is a high imperious national duty.

But there was only one proposal for the private operation of this property, and your committee, by one of its subcommittees, sat day after day for many weeks during the last session of the Sixty-ninth Congress taking testimony and considering in minutest detail the terms of the proposed private lease with the principal executive officer of the proposed lessee. Your committee offered a large number of amendments to the bill offered at the instance of the Air Nitrates Corporation and its parent corporation, the American Cyanamid Co., and nearly all of these amendments were accepted finally by the proposed lessee and characterized by it in a letter as "constructive amendments." However, there were some very vital and fundamental differences of views by the proposed lessee and the committee that we have been utterly unable to reconcile.

We have been willing to give great advantage and inducement to a private corporation, holding out reasonable promise of large profits, in order to obtain a contract for private operation. But we have been unwilling to depart from the fixed policy of the Government as announced in the national defense act of 1916 and as later announced by the joint resolution of Congress adopted the — day of ———, 1926, creating the joint commission to negotiate for the lease of the Muscle Shoals property and from the principles and policies that your committee has laid down and followed for several years, that have been reported to the House of Representatives and constitute a part of its records, and that for the approval of the great majority of the Members that have studied and investigated this question.

Herein below we will set out in detail just the point of difficulty and of difference and of departure between your committee and the Air Nitrates Corporation of America.

THE POLICY OF THE CONGRESS

The Congress in 1926 adopted a concurrent resolution setting up a joint congressional committee for the purpose of negotiating for a lease of the Muscle Shoals property. The Congress by said resolution set out in specific words its view of the policies and principles that should prevail in the writing of such lease, and the following is the second paragraph of the resolution:

> The committee is authorized and directed to conduct negotiations for a lease or leases (but no lease or leases shall be recommended which do not guarantee and safeguard the production of nitrates and other fertilizer ingredients, mixed or unmixed, primarily as hereinafter provided) of the nitrate and power properties of the United States at Muscle Shoals, Ala., including the quarry properties at Waco, Ala., for the production of nitrates primarily and incidentally for power purposes, such power to be equitably distributed between the communities and States to which it may be transported, in order to serve national defense, agriculture, and industrial purposes, and upon terms which, so far as possible, shall provide benefits to the Government and to agriculture equal to or greater than those set forth in H. R. 518, Sixty-eighth Congress, first session, except that the lease or leases shall be for a period not to exceed 50 years.

EFFECT OF PROPOSED POLICY

If the bill as now proposed by this report should be enacted into law it will in no way prevent the subsequent leasing of the Muscle Shoals property to any private person or corporation. We have carefully safeguarded the committing of any power to the proposed corporation that might be in conflict with a transfer of the possession and control and operation of the property at any time in the future, however near or however remote.

The bill provides that it is subject to repeal in whole or in part. Every person contracting with the corporation does so with this notice. The 10-year term of the proposed general manager is to end upon the repeal or specific amendment of this act to that effect. Any contract for the sale of power that might be made by the corporation for a 10-year period in one case or for a 15-year period in a certain other case would probably be such a contract as any lessee in the future might be willing to make, and would at least take the property subject to such contract and fulfill the same. Probably any lessee in in the future would find such existing contracts and fixed sources of revenue quite desirable. Furthermore, the operation through the proposed corporation will demonstrate conclusively many questions now disputed that might otherwise have to be settled at the expense and loss of a lessee. For example, the operation under the corporation will settle the question as to whether or not the nitrate plant No. 2 can and will produce nitrates, with certain modifications and additions, of such a quality and at such prices as will prove attractive to the American farmers. If it proves utterly unsatisfactory, that ends the question; if it proves successful, in like manner the question is settled. If it proves unsuccessful, other methods can and will be tried out, because we believe that the American engineer and scientist is just as proficient as the engineer and scientist of other nations, where they are undoubtedly succeeding to an eminent degree in the manufacturing of concentrated fertilizers at relatively very low prices.

Happily, Muscle Shoals is one munition factory and one arsenal and one agency of national defense that is capable of being useful to the people in time of peace and of paying its own way by producing a commodity which is essential to American agriculture, which in turn is the foundation stone upon which rests the whole national economic and social superstructure.

THE PROCESS TO BE USED

It will be observed that the committee directs the corporation to begin the manufacture of concentrated fertilizers by the use of the existing cyanamide plant after the same shall have been modernized. Many well-advised persons have insisted that we should scrap nitrate plant No. 2 as impractical, because of the high consumption of power per unit of production. But again we are faced with a practical situation. We have this plant which has cost us about $55,000,000. We have power in great abundance. It seems to us that the sensible, businesslike proposition is to begin by using the existing facilities and continue to use them until they are demonstrated to be either a success or a failure. In the meantime and at the same time the corporation may employ any other process, and by employing the two or more processes be able to compute the relative cost of production. In this connection it may prove feasible to use the building and certain parts of the equipment in nitrate plant No. 1 in order to make a fair experiment and clear demonstration of its feasibility as a synthetic-process plant. No private business man scraps and entirely discards machinery and equipment that have cost large sums of money until experience has demonstrated their impracticability for manufacturing purposes.

In this connection the committee has empowered and directed the corporation to construct a phosphoric-acid plant, so that the nitrate produced may be combined with phosphoric acid into a desirable form of fertilizer. The cyanamide alone might be unattractive to users. The board will also have the right to establish a potash plant if its production at that place appears feasible. In the meantime, until the phosphorus plant shall have been constructed and put in operation, the board has the power to buy phosphoric acid from private producers and may buy potash from private producers and mix one or more of these ingredients with nitrogen produced at Muscle Shoals so as to put upon the market a complete fertilizer product.

The first five years is to be manifestly a period of experimentation on a great scale. In order to give the fertilizer end of the experiment a fair chance to succeed, it is not only provided that the fertilizer shall be sold at cost but that the cost itself shall be reduced by the net receipts from the sale of electric power. In other words, the entire plant is dumped into the fertilizer hopper for the first five years. In order to familiarize the farmers with this concentrated fertilizer and its use, the board may donate 5 per cent of the annual production to county demonstration agents to be by them demonstrated to farmers to be used for experimental purposes. If the surplus accumulation for any one year is more than 25 per cent of the annual capacity, then an additional 10 per cent may, upon the unanimous approval of the board, be donated in like manner for experimental purposes. Thus at the end of five years we will know something about this fertilizer business. If it can not succeed with all its inducements and assistance proposed to be rendered under this bill, if the same shall be administered by friendly hands, then it is hopeless.

We believe that the President will try to select experienced business men reasonably friendly to the fertilizer project contemplated by this bill and that the Senate will exercise a reasonable discrimination in confirmation. These business men will outline a system of business, both for operation and sale, and place the actual administration of details in the hands of a general manager with two assistant managers.

It is proposed and suggested that the organization under a general manager and two assistant managers, who will have the right to employ and discharge all other clerks, office help, foremen, agents, and laborers generally, will give such direct and central control, heading up to a single responsible person, as to insure efficient administration and energetic discipline. It will be possible so to organize the business by a gradation of chiefs and subchiefs, with responsibility for their respective divisions, as to make an organization to function efficiently and systematically.

I realize that the suggestion of a maximum of $50,000 for the combined three salaries of the general manager and two assistant managers may seem high; but I think it is in line with good business principles to select these three men of a very high class, with business experience and executive ability. To find such men and to induce them to leave the present employments that they are certain to have will necessitate the board offering salaries that may appear high. But it must be remembered that their tenure is very uncertain. The tenure may be determined by the board; or this act may be repealed at any time. Due to such uncertainty, we must pay slightly higher salaries than the same men are now receiving in private industries with prospects of an indefinite continuance and with prospects of increase in salary and perhaps an interest in the business itself.

But after five years, the period of experimentation will be over. If the fertilizer business proves successful, then at the expiration of the first five-year period the fertilizer business must go not only on a self-sustaining basis but it must pay a profit of 4 per cent on the annual turnover into the Treasury of the United States. At the same time, the net proceeds from the sale of electric power must go into the Treasury of the United States. We believe that the sums of money derived from these two sources will be such as to reimburse the Government in the end for its investment in this problem. But in any event, the property remains the property of the Government. The possession, use, and control only are delivered in trust to the corporation for the purpose of being operated in the interest of national defense and of interstate commerce. The Government can recapture the property at any time upon the outbreak of war upon the declaration of a national emergency by Congress. The great experiment proposed here will not prove very expensive to the Government, and if it proves a success it will not only repay the Government but will prove profitable and will retain the title to the property to the Government and will prove a vast boon to agriculture and will prove a powerful agency of national defense.

By section 124 of the national defense act of 1916 the Muscle Shoals project was dedicated to the national defense for all time; but as a common-sense proposition, in the interest of economy and in order to insure the latest and most improved methods of the fixation of atmospheric nitrogen, the plant was to be employed in peace for the manufacture of concentrated fertilizers.

When the offer of Henry Ford was before the House these fundamental principles were consistently adhered to, and admitted on all sides as sound. The Committee on Military Affairs from the very beginning has had certain fundamental principles before it, and the Congress has been advised by various reports from that committee that these principles have guided the committee in its action. Finally, when the House joint resolution was passed in 1925, under which the joint committee functioned in 1926, in the effort to negotiate leases with private operating agencies, the joint resolution itself expressed the will of Congress that fertilizers in time of peace should be guaranteed by any lessee. Again, during the last session of the Sixty-ninth Congress, the Committee on Military Affairs reported to the House its inability to conclude any lease or to agree upon any bill, and reiterated its views in accordance with the established policy of the Congress and of the committee.

Hence it is aside from the mark for anyone now to pretend that the manufacture of concentrated fertilizers in large quantities at Muscle Shoals is novel or revolutionary or an afterthought or an experiment in socialism. It has been the deliberate policy of the Congress for 12 years, based upon the action of both Houses, signed by the President, and reiterated by subsequent Congresses, committees, and joint commissions.

Again, in 1926, the President of the United States appointed a commission to study, consider, and report its conclusions as to the proper policy to be pursued by the Government with reference to Muscle Shoals. That committee of eminent business men, public servants, and technical experts reported, recommending that if a private lessee could be obtained, who would guarantee and insure the manufacture of fertilizers according to the original plan and intention, then such lessee should be signed; but the commission went on to say with great reluctance that if no such satisfactory lease could be made, then the Government might be forced into the operation of the plant itself for the production of fertilizers in mass quantities.

So now we are up against a situation, a condition, a fact, that must be faced and can not be sidestepped nor evaded. We are not creating a new state of facts; we are not permitted to express our preferences. We have no opportunity to apply our theories. We must do something with the properties at Muscle Shoals which the Government now owns and has owned for more than 10 years, and has spent more than $150,000,000 in said properties.

Shall we give it away? Manifestly not. Shall we continue to operate it as we are now operating it? That would be manifestly unbusinesslike, because the net returns are less than $1,000,000 a year. Shall we lease it to just anybody that will take it on his own terms? That could not be justified. We do not give away or lease without consideration or sell for a bagatelle our arsenals, our shipyards, our navy yards, our airplane factories, or our munition plants. In a certain sense Muscle Shoals is the greatest and most vital munition plant in the Nation. Without it or its equivalent every gun might be silenced, every battleship useless, and every bombing airplane powerless. So we must keep Muscle Shoals and keep it in condition to manufacture nitrates for explosives in the event of an emergency. Keeping it, shall we let it stand by idle and be a constant charge upon the Treasury, or shall we use common sense, as Congress contemplated in 1916 and has been contemplating ever since, and use that power and plant for the fixation of atmospheric nitrogen, and combine the same with other elements of plant food and sell the same to the farmers at reasonable prices, and thus make the plant not only self-sustaining, but earn sufficient money there, in the end to reimburse the Government for all of its original investment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

CONSENT CALENDAR

DISBURSEMENTS TO NATIONAL GUARD OFFICERS AND ENLISTED MEN

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (S. 2537) to amend section 110, national defense act, so as to provide a better administrative procedure in the disbursements for pay of National Guard officers and enlisted men.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. While this will, no doubt, relieve the accounting in some measure, will it aid in greater supervision and in better accounting and better attendance at drill? The gentleman will remember that last year during the debate on the Army appropriation bill I made a statement that was somewhat surprising. After that unfortunately several National Guard officers were indicted for doing the very thing I called attention to. Will the issuance of these pay checks aid in the greater supervision of accounts?

Mr. McSWAIN. I think it will. It is true I am familiar with it only in a general way. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPEAKS] had to leave a few minutes ago in order to attend the funeral of the late Senator Willis. But I understand it will improve the supervision of accounts, since the accounting and pay officers will move into different zones at different times, and they can go from one zone to another; and in that respect I believe it will result in greater efficiency and economy. The fellow who knows can best look behind the paper and ascertain if the facts correspond with the surface appearance.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. I believe that.

Mr. GREEN. So do I.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the second paragraph of section 110, national defense act, as amended, be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"All amounts appropriated for the purpose of this and the last preceding section shall be disbursed and accounted for by the officers and agents of the Finance Department of the Army, and effective as soon as practicable after July 1, 1928, all disbursements under the foregoing provisions of this section shall be made for such three-months periods for the various units of the National Guard as shall be prescribed in regulations issued by the Secretary of War and on pay rolls prepared and authenticated in the manner prescribed in said regulations: Provided, That for the period necessary to put into operation the payment plan herein provided for, the Secretary of War is authorized to fix initial pay periods of less than three months for such number of units as he may deem necessary: And provided further, That stoppages may be made against the compensation payable to any officer or enlisted man hereunder to cover the cost of public property lost or destroyed by, and chargeable to, such officer or enlisted man."

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

QUALIFICATIONS FOR NATIONAL GUARD STATE STAFF OFFICERS

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 239) to amend section 110 of the national defense act by repealing and striking therefrom certain provisions prescribing additional qualifications for National Guard State staff officers, and for other purposes.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CRAMTON. Reserving the right to object, the form of this bill, I think, can be improved. I presume it will be made satisfactory by an amendment.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Mr. Speaker, may I inquire of the author of the bill just what provision of the national defense act is repealed by this bill?

Mr. FURLOW. The bill was sent to me by the War Department. I have read the War Department's letter of transmittal. The bill amends section 110. The only thing this will accomplish is this: At the present time when there is a vacancy in the National Guard staff an appointment must be made to fill that vacancy from the National Guard itself. This would make it possible to make that appointment irrespective of whether or not the man had served in the National Guard. The reason for that is this, because at the present time we have lots of World War veterans who are qualified for the position but they are not eligible for appointment under the amendment, which was put in at the time the national defense act was passed.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. In other words, there are men available who have had sufficient military experience but really have not served in the National Guard.

Mr. FURLOW. Who are not in the National Guard now.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. And the repeal of this provision will permit the Secretary of War to make appointments of that kind?

Mr. FURLOW. That is right. That is as I understand the bill.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I do not think the Secretary of War makes these appointments.

Mr. McSWAIN. They are made by the Chief of the Militia Bureau.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the following provisions, to wit, "nor to any State, Territory, or District, or officer or enlisted man in the National Guard thereof, unless and until such State, Territory, or District provides by law that staff officers, including officers of the finance, inspection, quartermaster, and medical departments hereafter appointed shall have had previous military experience and shall hold their positions until they shall have reached the age of 64 years, unless retired prior to that time by reason of resignation, disability, or for causes to be determined by a court-martial legally convened for that purpose, and that vacancies among said officers shall be filled by appointment from the militia of such State, Territory, or District," contained in the last paragraph of section 110 of the national defense act as amended by the act approved September 22, 1922 (42 Stat. L. 1036), be, and the same are hereby, repealed and stricken therefrom.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment. At the end of line 9, strike out the period and insert in lieu thereof the following.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CRAMTON: On page 2, line 9, strike out the period after the word "therefrom," insert a comma and the following: "so that said paragraph when so amended will read as follows: Except as otherwise specifically provided herein, no money appropriated under the provisions of this or the last preceding section shall be paid to any person not on the active list, nor to any person over 64 years of age, nor to any person who shall fail to qualify as to fitness for military service under such regulations as the Secretary of War shall prescribe."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

LONGSHOREMEN'S AND HARBOR WORKERS' COMPENSATION ACT

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 12320) to amend the longshoremen's and harbor workers' compensation act. This is an emergency measure.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether he regards it as a measure of such emergency that time is a vital question?

Mr. GRAHAM. I think it is, sir, for this reason: The proponents of the longshoremen's compensation law were under the impression that when suit was brought against a deputy commissioner the litigation would be defended by the district attorney of the district in which the litigation would arise. Litigation has been started and the Attorney General has ruled that it is not obligatory upon the district attorney to take up and defend this litigation. This bill simply provides that it shall be the duty of the district attorney in the district in which the litigation arises to defend it; that is, to defend the deputy commissioner who is sued. Only a few cases of this kind are likely to arise, but when they do arise they must be defended. It is nobody's business to do so unless we pass this legislation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in any court proceedings under section 21 or other provisions of the longshoremen's and harbor workers' compensation act, it shall be the duty of the district attorneys of the United States in the judicial district in which the case is pending to appear as attorney or counsel on behalf of the United States Employees' Compensation Commission, or its deputy commissioner, when either is a party to the case or interested, and to represent such commission or deputy in any court in which such case may be carried on appeal.

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. Speaker, I desire to correct a word in the bill. In line 5 the bill provides for district attorneys instead of district attorney.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GRAHAM: Page 1, line 5, strike out the word "attorneys" and insert the word "attorney."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

WRITS OF ERROR

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 12441) to amend section 2 of an act entitled "An act in reference to writs of error," approved January 31, 1928, Public, No. 10, Seventieth Congress.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of House Bill 12441. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 2 of an Act entitled "An act in reference to writs of error," approved January 31, 1928, Public, No. 10, Seventieth Congress, be, and it is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 2. The statutes regulating the right to a writ of error, defining the relief which may be had thereon, and prescribing the mode of exercising that right and of invoking such relief, including the provisions relating to costs, supersedeas, and mandate, shall be applicable to the appeal which the preceding section substitutes for a writ of error."

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will resume the calling of the calendar.

ADDITIONAL CIRCUIT JUDGE FOR THE NINTH JUDICIAL CIRCUIT

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8295) for the appointment of an additional circuit judge for the ninth judicial circuit.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, an additional circuit judge for the ninth judicial circuit.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

TERM OF COURT AT BRYSON CITY, N. C.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8835) to amend section 98 of the Judicial Code, as amended, to provide for terms of court at Bryson City, N. C.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the seventh paragraph of section 98 of the Judicial Code be, and it is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"Terms of the district court for the western district shall be held in Charlotte on the first Mondays in April and October; at Shelby on the fourth Monday in September and the third Monday in March; at Statesville on the fourth Mondays in April and October; at Asheville on the first Mondays in May and November; and at Bryson City on the fourth Mondays in May and November: Provided, That the cities of Shelby and Bryson City shall each provide and furnish at their own expense suitable and convenient places for holding the court at Shelby and Bryson City. The clerk of the court for the western district shall maintain an office, in charge of himself or a deputy, at Charlotte, at Asheville, at Statesville, at Shelby, and at Bryson City, which shall be kept open at all times for the transaction of the business of the court."

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 9, strike out the word "first" and insert in lieu thereof the word "second."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

SALARIES OF JUDGES OF PORTO RICO

Mr. KIESS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to return to the bill (H. R. 10952) to fix the salaries of certain judges of Porto Rico, the gentleman from Missouri having withdrawn his objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the following salaries shall be paid, in monthly installments, to the several judges hereinafter mentioned in lieu of the salaries now provided by law, namely:

To the chief justice of the Supreme Court of Porto Rico, $10,500 per year; and to each of the associate justices thereof, $10,000 per year.

SEC. 2. This act shall take effect on the first day of the first month next following its approval.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

DISPOSITION OF CERTAIN LANDS IN FLORIDA

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the next bill on the calendar (H. R. 11281) be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oregon?

There was no objection.

AMENDMENT OF THE GENERAL LEASING ACT

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 10885) to amend sections 23 and 24 of the general leasing act approved February 25, 1920 (41 Stat. L. 437).

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. ARENTZ. Will the gentleman withhold that?

Mr. SCHAFER. This is an important bill opening up some new lands.

Mr. ARENTZ. Is the gentleman referring to Calendar No. 523?

Mr. SCHAFER. Yes.

Mr. ARENTZ. This bill opens up no new lands, and this is done at the suggestion of the Secretary of the Interior to equalize the royalty between lands taken up under the 1920 act and lands under the 1925 act when you are taking up potash ground.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Any oil in it?

Mr. ARENTZ. No oil whatever. If a man wants to lease a piece of potash ground he has to pay 12½ cents royalty, and if the British outfit wants to take soda, borax, or potash they only pay 2 per cent. Do you want to handicap the American citizen and make him pay 12½ cents royalty and a dollar an acre a year rent when the British can monopolize the entire proposition and only pay 2 per cent?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. How did this discrimination come about?

Mr. ARENTZ. Because it was not contemplated that soda and borax would come together in the same area.

Mr. SCHAFER. If this is to clear up any discrimination between an American citizen and foreign parties I will not object.

Mr. ARENTZ. That is exactly what it does.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That sections 23 and 24 of the general leasing act approved February 25, 1920 (41 Stat. L. 437), are hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 23. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, to grant to any qualified applicant a prospecting permit which shall give the exclusive right to prospect for chlorides, sulphates, carbonates, borates, silicates, or nitrates of sodium, in lands belonging to the United States for a period of not exceeding two years: Provided, That the area to be included in such a permit shall not exceed 2,560 acres of land in reasonably compact form.

"SEC. 24. That upon showing to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Interior that valuable deposits of one of the substances enumerated in section 23 hereof have been discovered by the permittee within the area covered by his permit and that such land is chiefly valuable therefor, the permittee shall be entitled to a lease for any or all of the land embraced in the prospecting permit at a royalty of not less than 2 per cent of the quantity or gross value of the output of sodium compounds and other related products at the point of shipment to market; the lands in such lease to be taken in compact form by legal subdivisions of the public land surveys or, if the land be not surveyed, by survey executed at the cost of the permittee in accordance with regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior. Lands known to contain valuable deposits of one of the substances enumerated in section 23 hereof and not covered by permits or leases shall be subject to lease by the Secretary of the Interior through advertisement, competitive bidding, or such other methods as he may by general regulations adopt and in such areas as he shall fix, not exceeding 2,560 acres. All leases under this section shall be conditioned upon the payment by the lessee of such royalty as may be fixed in the lease, not less than 2 per cent of the quantity or gross value of the output of sodium compounds and other related products at the point of shipment to market, and the payment in advance of a rental of 25 cents per acre for the first calendar year or fraction thereof, 50 cents per acre for the second, third, fourth, and fifth calendar years, respectively; and $1 per acre per annum thereafter during the continuance of the lease, such rental for any one year to be credited against royalties accruing for that year. Leases under this section shall be for a period of 20 years, with preferential right in the lessee to renew for successive periods of 10 years upon such reasonable terms and conditions as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior unless otherwise provided by law at the expiration of such period: Provided, That nothing in this act shall prohibit the mining and sale of sodium compounds under potassium leases issued pursuant to the acts of October 2, 1917 (40 Stat. THE WHITE HOUSE, April 3, 1928.

WAR FINANCE CORPORATION

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to call up, out of the regular order, the bill (S. 3685) to amend the War Finance Corporation act, approved April 5, 1918, as amended.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, I would like to know the purpose of the bill.

Mr. GLASS. It is identical with a bill unanimously passed by the House of Representatives on yesterday to extend the life of the War Finance Corporation merely to enable the corporation to take care of $1,500,000 of outstanding loans. The corporation is not engaging in any new business at all, but it has outstanding $1,500,000 of these loans which it is necessary to take care of. A similar bill unanimously passed the House on yesterday.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, can the Senator advise us as to just how the business of the corporation stands as a matter of debits and credits?

Mr. GLASS. No; I can not advise the Senator as to that. The corporation has a very large balance to its credit in profits, if that is what the Senator means. It has now outstanding $1,500,000 of loans that have to be liquidated, and this is the purpose of the bill.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, that answers the question I was about to ask. They are liquidating, as rapidly as it can be done, the interests of the Government?

Mr. GLASS. Yes. The life of the corporation expires within three days; hence the House yesterday, under unanimous consent, passed the bill.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I hope the request of the Senator from Virginia will be acceded to. I think the proposed legislation is necessary.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Virginia? The Chair hears none.

Mr. GLASS. I ask that the House bill may be substituted for the Senate bill.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator if the bills are identical?

Mr. GLASS. They are identical.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There being no objection, the Chair lays the House bill before the Senate.

The bill (H. R. 12245) to amend the War Finance Corporation Act, approved April 5, 1918, as amended, was read twice by its title, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I think perhaps there ought to be an extension of time, although the War Finance Corporation have not been authorized to make any loans since December 31, 1924. They have been all this time liquidating. It would seem that enough time has elapsed for them to have wound up their business, but they appear to have on hand these obligations which they have not yet been able to collect, and, of course, it stands to reason that those acquainted with the business are best qualified to know how to handle it. I hope the expenses will be reduced to a minimum in order that there may not be a lot of people continued in positions unnecessarily.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, Senate bill 3685 will be indefinitely postponed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

Mr. WARREN presented a resolution adopted by the Lions Club, of Riverton, Wyo., favoring the enactment of legislation to provide for aided and directed settlement on Federal reclamation projects, which was referred to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation.

He also presented a resolution adopted by Local Union No. 2282, United Mine Workers of America, of Rock Springs, Wyo., favoring the maintenance in the eastern bituminous fields of the so-called Jacksonville scale of wages for coal miners, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. COPELAND presented petitions of sundry citizens of New York City and Brooklyn, N. Y., praying for the passage of legislation granting increased pensions to Civil War veterans and their widows, which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. ASHURST presented a resolution of Cactus Chapter, No. 2, Disabled American Veterans of the World War, United States Veterans' Hospital No. 51, Tucson, Ariz., which was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas the Circuit Court of Appeals of the Ninth Circuit on March 5, 1928, handed down a decision wherein it was held that the four-year statute of limitations of the State of Arizona applied to all insurance suits against the Government brought by ex-service men residing in this State; and

Whereas there are several hundred ex-service men residing in Arizona who were totally and permanently disabled at the time of discharge, and who will be unable to collect upon their insurance, which was in force at the time they became totally and permanently disabled, unless Congress shall pass a law extending the time within which suit may be brought against the Government; and

Whereas in a great many cases it was impossible to determine that the disability of the ex-service man was total and permanent until after the expiration of the time within which suit could be brought under the Arizona statute; and

Whereas a great many of the disabled ex-service men in Arizona are patients in Government hospitals and were sent here on account of their health and are thus deprived of the benefits of the statutes of limitations of their home State; and

Whereas we believe that the application of the law should be made uniform, irrespective of the State within which the ex-service man resides; and

Whereas a bill has been introduced in Congress by Congressman ROYAL C. JOHNSON, of South Dakota (H. R. 11350), granting the right to ex-service men to sue upon their insurance policies at any time within 20 years from the accrual of the cause of action; and

Whereas it is imperative that such bill should immediately be passed in order to protect the rights of those ex-service men now having cases pending before the courts: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That we heartily indorse said bill and that we respectfully request the Arizona delegation in Congress to support the same and that a copy of this resolution be mailed to Congressman ROYAL C. JOHNSON and Senators HENRY F. ASHURST, CARL HAYDEN, and Congressman LEWIS DOUGLAS, and that copies be furnished to such other individuals and organizations as from time to time it may be deemed advisable.

The foregoing resolution was duly authorized and approved by Cactus Chapter, No. 2, Disabled American Veterans of the World War, United States Veterans' Hospital No. 51, Tucson, Ariz.

SALE OF LANDS IN LOUISIANA AND MISSISSIPPI

Mr. STEPHENS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (H. R. 6993) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to sell and patent certain lands in Louisiana and Mississippi. The bill authorizes the Secretary of the Interior, in his judgment and discretion, to sell certain lands, which are described in the bill, located in the two States named. A similar bill on the subject passed both Houses at the last session, but failed to reach the President in time for his signature, I believe; at any rate, it did not become a law.

I introduced a somewhat similar bill at this session and the matter was referred to the Department of the Interior. The Secretary drafted a new bill and the bill for which I now ask consideration is the bill prepared in the Department of the Interior and has the indorsement of that department. I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

Mr. CURTIS. There is no objection to it so far as I know.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Mississippi?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, and it was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior, in his judgment and discretion, is hereby authorized to sell, in the manner hereinafter provided, any of those lands which he has found or shall hereafter find are public lands of the United States that have accreted to section 14 of township 5 north, range 4 west, Washington meridian, in the State of Mississippi, and to sections 65, 66, 67, and 68, of township 5 north, range 9 east, Louisiana meridian, in the State of Louisiana, and which are not lawfully appropriated by a qualified settler or entryman or other adverse claimant claiming under the public land laws.

SEC. 2. That the owners of said above-described lots or sections shall have a preferred right to file in the office of the register of the United States Land Office of the district in which the lands are situated an application to purchase the public lands thus formed by accretion at any time within 90 days from the filing of plats of such accreted area in the United States Land Office. Every such application must be accompanied with satisfactory proof that the applicant is entitled to such preference right by virtue of the ownership of said above described lots or sections and that the lands which he applies to purchase are not in the legal possession of any adverse claimant.

SEC. 3. That upon the filing of any application to purchase any lands subject to the operation of this act, together with the required proof, the Secretary of the Interior shall cause the lands described in said application to be appraised, including the timber thereon and the stumpage value of any timber cut or removed by the applicant or his predecessors in interest. Such appraisement shall be exclusive of any increased value resulting from the development or improvement of the land for agricultural purposes by the applicant or his predecessors in interest.

SEC. 4. That an applicant who applies to purchase land under the provisions of this act, in order to be entitled to receive a patent must, within 30 days from receipt of notice of appraisal by the Secretary of the Interior, pay to the register of the United States Land Office of the district in which the lands are situated the appraised value of the lands, and thereupon patent shall issue to said applicant for such lands as the Secretary of the Interior shall determine that such applicant is entitled to purchase under this act. The proceeds derived by the Government from the sale of lands hereunder shall be covered into the United States Treasury and applied as provided by law for the disposal of the proceeds from the sale of public lands.

SEC. 5. If, at the date of the approval of this act, any of the lots or sections or parts of lots or sections above described are covered by a pending entry on which satisfactory final proof in support thereof has not been submitted, patent based on any application to purchase land subject to the provisions of this act shall be withheld to await the completion of the pending entry. If, upon completion of the pending entry, it shall then be found that applicant has shown due compliance with the law under the said pending unperfected entry and his application to purchase is otherwise satisfactory patent on said application to purchase shall then be issued.

SEC. 6. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to prescribe all necessary rules and regulations for administering the provisions of this act and determining conflicting claims arising hereunder.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DEMOCRATIC PRESIDENTIAL CAMPAIGN

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD certain newspaper articles which I send to the desk, relating to the Democratic national campaign.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered. The articles are as follows:

[From the Columbia Record, Columbia, S. C., Monday, March 26, 1928]

THREATENS TO BOLT HOUSTON CONVENTION IF SMITH NOMINATED—DOMINANT SOUTH CAROLINA FACTION DETERMINED TO SUPPORT ONLY A DRY, NON-CATHOLIC CANDIDATE—DEMOCRATS EXPECT NATIONAL DEFEAT, BUT STATE WILL SUPPORT PARTY AT ELECTION EVEN THOUGH VOTES HAVE TO BE SHUFFLED—CRY OF "NIGGER" ENOUGH TO ROUSE ANTI-REPUBLICAN PREJUDICES

[EDITOR'S NOTE: This letter, under a Columbia date of March 22, was written to the Boston Transcript by Theodore G. Joslin, Washington correspondent of that newspaper. It should be of interest to voters of South Carolina.]

The dominant faction of the Democratic Party in South Carolina is doing its utmost to select a delegation to the Houston convention that will vote from the first to the last ballot against the nomination of Gov. Al Smith, and that will join, if necessary, with delegations from other Southern States to bolt the convention if the New York executive proves to be the two-thirds choice of the gathering. This faction, comprising voters who are politically dry or who are opposed to Smith because of his race and religion, are depending upon the leadership of Senator COLEMAN L. BLEASE, for years the political firebrand of the Jessamine State, and Gov. John G. Richards, his intimate friend, to "preserve the highest of southern traditions."

Not all the party leaders, however, are antagonistic to the northern candidate, who, if nominated and elected, would be the first Roman Catholic to enter the White House. On the contrary, various of these leaders, who insist that they could defeat Senator BLEASE if they should consolidate their forces, are willing to support Smith or are openly espousing his candidacy. Among them is former Congressman A. F. Lever, author of the war-time food control act, who has announced for Smith and whose declaration has resulted in his being boomed for the governorship two years hence, when the term of Governor Richards will expire. They assert that the time has come "to end all this hypocrisy," predicting that the State convention, which will be held 60 days hence to select the delegates, will be the most exciting in many years.

READY TO BOLT THE CONVENTION

On the basis of present conditions, the Blease-Richards faction can not but control the convention, in which event the delegation, while not necessarily instructed against Smith, will be pledged to vote first, last, and all the time for a dry candidate, thus premising their opposition to the New York governor on his wetness rather than on his religion. The pro-Smith faction does not intend, for the present at least, to ask for a Smith delegation. Rather, it intends to seek an unpledged delegation, believing that, if successful, the delegation can be induced to swing to Smith some time during the balloting. Feeling among Protestants in the State is so strong that the chances momentarily are against the Smith forces winning, even though they have the support of some of the most influential newspapers in the State. The sentiment of the present majority is expressed concisely in the following interview which Governor Richards granted to me:

"We will give our support to a dry, but we will not support any candidate who is a wet. The Smith supporters already have started a band-wagon movement for him, but it has had no effect. If Smith is nominated he will be defeated overwhelmingly. That is a foregone conclusion, in my opinion. The same fate would await any other wet. With Smith as the nominee, the Democratic vote in South Carolina would be the smallest in its history. It is not at all improbable that the South Carolina delegation would join in a rump convention if Smith should prove to be the two-thirds choice of the convention.

PARTY CAN NOT SQUARE ITSELF

"I am hopeful, however, that some outstanding Democrat who is a dry will be nominated, and I believe he will be. I think that Owen D. Young, of New York, former Secretary of War Newton D. Baker, Gov. Vic Donahey, of Ohio, Senator WALTER F. GEORGE, of Georgia, and many others are available. Here's my position. I can not understand how the Democratic Party can square itself by nominating a man who is sworn, if elected, to support the Constitution and who openly violates the eighteenth amendment. I don't believe the Democratic Party will be so foolish as to nominate that type of man."

Governor Richards spoke with all sincerity. He is a dry, politically and personally. Other leaders who are as opposed to Smith as he is, giving prohibition as their reason for opposing him, are as wet as Smith ever was, availing themselves of "the mountain dew" which is made in the hills surrounding the State capital and sold in this city at about any price one wants to pay for it. The truth is that much of the antagonism to Smith is due to religious intolerance, more so, in fact, than in Virginia and North Carolina, which I have surveyed already. Until now the Baptists and Methodists have controlled the Democratic Party. Whether they can be ousted will be determined by the May convention.

RECONCILED ALREADY TO DEFEAT

A most significant fact is that the rank and file of the party is giving comparatively little attention to national politics. All the talking is being done by the leaders of the rival factions, the "ins" and the "outs." The average man on the streets and the "hill billies," as the country folk hereabouts are referred to, are not even thinking about the coming campaign. I tried to talk politics with the farmers—"red necks"—who boarded the local train on the tedious ride from Raleigh to Columbia. They said that "this Smith rumpus" didn't "consarn" them. Clerks in the stores here said they were not interested. Attempts to draw them out produced only the supplementary information that they did not believe the Democratic Party had any chance of winning the election, regardless of whether Smith or anyone else was nominated; in fact, gave the impression that they would be contented if the Republicans won the election this year, even though adherence to the Democratic Party has been born and bred in them.

This brings up an interesting point. The party chieftains seem to be agreed in only one particular, namely, that defeat will be the portion of Democracy again. The anti-Smith leaders asserted that they were convinced the New York governor would be defeated if he should be nominated, saying that while he might capture some Northern States, these gains would be offset by losses in the border land and even in the South, mentioning most often Tennessee, Kentucky, and Oklahoma, and occasionally referring to Alabama and Florida. One of these leaders said he had no doubt that if Smith received the nomination Florida would go to the Republican nominee, asserting he had first-hand information in that particular. His statement was surprising enough to hear in the one section of the country that always has turned thumbs down on the Republican Party, but it wasn't half as startling as to hear another leader, whose business has prospered in recent years, assert: "I never thought I would ever say it, but the truth is I am convinced that the welfare of the country for the next four years depends on the election of a Republican President. I know that the election of a Democratic President would mean business depression for a year at least, and I don't want that to happen."

WANT TO GET RID OF BLEASE

The anti-Smith leaders do not go half as far as do the friends of Smith. The latter declare that Smith is the one and only Democrat who can hope to be elected. They accept all reports from the North at their face value. They admit that Smith might lose a few of the border States because of religious intolerance, but they insist that such losses would be more than offset by gains in the North and East. They really believe that Smith can carry New York, New Jersey, Massachusetts, Ohio, and Illinois and ask anyone to name any other candidate who can begin to command such support as they believe is at the disposal of their favorite. They are trying to interest the apathetic public in the arguments which they are making, believing that if they can arouse sufficient enthusiasm they not only will get support for Smith by the State's delegation, but can rid themselves of Senator BLEASE, whom they cordially hate and whose contribution to the campaign to date has been to say he favored "BILL" BORAH. One motive is almost as important as the other, for they have convinced themselves that BLEASE is unhappy in the Senate and is preparing to exchange places two years hence with Governor Richards, sending the governor to the Senate in his place and assuming the governorship again for himself, thus becoming "a big toad in a small puddle" again.

If there is any other agreement among the contending factions, it is that whatever the Houston convention may do, South Carolina will remain in the Democratic column. They say that under no circumstances will the State go Republican, even though the Democratic majority may be reduced to next to nothing. Even if a rump convention should be held and the State should give its support to the dry nominated by that gathering, the State would regard that nominee as much, if not more, of a Democrat than the choice of the regular convention. There are some Republicans here, of course, but they are in a minority and no matter how strong Democratic feeling may run the staunch party leaders need only shout "nigger" for 10 days before the election to assure at least a fractional Democratic majority, and even if it wasn't polled honestly the ballots would be juggled sufficiently to permit announcement of the desired result. This may not be pleasant reading in a Northern city, particularly as it refers to the negro, but the survey I am making will be futile if I do not report facts as I find them.

HOOVER OR DAWES WOULD SATISFY

Intense as is the feeling regarding the negro when his voting equality is considered if not respected, and notwithstanding that the members of this race personify the Republican Party from the point of view of most Southern gentlemen, it is a fact that such Republicans as President Coolidge, Secretary Hoover, and Vice President Dawes are praised here in the South as they are in the North, not to the same extent, but sincerely. Most white folks in the South want a Democrat for President, but if their wishes can not be gratified they will not be broken hearted if either Hoover or Dawes should be elected and they would be quite happy under four more years of Coolidge. Presumably the South Carolina delegation to the Republican convention will turn eventually to Dawes after it has supported former Governor Lowden, its moves being determined by Joseph W. Tolbert, the Republican national committeeman, who will dominate it. This is the situation in South Carolina as revealed by the survey I have made, with as merry a fight in prospect during the next two months as the State has seen in "lo, these many years."

OPPOSES ANY CHANGE IN RULES IN DEMOCRATIC PARTY

By John K. Aull

COLUMBIA, March 31.—"In the first place, I have never thought of even attempting to exchange positions with Governor Richards," United States Senator COLE L. BLEASE writes the Anderson Independent's Columbia correspondent in reply to certain questions asked by this writer in view of a recent article in the Boston Transcript, reprinted here by the afternoon daily paper, the article being written by the Boston paper's Washington correspondent, who visited Columbia in his tour of the country, writing articles on the national political situation. While here he, however, dipped into State affairs also. "As far as I can see ahead now," writes Senator BLEASE, "I shall be a candidate to succeed myself in the Senate."

The Senator reiterates the position which he has heretofore made plain, and nails the rumor, again given circulation by the Boston Transcript and the Columbia Record, which reprinted the article, that what the Boston paper's correspondent termed the "Blease-Richards" faction was threatening a bolt if Smith should be nominated. "Both Governor Richards and myself have time and time again said," says Senator BLEASE, "that we would support Mr. Smith if he were the nominee of the Democratic Party, and I have never heard of any man of what they call the 'reform faction' in South Carolina saying he would not do so, unless the Smith people, with their money, whisky, and bought-and-paid-for newspapers should be able to abolish the two-thirds rule in the Democratic convention, refuse to listen to any appeal from the South, and nominate Smith on his wet platform," in which event the Senator would advocate the same course which he advocated in his Bishopville speech, and which is reiterated in his letter here published. But "if the delegates from South Carolina in that convention participate in the nomination of a candidate for President and a candidate for Vice President, I shall not only vote for him or them but shall take the platform for them at such time and such places as the National Democratic Committee may request."

Senator BLEASE'S opposition to Smith for the nomination is well known, but in discussing the agitation to change the rules of the Democratic Party in this State so as to permit a voter to participate in the Democratic primary and then support the presidential ticket of some other party, the Senator says that when one votes "in the primary that he should pledge himself to support the nominees of the party."

The Senator's letter is clear, concise, and a complete and definite statement of his position, which, he says, "I shall reiterate if I live to be in Columbia on the 16th of May." Senator BLEASE'S letter speaks for itself, and nothing could be plainer or easier to understand than his words, and from this time on there should be no occasion for question by anyone as to where Senator BLEASE stands. He comes square out, as he always does.

His letter follows:

UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, D. C., March 28, 1928.

Hon. JOHN K. AULL,
Columbia, S. C.

MY DEAR JOHN: Yours of March 27, in which you ask certain questions and inclose an article headed "Threatens to bolt Houston convention if Smith nominated," received.

I had already read this article and was very much amused at most of its contents.

In the first place, I have never thought of even attempting to exchange positions with Governor Richards. I will frankly state, however, that I would rather be Governor of South Carolina than to hold any other position in the world. But the majority of the people of South Carolina were kind enough to elect me to the United States Senate when I asked them to do so in 1924, and I have no intention of hereafter becoming a candidate for the governorship.

However, if such an emergency should arise that a majority of my people think that I should make the campaign in order to be of some special service to them, I would not hesitate a moment to do so, but I can not now even conceive of any such emergency arising; therefore I shall remain in the Senate, if God spares me health and life, until the end of my present term, March 4, 1931.

In the meantime I shall endeavor to do as I have been doing, advocate and vote for what I believe to be for the best interests of the people of my State and this Nation, and render such service as I think would be acceptable to my people and to their and my God. If my services are satisfactory to a majority of my people, I care very little for the criticisms of "a bitter small minority," who can not get over their jealous rage at my having been elected to this exalted position. Neither shall I give any heed to the "small minority" who "want to get rid of BLEASE," "whom they cordially hate." As far as I can see ahead now, I shall be a candidate to succeed myself in the Senate.

That, of course, will be left in the hands of a majority of our people. If they indorse my course, all is well and good. If they have a man in the State who they think can be of greater service to them here, or who can accomplish more for them than I can, I want them to elect him, for they are entitled to the best, and no one would go further than I would to see that they get the best; and if some emergency should arise, some great question come before this country, and there was a man in South Carolina who could represent our State with greater ability or accomplish more for our State in this emergency I would not hesitate to do as Mr. Hayne did on one occasion, and step aside, he stepping aside to allow Mr. Calhoun to return to the Senate on such occasion as I mention.

As to the Democratic rules: I think that when a man goes to his club meeting and helps to elect delegates to his county convention, and the delegates so elected help elect delegates to a State convention, and the State convention elects delegates to the national convention, who participate in the nomination of candidates for President and Vice President, he, having participated in his club meeting, is just as much bound to support the action of the delegates elected by the State convention to the national convention as he is to support candidates for the United States Senate, Congress, State, and county offices when he votes in the primary at which they are nominated.

Therefore, I think when he votes in the primary that he should pledge himself to support the nominees of the party. If you don't do this, we will have confusion confounded. Why? Because men will vote in the primary, their candidate will be defeated, they will have no oath to bind them to support the nominee, and therefore would have no hesitancy in voting for their candidate in the general election against him who had been nominated by the party in the primary, and I know of no quicker way to ruin the united democracy of our State than to invite such a split and appeal to the negro for the balance of power as was done in 1890 and on other occasions.

It is strange to me how some people who bolted the party in 1890 and who again bolted in 1896 and 1900, when Mr. Bryan was the nominee, have all at once become so solicitous about the rules of the party to-day.

Now, as to a bolt as mentioned by this man in his newspaper article which you inclosed me, I will simply state that he is just another common Yankee liar, because both Governor Richards and myself have time and again said that we would support Mr. Smith if he were the nominee of the Democratic Party, and I have never heard of any man of what they call the "reform faction" in South Carolina saying that he would not do so, unless the Smith people with their money, whisky, and bought-and-paid-for newspapers should be able to abolish the two-thirds rule in the Democratic convention, refuse to listen to any appeal from the South, and nominate Smith on his wet platform; then, as I said in my Bishopville speech, "I favor the southern delegates to the next Democratic National Convention standing up in that convention and demanding to be represented and demanding that what they favor be written in the platforms of the party, and if the two-thirds rule be abolished and their demands are not agreed to, that they withdraw from that convention and hold a simon-pure Democratic convention and invite all of the citizens of the United States of America to joint them in the election of their nominees and not allow mugwamps and camouflaged so-called Democrats to control the Democratic convention—men who do not want the Democrats to succeed but want both Democratic and Republican candidates from their own crowd, so it matters not which gets in, they win and the people lose. As I suggest, if anyone is to bolt, let it be them and not us. Why let delegates from States that never have and never will give the Democrats an electoral vote name whom we shall vote for and what issues we shall advocate?"

Now, this is not a bolt. If the delegates from South Carolina in that convention participate in the nomination of a candidate for President and a candidate for Vice President, I shall not only vote for him or them but shall take the platform for them at such time and such places as the Democratic National Committee may request.

As to your next question, I don't care to have much to say about it; it is so amusing. Any man has a right to announce for governor who pleases, and if I wanted to be governor, I would not want any easier campaign than to be opposed in South Carolina by a man who is in favor of Al Smith for President and a whisky platform.

I shall be at the May convention if I am living, not with any intention of dictating to anybody or of even attempting to influence anybody, but merely to be of such service as I may be able to render to my people and to my party.

I want South Carolina to adopt a good strong platform, a State-rights platform, for the enforcement of all laws, against the repeal or modification of the eighteenth amendment or the Volstead law, denouncing corruption and extravagance in government, and making plain that she wants what she has always stood for—white supremacy, home rule, a belief in the doctrine of Jesus Christ and in His divinity.

I hope that the delegates, whoever they may be, will not be instructed to vote for any candidate but instructed to vote against any man who stands for or advocates the repeal of or the modification of the eighteenth amendment or the Volstead and kindred acts, and that they will choose a clean, able, honorable, outstanding American citizen as their nominee for President and a like one as their nominee for Vice President, and vote as a unit and work for such candidates and such platform.

Speaking of a bolt, will Smith and those who are advocating his nomination support whole-heartedly the candidate nominated if it be not Smith?

I have spoken plainly, possibly a little too plainly, but that has been one of the rules of my life, let the consequences be what they may, and what I have written you here you may publish in any newspaper you please, for I shall reiterate it if I live to be in Columbia on the 16th of May.

Very respectfully,

COLE L. BLEASE.

[From the Anderson Independent (the paper the people read), Tuesday morning, March 27, 1928]

BLEASE BROUGHT US PESTILENCE, WEEVILS, AND ALL; NOW LOOK!

Mr. EDITOR: I have just read a remarkable article in the Greenville News from the distinguished capitalistic newspaper, the Charlotte News, in which it says "Bleasism in saddle." In this article the woefully ignorant Tar Heel editor blames Bleasism for driving Dr. S. C. Mitchell away from the University of South Carolina years ago; now, says the North Carolinian, Dr. D. M. Douglas is threatened with Bleasism. These are the implied statements in the brilliant article copied in the Greenville News, which is opposed to anything BLEASE has, will, or may do, has zealously copied in its columns.

Now, of course, to be perfectly frank, we South Carolinians all know that COLE BLEASE brought the Jim Crow law, lynchings, high-priced guano, low-priced cotton, the hookworm, bollworm, corn borer, spinal meningitis, side pleurisy, antagonism, factionalism, disease, pestilence, floods, and famines to this State. This is general knowledge as spread around by the partisan press. If BLEASE had never been born this State would never have had tornadoes and floods, etc., and the two dry years, 1925 and 1926, were providential measures against the régime of Bleasism in this State.

Everything bad this State has ever had was caused by BLEASE. Too bad, too bad.

It's an awful situation: Christ was born in a stable, COLE BLEASE worked in one when he was a boy, and Carolina is hell bent because of the latter. Of course, BLEASE has never been accused of stealing or robbing or thievery while in office; and if he hadn't put the curry-comb on the backs of some of the plutocratic jackasses in this State he would be classified as a "statesman." Any man who wants to be called a statesman in South Carolina can be one if he will let the Columbia State, Columbia Record, Greenville News, and News and Courier tell him how to run the State for the benefit of the respective classes they represent; if he tries to represent the masses, then he is a rank failure and a rotter in the sight of God.

The newspapers frequently tell us how BLEASE "is tolerated," or how the State has put up with him, and what a disgrace he is to the State; but the outstanding question is, Who the hell are the newspapers? What prior claim on the standards of weights and measures of morals, public leadership, and ability can the newspapers produce? Because a man happens to own a newspaper is no sign he isn't a fool, and the official who tries to please the press of this State may expect ruin and disaster. BLEASE has ignored the press and has enjoyed almost entirely an undivided antagonism among the papers, yet he has been elected to more public offices than any South Carolinian.

So far as the North Carolina tumblebug is concerned, I advise to back up and get another load; he ought to be a good hauler judging from his experience!

Z. V. MENSLEY.

FARM RELIEF

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3555) to establish a Federal farm board to aid in the orderly marketing and in the control and disposition of the surplus of agricultural commodities in interstate and foreign commerce.

Mr. MAYFIELD obtained the floor.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GOODING in the chair). Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. MAYFIELD. I yield.

Mr. ASHURST. The able Senator from Texas is about to deliver a speech on one of the most important subjects that can come before the Congress. The Senator's service here has demonstrated that he has a grasp of this question that is not equaled by that of any other person in the Congress. I ask for order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Senators will take their seats, and the Senate will be in order. The Senator from Texas will proceed.

Mr. MAYFIELD. Mr. President, no Senator can longer doubt that a new determination of the Nation's policy toward agriculture is the most important task that has confronted the country in the past decade. The men and women who produce the raw materials on which our industrial existence and, indeed, the very life of the Nation depend, are operating at a great disadvantage compared with the more closely knit economic groups in industry, commerce, and finance. We can neither avoid nor efface the evidences of this disparity.

The greatest problem before the American people to-day is the restoration of agriculture to a permanent, remunerative basis.

The industrial conference board of New York city, composed of the best economists that the country affords, reveals to us the seriousness of our national farm problem when it states that for the last 40 years the wholesale prices received for agricultural products have not even covered the cost of production. This simply means that since 1887 our farmers have been producing at a loss. In 1910 the farm indebtedness of the United States was $4,000,000,000, but had increased to $12,000,000,000 in 1920, and has been steadily increasing since that time. An investigation into the bank failures of our country shows that since 1920 more than 2,000 bank failures have occurred in agricultural States. On April 21 last year the Department of Agriculture announced that the farm population of our country decreased 649,000 persons in 1926, which is the largest decrease in any year since 1920. During the last seven years farm values in the United States have decreased $23,000,000,000, while other property values have increased over $50,000,000,000. In the face of these facts it passes my understanding how anyone can minimize the seriousness of agricultural conditions that exist in our country to-day, or seriously contend that there is no agricultural problem to be solved.

The presidents of our banks, the managers of our automobile concerns, the presidents of our railway companies, the stockholders of our mercantile establishments, and the managers of all our industrial and manufacturing enterprises have long since realized that the prosperity of their business depends very largely upon the prosperity of the producers of the Nation. As the financial barometer of the farmers goes down, so goes the financial barometer of the cities and towns that are dependent on agricultural areas.

It has been truly said that our cities may burn to ashes, but if the agricultural areas surrounding them remain prosperous the cities will be rebuilded more beautiful than before, but leave the cities prosperous and reduce to penury the agricultural areas surrounding the cities, and it will not be long until weeds will grow in the streets of the cities. The agricultural problem is, therefore, a national one and affects all our people alike. This being true, I have not felt that I was supporting class legislation when I have given enthusiastic support to every measure coming before the Senate that I concluded would bring even the remotest relief to the farmers of our country.

The most painstaking and unprejudiced economic surveys that have been made in any field for a generation confirm the stories of decreasing farm values and increasing farm debts that come to us who are privileged to represent agricultural States. With my distinguished colleague, I have the honor of representing in this body a State which is probably more widely concerned in securing an abatement of the difficulties that surround the business of farming than any other State in the Union, because Texas is preeminently an agricultural State with an area of land in farms more than double that of any other State. The total value of crops produced in Texas, according to the last agricultural census, is nearly twice that of any other State, while within its borders the number of farms exceeds by more than 50 per cent the number of farms in the second ranking State.

Each of the 465,000 farms in Texas is a distinct economic unit, independent in its productive operation from the others; these are all part of a grand total of more than six and a third millions such economic units in our country. Because of the vast number and wide diffusion of the farms in this country the farm problem can not be solved by trusts or tariffs or other forms of self-help or subsidy which industry has evolved for its own stabilization and protection. Many phases of the problem are peculiar to agriculture and in our consideration of a remedy we must seek for that which is adequate and lasting.

Consideration of the agricultural problem naturally falls into three steps or stages: First, what is the condition of agriculture? Second, what are the causes? And, finally, what are the remedies?

Agriculture is a varied and diverse industry. It may languish in one section and prosper in another in the same season. That which causes loss and disintegration in one branch of farming may not be the cause which is resulting in ruin to another. The remedy that is proposed for one form of agriculture may not be equally effective as applied to another form. Then, too, remedies may be negative as well as positive. It is important that we discontinue or modify national policies that work to the disadvantage of farmers, but that in itself is not sufficient. We must attempt to develop a new policy that will assist farmers to enhance and stabilize agricultural prices.

For eight years the farmers of this country have been crucified by a 10 to 30 per cent disadvantage, compared with their pre-war position, in prices at which their products are exchanged for goods and services of others. This disadvantage is not a temporary passing phenomenon. It persists to-day. It is a disadvantage that will continue as long as farmers remain without effective bargaining power in the sale of their goods and as long as agriculture continues to be the outstanding example of an unorganized industry in an organized world. The fact and the extent of agriculture's disadvantage are now generally recognized. The first question—what is the condition of agriculture—requires no further reference. I could draw from the experiences of the sturdy and self-reliant farm men and women of my own State to make an appeal to sentiment or passion more moving, perhaps, than any economic discussion can be. I might dwell on social and political aspects that are inevitable companions of farm distress. I might draw from the pages of history the references necessary to fasten your attention on the significance that exists in the fact of a disintegrating agriculture in a rapidly industrializing state, but such is not the purpose of this discussion. I seek to explain to-day at least in part the purpose and meaning of the McNary agricultural surplus control bill, which the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry has reported favorably to the Senate, and which had my support in the Sixty-eighth and the Sixty-ninth Congresses.

Facts and figures have been presented within the last two years by the business men's joint committee, representing the United States Chamber of Commerce, and the National Industrial Conference Board, and also by the Association of Land-Grant Colleges and Universities of the United States, that prove beyond question the fact, the nature, and the extent of agricultural depression.

The causes of this admitted depression are varied, but out of eight years of debate and study of this question, extending throughout the country and consuming months of time in the Congress of the United States, a few major propositions have emerged on which there is general accord:

(a) Agricultural production can not and should not be centralized in gigantic corporations in order that production may be measurably regulated and the industry stabilized. Even if it were economically practical to thus reorganize the nature of our agriculture, the social consequences of reducing farmers to the status of hired laborers would be too widespread and unpleasant to contemplate with composure.

(b) Weather and other factors uncontrollable by man determine the aggregate volume of output from farms to a far greater extent than does acreage, which in a measure at least might be controlled by cooperative action of the farmers themselves.

(c) It is the actual or potential presence of crop surpluses in their several forms that renders ineffective the various devices that have been brought forward as aids to agriculture during the period of depression. Tariffs have failed to assist farmers materially because they are practically inoperative on surplus crops. Cooperative marketing is not effective as a means to stabilize markets because the risk and cost of handling surpluses bear down too heavily upon members in comparison with nonmembers.

(d) We have pursued and are pursuing national policies that increase the farmer's operating costs, that in turn add to his financial burdens.

(e) It is a national responsibility to help farmers to so control the marketing of their products that agriculture may, as far as possible, be freed from ruinous fluctuations and heartbreaking slumps.

It is in the consideration of remedies that opinions differ most widely, though it is only fair to say that the differences are more marked on the outside than the inside of farm circles. The organized farmers, particularly those whose business organizations have had some experience in attempting to handle crop surpluses, show a remarkably united front on this question.

Mr. President, I am in favor of action by the Senate along two general lines for the permanent betterment of the condition that surrounds the business of farming in the United States.

In one direction we must modify or amend our national policies which operate to the disadvantage of the farmers. This country should stop subsidizing increased production at least until we have helped farmers to a position to save themselves from the loss and ruin that are inevitable consequences of this increased competition within their industry. We should recast the provisions of the tariff with a definite view to improve the relative position of agriculture and livestock in comparison with other groups. There should be no discrimination between raw materials and finished products in the raising of revenue. A competitive tariff would give our farmers and livestock men a tariff on their raw products sufficiently high to equalize the difference in the cost of production of raw products in foreign countries that employ pauper labor. Without such a tariff our farmers and ranchmen will never be able to make a profit on the farm products and livestock that they produce. The farmer's share of the national freight bill is disproportionately heavy and should be reduced at the earliest possible moment. Manipulation of the prices of farm products through future exchanges should be prohibited at once. Our cotton farmers and wheat growers will never receive the real value of their cotton and grain as long as the prices of these products are controlled and dominated by gamblers through future exchanges. But when these and other reforms have been accomplished, the great task is still to be done. That task is to provide a method whereby the producers of our staple agricultural crops can secure for themselves benefits and advantages that are commensurate with the benefits and advantages which business and industry are securing for themselves through trusts, incorporated combinations, and trade associations. This can only be accomplished for agriculture by helping the farmers to handle their crop surpluses for their own stability and benefit, rather than to continue a system in which the surpluses enrich others at the farmers' expense.

It is of this last form of farm relief—the development of an effective system of surplus control in agriculture—that I speak more particularly at this time. I want to see the farmer in Texas get every cent of advantage that is economically obtainable in the price of his cotton, or wheat, or beef. I realize that he can not meet in one room or sit around a table with all of his fellow producers from other parts of the land. I realize that national surpluses can not be handled effectively in the interests of the producers by the voluntary action of local cooperatives, unless all who benefit from such voluntary action contribute in fair proportion to the costs involved in such an undertaking.

Before the farmers of my State can secure every cent of advantage which is economically obtainable in the prices of their products they must be brought into position where, if there is a tariff, they will receive its benefits just as industry does; they must be helped into position to demand for their cotton and other crops prices that cover the cost of producing those crops, plus a reasonable profit on their investment, just as industry would receive if the American cotton crop were the product of an organized industry. I want to see the Texas farmers placed in such a position that a surplus of any staple crop one year will not be allowed to smash down the price of that crop to a ruinous level, regardless of the fact that the entire crop will be needed before another 12 months goes by.

We are wasting time here if the legislation we enact is merely a temporary makeshift or sop thrown to the farmers just before election, which will soon demonstrate its uselessness or which later will be taken away. If we are to have permanent agricultural relief it must be based on principles that provide a firm and lasting foundation upon which farmers can develop their great cooperative and marketing associations, secure in the faith that they possess a bargaining power to match the power of those groups with which they now trade at such tremendous disadvantages.

The McNary measure contains a provision which in my judgment is necessary to place the farmers of this country in a position that will make them secure in their bargaining power and not dependent upon Treasury subsidies. It will not destroy private business. It will not compel farmers to join cooperatives or sell their crops to a Government board. Under its operations farmers who are members of cooperatives can continue to sell through them, while farmers who are not can continue to sell when they please, where they please, and to whom they please. It will bring about orderly marketing, with the result that peak prices will not be so high nor depressed prices so low. It will produce a moderate level of prices that would cover cost of production, plus a reasonable profit on the farmers' labor and investment. It will finance, but not subsidize, their business organizations through loans and advances. Finally the measure opens a way for effective action on behalf of each commodity whose surplus problem demands united action, if periodical disaster is to be averted. American farmers have never been consulted about the prices they have received for their cotton and grain, but have been forced to sell on markets made by speculators and gamblers through futures exchanges. They have never been consulted about the prices of the things they purchased, but have paid whatever was demanded. Therefore, under this system, our farmers receive less for what they sell and pay more for what they purchase than any other farmers on the face of the earth. I have supported the McNary bill, because it will change the system under which our farmers have been made "hewers of wood and drawers of water."

It has been repeatedly declared that under the provisions of the McNary bill the Government itself will go into business and purchase crop surpluses. The statement is not only untrue but perfectly ridiculous. The measure merely provides that the Government shall loan the farmers $250,000,000 with which they may retire the surplus of a crop from the market, and thereby secure a fair price for the remainder of the crop.

Since the war the Government has made outright gifts of $30,000,000 for the relief of people in foreign nations.

After the war the Government gave the railroads, as provided for in the Esch-Cummins law, a straight-out subsidy of $529,000,000, to enable them to earn war-time profits for the first six months following the return of the railroads to the owners.

After the war the Government loaned to foreign nations over two and one-half billion dollars.

And yet, Mr. President, when we ask that the Government loan our farmers not quite one-half as much as it actually gave the railroads, we encounter the severest criticism from the men who voted for the law that gave the railroads this subsidy of $529,000,000.

It seems to me that if the Government can afford to give $30,000,000 for the relief of people in foreign nations, and a little over one-half a billion dollars to the railroads, and then is generous enough to loan over two and one-half billion dollars to foreign nations, it certainly can afford to loan our farmers $250,000,000, by which they hope to free themselves from industrial slavery.

The opponents of the McNary measure have centered their fire upon the equalization fee, and they have not hesitated to misrepresent it completely, both as to its nature and its effects. If all the misrepresentations about the equalization fee were made into iron links an inch long and welded together, they would constitute a chain that would belt the globe nine hundred and forty-seven times. The attack on the equalization fee has not come from the farmers but from those who do not want to see them possessed of an effective bargaining power, and who realize that the equalization fee is the one essential feature of the McNary bill that will give them such a power.

What is this proposed equalization fee in fact? A fund is required to finance marketing operations that may be necessary in acquiring, storing, and disposing of crop surpluses to protect the market for the remaining bulk of the crop. The equalization fee is merely the proportionate share which each bushel of wheat, for example, or bale of cotton that moves in commerce would contribute to this common fund.

In one form or another the practical counterpart of the equalization fee is in daily use in industrial operations and in State and local projects. When the steel corporation makes its foreign sales on one price level and its domestic sales on a higher level, its profits are necessarily less than they would be were it possible to sell the output, surplus and all, at the higher domestic price level. When an implement manufacturer stores his surplus goods in a warehouse until they can be sold at a price he thinks fair, he charges his business with the storage cost. It is worth the cost; in fact, it is necessary if the manufacturer is to keep his current market from being demoralized. The export sales of the steel corporation may show no profit in themselves, but they contribute to the profitable operation of the corporation as a whole. The entire business of the steel corporation absorbs the cost of maintaining the foreign market for its surplus. The entire business of the implement manufacturer also absorbs the cost of storing and withholding any seasonal surplus that occurs. The cost and losses thus absorbed in industry are the practical equivalent of the equalization fee which the McNary measure proposes to make available for agriculture.

The 1925 agricultural census reports that there were 1,931,307 individual farmers who produced cotton in the United States. The problem and its remedy would be totally different if all the cotton in the United States were grown by 15 or 20 big planters or corporations. Such is the nature of agricultural production that these few planters or corporations could not control weather or pests any more than the individual farmers now do, but surely they would not dump all their cotton on the market in a big year of production regardless of the price.

Does anyone doubt that in some way or another each of these 15 or 20 producers would finally withhold from the market his proportionate share of any surplus which, uncontrolled, would impair the market for the entire crop and pay the costs incident to the operation in proportion to his interests, or that these few growers would accomplish the same purpose by arranging the marketing of their cotton through a single agency? There would be costs attached to withholding the surplus from the market and disposing of it under such a system, to be sure, but the costs on a small portion of a crop would be cheerfully incurred in order that the remaining portion of the crop could be disposed of in a sound and stable market and at prices fairly related to the producer's cost of production. The cost of handling the surplus in the case of the 15 or 20 growers would be the practical equivalent of the equalization fee proposed in the McNary bill for nearly 2,000,000 cotton producers.

There is nothing particularly difficult in the buying, storing, and selling operations which would be necessary in any program of the organized surplus control of agricultural products. Farmers with the assistance of the proposed Federal farm board have or can create cooperative marketing associations and business corporations capable of doing all the marketing involved in the program contained in the measure under discussion.

The question which we have to meet and which the McNary measure meets in a practical way is determining the source of the money with which to finance such surplus control operations as will be undertaken for the benefits of the whole crop. No one has yet attacked the equity of the provision of the bill which says that the funds to be used for the benefit of all the producers of a crop should be drawn proportionately from all the marketed units of the crop itself. Since the proposed legislation has been before the country and the Congress for discussion no one has proposed any substitute source of funds, if we except the vague suggestions heard from time to time that Federal funds should be used for this purpose, excusing the facts in the case with the argument that there will be no loss but rather only profits upon the surplus portions of the crop.

Conceding, therefore, the equity of the proposed method of financing farm stabilization through the equalization fee, then the only practical matters which remain for settlement are two—first, the determination of the amount of the fee to be collected during operations in any season upon a particular commodity, and, second, the selection of the most practical and least expensive method of collecting the fee. Some of the uncompromising opponents of the McNary measure have been so reckless in their statements to charge that in the case of cotton the equalization fee might amount to $10 or $15 a bale and that it would be collected from the farmer when he carries his cotton to the gin. Such statements are utterly preposterous and absurd. This is, indeed, a strange argument to be made by men who, at the same time, contend that in the case of cotton satisfactory results could be secured without any net loss whatever on the surplus operations.

The fee on cotton need be only enough to finance the storage and carrying costs of withholding the surplus from the market until the market is ready to take the surplus at a fair and reasonable price. The equalization fee of $1 a bale on the cotton crop, collected as provided in the McNary bill, not from the farmer when he takes his cotton to the gin, but by the agent of the railroads when the cotton merchant ships his cotton, would raise $15,000,000 a year, and according to the best authorities that amount would be ample and sufficient. The fee would be reflected in the price paid to the farmer for his cotton exactly as in the case of freight charges. It is true that the fee would be heavier in the years of a large surplus than in years when the surplus was small and easily handled, but if prices were held reasonably stable in the face of a large surplus there would be no complaints against the collection of the fee. And if the fee in any season proved by experience to be either too large or too small, the subsequent fee would correct the margin of variation.

Unfair critics of the McNary measure have deliberately and intentionally endeavored to create the impression that the equalization fee is a tax levied on the farmers of the country for which they would receive no benefits whatever. This measure is called a farm-relief measure, and certainly it would not give relief to the cotton farmers of the South by collecting an equalization fee of even $1 a bale from them without giving them something larger in return. And that is exactly what the McNary bill will do. Cotton farmers, if this measure were enacted into law, would receive ten times more in the way of an increased price for their cotton than the amount that would be deducted from the price to cover the equalization fee. Let me illustrate. Suppose there is a temporary surplus of cotton produced and the price declines to 15 cents per pound. Do you suppose there could be found a cotton farmer in the entire South who for a moment would object to the collection of an equalization fee of $1 or $2 a bale on cotton if the collection of such a fee would assist in raising the price of cotton to 20 cents per pound? Where is the farmer who would object to the collection of an equalization fee of $1 or $2 a bale on cotton if this would assist him in getting $100 per bale for his cotton instead of $50 a bale?

While the equalization fee would be collected, as I have pointed out, yet in the end it would not actually be paid by the farmers themselves, because it would be passed on to the consuming public. Senators representing the great consuming centers of the North and the East have known all the while that the enactment of the McNary bill into law would increase the price of cotton, wheat, corn, and hogs, and, no doubt, this fact has influenced them to a large extent in their opposition to the measure.

Many of the ablest students of agricultural problems seriously doubt that an equalization fee would ever be levied on cotton, because the mere fact that the Federal farm board was prepared to retire a temporary surplus of cotton from the market, if necessary, would in itself be sufficient to stabilize the market and give our farmers a fair and reasonable price for their cotton. The McNary measure simply sets up the machinery that will enable the farmers to control their own business. If the farmers themselves do not object to the collection of the equalization fee, which is necessary in order for them to get control of and manage their own affairs and to assist them in securing a fair price for their products, why should demagogic politicians object to giving the farmers what they want? Legislation of this character, as we know, is largely experimental. I do not claim that the McNary farm measure is a panacea for all our agricultural ills, but I do know that it points in the right direction and that is enough for me. I am willing to give it a trial. Surely we can lose nothing by doing that. If the McNary farm measure proves worthless, as its opponents claim it will, we can repeal it and will have lost nothing by having given it a trial. If, however, on the other hand it brings real, substantial relief to the farmers of the country, then we will have stabilized agriculture and will have brought a blessing to our farmers. Surely, Mr. President, the Congress can enact no legislation that will hurt the farmer, because he must now look up to see the bottom.

Well do we remember that in the early part of the fall of 1926 the price of cotton declined from 20 cents to 10 cents a pound within 30 to 60 days because it was reported that the South had produced 3,000,000 bales too much cotton. Most of the 1926 cotton crop sold below cost of production, and many thousands of industrious and hard-working farmers lost their farms and the savings of a lifetime. And why? Simply because nature had been kind to growing crops and brought forth a yield not greater than the world needed but greater than it was thought the world could consume in one year. Verily, the farmer's business is in such turmoil it seems that the more he produces the less he has.

Investigation has shown that there is no such thing as maintaining a surplus of cotton over a period of five years. One year there is a surplus but the next year it is wiped out by droughts, floods, or by the boll weevil and the bollworm. So it has been demonstrated that in a period of five years supply and demand are equalized. While occasionally we produce more cotton in one year than the world can consume in one year, yet we have never produced over a period of five years more cotton than the world needed and could consume during that time. The "carry-over" from year to year is not a true surplus; it is merely that part of the crop not temporarily needed, but which will be needed to supply a deficiency in the years of smaller production.

If the McNary measure had been in effect in September, 1926, the cotton farmers of the South would have been saved not less than $600,000,000, and the truth of the statement is easily established. When the farmers began marketing their cotton in the early part of September, 1926, the price of middling cotton was around 20 cents per pound. About that time it was reported that there would be a surplus of about 3,000,000 bales of cotton, and down went the price to 10 cents per pound within 30 to 60 days. If the McNary farm measure had been in effect at that time, the Federal farm board would have come to the rescue of the cotton farmers of the South and retired about 2,000,000 bales of the purported surplus from the market and our farmers would, undoubtedly have received 20 cents a pound for their cotton. Why? Because that was the price of cotton about June 1, 1927, and we had not produced one single bale of cotton in addition to the 1926 crop. While the cotton crop of 1926 was in the hands of the farmers it was a purported surplus that sent the price down to 10 cents per pound, but as soon as the farmers had sold their cotton and it had become the property of others the surplus disappeared and the price steadily advanced until it reached 20 cents per pound by June 1, 1927. Just here it will be well to remind the uncompromising opponents of the McNary measure that the cotton farmers of the South paid an equalization fee in 1926 of something like $40 to $50 a bale in the loss they sustained in the decline in the price of cotton because they had no machinery with which to handle the temporary surplus.

The only country that produces a surplus of cotton is the United States, and whenever there is a world surplus it is produced by our country. The surplus therefore determines the price. If we could withdraw from the market the temporary surplus of cotton raised in the United States, we would then regulate the supply with the demand and thereby stabilize the price of cotton upon the basis of the supply not exceeding the demand. It is therefore apparent that the one thing needed in the South to-day is the establishment of the machinery by which we can retire a temporary surplus of cotton from the market and hold that surplus until it is needed. This is the aim and purpose of the McNary measure, for which I voted twice in this body and which passed the last Congress, but was vetoed by President Coolidge. The Federal Government has spent multiplied millions of dollars encouraging our farmers to a greater production; from its Treasury has flowed untold millions for reclaiming swamp lands, for irrigating arid lands, for destroying agricultural pests and insects, all of which have resulted in increased production; and yet the Government has left our farmers without the machinery by which at least a moderate surplus can be carried forward until it is needed.

When we who want to help our farmers propose that the Government should assist them in setting up the necessary marketing machinery we are instantly met with the statement from representatives of certain selfish interests that the farmers should help themselves and that Government aid to the farmers would be the rankest kind of paternalism. That statement, Mr. President, would be more persuasive had the Federal Government not helped, assisted, and protected every other industry in the country.

Through the Interstate Commerce Commission the Government establishes freight rates that will yield the railroads of our country a reasonable profit on their investment, and the farmer must pay the same freight rates on 10-cent cotton as on 25-cent cotton. Through the Federal courts the Government says that gas companies, telephone and telegraph companies, water and light companies, and public utilities of every character are entitled to rates that will yield them 7 per cent profit on the value of their investments. Through the Adamson law, the transportation act of 1920, and the immigration law of 1924, the Government has given protection to organized labor of the country. The tariff law gives protection to the manufacturing interests and forces the farmer to pay tribute on everything he buys from a file to a threshing machine.

Over one-third of a century ago Congressman Kelly, of Pennsylvania, known as "Pig-Iron" Kelly on account of his steadfast devotion to a protective tariff on pig iron, after visiting several sections of the South, said:

> It is the most glorious country upon which my feet or eyes have ever rested. It is to be the coming El Dorado of American adventure. The States south of the Ohio and east of the Mississippi, with their half-million square miles of area, contain in them wealth great enough for a continent, and wealth so vast, so varied in its elements and character, so advantageously placed for development, that these States alone can sustain a population far greater than the population of the United States to-day.

The South produces a world necessity and should be the richest spot on the face of the globe, and yet our farms are plastered with mortgages and our people are impoverished and discouraged. Why? Because our farmers have not received governmental aid and protection. If cotton were produced in the New England States, the ingenuity of northern statesmanship would make the South pay 50 cents a pound for it. The railroads are prosperous. The public utilities are prosperous. Manufacturing is prosperous, and so is organized labor. Why? Because they have been given governmental aid, supervision, and protection. If it is sound public policy for the Government to protect the railroads that haul the farmers' cotton and the manufacturers that spin and weave it, I submit, Mr. President, that it is a sounder public policy for the Government to also protect the farmers that produce the cotton for the protected railways to haul and the protected manufacturers to weave.

A bale of cotton on a farmer's wagon represents just so much of the farmer's labor, and the efforts of the Government to help the farmer get a profitable price for his cotton is nothing more than the efforts of the Government to help him get a little better price for his labor. If it be paternalism for the Government to help the farmer secure a better price for his labor, then why is it not paternalism for the Government, through its commissions and courts, to guarantee a profit to public-service corporations of the country, and through its railway and immigration laws to give protection and help to organized labor in every other industry? England helps her rubber producers, Brazil her coffee producers, and Cuba her sugar producers, but we are told that it would be paternalism for America, the richest country on the face of the globe, to help her farmers, who have been producing at a loss for the last 40 years.

In studying the question of "carry-over" cotton, I concluded that it had much to do with depressing the price of cotton, and it occurred to me that legislation dealing with this question was of the greatest importance. Our cotton year runs from July 31 to August 1, and when it is estimated that there will be 5,000,000 bales of "carry-over" cotton on August 1, the general impression is that all of that cotton is tenderable on contracts of sale under the cotton futures act. This impression is quite misleading because under the cotton futures act only 10 grades of cotton can be tendered on future sales of contract, and most of the "carry-over" is low grade, dog-tail cotton, and does not fall within the 10 grades designated as tenderable cotton under the cotton futures act. And yet, a very large amount of low-grade, dog-tail, untenderable cotton has through the years acted as a lever to pull down the price of high-grade, commercial, tenderable cotton. It has had this effect and has exerted this influence because there has been no classification of the "carry-over" cotton by the Government.

The conclusion is therefore inescapable that it is of the greatest importance to the cotton growers of our country to know exactly the character of the "carry-over" cotton that is on hand in the mills, warehouses, and other establishments in the country on August 1 of each year.

When Congress convened in December, 1926, I introduced in the Senate a measure that authorized and directed the Secretary of Agriculture to make a general survey of all the "carry-over" cotton in the United States on the 1st day of August of each year, and to publish annually statistics concerning the grades and staple length of stocks of the cotton known as the "carry-over" or surplus. In the statistics, to be published by the Secretary of Agriculture, cotton which is tenderable on contracts of sale for future delivery under the law is to be reported separately from that which is untenderable under the law. I am glad to be able to say that I was successful in passing the measure through the last Congress and it received the approval and signature of the President. When the provisions of this law have been complied with, we will know exactly the character of the "carry-over."

When I introduced the cotton classification bill in the Senate in December, 1926, the price of cotton had reached the lowest level since 1921. Cotton farmers, bankers, and merchants throughout the entire South were clamoring for relief. At that time good cotton was selling for 10 cents per pound, but when the Committee on Agriculture of the Senate reported my bill favorably to the Senate, and it had been placed on the Senate calendar, the price of cotton began to advance, and by the time the bill had been enacted into law the price of cotton had advanced 3 cents per pound, or $15 per bale. Far be it from me to say what effect the measure had upon the price of cotton, but Mr. Theodore Price, editor of Commerce and Finance of New York City, one of the greatest experts and authorities on cotton in the world, directed attention to my cotton classification bill at the time it was introduced in the Senate, and is reported to have stated that the reaction to the downward trend of the cotton market was due to that measure.

Since under the provisions of the cotton classification act we are to know the number of bales of low-grade dog-tail cotton in the "carry over" that can not be tendered on contract of future sales under the law, it occurred to me that we should put forth our very best efforts to find new markets for this grade of cotton. I submit that one of the best ways to deal with the overproduction or surplus of any commodity is to bring about an increased consumption of that commodity. Therefore, when the Agricultural appropriation bill came before the Senate last year I secured the adoption of an amendment to it that authorized and directed the Secretary of Agriculture to make a scientific investigation into the potential uses of cotton with the view of bringing about an increased consumption of that great commodity.

Under the provisions of my amendment, the Department of Agriculture has for several months been conducting the investigation, Dr. B. Youngblood, of our own agricultural and mechanics college, having been called to Washington by Secretary Jardine, of the Department of Agriculture, to superintend the investigation.

The investigation shows clearly that bagging made of low-grade cotton is in every respect preferable to the jute bagging. In the first place, the jute bagging does not protect the cotton as well as bagging made of low-grade cotton, because the meshes of the jute bagging are three-fourths of an inch and that much of the cotton is exposed to the weather. Cotton bagging is very closely woven and covers the cotton entirely, and yet it is porous enough to dry if it should become wet. Bagging made of low-grade cotton can be used several times as bagging by being rewoven into new bagging, but not so with jute bagging. As junk, bagging made of low-grade cotton can be used to make towels, laundry bags, rugs, carpets, and so forth, but the value of jute bagging as junk is almost negligible.

The expert authorities of the Department of Agriculture tell us that if we were to wrap the entire cotton crop of the South with bagging made of low-grade cotton instead of jute bagging, and if we would ship our rice, sugar, salt, corn, bran, oats, cement, potatoes, meats, and all other such commodities in sacks made of low-grade cotton instead of burlap sacks made of jute, and substitute the use of cotton manufactured fabrics for jute-manufactured fabrics we would create new markets for 2,000,000 bales of low-grade cotton. Doctor Youngblood and other authorities say that the creation of new markets for the consumption of an additional 2,000,000 bales of low-grade cotton would undoubtedly bring about an increase of 4 cents per pound in the price of cotton, or $20 a bale, above that which our farmers would receive were the new markets for this additional amount of cotton not created.

If these statements are true, why, some one asks, has this situation been permitted to exist? There are several answers to that question. In the first place, our farmers have been led to believe that since they sold their cotton on gross weight and the jute bagging and ties were included in the weight of the cotton, they were therefore being paid for the bagging and ties at the price they received for their cotton; but, as a matter of fact, they have never received one cent pay for the bagging and ties with which their cotton is wrapped. Every farmer who carries a bale of cotton to the gin pays the ginner for the bagging and ties that go around his cotton. Nobody gives the farmer anything. The cost of the bagging and ties enters into the cost of producing cotton just like the cost of chopping, picking, and other necessary items of expense.

On cotton shipped to foreign countries the mills deduct 30 pounds from the gross weight of every bale of cotton, which by trade agreements is called the "tare," and is supposed to represent the weight of the bagging and ties around a bale of cotton. While the cotton merchant pays the farmer for the gross weight of his cotton, which includes the weight of the bagging and ties, the merchant knows that this tare of 30 pounds will be deducted from every bale of cotton that he sells to foreign mills, and therefore he protects himself accordingly and deducts from the price which he pays the farmer for the gross weight of the cotton a sufficient amount to cover this deduction of 30 pounds for tare. Therefore it is clearly evident that the farmer who produces the cotton does not receive one cent pay for the jute bagging and ties that cover his cotton, as is the general impression, but, on the other hand, he actually pays the cost of the bagging and ties.

In the next place, cotton bagging and cotton fabrics can not compete with jute bagging and jute fabrics, because jute is raised in far-away India by pauper labor and is manufactured into burlap and other fabrics by pauper labor. The jute-bagging trust has moved its mills to India in order to take advantage of the cheap labor of that country. The jute mills of India pay their carders 15 cents a day and their weavers, the highest-priced laborers, about 50 cents a day. There is not a bootblack in the United States who does not make more every day than the most skillful weaver makes a week in the jute mills of India. We can not bring about the substitution of cotton bagging and cotton fabrics for the use of jute bagging and jute fabrics unless we raise the tariff to such a point as will exclude jute bagging and jute fabrics from the United States, and we Democrats in the South have been opposed to such a course.

The present tariff law was written by the Republicans; it gives protection to the manufacturing interests of the East and leaves the agricultural industry of the South wholly unprotected. Our farmers are forced to buy in a protected market and to sell in a world-wide competitive market. In other words, the present tariff law places all the burdens of a high protective tariff upon the bending backs of our farmers, while it gives them none of the benefits of protection.

If it were within my power I would revise some of the schedules of the present tariff law downward until relief was given to the farmers of our country, but I do not possess that power. The Republican Party is in control of the legislative and executive branches of the Government, and as long as it continues in power a tariff law can not be written from a Democratic standpoint. If, however, the present high protective tariff law is to remain the fixed policy of our country, I think its provisions should be recast so that the cotton producers of the South will receive some of the benefits of the law and not be compelled to bear all of its burdens.

Mr. President, I am familiar with the agricultural conditions that exist in our country to-day. As a member of the Committee on Agriculture of the Senate I have heard representatives of the farmers describe conditions in the Corn and Wheat Belts of the Nation. I have heard representative farmers tell of the conditions that exist in the cotton States of the South. I have first-hand knowledge of conditions in the rural sections of Texas, because I have been among our farmers and am familiar with the hardships they endure. Over 20 years ago, as an organizer of the Farmers' Union, I visited the remotest rural communities of our State and became thoroughly convinced of the dire necessity of a change in the conditions of our rural life. The impressions made upon my mind have abided with me through the years.

I have seen the farmer's wife place her youngest child on a quilt beneath the shade of a tree and take her place by the side of her husband, plowing in the new ground that was thick with roots and stumps. I have seen her pulling the cotton sack down the long cotton rows early in the morning when the sun had not yet driven the dew from the leaves of the cotton, ruining her health, when she should have been in the home. I have seen the farmer's boys and girls under 10 years of age in the fields chopping corn and cotton when they should have been in school.

Why do such conditions exist in the cotton-producing States of the South to-day? Is it because the white farmers of the South prefer that their wives and children should work in the cotton fields? Ah, no. It is because conditions actually demand it. When the head of the family, together with his wife and children, work in the fields through the scorching rays of the sun and the wintry winds of winter, month in and month out, he then finds it difficult to make "tongue and buckle meet" and too often is compelled to borrow money in the fall with which to pay his taxes. I would be untrue, Mr. President, to the people of Texas, who have honored me with public office for more than 20 years, and I would be false to the very instincts of my nature did I not do everything within my power to bring about a change in these conditions.

When agricultural prices have been stabilized and agriculture itself has been placed upon a remunerative basis by the enactment of the McNary measure into law, our farmers will be happy and contented, because home ownership will have been made possible. Nothing contributes more to the security of the Republic than its homes and the sturdy, patriotic, God-fearing people that constitute its rural population. They are the base and foundation of our country's freedom, the bulwark of its prosperity, the source of its patriotism, and the citadel of its virtues.

Mr. President, behold the strength and glory of the Republic! Not its cities and towns that deck the land like jewels; not its railroads that span the continent from ocean to ocean; not its commerce that floats upon the broad bosom of the seas; not the untouched stores of its virgin wealth that beckon the industry of man—not these—but her six and a third million farmers and ranchmen whose lands spread out in countless valleys and whose cattle range on unnumbered hills—these, sir, constitute the strength and glory of the Republic.

Our farmers and ranchmen are the strong pillars of the Government; they are the men who lighted the fires of liberty and who have kept them burning through the years; they found this land naked and clothed it; they found it hungry and gave it meat; they found it imprisoned in cities and invited it to the freedom of husbandry.

What calling or profession among men can point with such pride to sons who have sprung from such an environment? What nursery has nurtured men of such Spartan mold? From America's rural homes has come the fiber from which the loom of destiny has woven our greatest characters. Would we bring forth in the future sons and daughters worthy to inherit the glorious legends of the past—rear them in the pure air and simple habits of rural life "far from the madding crowd's ignoble strife"? Would we rear a race of patriots? In the short history of our country, the men who have lead the van of freedom's battles have left a plow standing in the field. Would we nourish the principles of religion and virtue? There is not under the shadow of the flag a more consecrated spot than the fireside of the farmer's humble home.

God grant that the time may soon come when the shackles that bind our farmers to industrial slavery will be broken—when the men and women who feed and clothe the people of the United States will walk out into the sunshine of blue heaven, as independent as our Government, as free as the air we breathe, as joyous as the springtime. To this beneficent consummation I consecrate myself to the end of my service in the United States Senate, whether that service be short or long, for I fully realize that—

> Ill fares the land, to hastening ills a prey,
> Where wealth accumulates and men decay;
> Princes and lords may flourish, or may fade—
> A breath can make them, as a breath has made;
> But a bold peasantry, their country's pride,
> When once destroy'd, can never be supplied.

Mr. MAYFIELD subsequently said: I ask unanimous consent to have the colloquies during my address published at the close of the address.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

During Mr. MAYFIELD'S speech—

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield right there?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FRAZIER in the chair). Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. MAYFIELD. I yield.

Mr. HEFLIN. The Senator is talking about the farmer's cotton being manipulated and the price of it fixed by the future exchanges, and he suggests that this ought not to be permitted. I heartily agree with him. Does the Senator know that you can not speculate upon the stock exchange in Pennsylvania Railroad stock unless that company agrees for you to speculate in it? You can not speculate in General Motors stock unless that company agrees for people to speculate in it; but they take the farmer's cotton and speculate in it when he is holding it off the market, hoping to get a profitable price, and he is not consulted at all; and they sell ten times the amount of the crop every season without the farmer ever having any say in it at all.

Mr. MAYFIFELD. That is true. I am hoping that this Congress will pass legislation that will prohibit the manipulation of the prices of farm products in future exchanges. But we must do more than that.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to suggest at this point that the price of cotton goods to-day would justify the farmer in receiving from 40 to 50 cents a pound for his cotton?

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Texas a question? He said he would be willing to yield at the close of his speech.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. MAYFIELD. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. After congratulating the Senator on his splendid address, of which I very strongly approve, getting back to the bill itself, I desire to ask as to his view regarding the time when the equalization fee is to be paid. When is it to be levied and who is to levy it? Who fixes it, who determines it, and when and how is it to be paid? That seems to be a very important matter for consideration in connection with the bill.

Mr. MAYFIELD. Mr. President, my understanding is that the amount of the fee would be determined by the board, and in the case of cotton that it would be collected by the agent of the railroad.

Mr. FLETCHER. For the use of the board, I take it?

Mr. MAYFIELD. Yes.

Mr. FLETCHER. And the board is to determine the time when the surplus that is protected by the equalization fee is to be disposed of and the price at which it is to be sold?

Mr. MAYFIELD. That is correct.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I wish to offer for the RECORD some communications which I have received on the subject of the pending measure. I shall not ask to have them read, but merely to have them inserted in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The communications are as follows:

ILLINOIS BANKERS ASSOCIATION,
Chicago, February 20, 1928.

To the Members of Congress:

Being firmly convinced that the agricultural situation is one that ought to have definite action at this session of Congress, the executive council of the Illinois Bankers Association passed a resolution indorsing the McNary-Haugen bill, as approved by the American Farm Bureau Federation.

Illinois is an agricultural State. Seventy-five per cent of its banks are in daily contact with those who operate farms. The bankers, therefore, feel that they have an intimate knowledge of the situation and that there is a disparity between agriculture and industry because of an artificial stimulation to the latter by prior Federal legislation. We can not hope for continued prosperity with agriculture being obliged to sell its products on a world basis, coming in competition with foreign markets, and to buy in the home markets benefited by a protective tariff.

We respectfully ask you to help enact the McNary-Haugen bill.

M'NARY-HAUGEN FARM RELIEF BILLS

DEAR SIR: Referring to Senate bill 1176 (McNary bill), House bill 7940 (Haugen bill), creating a Federal farm board, advisory council, revolving fund, etc., as well as a clearing house and terminal marketing association for cooperative associations' product.

We feel that this bill or any similar one would be a terrific mistake, and that the bill in question is not only basically wrong in principle but practically impossible to satisfactorily be placed in operation on a practical scale. In writing this we express not only our own feelings but that of a large group of growers who market their tomato crop in this territory through us.

We are speaking in particular as far as the bill refers to fresh fruits and vegetables. Our reasons are, we feel, well founded on a considerable number of years' marketing experience, and should you so desire we will be pleased to outline them in some detail; but unless you care to go further into the matter we will not burden you with these details.

Sincerely trust, however, that you will see your way clear to not only vote against this bill but to use your personal influence against it.

Very truly yours,

E. W. LINS, Sales Manager.

THE ARNOLD FRUIT CO. (INC.),
Jacksonville, Fla., March 21, 1928.

HON. D. U. FLETCHER,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: One of the associations to which we belong called to our attention the fact that apples are included in the products to be regulated by the bill known as the McNary-Haugen bill. The secretary of this association writes that recently, while in Washington, several Senators and Representatives expressed a real desire to hear from their constituents with their opinions in regard to this bill. I am taking the liberty of writing to you to express mine.

My objections to the bill in regards apples are:

First. Apples sold in export market are neither the size nor varieties which are wanted by the domestic trade.

Second. The bill is not wanted by successful apple growers who raise quality fruit and usually get satisfactory prices.

Third. Dumping on foreign markets a surplus bought by a Government board, which would probably know little, if anything, of apple handling, would disrupt the present export business in apples which it has taken years to build. It would prevent foreign buyers from coming here, as they now do, with their money, purchasing a large percentage of the apple crop. They would not purchase when prospects were that their market would be glutted with improperly graded and undesirable fruit bought by the equalization board.

Fourth. The law would tend to increase the production of poor, off-grade fruit, especially by persons with political influence, who could sell their poor production at good prices to buyers for a political board.

Fifth. All attempts to interfere with natural laws of economics have proved a failure. If the farmers did not have to buy tariff-protected goods, they would not need help. If the farm-loan banks did not provide cheap money for a lot of nonfarmers to grow crops for domestic consumption (tomatoes on our east coast, for instance) those farmers who were capable could make a very successful living without protection or help.

Sixth. If Congress really wants to help those farmers, the price of whose products depends on world markets, why not put a bonus on exports? This would directly increase the farmers' price the amount of the bonus, as domestic users would have to pay the foreign price plus the bonus or not get the goods. This, domestic users, protected by tariff, should be able to afford if the contentions of high protectionists are true.

Very truly yours,

H. V. ARNOLD.

HON. DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR FLETCHER: This organization is very much interested in the Haugen bill (H. R. 7940), particularly the provisions thereof in regard to loans to cooperative organizations. We think it vital that something should be done along these lines and the provisions of the bill should be such that there would be no question of our being able to avail ourselves of them.

We would, therefore, ask that you kindly keep us advised of the situation as it concerns the passage of this legislation, with suggestions as to anything we might do to assist. If you think it advisable at any time for a member of our organization to come to Washington, we should be very glad to have someone go there.

Yours very truly,

AMERICAN FRUIT GROWERS (INC.),
SANFORD DIVISION,

Senator DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR FLETCHER: Referring to Senate bill No. 1176 and House bill No. 7940, known as the McNary-Haugen farm relief bills, we are of the opinion that it would be impossible to apply the provisions of those bills to perishable products, such as fresh fruits and vegetables. Owing to their perishable nature, these products can not be classed with staple crops like wheat, corn, and cotton and should be treated separately.

There is not only a multiplicity of fruit and vegetable crops, but there is a multiplicity of varieties, grades, and sizes within each crop. Some varieties and grades may be suitable for temporary storage, while others must go into immediate consumption, and some may be suitable for export while others (in fact, the bulk of the crops) would not. The enforcement of the provisions of these bills would be very difficult, if not impossible, without working a hardship on fruit and vegetable growers.

The tax which these bills would impose can not, in our opinion, be applied equitably. The best varieties and grades would bear the burden which might even result in the encouragement of undesirable production. Furthermore, the apple growers of New York State, for example, can largely market their crops within the State and avoid the tax, while the Virginia growers must necessarily ship the bulk of their crops in interstate and foreign commerce, and therefore be subject to taxation.

We respectfully request that in the interest of the fruit and vegetable growers of the South you endeavor to have these bills so amended as to exclude fresh fruits and vegetables. We shall greatly appreciate whatever you can do in this connection.

Yours very truly,

AMERICAN FRUIT GROWERS (INC.),
W. M. SCOTT, Division Manager.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. COUZENS in the chair). Sixty-six Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART] is recognized.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Iowa yield to me to present a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield.

CHILD HEALTH DAY

Mr. BARKLEY. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 89, which is on the calendar.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. May the joint resolution be reported?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the joint resolution.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 89) designating May 1 as child health day was read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, may I ask if the joint resolution has been reported from a committee?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes, sir; it has been reported favorably from the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. BORAH. Is the effect of the joint resolution to make May 1 a legal holiday?

Mr. BARKLEY. No, sir; it is not. There is no appropriation and no effort to make any legal holiday. It simply calls attention to that day as a suitable day in the year to promote child health.

I will say that this joint resolution is backed and requested by practically all the civic organizations of the United States, including the Federation of Women's Clubs, the Red Cross, the Boy Scouts, the American Federation of Labor, and some 25 or 30 similar organizations throughout the country.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I have no desire to object to a joint resolution which merely results in displaying the American flag upon a particular day, if that is what it is; but I do object if it has, or is intended to have, the effect of creating a legal holiday.

Mr. BARKLEY. It does not do that; and I will say to the Senator that I would not be for it myself if that were the effect of it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, as I understand, this is not one of those measures which call for "the old flag and an appropriation."

Mr. BARKLEY. No, sir.

Mr. BRUCE. I should like to ask the Senator what is the constitutional authority of Congress with regard to the matter?

Mr. BARKLEY. The same constitutional authority that it has to adopt a joint resolution setting apart a certain Sunday to be known as Mother's Day by proclamation of the governors of the States. There is no inhibition in the Constitution against it.

Mr. BRUCE. No, there is not; that is undoubtedly the fact; but I can not see that Congress has any constitutional power to pass such a joint resolution, and I thought possibly the Senator could point to some such power.

Mr. BARKLEY. It has adopted similar resolutions with reference to other matters. This is not going to do any harm to the Government. It is simply a recognition of that one day in the year which all the patriotic associations desire to devote to the promotion of child health.

Mr. BRUCE. What attracted my attention was the fact that the joint resolution proposes to have Congress set aside a day for this purpose, and thereby interferes with the domestic life of the States.

Mr. BARKLEY. No; the State health authorities and many of the governors of the States have written me urging that this joint resolution be passed as an encouragement to their efforts in the States.

Mr. BRUCE. I must admit that it is not a very violent interference with the States.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I should like to know what authority the President of the United States has to go into the States and recommend to the people of the States that they shall display the flag. If the governors of the States or the legislatures of the States want to set aside a child-health day, there can be no objection; I would be quite in favor of it.

Mr. BARKLEY. There is no specific constitutional provision that authorizes anything of the sort, but certainly there is no constitutional objection to it. The President issues a proclamation with reference to Thanksgiving, which is made a legal holiday; he issues proclamations about other days that are observed; and I can think of no worthier object for a national day of observance, not as a holiday but simply to call the attention of the whole people to the desire for cooperative and patriotic efforts along this line.

Mr. KING. Undoubtedly the States and the people within the States have plenary power over those matters. I agree entirely with the Senator from Maryland that this is merely one of those movements in the interest of this irresistible plan to have the Federal Government——

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, if this matter is going to lead to debate I must ask that it be withdrawn.

Mr. BARKLEY. I hope the Senator will not object, because the States are doing this now; but they are asking that it be recognized all over the country as a universal day, so that all the States may cooperate in its observance.

Mr. KING. I think it is a very improper thing for the governors of the States to importune Congress to help them set apart a particular day for observance within their own States.

Mr. BARKLEY. This merely contributes to the uniformity of observance.

Mr. KING. Uniformity is not what is desired. There is too much uniformity. There is too much of the stereotyped in our educational system and everything else. If we had a little more differentiation and less uniformity in this country, it would be far better for us.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah object?

Mr. KING. I do not object, but I shall vote against the joint resolution.

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield if it does not lead to debate.

Mr. BLEASE. It will lead to debate, because I am going to speak against the joint resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator object to the immediate consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. BLEASE. If the Senator from Iowa objects to taking up his time, I object to its immediate consideration.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I did not desire to take the Senator off his feet for a long discussion of this matter; and for the present I will withdraw the request.

Mr. BARKLEY subsequently said: Mr. President, I renew my request for the consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 89, designating May 1 as child health day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution had been reported from the Committee on Education and Labor with an amendment, in section 2, page 2, line 10, before the words "child health day," to strike out "May day," so as to make the joint resolution read:

Whereas the quality of the adult citizenry of a country depends upon the opportunities for wholesome development provided in childhood; and

Whereas in order to secure such well-rounded development it is essential that provision be made for a year-round child-health program; and

Whereas the concentration of the public mind on the necessity of such a year-round program can be effectively achieved by setting aside one day for this purpose as "child-health day": Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That the President of the United States is hereby authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling upon the Government officials to display the United States flag on all Government buildings, and the people of the United States to display the flag at their homes or other suitable places on May 1 of each year, in order to awaken the people of our country to the fundamental necessity of a year-round program looking toward the protection and the development of the physical and the mental health of our children.

SEC. 2. That May 1 shall hereafter be designated and known as child-health day and that it shall be the duty of the President to request its observance as provided in this resolution.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

FARM RELIEF

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3555) to establish a Federal farm board to aid in the orderly marketing and in the control and disposition of the surplus of agricultural commodities in interstate and foreign commerce.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. COUZENS in the chair). Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. I wanted to ask the Senator in charge of the bill a question which he can answer by a simple yes or no, perhaps; I do not want to take the time of the Senator from Iowa if it can not be answered in a word. As I read the bill, and as I understand it, so far as the legal propositions relative to the equalization fee are concerned, there is no change in the pending bill from the former measure.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I said yesterday in discussing the bill that there had been some amplification in the declaration of policy, which, in my opinion, strengthened it, so far as its basis being the commerce clause of the Constitution was concerned, to that extent, and to that extent only.

Mr. BORAH. Very well.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, at this time I desire to discuss briefly only the matters that will be in issue between the bill as offered by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY] and the substitute which I have offered myself.

First, I want to describe something of the size and the magnitude of this proposition. I think we are all agreed that, so far as marketing farm products is concerned, the control of the surplus in the United States is the important proposition. That is not all of the farmer's troubles, by any means. That is only a fraction of the cause of the present agricultural situation. But I will confine my discussion to that proposition, and that alone.

First, I look upon that proposition as if it were one big American farm. As far as Congress is concerned it is our farm, and we are producing a surplus, and that surplus is depressing our domestic market. The problem for us is to control that surplus, so that we can get our cost of production plus a reasonable margin of profit, to which all business is entitled. I hold that that is fundamental in this question.

What is the size of this surplus, to begin with? We are exporting, on an average, about $2,000,000,000 worth of farm products every year. Those products are not altogether in the condition in which they left the farm. A considerable portion has been processed. Perhaps it was about $1,200,000,000 in value, according to the present price, as it left the farm. The other $800,000,000 was added by the processes of manufacture in one way and another. The biggest addition in value is to livestock products, through the packing companies.

We as a Congress have this $2,000,000,000 surplus to handle, to dispose of, to remove from the domestic market if it is not going to depress the domestic market. I think we are all agreed that if prosperity returns to the farm, it must return by giving the farmer a better price in the domestic market than he has in the world market, upon the same basis that manufacturers, by the protective tariff, are given a higher price level in the United States.

That being true, the first question we will have to determine is as to how much finance will be necessary to handle this surplus. I think in handling that surplus, too, we must consider the effect of our method of handling it upon the world market itself. I think it would be disastrous, for instance, to take cotton and dump it into the world market for any sort of price we might receive at the dumping time. The same is true of wheat, and, in fact, of all farm products.

I think it will be conceded by anyone who has studied the world market in wheat that the Canadian pool has not only stabilized but has advanced and raised the world market for wheat. Yet the percentage of wheat placed in the world market by Canada is far below the percentage of cotton placed in the world market by the United States. However, the percentages would not be far apart if the Americans had a pool, and would join their surplus wheat, cooperate, as it were, with the Canadian pool, and seek the same means of improving the world market for wheat.

Therefore I have proceeded to figure out my substitute on the theory, not that we would dump these surplus products into the world market as our manufacturers sometimes have done with their surplus, but that we would hold the surplus to improve the world market itself.

Let us see about cotton. We are exporting over half of the cotton we produce in the United States. I am not sure as to the proportion that is in the world market, but I think it is over 60 per cent. The Senator from Idaho [Mr. GOODING] says it is 65 per cent. If that be true—and it is substantially true, I have no doubt—then it is apparent to Congress, as the big farmer producing 65 per cent of the world's exportable cotton, that the moment we collect that cotton together under one agency, properly financed, that moment we will be in substantial control of the world market.

Of course, if we advance the price unduly and unreasonably, the world will look for substitutes, and we will fail; but if we ask merely our fair cost of production, or average cost of production, and add to it, as I have done in this substitute, a demand for a 5 per cent return on the farmer's capital investment, the world will pay that price, and there will be no occasion for one dollar's loss upon the handling of the cotton surplus of the United States.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield gladly.

Mr. KING. The Senator indicated that with 65 per cent production of cotton in the United States, if that were controlled by one agency in the United States, it would control the world price. Does the Senator think it a wise thing for a corporation to have such tremendous power? I recall a few months ago when it was charged that Great Britain controlled the rubber output, and we announced it as a great crime, and there was tremendous agitation in the United States against the monopoly of Great Britain, and the evils which it was alleged resulted.

What I want to ask is this: Does the Senator believe it is wise—and I am asking for information, to get the Senator's view—to aid in the creation of a world monopoly, or of a monopoly in the United States, that could fix the price, particularly of a commodity that is so essential to the life and the welfare of the people as cotton or wheat or corn or pork is?

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, I think the Senator's question is a very proper one, and a very important question. I am glad to point out the way I have treated that in my substitute.

Unless that power is defined and controlled, it should not be granted to any board, and I have defined it and controlled it in this way, by holding that price down to a level where it will yield only a 5 per cent return on the investment in the cotton farms of the United States. That is the strongest, the surest, the easiest, and the most successful regulation that can be written into any law. That is the cooperative limit. It is the cooperative idea that controls capital earnings wherever cooperation is practiced in the world.

A great argument is made here against any bill that contains a provision for Government price fixing. I want no Government price fixing, but I do want price fixing according to the honest and fair cost of production, and every business in the United States, every successful business in the world, fixes its prices in that way.

I want to say, further, to the Senator that the principle was unanimously approved by the Corn Belt committee in its session when I was present, but the leaders who have formulated the pending bill have refused to stand for that idea, which the farm organizations back home have ordered them by their resolutions to put into the bill. So, instead of price fixing, according to the cost of production, as all business fixes its prices, the McNary bill provides for the fixing of a price according to competitive conditions as they exist at the time.

I did not think anybody could write a farm bill that I would ever vote against, but unless we can get rid of that idea in the McNary bill, I think I shall have to vote against it.

On page 12 the wording is this:

> The price at which a surplus or any part thereof is to be purchased or disposed of under any marketing agreement shall not be fixed in such agreement, but all such purchases and disposals shall be made subject to the prevailing competitive conditions of the markets in which they occur.

That is exactly what we have now. Those are the conditions that have stricken down agriculture, and driven it into bankruptcy.

To illustrate, I hold in my hand a Sheaffer pen. Everybody in these times knows the Sheaffer fountain pen. Walter A. Sheaffer was a schoolmate of mine, and I have known him all my life. I saw him in August of last year, and he held up one of these pens and said to me:

> I am now the biggest manufacturer of pens in the United States. I am producing 20 per cent of all the fountain pens used in the United States. I have a plant and a force of people here at Fort Madison, Iowa, producing these pens. I put on a steady stream of production the year around each year in order to keep my plant and my force efficient, and I produce each year about 10 to 15 per cent more pens than I can sell in the United States. I do not let that surplus affect my market in the United States, because I have certain tariff protection on the ingredients used in these pens, and I have more patent protection against all the world. Therefore I box up my surplus and send it abroad. I sell most of it in Canada, without profit, at a lower price level than I am able to get in the United States.

Steel is doing the same thing, aluminum is doing the same thing, and on yesterday even the Senator from Indiana quoted President Gary, of the United States Steel Corporation, to that effect in reference to steel products.

Mr. Sheaffer said to me:

> The American farmer is the one big producing manufacturer in the United States producing a surplus of only about 10 per cent, not more than I do of my pens, but that little surplus in the main is going abroad, is sold in the competitive markets of the world, its price is fixed by that sale, and the price is cabled back to the cotton exchange or the board of trade, and fixes the price of the whole product in the United States, the same less the expense of reaching the foreign market.

Mr. Sheaffer said, and I think fairly, and I think the manufacturers of the United States ought to see this farm problem in the same way, that agriculture can never again have prosperity in the United States, until agriculture, like the manufacturing industries, can have an American price level independent of and above the world price level.

I agree with that analysis of this situation, and I have formulated my substitute with some idea of the size of the proposition to bring about that result.

Let us take cotton. That is the biggest item of export. The President said in his veto message on the other bill that $250,000,000 was not enough to handle cotton alone, and he was right. At the time of the big surplus I estimated that it would take $500,000,000 to handle that surplus alone.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield.

Mr. HARRIS. I would like to know how much would be provided under the bill of the Senator from Oregon? The way some of us understand it, there will only be $25,000,000 provided, and the President in his veto message said, as the Senator has just remarked, that $250,000,000 was not enough for cotton alone.

Mr. BROOKHART. I would prefer that the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY] should answer that question, if he will.

Mr. MCNARY. The bill provides for a revolving fund of $250,000,000. How much would be used for cotton alone would be controlled by the judgment of the board. The sum of $25,000,000 is permitted for the purpose of furnishing and establishing facilities to be used by all cooperative organizations producing any of the basic agricultural products. I do not know what amount would be used, but it is in the nature of a revolving fund, and the turnover would be very quick some years, and some years not so rapidly, but the board would use enough money to take care of the cotton proposition.

Mr. BROOKHART. What is the $25,000,000 for?

Mr. MCNARY. For the purpose of acquiring facilities in connection with the cooperatives.

Mr. BROOKHART. And not for marketing itself?

Mr. MCNARY. No.

Mr. BROOKHART. Is $250,000,000 enough? I say it is not. There is plenty of evidence to prove it is not enough to handle the proposition. It took $500,000,000 to handle wheat alone during the war. I have on my desk now Mr. Hoover's report of the amount of capital used. It will not take more than one-third that much for wheat in peace times, but on that basis it would take $500,000,000 to properly handle cotton in peace times.

How would the cotton proposition be handled? According to the provisions of my proposed substitute, the Department of Agriculture will ascertain, as it does now, the average cost of production of cotton for five years. I have provided some additional rules that they shall follow in their figuring of the cost of production. Their present methods are not adequate because, first, they allow no adequate compensation to the farmer for his work. They take simply the prices given him, which are very small indeed. Second, they allow no depreciation of his soil and they allow no depreciation of his buildings, of his work animals, and his breeding animals. By my bill I would provide that they should allow those elements in fixing the cost of production and shall allow him a capital return of only 5 per cent.

Let us suppose we had had this $500,000,000 and had gone out to buy the big surplus of cotton two years ago. We would have bid directly to the farmers themselves that cost of production and capital return price. That would have taken up the surplus and would have raised the domestic price to that level, 24 or 26 cents, or whatever it might figure out. We would have left on hand in the corporation that surplus to be disposed of in the world market.

But the Senator from Idaho [Mr. GOODING] has said that we are producing 65 per cent of the world's cotton. I think we are exporting something over 60 per cent of the exportable cotton of the world. Having this cotton on hand in the hands of a single agency, what would be the situation? There are about 50 agencies now exporting cotton, competing with each other in selling cotton in the world market, naturally beating down the price of cotton, which is the effect competition has on the selling side of cotton. But here is one agency, and it is financed how? It is like Mr. Ford in that it is its own banker. It does not have to borrow any money and it does not have to sell to pay any back. It then says to the world, "The cost of producing this cotton was so much, and we want a 5 per cent capital return."

The world will pay it. I agree with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] in his statement on yesterday that there would be no dollar of loss on cotton if it were handled in that way in the United States. There would be no equalization fee required to take that up. The Senator from South Carolina thought that cotton stood alone in this regard.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. As I understand the Senator's proposition, it is to hold the cotton which we are going to control until the price represents 5 per cent upon the investment?

Mr. BROOKHART. That is substantially the situation.

Mr. BORAH. I am interested to know how we would determine the amount of investment in producing the entire cotton crop.

Mr. BROOKHART. I have provided in my substitute bill that the Department of Agriculture shall determine the average cost of production for the preceding five-year period. I do not want it based on any one seasonal situation, because the seasons vary so much, but a five-year average is a good basis. They are doing that now, but they are not allowing the farmer any greater compensation than his price gets him, which since 1920 has been considerably less than $700 a year for the work of himself and his family. I have provided in the bill that they shall figure in enough additional to give him a reasonable compensation for his work and his management of the farm. I think no one will dispute that right. They have not allowed a depletion of the soil which occurs. They have not allowed depreciation of the buildings, fences, breeding animals, and work animals on the farm, and that occurs.

I have directed in my substitute bill that the Department of Agriculture add in these elements and determine from them the average cost of production. They take from the census figures the capital investment. That is not Government price fixing. That is price fixing by the facts of the situation. Then this institution, which I have authorized from Government funds up to $1,500,000,000, goes and bids to the farmer that average price, making due allowance, of course, for the difference in freight charges to the world market at Liverpool, exactly as was done in that proposition by the Grain Corporation during the war. That being bid to the farmer, everybody knows it will benefit the farmer. It will not benefit cotton exchanges or any other middleman anywhere else. It will benefit the cotton farmer.

Since 60 per cent of the cotton which the world buys comes from the United States, there is no place else to get it. Unless that price is made unreasonable, they will pay this cost of production and 5 per cent return, and we need to have no dollar of loss, no equalization fee, nor anything else in it to make up losses in that operation.

The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] said that cotton stood alone in this regard, and I want to comment briefly on that suggestion. Cotton does not stand alone. Let us take wheat and get the size of the wheat proposition. There is not much difference. I have only the figures for five years, 1918 to 1923, the latest I could get. The United States furnished 36 per cent of the exportable wheat of the world during the average of those five years, and Canada furnished enough more to make 55 per cent of all the exportable wheat of the world.

Mr. BORAH. That was since the war?

Mr. BROOKHART. Yes; since the war.

Mr. BORAH. Prior to the war we were shipping abroad only about 90,000,000 bushels of wheat a year.

Mr. BROOKHART. The amount of exportable wheat of the world is not so very great. In those days it was something like 225,000,000 bushels, as I recollect. I can give the Senator the exact figures if he desires them.

Mr. BORAH. What I was thinking about was that when we come back to the conditions which prevailed prior to the war with reference to production in foreign countries, we will not be exporting 200,000,000 bushels of wheat, as we are now.

Mr. BROOKHART. That is true. The point I was bringing out, in order to make a comparison of wheat with cotton, was that the United States and Canada together are furnishing 55 per cent of the exportable wheat of the world. That is more than half of all the wheat that all the countries export. Argentina, Australia, New Zealand, Russia, and all of them together only export about 45 per cent. The United States and Canada export 55 per cent.

Canada has already organized a very efficient wheat pool and, as I have said, if we study the world market of wheat before and since that pool, even the small percentage that Canada has been able to handle by withholding and not dumping in the world market at unseasonable times, has actually stabilized and improved the world market for wheat. As soon as we are in condition in the United States to join with Canada in that pool, and it is to our interest to cooperate in it, the two of us together can have as much influence and naturally will have as much influence on the world market for wheat as the United States alone could for cotton, and could have complete control of the world market for both wheat and cotton within reasonable limits.

I am not able at this time to give the exact figures and percentages of the other farm crops. Cotton and wheat are the two largest export items, the two big propositions on which we might have a loss in the operation of this surplus corporation, but there should be no loss as we have seen.

Livestock products and pork products come next, and then the others are smaller on down the line.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BROOKHART. Certainly.

Mr. KING. I would like to ask the Senator what machinery is set up under the provisions of his bill to prevent the increased production of those commodities taken over by the Government? It would seem to me that if we start out with the premise—and that seems to be the principal characteristic of the Senator's bill—that there must be a 5 per cent return upon the capital invested by the farmer; and if it be true that they are not making, as the Senator contends, anywhere near that amount now upon their investment, there will be a great encouragement in agriculture. There will be a large increase in exports in these agricultural products. How are we going to restrain production?

The bill offered by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY] has a provision by which that is largely limited, but if I understand the Senator from Iowa, and I am asking for information, his scheme does not contemplate a restriction in production. It seems to me that if we guarantee a return upon the capital investment, and that means, of course, allowing the farmer and those who work with him a reasonable wage, there would be a great encouragement for increased agricultural production and, therefore, a large exportable product. How does the Senator deal with that question?

Mr. BROOKHART. The Senator has asked another very vital question. I think oftener than any other we have heard the argument that a plan of this kind would stimulate overproduction. I believe even the President in his veto message said that in the end it would damage the farmers because of the overproduction. Again I want to get the facts surrounding the question of production, and when we get them I think it will show that overproduction would be the least of our troubles and the least of our dangers. So far as the provision in the bill of the Senator from Oregon is concerned as it relates to production, it simply provides that the board, when it finds farmers producing too much, can stop operations. They will never find it, so far as that is concerned.

But there is no danger of overproduction. I will say to the Senator from Utah that if we applied this bill of mine to wheat alone or to cotton alone or to livestock products alone there would be, while it was applied to wheat, an overproduction of wheat, while it was applied to cotton there would be an overproduction of cotton, and while it was applied to livestock there would be an overproduction of livestock, because wheat growers would quit wheat and go over to cotton, they would quit livestock and go over to cotton or over to wheat, one from the other. That is what happened to some extent as a result of the stimulated price of wheat during the war. But if we take care of all these products on the same basis, then they will go ahead exactly as they are now; there will be no advantage in changing from wheat to corn or to oats or to cotton or to livestock or to any other product, because the same protection, the same situation will apply to all. The only overproduction then will be a general overproduction, if it shall occur.

Now, I wish to read a statement as to the facts surrounding production, and I take them from the National Industrial Conference Board report. To begin with, that board is certainly not a farmer's board. I will give it credit, however, for making a fair statement of facts, even if it never has suggested any remedy for the facts it has discovered. On page 78 of its report of 1926——

Mr. KING. Is that the Nagel report?

Mr. BROOKHART. It is the National Industrial Conference Board report. Mr. Nagel represented this board in conjunction with the United States Chamber of Commerce in a report on this subject, but for some mysterious reason or other he forgot the facts this board had dug up and found in its original report, although those facts were just as true then as they now are. They have been true all the time. I now proceed to read them:

> These considerations are emphasized in the case of the United States. The increase in agricultural production during the war period and the "surplus" in the postwar years were in large part only apparent. The marked growth of cereal exports during the decade 1913–1922 was not the result of a sudden expansion of the per capita area of land in crops. From 1900 to 1925 the trend of crop acreage per capita was downward, and in the period 1919–1922 the per capita acreage in 12 principal crops was 10 per cent less than for the period 1899–1903.
> The "surplus," which has in large part been the source of agricultural depression since the war, was partly the result of an increase in the acreage of cereals, especially wheat, at the expense of other crops, and partly due to the falling off in domestic demand in 1920–1922. The average in the five cereals in 1919–1922 exceeded that of the pre-war period, 1909–1913, by about 23,000,000 acres, of which wheat accounted for more than 18,000,000 acres. This increased acreage was made possible by a reduction in that used in producing for domestic uses, especially for feeding livestock. From the pre-war period, 1909–1913 to 1919–1922, the per capita acreage employed in producing for domestic consumption declined nearly 6 per cent.
> Most of the acreage thus economized was diverted to increasing the production of wheat under the stimulus of high prices and of patriotic appeal during the war period. But even during that time the per capita production of the major crops taken together was not markedly higher than pre-war. The average for the five-year period 1915–1919 was 0.4 per cent lower, and that for 1920–1924 was 4.8 per cent lower than the average of the pre-war period 1910–1913. The apparent surplus was due partly to the shifting of the balance of production and partly, as will be seen later, to the decline of effective domestic and foreign demand in 1920–1922.

The acreage in wheat, however, has been rapidly returning to normal. Although in 1923 it was still 27 per cent larger than the average of the five years before the war, and in 1924–25 it was about 11 per cent higher than pre-war, in view of the population increase in the past decade, this indicates a definite tendency toward readjustment of supply and demand.

This readjustment, however, has been accompanied by disturbance and distress which illustrate both the importance and difficulty of control of production.

That is why the bill of a year ago would have been a very bad thing, because it included only a part of the farm products. These bills include them all, and the readjustment or shifting back and forth of production will not occur under them.

After new land, some of it range, was broken up and put into wheat, houses built, livestock and implements purchased, and debts incurred, it was not easy to let the land go back to pasture or to shift it to other uses.

I saw some very pitiable conditions of that kind in Wyoming and other Western States.

In large areas of the Northwest the process has simply meant abandonment of land and equipment. Moreover, as has already been pointed out, the transference of a relatively small proportion of the acreage in one of the major crops to a minor crop is likely to result in overproduction of the latter, while the output of the farmer is relatively little affected. The subtraction of 10,000,000 acres from the corn area, for instance, and its transfer to potatoes or other small crops, might easily double the production of some of these. Thus, even though the total acreage in crops is kept under control, the shifting of acreage as between the various branches of production under the influence of price changes may upset the equilibrium of agricultural income.

One of the greatest evils of all is the presence of conditions that do upset that equilibrium.

All evidence points to the fact that the apparent surplus of cereal products, due to reduction in the per capita acreage of land employed for producing livestock for domestic consumption, and to the overexpansion in the per capita acreage of wheat and rye at the expense of other crops, has merely obscured temporarily the increasing scarcity of land in the United States in relation to domestic demand. Under the gradual operation of economic forces some degree of adjustment of production, at least in respect to acreage put into the major crops, has undoubtedly taken place in the United States. Data given in the preceding chapter show that the acreage in farms in proportion to total population—has declined almost steadily since 1860 from 13 acres per capita to 9 in 1920. The per capita acreage of improved land has declined steadily since 1890 and is now about the same it was in 1850. The per capita acreage of land in crops has declined since 1900 and is now below the point at which it was in 1880. These declines in acreage were offset up to about 1900 by an increase in yield per acre of the nine principal crops, but since that time the yield per acre has shown no increase, and in consequence the per capita production of the principal crops, as charts 3 and 4 indicate, has shown a tendency to decline almost steadily since 1900. The number of livestock per capita has declined to about 30 per cent since 1893. The wheat acreage has undergone a great reduction since 1920.

In general, therefore, as to the outlook in respect to production in the United States there appears to be progressively less likelihood of overexpansion in the future than there has been in the past. Practically all the readily available land for crop production and pasture is now in use. Extensions of acreage are likely to be largely at the expense of pasture and otherwise only at increasing cost. As has been seen in comparison with other lines of activity, agriculture by and large is not so profitable under normal condition that there is any great incentive to extend the margin of cultivation, extensively or intensively, much beyond the requirements to be determined by demand. The average farmer and his family under present conditions are working so hard, and the overhead charges for interest and taxes are so high, that stabilization or even moderate increases in prices would hardly be likely to stimulate any considerable general overexpansion of acreage or production.

I think that is the best statement of facts that has ever been promulgated upon the question of production, and I think the facts are indisputable.

Mr. President, the new McNary-Haugen bill is different from the old McNary-Haugen bill, the one with which I first became acquainted. That first bill provided an appropriation of $200,000,000 and a thousand million dollars additional by bond issues to handle the exportable surplus. That was the McNary-Haugen bill that I learned to love and that the farmers learned to love. But now, where has that $1,200,000,000 of Government capital gone? It has been pared down to $250,000,000 with which to handle a $2,000,000,000 a year exportable surplus. It can not be done.

The Senator from Oregon in his explanation says we will start out by lending the $250,000,000 to cooperatives. I wish to review the history of loans to cooperatives. We established a War Finance Corporation which was to lend money to cooperatives. I talked to-day with Mr. Meyer, who managed that corporation, and he told me that there was no limitation on the amount that could be loaned, that the War Finance Corporation could have loaned all the cooperatives asked for, that it did loan in one year about $120,000,000, and the amount loaned could just as well have gone to a billion if the cooperatives had been organized and had asked for the loans. That project failed. What effect did the lending of money through the War Finance Corporation have upon the agricultural situation? What did it do to the farmers who were losing their homes? It sent them right on into bankruptcy; it did not succeed.

Then there was devised another money-lending plan. We created the intermediate credit-bank system. Under that system, already established, Mr. Meyer also pointed out to me to-day that we can lend the farmers $600,000,000. So this thing of lending money to cooperatives has failed twice and failed when it had a wider margin and a bigger backing. Now it is proposed to have it succeed with a paltry $250,000,000 behind a $2,000,000,000-a-year surplus crop.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield.

Mr. KING. I hope I understand the Senator correctly; and if I do so understand him, it is his view that progressively the production for export will decrease. He read a statement to that effect from a book and pronounced the statement one of the soundest that has been promulgated, and stated that he indorsed it. If the amount produced for export is to be progressively less, then why will not the amount provided in the McNary-Haugen bill be sufficient? Why would it not be adequate if the Senator's bill, which provides nothing, as I understand, directly for the handling of exportable surplus, meets the situation?

Mr. BROOKHART. The Senator has not read my bill; he has not stated its provisions correctly. My bill provides fifteen hundred million dollars directly for handling the surplus crops.

Mr. KING. By the issuance of bonds?

Mr. BROOKHART. Yes.

Mr. KING. But the original appropriation——

Mr. BROOKHART. The original appropriation is only $250,000,000. It is the purpose of the bill to employ the additional money only as it may be needed. I do not want it appropriated at one time. I want to follow the original McNary-Haugen idea, and so my bill provides a sum only a little bit greater than that bill provided in the beginning. In my bill I have increased the amount which would be available, while the proponents of the old McNary-Haugen bill have decreased the amount.

Mr. KING. But if the organization that is to be created, whether under the Senator's bill or under McNary-Haugen bill, is to handle only the surplus, and the surplus is to be progressively less and less each year, it does seem to me that the amount required to handle that surplus would not be as great as contended by the Senator and would be met by the provisions of the McNary-Haugen bill.

Mr. BROOKHART. The trouble with that proposition is that in spite of all this declining that I have read to you, the surplus still remains about $2,000,000,000 a year. It runs, I think, from $1,800,000,000 to about $2,200,000,000. We will have to start with the proposition of handling a $2,000,000,000 surplus on an average, and it will decline in the next 10 or 20 years, and perhaps by the end of 30 years it will be gone and we will have no surplus problem; but 30 years is a long time to stay in bankruptcy.

Mr. President, I want to congratulate the Senator from Oregon on the fairness with which he has presented his bill. He made no extravagant claims. He admitted that this money-lending proposition, which has already failed twice, might not succeed.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCMASTER in the chair). Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. In regard to this loaning of money to cooperatives, the intermediate credit banks were organized for the purpose of loaning money to farm cooperatives and farmers through banks, all owned by the Federal farm land bank.

Mr. BROOKHART. Yes.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. A great deal of money was loaned, and now I—and I take it for granted other Senators—am being solicited to support a proposition to relieve these banks of their liability for guaranteeing to the Federal land bank the principal of the money advanced by the Federal land bank to these country banks to loan to farmers. This paper is now frozen paper, I am informed by people who write to me, and unless the Federal land bank assumes the liability or the Federal Government assumes the liability the banks that hold this paper will have to be closed. The various State departments of banking will close the State banks, which are loaded up with this frozen paper originally covered by loans through the intermediate credit-bank system. Now, as a matter of fact, if the liability of the local bank is removed by legislation, some one else will have to pay. Either the stockholders of the Federal land bank will have to pay or the Federal Government will have to appropriate money to reimburse the land bank for the money that is lost in these loans. That will be a form of subsidy.

I wanted to call that to the Senator's attention.

Mr. BROOKHART. I think the Senator is right on that; and I also think that this argument that the McNary bill is not a subsidy and that my substitute is a subsidy is without foundation. The McNary bill itself is a subsidy. It is based on a subsidy principle, because $250,000,000 of Government money is handed over for use. That revolving fund, so far as its use is concerned, is a subsidy and it is on the subsidy principle.

I am not frightened, however, by this subsidy argument. We have had some experience with subsidies in the United States before. This is not the first time that we have had talks of subsidy. I remember a railroad bill in 1920—the transportation act. There are a number of Senators here who voted for that bill. That bill provided that for the first six months we should guarantee out of the Treasury of the United States the operating expenses and the war-time return, as the railroads had received that return during Government operation. Yesterday I asked the Interstate Commerce Commission for the figures as to how much subsidy we had paid to the railroads on that guaranty, and I have it here. It is $529,278,911.51, and we still owe them $250,000.

By the terms of the transportation act we went into the Treasury of the United States and paid that subsidy to the railroads to guarantee the war-time profits of those roads the first six months after they were turned back. We not only did that but in order to make sure that there would be a deficit under that guaranty those roads increased their operating expenses the first year after we turned them back by $1,485,000,000, nearly a billion and a half of dollars. They only claim $600,000,000 of that to be increase in wages, and the other is increase for reasons that I can not state this afternoon; and because of that situation we paid this subsidy.

I listened to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] saying that this bill of the Senator from Oregon is not a subsidy, and that he is opposed to subsidies; but the Senator from Indiana was the principal promoter and supporter of this railroad bill that paid more than half a billion dollars of subsidy to the railroads of the United States. He had no scruples against subsidies when it came to the railroads.

Some one says, "But the Government took over the railroads, and it did not take over the farms." The Government did take over the wheat, however; and the Government surrounded cotton and all of the other staple products with such conditions of price fixing that it virtually fixed the price and took over all of the farm products during the war. I think no one will dispute that. I have here Mr. Hoover's report on the operations of the wheat corporation during the war. I just got that yesterday, fresh up to date. In the Government operation of this wheat corporation they had a profit of $59,000,000, and that is safely tucked away in the Treasury of the United States. So it is wrong, it would appear, to pay subsidies to the farmers; the Government must collect profits from them; but it is all right for the Government to pay subsidies to the railroads, because they are controlled by the big Wall Street financial crowd.

As a measure of comparative justice, at least, I have provided in my substitute that the Government shall pay the losses of this export corporation up to $600,000,000. That is just a little over the sum total of what the Government did for the railroads and took from the farmers.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator anticipate that there will be a loss of $600,000,000 under his bill which will be a charge upon the Treasury of the United States?

Mr. BROOKHART. Not in any one year. I do not anticipate a loss of $100,000,000 in any one year.

Mr. KING. Is that loss to be indefinite; that is to say, are we to have an annual deficit, which is to be met by resort to the Treasury of the United States?

Mr. BROOKHART. It stops when the $600,000,000 is reached.. If it takes 10 years to reach that amount, it will take 10 years to reach the stopping point.

Mr. KING. Having reached the momentum which it will reach in 10 years and the absorption of $600,000,000 of loss, does the Senator think we will be able to resist that momentum and stop the subsidy from being continued indefinitely?

Mr. BROOKHART. I assume that we will be able to do our duty, whatever it is.

Mr. KING. If it is our duty to pay $100,000,000 a year deficit now for 10 years, will not the duty be increasingly greater after that period, because the people will have been accustomed to it, and we will have encouraged them to believe that they are going to get that subsidy every year?

Mr. BROOKHART. We have found that this surplus is declining every year, and perhaps in 10 years it will be reduced until the loss will be small. The senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] has indicated to me that there need be no loss in the operation of this corporation if it is properly financed and properly managed, which it ought to be.

However, I will not stop there. I want to make this comparison complete..

We gave $500,000,000 to the railroads. There are only one-seventh as many people interested in the railroads as there are in the farms; and, valued as the farms are, there is considerably less than one-third as much capital in the railroads as there is in the farms. If we would do proportionately as much for agriculture as we have done for the railroads since they were turned back in 1920 we would pay $3,000,000,000 out of the Treasury of the United States, and I know that would run this export surplus corporation until we had no surplus.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. Without attempting to draw invidious comparisons between the railroads and agriculture, because I think whatever duty the Government owes to either should be performed impartially, is it not true that in the last six years it has been estimated that the loss in the value of property by the farmers of the country and the loss in the value of their products has amounted to more than the estimated value of all the railroads in the United States?

Mr. BROOKHART. I think the Senator is correct. The Manufacturers Record puts the total farm deflation at $32,000,000,000, and that is about as much as the railroads even claim in value. It puts the loss of other business at $18,000,000,000. That is the Manufacturers Record, a high authority and a fair authority, I think. That means that the farmers are deflated about six times as much in proportion as the other business of the country; and the deflation of that $18,000,000,000 was on little business and not on big business. The deflation was also timed so as to hit agriculture in October, when the crops were matured, when the whole year's crop was ready for market; and therefore it hit agriculture harder than it did the other lines of business.

Mr. President, without going into the details of the working out of these two bills—I do not care so much about that; I will not debate about details, except to get them efficient—I think I have stated the big propositions that are at issue.

First, the McNary bill is wholly inadequate. Two hundred and fifty million dollars will not under any conditions handle this proposition, and it is worse than useless to go out to finance this surplus with an inadequate supply of funds. We will be defeated, and it will be lost as surely as we try it. In the next place, if that is not enough, we will try that out and squander that $250,000,000, and then we will go to an equalization fee. I want to ask the Senators from the South how their cotton farmers will be able to pay an equalization fee before their price is raised. This lending did not raise the price before, and it will not do it again, and they are not going into this equalization fee until after the $250,000,000 is used up in lending to cooperatives. Then they come along the first thing with an equalization fee, and the farmer does not then know what price he will get for his cotton. I say it is unsafe and unsound. It is just as unsafe and unsound for the wheat farmers of the North.

If we are going to handle this proposition, I want to handle it as any business man would handle it if it were his single proposition. The United States is the big farm of this Congress. This big $2,000,000,000-a-year surplus is the big surplus the Congress should handle, and since it has given this advantage to the railroads by law, by enactment of Congress; since it has given an advantage to every protected manufacturer in the United States by law, by tariff enactment; since it has given an advantage to the banking industry of the United States by creating a governmental reserve bank, controlled and operated by the Government, a board appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate; since it protects the patented industries of the United States by law; since it fixes the value of every public utility by law, and fixes a return of at least 7 per cent, and that when the American people are producing only 5½ per cent; I say, since the Government has done these things for all these industries, it owes it to agriculture to go into the Treasury of the United States for that whole three thousand million dollars to make right the wrongs it has done.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, I would like to inquire of the Senator from Oregon if it is proposed to continue debate on the pending measure this afternoon. Are any other Senators ready to speak?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I shall very gladly yield to the Senator from Colorado, the unfinished business being temporarily laid aside for the consideration of the District appropriation bill.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. PHIPPS. I yield.

FATE OF POSTMASTER AT DOUGLAS, GA.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I send to the desk an article appearing in this morning's Washington Post, and ask that it be read by the clerk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

POSTMASTER LAID DEATH TO FORCED G. O. P. GIFTS—HAD TO PAY $2,000 TO KEEP JOB, SUICIDE'S LETTER DECLARES—COMMITTEEMAN IS NAMED

DOUGLAS, GA., April 2.—Charges that the Republican Party exacted donations from him that had driven him into debt and that "they are still claiming more" were made by L. S. Peterson, Democratic postmaster here for more than 12 years, in a letter written shortly before he shot and killed one of his clerks and committed suicide yesterday. The shooting took place just after Peterson had been relieved of the post by a recently appointed successor.

Peterson, who received an annual salary of $2,700, said that these contributions amounted to more than $2,000 over five years and indicated they had been demanded in return for patronage under which he was permitted to retain his position.

His letter, addressed to his brother, J. H. Peterson and read at the coroner's inquest, also charged he had been "framed" by two employees of the post office, one of whom, J. E. Kirkland, was his victim.

"The Republican Party has pulled me for over $2,000 in the last five years," he wrote, "and they are still claiming more now. Thomas W. Overstreet, the inspector, and Elton Kirkland, money-order clerk, are to blame for it all. They have framed me. These donations are responsible for my financial condition. What they have taken away from me is why I am in debt to-day."

Authorities made public a letter found in Peterson's pocket, in which he was directed to send money to R. H. Johnson, postmaster at Ocilla, Ga., to be sent in turn to Ben J. Davis, negro Republican national committeeman for Georgia in Atlanta. It was dated September 27, 1927, but bore no signature.

Peterson, who was first appointed by President Wilson, did not elaborate on his charges against Kirkland and Overstreet. Friends said he and the former had been in disagreement for some time.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, other than the press report, the details in this case I do not know. I do know that some few days ago a shortage was reported by a post-office inspector in the Douglas, Ga., office. The shortage was alleged to be $214, I believe, to be exact. The Postmaster General issued an order removing Mr. Peterson, and I am not disposed at all to criticize the Postmaster General. I talked with him, and in the circumstances he was quite within the discharge of his duty in issuing the order of removal and in the appointment of an acting postmaster. It is not about that matter that I wish to speak.

Mr. Peterson was an honorable man, and held office during three separate administrations. He was personally known to me. I am prepared to accept the statement made by him, and contained in a letter to his brother, referred to in this press dispatch. But beyond that, it is known in my State, and has been known for several years, that the Federal employees not only are required to make contributions, under the guise of campaign contributions, in order to obtain Federal office, but that month by month and year by year during their continuance in office they are compelled to continue those contributions.

In this particular case Mr. Peterson says that over the five-year period last past he has contributed a total of $2,000 to the Republican organization in Georgia, though his salary as postmaster was but $2,700 a year.

My colleague the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS] and myself many months ago specifically directed the attention of the Postmaster General and of the Attorney General to conditions which were undoubtedly known to exist in my State. There was an investigation, through the regular channels, by these two departments of the Government, but beyond deterring for the time being those responsible for this condition of affairs, nothing came of it.

Incidents like this bring very forcibly to the attention of the country and to the Senate of the United States conditions that exist at least in certain of the Southern States.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. BRUCE. Was this man a third-class postmaster?

Mr. GEORGE. I am not sure whether the office is second or third class. It is on the border line between third and second class; I think it is second class.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. Were these contributions made during the postmaster-generalship of Mr. Will Hays?

Mr. GEORGE. I was not then in the Senate, and I am not familiar with what went on then.

Mr. BARKLEY. If it turns out that that was true, in view of the fact that he seemed to have had an elastic supply from another source, does not the Senator think he ought to have let this poor fellow off?

Mr. GEORGE. This particular postmaster, I will say to the Senator, held office during the administration of former Postmaster General Will Hays.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, I will say that we have at the present time pending in the Senate a bill to subject fourth-class postmasters to competitive examination. The idea of that bill is to place them within the classified service.

Mr. GEORGE. Yes; I am familiar with that.

Mr. BRUCE. A very fair test as to how successful the Senator will be in arousing indignation in the Senate against the abuse he has mentioned would be the extent to which Senators may be disposed to vote for legislation of that kind.

Mr. GEORGE. I fully agree with the Senator's observation. Mr. President, this condition is not a new one. It has been brought to the attention of the Senate many times before, but it is a condition that should not exist in the United States. It is a sad commentary upon free institutions when important public offices are thus peddled about, and when the very tenure of office itself is dependent upon continuous and enforced contributions to a State committee, a party committee, whether that party committee be Democratic or Republican or what not.

It is, of course, most difficult to prove the exact state of affairs existing in any particular State at any particular time with reference to Federal patronage. But incidents of this kind serve to confirm what all informed men and women within the State believe to be true, and serve to confirm the conviction that public offices are, in effect, sold and that many are compelled to make contributions after they get in office in order to retain office.

Some time ago I was at pains to find out exactly the number of postal employees in my State who had been reported short in their accounts. The percentage was alarming, and the condition is due to but one fact and that is the exaction made of the appointee before or at the time of appointment, and the continuous exaction thereafter as long as the appointee remains in office. The matter is of tremendous importance. It is vastly more important than much legislation which we consider here on the floor of the Senate, because it involves the very integrity of our Federal system within the States, certainly in the South, so far as I am informed.

Mr. President, my colleague and myself have again renewed our request for and will insist upon a thorough investigation by the Post Office Department and the Department of Justice. We would like to proceed in the regular and orderly way because the Government ought to be able to rid itself of these reprehensible and disgraceful practices and conditions. But if we can not obtain through those channels results to which we are entitled, we shall certainly come to the Senate and ask for a most searching investigation by some committee of the Senate.

Whether the money goes to any political party, whether all of it actually reaches the hands of the Republican committee in the State, or whether all of it actually reaches the hands of any particular Republican Party official in the State, if the sum of the exactions made of Federal officeholders in my State alone was known that total would be fairly staggering to all decent men and women in the country.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator whether I am correct in thinking that it is a criminal offense for one Federal officeholder to collect money for political purposes from another? My recollection is that the civil service laws make it so. Of course, it is not so easy to discover such a fact.

Mr. GEORGE. It is a criminal offense, as I understand, for anyone, Federal officeholder or not, to demand of a Federal officer in or about his place of business the payment of money for campaign purposes or for other purposes political. Partly as the result of an investigation which was carried on upon the demands of my colleague and myself some two or three years ago, an additional statute was enacted which requires an appointee to a Federal office, before taking office, to make affidavit that he has not paid any money to procure the indorsement of any person or for the appointment itself. But the Senator realizes how difficult it is to find the facts and submit them to the department in each case.

Mr. BRUCE. We would have to have the investigation the Senator mentions in order to get at those facts.

Mr. GEORGE. Of course, the Senator realizes that a Senator can not himself occupy the position of a private detective. If he should undertake it his entire time would be consumed in that process.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I merely wish to say that I agree with all that my colleague has said about the sale of Federal offices in Georgia. From my knowledge of conditions I would say that instead of this case being an exception it is the rule. Ninety per cent of the post-office appointments, I believe, are sold in my State, and I do not believe the money ever goes to the Republican National Committee. I know something about expenditures of the men in charge who handle the money, and I feel sure that they are handling it for their own personal use.

My colleague and I, as he stated, for several years have brought this condition to the attention of the Attorney General and the Postmaster General. I have the very highest regard for the Postmaster General, as all of us have who were associated with him here in the Senate. I wish he would go into the matter as well as the Attorney General, whom we are both asking now to investigate the conditions which are just as bad as they can be. Such conditions are a disgrace to the Republican Party, but the negro national committeeman who controls these appointments cares nothing about that.

As my colleague stated, I introduced a resolution a year and a half ago to investigate the sale of offices down there. The charges can be proven without any doubt, but the investigation was held up in the Judiciary Committee because of the opposition of former Senator Ernst, of Kentucky, who was then a member of that committee. Something must be done to prevent such methods being used in these appointments and my colleague and I will leave nothing undone in remedying matters.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATIONS

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, I ask that the pending unfinished business be temporarily laid aside and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 11133, making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia and other activities chargeable in whole or in part against the revenues of such District for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to laying temporarily aside the unfinished business? The Chair hears none.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I would like to inquire of the Senator if he will be willing, in the event the bill, other than the item of which I am about to refer, shall have been concluded before the usual time for adjournment, to postpone until to-morrow the consideration of the 60-40 provision. There are a number of Senators absent.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, I would be quite willing to do so. I feel that, perhaps, it would be the proper procedure, in view of the fact that there are many Senators absent to-day. Yet it is desired to go ahead in the regular manner with the ordinary provisions of the bill, and this appeared to have been a rather favorable time to get the bill up for consideration.

Mr. KING. I share the views of my friend from Colorado, and am very glad to join with him in asking that we proceed with the consideration of the bill, other than the item to which I have referred; but if we shall conclude all the other items in the bill by 4 o'clock or half past 4, I shall ask that the consideration of that item go over until to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

Mr. PHIPPS. I ask that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, that the bill be read for amendment, and that the committee amendments be first considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 1, after line 2, to strike out "That in order to defray the expenses of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, any revenue—not including the proportionate share of the United States in any revenue arising as the result of the expenditure of appropriations made for the fiscal year 1924 and prior fiscal years—now required by law to be credited to the District of Columbia and the United States in the same proportion that each contributed to the activity or source from whence such revenue was derived shall be credited wholly to the District of Columbia, and, in addition, $9,000,000 is appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be advanced July 1, 1928, and all the remainder out of the combined revenues of the District of Columbia and such advances from the Federal Treasury as are authorized in the District of Columbia appropriation act for the fiscal year 1923, namely," and in lieu thereof to insert:

That in order to defray the expenses of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, 40 per cent of each of the following sums, except those herein directed to be paid otherwise, is appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and all the remainder out of the combined revenues of the District of Columbia, and the tax rate in effect in the fiscal year 1928 on real estate and tangible personal property subject to taxation in the District of Columbia shall be continued for the fiscal year 1929, namely:

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, that is the matter which it has been suggested shall go over for consideration to-morrow.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be passed over, without objection.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "License bureau," on page 5, line 5, after the name "District of Columbia," to strike out "without paying the license tax named in paragraph 32, section 7, of the District of Columbia appropriation act approved July 1, 1902, subject to the proviso contained in said paragraph," so as to read:

For personal services in accordance with the classification act of 1923, $17,820; temporary clerk hire, $1,500; in all, $19,320: Provided, That hereafter no person shall practice phrenology in the District of Columbia.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Office of corporation counsel," on page 5, line 24, after the figures "1923," to strike out "$50,840" and insert "$53,420"; and in the same line, after the words "in all," to strike out "$58,340" and insert "$60,920," so as to read:

Corporation counsel, including extra compensation as general counsel of the Public Utilities Commission, $7,500, and other personal services in accordance with the classification act of 1923, $53,420; in all, $60,920.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator in charge of the bill the reason for the increase in this item.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, there has been a transfer from this department to another department which gives an increase on the face of the item, but it is compensated for by the displacement of three policemen, as will be seen when we come to another section of the bill. It means a better organization and a better allocation of the duties, and in cases where work is now being done by three policemen it will hereafter be performed by three civilian clerks at lower rates of pay.

Mr. KING. I hope I have not in view the item that the Senator does. I was calling attention to the item relating to the corporation counsel's office and am now wondering what policemen would have to do with that office.

Mr. PHIPPS. This item comes under the head of "Information department and stenographic service."

Mr. KING. In the corporation counsel's office?

Mr. PHIPPS. Yes; that is correct.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Office of superintendent of weights, measures, and markets," on page 6, line 15, after the figures "1923," to strike out "$41,045" and insert "$43,685," so as to read:

For personal services in accordance with the classification act of 1923, $45,685.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 6, line 19, to increase the appropriation for maintenance and repairs to markets from $6,000 to $7,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 6, after line 19, to insert:

For repairs, alterations, additions, and purchase and installation of equipment, Western Market, $50,000.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, with respect to the item just stated, and items on pages 20 and 21, I would like to ask the Senator to make an explanation in view of the fact that the District of Columbia Committee two or three days ago recommended, as I recall, a bill carrying an appropriation of $35,000 for sheds and for a temporary market. Do they relate to the same thing?

Mr. PHIPPS. No; that related to the produce market, which item would not be properly taken into this bill. That is an authorization which has not yet reached the stage of the Budget estimate. However, the items we are caring for in this item are those relating to the Western Market in the neighborhood of F and Twentieth Streets. The roof is absolutely gone beyond repair, the brick walls need pointing up, and the refrigerators are in a disgraceful condition. They need a proper refrigerating system there. The market should be maintained. We have added $1,500 in one item and $50,000 to provide a new iron roof and a refrigerating system.

The market has been a little more than self-supporting, and with the installation of modern refrigerators the rentals or receipts from those having their use will be increased so that it will prove a real investment.

Mr. KING. I would like to ask the Senator whether, in view of the fact that we have an acute controversy here with reference to the southwest and the mid-city or Patterson tract for the location of the market, the ground for which may cost from $300,000 to $600,000, and perhaps more, for the building, the District ought to continue appropriations for these other smaller markets in various parts of the city? Is it the idea of the Senator and of the Committee on Appropriations that that should be done?

Mr. PHIPPS. It is. I think if the Senator had been with the committee when we visited the Western Market he would have been convinced that it is necessary to maintain the market. It is well patronized. It is attractive in appearance. It is well kept, and the only thing about it at the present time is that the buildings are so old that the roof has failed, and the old refrigerators, which are really nothing but wooden ice boxes, should be replaced with modern appliances.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the subhead "Office of the director of traffic," on page 9, line 12, after the figures "1923," to strike out "$25,940" and insert "$31,280," so as to read:

For personal services, in accordance with the classification act of 1923, $31,280.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Recorder of deeds," on page 11, line 13, after the figures "1923," to strike out "$92,500" and insert "$96,000," so as to read:

For personal services, in accordance with the classification act of 1923, $96,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 11, line 19, after the word "postage," to insert "rest room for sick and injured employees and the equipment of and medical supplies of said rest room"; and in line 21, after the word "expenses," to strike out "$14,500" and insert "$15,000," so as to make the paragraph read:

For miscellaneous and contingent expenses, including telephone service, printing, binding, rebinding, repairing, and preservation of records; typewriters, towels, towel service, furniture and equipment and repairs thereto; books of reference, law books and periodicals, streetcar tokens, postage, rest room for sick and injured employees and the equipment of and medical supplies for said rest room, and all other necessary incidental expenses, $15,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 30, after line 7, to insert:

Northwest: For widening to 50 feet and repaving the roadway of H Street from Seventeenth Street to Pennsylvania Avenue, $30,000, and those portions of Public Act No. 688, Sixty-ninth Congress, making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year 1928, approved March 2, 1927, which appropriated $10,000 for widening and repaving this street from Seventeenth Street to Eighteenth Street, together with the provisions therein in respect to the assessments of the cost of said work are hereby repealed.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, in view of the amendment on page 29 for widening and repaving the roadway of Connecticut Avenue, and so forth, I would be glad to have the Senator in charge of the bill state what his understanding is that the future program is to be with respect to the widening of streets and the uprooting of trees which have added so much to the beauty of the city.

I suppose I have received a hundred letters within the past three weeks and I have had visits from a large number of residents of the city protesting against what they call the vandalism of the destruction of the trees along the city streets and the widening of those streets. They claim that the beauty of the city is being greatly marred and that it looks as though an attempt were being made to make Washington a commercial city rather than a capital. Many such criticisms come from residents of Washington as well as from those who visit the Capital City. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee whether it is the plan to widen many more streets; and if so, whether it is the purpose to continue the destruction of the trees upon some of the choicest avenues and streets of the city?

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, the particular item providing for an expenditure of $65,000, and another small item in the bill, will practically complete the widening of Connecticut Avenue, which is a main thoroughfare and which has been changed from a residence street to a business street. Fortunately, that avenue was wide enough to admit of narrowing the sidewalks and adding to the main roadway.

The street-widening operations in Washington, I think, are nearing an end. It is my opinion that the widening should not be further encouraged, and that it should only be resorted to in business sections in the case of business streets, where it is necessary to have greater width of roadway in order to accommodate the traffic. Traffic is increasing right along. That condition naturally comes with the increase in population, and I assume with a further increase in the number of automobiles, even without an increase in population, we shall still have more and more of a congested situation, which is largely brought about by the practice that has grown up of parking automobiles along the public highways. Perhaps it would be impossible to find sufficient covered space in the city in all the buildings that could be made available to house the automobiles now in use, but it does seem a pity that the main thoroughfares and the beautiful residential streets of this city should be used as all-day and all-night garages. It detracts from the beauty and the appearance of the city. It is too bad that it has been found necessary to widen some of the streets and sacrifice the old trees that were on them, in order that automobiles might still park along the sidewalk and allow the traffic to move in the center of the street.

I am in accord with the Senator from Utah in feeling that we should restrict the operation of further widening streets and avenues in so far as possible. While I have not had a thorough discussion of the matter recently with the Commissioners of the District or the authorities having the streets and highways in charge, it is my impression that we are about at an end of that kind of activity. I certainly trust that we are.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I am very glad to receive the assurance of the Senator from Colorado. I know he has given more attention to the condition of the streets, and, indeed, to the general condition of the District of Columbia, than has any Senator on the committee, and his judgment upon these matters I regard as very important.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 31, at the end of line 12, to strike out "$200,000" and insert "$290,000," so as to read:

The next amendment was, under the subhead "House of detention," on page 58, line 7, after the word "detention," to strike out "of children under 17 years of age and, in the discretion of the commissioners."

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from Colorado to allow that amendment to go over until the amendment on page 73 shall be disposed of. I really should like to have it go over until to-morrow if the 40-60 amendment shall go over. I do not want to raise a point of order against the amendment on page 73, but if that amendment is to be acted on to-night, I should be inclined to make a point of order against it.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, I should have no objection to having both items, that is, the amendment on page 58, line 7, and the amendment on page 73, beginning in line 21, in reference, respectively, to the house of detention and a reception home, or whatever it may be called, for children, passed over. I ask that those items may go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendments indicated will be passed over.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator in charge of the bill if he intends to insist on a vote on the amendment on page 73? Several Senators have spoken to me about it. I have not as yet received the information I should like to obtain in reference to the item, but there is considerable opposition to it.

Mr. PHIPPS. It is my intention to secure further information on the subject. I had thought that the two items as they now appear in the bill modifying the House language would open the way for the entire question to be taken up and considered in conference. It is rather a long story, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. CURTIS. Then let the amendment be passed over to-night.

Mr. PHIPPS. It may be passed over to-night, and I will be glad to talk it over with the Senator.

Mr. CURTIS. I thank the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. PHIPPS. Some of the information I have asked for, I regret to say, has not as yet reached me, although it was promised by noon to-day.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator from Kansas if he objects to the disposition of children who may have been arrested in a different manner from that obtaining in the past? The Senator knows that the Board of Public Welfare was created after years of earnest study by persons who were deeply concerned in social welfare and the care of children. A great many have felt, as I have felt, that it is wholly improper to let policemen and policewomen have charge of little children, but that they ought to be cared for in a suitable place.

Mr. CURTIS. I agree with the Senator that they should be cared for in a proper and safe place and not be kept with criminals.

Mr. KING. They should not be kept under police surveillance.

Mr. CURTIS. I happened to be in charge of the bill when the original provision was made for taking care of children who might be arrested and for segregating them from criminals. I am advised that they are not now detained in places where they can come in contact with criminals, but are otherwise taken care of; that if this amendment goes in the bill, the situation will not be relieved, but that by the end of the year perhaps a change can be made that will be beneficial. I have not all the facts; I should like to gather them. I am just as anxious to see children properly taken care of as is the Senator from Utah, and, having proposed the original provision relating to the subject, and having had put in the bill the item to remodel the old building that was used for the purpose of providing for children who might be detained, I was asked to look into this item.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, my position is that while children may be arrested by policemen or policewomen, after their arrest, if they are to be held in custody for any considerable length of time, they ought not to be under the control of policemen or policewomen, but there ought to be a suitable home or place for them.

Mr. CURTIS. Under the charge of a matron.

Mr. KING. Under charge of a suitable matron.

Mr. CURTIS. I agree with the Senator as to that.

Mr. KING. They ought not to be under the influence of policemen or policewomen or be regarded as being under such control. I have favored the establishment of a suitable home or place for children who may have been taken into custody by policemen or by policewomen.

Mr. SACKETT. The Senator understands that the amendment proposed by the committee would do that?

Mr. KING. Exactly; and I am in favor of it.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 58, in line 16, after the word "expenses," to strike out "$14,000" and insert "$8,000"; and in line 17, after the figures "1923," to strike out "$15,780; in all, $29,780," and insert "$6,480; in all, $14,480."

Mr. PHIPPS. All the amendments on page 58, from line 6 to line 22, inclusive, relate to the subject which has just been discussed, and should be passed over. The amendment beginning in line 23, however, should be acted upon, because it has to do with quarters for the health department clinics. The item is eliminated at this point in the bill, but is reinserted at another point.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendments referred to by the Senator from Colorado will be passed over.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 58, after line 22, to strike out:

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 70, line 6, after the word "services," to strike out "$8,720" and insert "$8,920"; and in line 7, after the words "in all," to strike out "$9,220" and insert "$9,420," so as to read:

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 70, at the end of line 10, to strike out "$29,300" and insert "$29,704," so as to read:

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PHIPPS. This is the amendment which it has been agreed shall be passed over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment will be passed over.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the subhead "Reformatory," on page 78, after line 5, to insert:

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I invite the attention of the Senator to that amendment.

Mr. PHIPPS. I shall be glad to explain it.

The large increase here is detailed on the following page. This increase includes $100,000 for the improvement of the Meridian Hill Park, which was entirely omitted from the estimates, although it had been recommended by the commissioners. It also includes an increase of $32,000 for the improvement of the Rock Creek and Potomac Parkway, which raises that to the estimate, and $5,000 for a comfort station at Seventeenth Street and Pennsylvania Avenue.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, with respect to the Meridian Hill Park, I think there has been too much delay in the completion of that splendid part of our city. If we had completed it several years ago, instead of doing the work by piecemeal and by sections, it would have cost less and we would have had the benefit of the park long before this.

Mr. PHIPPS. I regret to say that even at the rate of $100,000 a year it will take three years more to complete the work.

Mr. KING. In view of that statement, I should favor a larger appropriation to complete it, if that could be used.

Mr. PHIPPS. They could not use more than that. We have given them all that they feel they can use to advantage, because some public-spirited people are going to put about $100,000 of their own into the park in the way of a monument.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 91, line 5, after the word "exceeding," to strike out "$93,000" and insert "$125,000," so as to read:

The next amendment was, under the heading "National Capital Park and Planning Commission," on page 93, line 4, after the word "binding," to strike out "$600,000" and insert "$1,000,000"; and in line 6, after the word "than," to strike out "$150,000" and insert "$400,000," so as to make the paragraph read:

For each and every purpose requisite for and incident to the work of the National Capital Park and Planning Commission as authorized by the act entitled "An act providing for a comprehensive development of the park and playground system of the National Capital," approved June 6, 1924, as amended, including not to exceed $100 for technical books and periodicals, not to exceed $40,530 for personal services in the District of Columbia in accordance with the classification act of 1923, and the act approved April 30, 1926 (44 Stat. L. 374), and not to exceed $3,500 for printing and binding, $1,000,000, to be immediately available and to remain available until expended: Provided, That not more than $400,000 of this appropriation shall be available for the purchase of sites without limitation as to price based on assessed value and that the purchase price to be paid for any site out of the remainder of the appropriation shall not exceed the full value assessment of such property last made before purchase thereof plus 25 per cent of such assessed value.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the heading "National Zoological Park," on page 94, line 4, after the word "periodicals," to strike out "$180,250" and insert "$182,050," so as to make the paragraph read:

For roads, walks, bridges, water supply, sewerage, and drainage; grading, planting, and otherwise improving the grounds, erecting and repairing buildings and inclosures; care, subsistence, purchase, and transportation of animals; necessary employees; traveling and incidental expenses not otherwise provided for, including maintenance and operation of one motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicle required for official purposes; not exceeding $2,500 for purchasing and supplying uniforms to park police, keepers, and assistant keepers; not exceeding $100 for the purchase of necessary books and periodicals, $182,050, no part of which sum shall be available for architect's fees or compensation.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That completes the committee amendments, except those passed over.

The reading of the bill was concluded.

COL. CARL L. ESTES—OUACHITA NATIONAL PARK

Mr. MAYFIELD. I ask unanimous consent to have published in the RECORD a telegram from Col. Carl L. Estes to the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY].

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The telegram is as follows:

TYLER, TEX., April 2, 1928.

UNITED STATES SENATOR T. H. CARAWAY (ARKANSAS),
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The presidents of the three Tyler banks and following ministers of the gospel in my home town sign this statement to-day: "We the undersigned ministers of the gospel in Tyler, Tex., unhesitantly state that Col. Carl Estes, newspaper man of this city, is a truthful, upright citizen and that you may depend upon what he says as being the absolute truth": Rev. C. M. Raby Marvin, Methodist Church; Rev. James Ulmer, First Christian Church; Rev. Robert Hill, First Presbyterian Church; Rev. J. T. McNew, First Baptist Church; Rev. W. N. Claybrook, Episcopal Church; Rev. Floyd Aten Bostick, Baptist Church; Rev. M. Faber, rabbi Temple Bethel; (Joseph M. Haddad, grand knight of the Knights of Columbus, signed this statement in the absence of Father Sampari, rector of the Catholic church) Gus F. Taylor, president Citizens' National Bank; Sam R. Greer, president Peoples' National Bank; C. J. Brogan, president Tyler State Bank & Trust Co., signed statements vouching for my truth and veracity. Please have this read into the RECORD, as the Associated Press in the Southwest leaves me branded as a liar. Please show to Senator MAYFIELD. Original statements with signatures mailed to you to-night. Man named Clark Greer was not in Secretary Work's office during the interview, as stated in press dispatches to-day. Remember, I stand ready to return at any moment. By all means hold on to that copy I gave you of the letter which Capt. J. F. Lucey, Hoover's campaign leader in Texas, wrote to Lawrence Richey, one of Mr. Hoover's aides there in Washington. We are going to need that thing very badly, unless I miss my guess.

COL. CARL L. ESTES.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

TUESDAY, April 3, 1928

The House met at 12 o'clock noon and was called to order by the Speaker pro tempore, Mr. TILSON.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, who wert and art and evermore shall be, bless us with all fullness of grace, might, and redemption. We are weak and full of doubts. Do Thou defend, guard, and be between them and our need. Never allow our steadfastness and confidence to abate. Overcome our fears, our tendencies, and our compromises, lest we be judged unfaithful to our sacred vows. Let no harsh or unwise word mar the good we might do here. In spite of old sins, old failures, and old sorrows, may all of us take new heart with this new day and begin again. We breathe our prayer of praise and gratitude to the God of our fathers.

We wonder what day of the week, we wonder what night of the year when the messenger shall call. He has come and one has answered the summons. He has fallen in the strength of his years. O God, we beseech Thee to bestow the blessings of peace and consolation upon all the sorrowing ones. So teach us to number the days that we may apply our hearts unto wisdom. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its principal clerk, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 359. An act authorizing the presentation of the iron gates in West Executive Avenue, between the grounds of the State, War, and Navy Building and the White House, to the Ohio State Archeological and Historical Society for the memorial gateways into the Spiegel Grove State Park; and

H. R. 5721. An act authorizing E. M. Elliott & Associates (Inc.), its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Ohio River at Augusta, Ky.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

H. R. 4115. An act for the relief of Winfield Scott;

H. R. 4116. An act for the relief of W. Laurence Hazard; and

H. R. 4117. An act for the relief of Harriet K. Carey.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed a joint resolution, a concurrent resolution, and bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. J. Res. 97. Joint resolution authorizing the President to appoint three delegates to the Twenty-third International Congress of Americanists, and making an appropriation for the expenses of such congress;

S. Con. Res. 13. Concurrent resolution to pay the necessary expenses of the joint committee appointed to represent Congress at the unveiling of the Stone Mountain Monument at Atlanta, Ga., on April 9, 1928;

S. 805. An act donating Revolutionary cannon to the New York State conservation department;

S. 2542. An act for the construction of a private conduit across Lincoln Road NE., in the District of Columbia; and

S. 3791. An act to aid the Grand Army of the Republic in its Memorial Day services, May 30, 1928.

FILING OF CERTAIN REPORTS AND MINORITY VIEWS

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I am under instructions from the Committee on Foreign Affairs to report out House Joint Resolution 259 this afternoon. I ask unanimous consent to be permitted to file the report up to midnight to-day.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to have until midnight to-day within which to file a report upon House Joint Resolution 259, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I make a similar request with reference to filing the report upon House Joint Resolution 262.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CLARKE. Mr. Speaker, it is my understanding that the majority report upon the Haugen bill—H. R. 7940—was to be filed yesterday or will be filed to-day. I expect to be absent for a few days, and I ask unanimous consent to have five legislative days after the filing of the majority report in which to file my own personal minority views.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] whether it is the purpose not to consider this legislation within the next five legislative days?

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, as a matter of fact, we do not know just when it will be considered, because the report has not yet been filed.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. And the gentleman would not want to grant five legislative days within which to file minority views if he were going to call up the legislation before that time? That is the reason I am asking now whether the gentleman expects to call it up within five legislative days.

Mr. SNELL. No arrangement has been made as yet, because the bill has not been reported. I do not know what they want to do. We expect to take the legislation up within a reasonable time.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Then the gentleman would not let this unanimous request, if it be granted, stand in the way of considering the legislation if he saw proper to do so.

Mr. SNELL. I do not think it would be possible to take it up within five days, anyway.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ASWELL] spoke to me yesterday about this measure and the filing of minority views upon it. I do not see him in the Chamber at the moment, but while this consent is being granted I think it might be well to prefer a request that if he so desires he may have five legislative days within which to file minority views, including others who wish to join with him.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that if the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ASWELL] so desires, he and others who may wish to join with him may have five legislative days within which to file minority views. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the special orders in order to-day, and other business that would have been in order to-day, be in order on Thursday next. I make that request because of an announcement which will shortly be made.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the special orders and other business in order to-day may go over until Thursday next and be in order at that time. Is there objection?

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, does that carry over Calendar Wednesday business?

Mr. SNELL. It has nothing to do with Calendar Wednesday business. That will come up to-morrow regularly.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I ask the gentleman whether or not the rule on the Newton bill provides under those circumstances that debate will continue on to Friday?

Mr. SNELL. It will be a continuing debate, of course.

DEATH OF REPRESENTATIVE JAMES A. GALLIVAN, OF MASSACHUSETTS

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, I send to the desk a resolution and ask for its immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts submits a resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 157

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. JAMES A. GALLIVAN, a Representative of the State of Massachusetts.

Resolved, That a committee of 22 Members of the House, with such Members of the Senate as may be joined, be appointed to attend the funeral.

Resolved, That the Sergeant at Arms of the House be authorized and directed to take such steps as may be necessary for carrying out the provisions of this resolution, and that the necessary expenses connected therewith be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The committee to attend the funeral will be selected and announced by the Speaker to-morrow.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect, this House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was unanimously agreed to.
